LORD CHELMSFORD delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—In this case an application was originally made ex parte for leave to permit the appellant to appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of British Guiana, committing him for a contempt, and their Lordships upon that occasion advised Her Majesty to allow the appellant to enter and prosecute his appeal without prejudice to the question of the competency to entertain an appeal from an order of a Court of record, inflicting punishment by fine or imprisonment for a contempt of Court. It is quite clear that, upon that ex parte application, and upon the leave which was conditionally granted, the respondents might have come in, and have moved to discharge the order, upon the very ground which has been taken to-day, namely, that there can be no appeal against an order of a Court of record committing a person for contempt. The appellant, therefore, is exactly in the same condition now as if the application had been made to rescind that order, and he would be bound to support the propriety of the leave to appeal by shewing either that the Court was not a Court of record, or that, if it was a Court of record, yet there was something in the order committing the appellant for contempt which rendered it improper, and therefore the subject of appeal.

The first question, therefore, which the appellant had to establish was that the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of British Guiana was not a Court of record. For that purpose he has argued at very considerable length—not at too much length—that originally by the constitution of the Court, which in its origin was a Dutch Court, it was not, according to the Dutch law, a Court of record, and that, according to that law, it was a Court which did not possess the power of committing for contempt. In the year 1802, in the Articles of Capitulation, upon the conquest of Demerara, there was a stipulation that the laws in use in the colony should remain in force and be retained. The constitution of the Supreme Court at this time, and down to the period of the ordinances which established it on its present footing, by the account given of it in Mr. Clarke's book on Colonial Law, appears to have been that it consisted of a president and eight members, of whom four and the president were to be present to constitute a Court. The president was appointed by the King, and removable at his pleasure. The other members were planters or merchants of the colony, elected by the College of Keysers, who, when vacancies occurred, returned a double number, from which the Court of Justice made a selection. In the month of May of every second year one-third of these colonial members vacated their seats, beginning with the oldest member, and, as their number was eight, three and two would vacate every alternate second year. The constitution of this Court might be satisfactory to the colonists, but it does not appear to have been one very desirable to be continued. Accordingly, by ordinances passed in the years 1831 and 1855, an entirely new Supreme Court of Justice was established —by the former ordinance for Demerara and Essequibo, and by the latter this Court, which had been united with the Court of Civil Justice of Berbice, was "to be consolidated into one Court, styled the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of British Guiana, and to continue to have the same jurisdiction as each of the Supreme Courts of Civil Justice of Demerara and Essequibo and of Berbice, and as such consolidated Court then possessed;" and it provided "that the Judges of the said Supreme Court, and each of them should have, possess, exercise and enjoy such and the same jurisdiction, powers, and authority in every respect as the Judges of the said Supreme Courts had theretofore lawfully possessed, exercised or enjoyed."

Now, it is to be observed that this ordinance is, in fact, equivalent to an Act of Parliament. Therefore the question is whether this Act of Parliament, as it may correctly be styled, did not establish this new Court in the colony to be a Court of record. What then were the powers which the Supreme Court lawfully possessed, exercised or enjoyed at the time of the passing of this ordinance? For these we are referred to the Order in Council of June 20, 1831, which provided for altering the original constitution of the Court, and ordered "That henceforth the Court of Criminal and Civil Justice of Demerara and Essequibo, and the Court of Civil Justice and the Court of Criminal Justice of Berbice, shall be holden by and before three Justices, and no more, and that the first or presiding Judge of the said Court shall be called and bear the style and title of Chief Justice of British Guiana, and that the second and third of such Judges shall be called and bear the respective styles and titles of first Puisne Judge and second Puisne Judge of British Guiana." In the provision made for the jurisdiction of the Judges in civil cases, it is ordered, "That in each of the said Courts respectively the said three Judges of the respective colonies shall in all civil cases have, possess, exercise and enjoy such and the same jurisdiction, powers and authority in every respect as the Judges of the said Courts have heretofore lawfully possessed, exercised or enjoyed; and that the decision of the majority of such three Judges shall, in all civil cases at any time depending in the said respective Courts, be taken and adjudged to be, and shall be recorded as the judgment of the whole of such Court."

It might be said, without going further, that this provision in the ordinance of June, 1831, with respect to the powers and authority of the Judges (which are preserved to them by the ordinance of 1855), in terms constituted the Supreme Court a Court of record, for no other interpretation can be fairly put upon the words "that the decision of the majority of the Judges shall be taken and adjudged to be, and shall be recorded as the judgment of the whole of such Court."

But it was argued by Mr. Coleridge, that in the year 1846 a criminal Court was established in British Guiana, and that this criminal Court was expressly ordered to be a Court of record. For by the second article of that ordinance it is enacted "that the Supreme Courts of Criminal Justice in British Guiana shall be Courts of record, and shall have cognizance of all criminal pleas and jurisdiction in all criminal cases whatsoever as fully and amply, to all intents and purposes, in British Guiana, as Her Majesty's Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, at Westminster." From this ordinance he drew the following argument: here, he said, is an ordinance in the year 1846, which orders that the Court of Criminal Jurisdiction shall be a Court of record. It says nothing with regard to the Supreme Court of Civil Justice, and therefore impliedly it must be taken that that Court was not to be a Court of record. In other words, the ordinances of 1831 and 1855 having, according to the view of their Lordships, constituted the Supreme Court of Civil Justice a Court of record, an ordinance of 1846, referring solely to the establishment of a criminal Court, is to have the effect by force of the words making it a Court of record of proving that the Court of Civil Justice is not a Court of record. Their Lordships were referred by the Solicitor-General to an ordinance which immediately preceded that upon which Mr. Coleridge laid so much stress, which was the ordinance No. 19, of the year 1846, which provided that there might be a trial by jury in all issues in civil cases, and that the Supreme Court of Civil Justice might try at bar with a jury any cases which they thought it was right and proper should be so tried.

Now, in the case of Rainy v. the Justices of Sierra Leone (not reported), where a question arose whether the Recorder's Court of Sierra Leone was a Court of record or not, and whether the Court, being a Court of record, would have power to commit for contempt, their Lordships said: "The Recorder's Court is created by the Charter of Justice, dated October 17, 1821, and is authorized to hear and determine all civil suits, actions and pleas which may happen within the colony, and the charter directs that, in all cases where the action would, if the parties were resident in England, be tried by a jury, such action shall be tried before a jury in the Court of Recorder, according to the practice in England.

That being the constitution of the Court, in regard to trial by jury, we are of opinion that it is a Court of record, and that the law must be considered the same there as in this country, and therefore that the orders made by the Court in the exercise of its discretion, imposing these fines for contempts, are conclusive, and cannot be questioned by another Court; and we do not consider that there is any remedy by petition to the Judicial Committee to review the propriety of such orders." If, therefore, it had been shewn to their Lordships in the clearest and most satisfactory manner that, according to the old Dutch law and the original constitution of this Court in the colony of British Guiana, it had no power whatever to commit for contempt, still, under the ordinances of 1831 and 1855, they would entertain no doubt that the old Dutch law was completely superseded, and that this Court was established as a Court of record by that which is equivalent to an Act of Parliament. Under these circumstances, the Supreme Court of Civil Justice, being a Court of record, it is only necessary to refer to cases in which appeals have been made to the Judicial Committee from orders committing parties for contempt by colonial Courts of record, to see whether this is a case in which their Lordships would think it proper, according to those authorities, that the appellants should have a right to appeal. Not a single case is to be found where there has been a committal by one of the colonial Courts for contempt, where it appeared clearly upon the face of the order that the party had committed a contempt, that he had been duly summoned, and that the punishment awarded for the contempt was an appropriate one, in which this Committee has ever entertained an appeal against an order of this description. The cases to which we have been referred are all cases very special in their circumstances, and in which leave was given owing to some peculiar objection to the committals for contempt. In the case of Smith (3 Moore P.C. 361) there was an order of the Recorder's Court of Sierra Leone, disbarring and striking off from the Rolls a practitioner of that Court for alleged contumelious conduct. But in addition to this order, there was a distinct and separate one, ordering Mr. Smith to be fined and imprisoned for the same alleged contempt. Now, the mode in which the committee dealt with these orders brings out the distinction as to the right to appeal in these cases in the clearest manner. Mr. Smith's petition was presented through the Secretary of State, and after considerable delay it was, by an Order in Council, referred to the Judicial Committee. Their Lordships, in that case, entertained the petition against the order for disbarring Mr. Smith and striking him off the roll, because they held that that was not an appropriate punishment for a contempt of Court. They took no notice of the order for imprisonment which they seemed to consider to be in the same category with the fine; but with regard to the fine imposed by the Court for contempt, they held that they had no jurisdiction over it, and that they could not entertain the appeal. In the case, in the same volume, of In re Downie (3 Moore P.C. 414) there was an application first of all, and special leave granted to appeal from two orders of the Supreme Court of British Guiana suspending the petitioners from practice for six months. The orders in this case were reversed upon the same ground as in the previous case to which we have referred. In Rainy's case (37 L. J. P.C. 94) both the cases previously referred to were cited, and therefore their Lordships had before them the consideration of the whole question as to the propriety of entertaining appeals of this description.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships entertain no doubt whatever as to the propriety of deciding that in this case the leave to appeal ought not to have been granted, that the Supreme Court of Civil Justice was a Court of record, and that as a Court of record it had power to commit for this particular contempt. As their Lordships do not enter into the merits of the case, they will say nothing as to the character of the libel upon which the Court thought it proper to commit the publisher for contempt; but their Lordships will humbly report to Her Majesty as their opinion that Her Majesty's Order in Council of November 10, 1866, whereby leave to appeal was conditionally granted, in this case ought to be rescinded, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Bermuda—Chancery Jurisdiction—Church of England—Benefice—Induction of Incumbent—Forcible Obstruction by Laity—Writ "De Vi Laica Removenda."

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—By an Act of the colony of Bermuda a Court of Chancery was established in the islands, with authority to examine, hear, judge, determine and decree all matters, causes and things whatsoever as fully and amply as the High Court of Chancery may and can:

The appellant, a clerk in orders, was presented by the Crown to the rectory of the parishes of H. and S. The appellant was duly inducted into the parish church of H., but his induction into the parish church of S. was obstructed by the laity. The appellant applied to the Court of Chancery in the colony for a writ de vi laica removenda, to remove the obstruction. The Court refused the writ:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Chancery in Bermuda, that the appellant was not entitled to such writ ex debito justitiæ; and that the writ de vi laica removenda is not a necessary incident of Chancery jurisdiction.

This was an appeal from two orders of the Court of Chancery of the Islands of Bermuda, made respectively on February 23, 1867, and December 9, 1867, by which an application made by the appellant, Charles Alfred Jenkins, for a writ de vi laica removenda, to remove any opposition which might be offered to his being inducted into the parish church of Smith, in the said Islands, was refused.

The appointment to vacant benefices in Bermuda has, ever since the establishment of the government of the colony under a governor in the year 1685, been vested in the Crown, and has been from time to time exercised without dispute by the governors, who, by their commissions down to the year 1825, were empowered to collate any person to any ecclesiastical benefices in the islands of Bermuda as often as they should happen to be void.

In the year 1825, Bermuda was first attached to the see of Nova Scotia, then newly created. Since that time the governor's commissions, instead of authorizing them to collate to vacant benefices, have directed them to present clergymen to the Bishop of Nova Scotia from 1825 to 1839, and since then to the Bishop of Newfoundland for induction; and the governors have constantly acted in pursuance of these directions; and down to the time of the order of February 23, 1867, no doubt was ever raised as to the legality of filling vacant livings by presentation, institution and induction, instead of by collation, and in fact every beneficed clergyman of the said Islands has acquired in that mode the living now held by him.

The parochial and vestry system of the Church of England has existed in Bermuda, and has been recognized by various Acts of the Bermuda legislature since the year 1693 down to the present time.

In 1839 the bishopric of Newfoundland was created, and the Islands of Bermuda were disannexed from the see of Nova Scotia, and annexed to the see of Newfoundland, and by the letters patent creating the bishopric of Newfoundland, it was, amongst other things, declared that the bishop and his successors might exercise and enjoy full power and authority by himself or themselves, to give institution to benefices.

The bishoprics of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland were created by the authority of the letters patent alone, and the annexation thereto of the Islands of Bermuda, and of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction therein, was not made under the express authority of any Act of the Imperial or colonial legislatures. The episcopal authority conferred by the letters patent creating the bishopric of Newfoundland has, as respects the Islands of Bermuda, been recognized by many Acts of the legislature of that colony.

In January, 1867, the acting governor of the Islands of Bermuda, by a letter of presentation addressed to the Bishop of Newfoundland, presented the appellant for institution to the then vacant rectory of Smith and Hamilton, situate in the said Islands.

On January 17, 1867, the acting ecclesiastical commissary of the said Bishop of Newfoundland (the said bishop being then absent from the Islands) admitted and instituted the appellant to the said rectory, and addressed a mandate to the Rev. Joseph Frazer Lightbourn, authorizing and instructing him to induct the appellant to the said rectory.

On February 9, 1867, the Rev. Joseph Frazer Lightbourn inducted the appellant into the parish church of Hamilton, and was proceeding thence to the parish church of Smith for a similar purpose, but was met by a large body of laymen, who, by a display of physical force and actual violence, prevented the induction of the appellant to the church, and the appellant had ever since been excluded from the church of Smith, the doors of which have been closed against him whenever he hath presented himself there.

On February 23, 1867, the appellant moved the Court of Chancery of Bermuda for a writ de vi laica removenda, to remove any opposition by force of the laity which might be offered to his being inducted to the parish church of Smith.

The Attorney-General of Bermuda appeared and was heard on behalf of the Crown in support of the said motion.

The motion was refused by a majority of the Judges upon the ground—That since the decisions of the Privy Council in the cases of Long v. The Bishop of Capetown (1 Moore P.C. N.S. 411) and In re the Bishop of Natal (3 Moore P.C. N.S. 115), it was not competent to the Crown, in a colony having a settled constitution and representative form of government, to alter the constitution of the colony as to its church establishment by conferring by letters patent on a bishop any coercive or judicial powers, and that the institution by the bishop of the appellant was a judicial act not authorized by law, and consequently that the Court ought not to grant the writ moved for, the practical effect of which would be to authorize the employment of the civil force of the colony in aid of the Bishop's mandate.

On December 9, 1867, a second application was made on behalf of the appellant to the Court of Chancery at Bermuda, for such writ to remove the further opposition of the laity to his induction to the parish church of Smith, and was refused.

From these orders the present appeal was brought.

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. Baggallay) and Archibald, for the appellant.—The orders of the Court of Chancery in Bermuda were erroneous and ought to be reversed. The writ ought to have been issued. The matter should be remitted to the Court, with directions for the issue of the writ. The decisions of the Privy Council, relied upon by the Court of Chancery in Bermuda as a ground for refusing the issue of the writ prayed for, are inapplicable. The circumstances in reference to church establishment of the respective colonies of the Cape of Good Hope and of the Islands of Bermuda are totally different. Even if these decisions were otherwise applicable, institution and induction are not acts of either coercive or judicial jurisdiction. The episcopal authority conferred upon the Bishop of Newfoundland by the letters patent of 1839, and the validity of institution and induction as practised in the colony, have been recognized by repeated Acts of the colonial legislature. Under all the circumstances, the application should have been granted and the writ issued.—They referred to Fitzherbert de Natura Brevium, p. 55; Dr. Warren's case (reported separately); Long v. the Bishop of Capetown (1 Moore P.C. N.S. 411); In re the Bishop of Natal (3 Moore P.C. N.S. 115); Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, vol. i. p. 173; Watson's Clergyman's Law, c. 30; Roberts v. Agmondesham (Moore's

No counsel appeared on the other side.

LORD CHELMSFORD delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This is an appeal from two orders of the Court of Chancery of the Islands of Bermuda, upon an application on behalf of the Rev. Charles Alfred Jenkins for a writ de vi laica removenda to remove any opposition which might be offered to his being inducted into Smith's parish church as the rector and incumbent thereof.

A majority of the Court refused the writ for the reasons assigned by the Chief Justice, one of the members of the Court. He said that the law relating to writs de vi laica removenda was very obscure, and that no instance was known of such a writ ever having been granted in Bermuda. And he conceived that since the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Long v. the Bishop of Capetown (1 Moore P.C. N.S. 411) and In re the Bishop of Natal (3 Moore P.C. N.S. 115), it must be considered that it is not competent to the Crown in any colony having a settled constitution and representative form of government such as Bermuda had, to alter the constitution of the church in the colony, by conferring by patent upon a bishop any coercive or judicial powers not granted by the Imperial Parliament or the local legislature. That it appeared to him, that according to the effect of these decisions the bishop had not lawful authority, without legislative sanction, to grant institution and issue a mandate for induction into benefices in Bermuda.

The appeal was argued ex parte, no one appearing on the other side, although ample notice was given to a person who had been the foremost in resisting the induction of Mr. Jenkins, that leave to appeal had been granted. Under these circumstances their Lordships before delivering their judgment have very carefully considered the grounds which were assigned for refusing to grant the writ prayed for, and the arguments which were urged by the appellants against such refusal.

The Islands of Bermuda, which had previously been a proprietary colony, were transferred to the Crown in 1685. They then possessed, and have ever since enjoyed, an independent legislature. They were first attached to the colonial see of Nova Scotia in the year 1825, and were afterwards transferred, in 1839, to the newly-erected bishopric of Newfoundland.

By the letters patent of Dr. Inglis, who was appointed Bishop of Nova Scotia and its dependencies in 1825, authority was given to him to exercise jurisdiction, spiritual and ecclesiastical, and all and singular the functions and authorities within (amongst other places) Newfoundland and the Bermudas, which might be lawfully exercised within the province and diocese of Nova Scotia. By the letters patent of 1839, erecting the island of Newfoundland into a bishop's see, the former letters patent were revoked so far as they related to the islands of Newfoundland and the Bermudas; and power and authority were given to the bishop, by himself or by his sufficient commissary or commissaries to be by him substituted and appointed, to exercise jurisdiction, spiritual and ecclesiastical, and all and singular functions and authorities within the Islands of the Bermudas and their dependencies, which might, by virtue of the letters patent, be lawfully exercised by himself or his commissary or commissaries within the island and diocese of Newfoundland.

The Islands of Bermuda seem to have been divided into parishes at the time of their becoming a Crown colony, or very soon afterwards, for amongst the Acts of their legislature, there is one as early as the year 1693 for settling a yearly revenue upon the minister or incumbent of St. George's parish, and of the other parishes within the islands. That the parochial system was completely established towards the end of the last century appears from another Act of March 30, 1755, intituled 'An Act for the more regular payment of the clergy, the regulating the seats or pews in the several churches in these islands, and more effectual recovery of parish assessments.' And the church of Smith itself, to which these proceedings apply, has been the subject of legislative provision; for by an Act of March 17, 1820, it is enacted, " that the parishes of Smith and Hamilton, together with the annual interests, profits or issues payable by law for the glebe situate in the parish of Hamilton, and which has been sold in fee simple, conditional, under and by virtue of an Act of the legislature, shall constitute one living."

It must be borne in mind that during the whole of this long period, when the legislature of the Bermudas was constantly recognizing the establishment of parishes and their incumbents, the power of appointing clergymen to the different parishes was vested in the governors. This authority they possessed, by delegation from the Crown, conveyed to them by a clause in their commissions, directing them to collate to all vacant benefices within the islands. This form of commission continued down to the year 1831, when it was changed by substituting a clause directing the governor, upon the vacancy of a benefice, to present a clerk to the bishop (first of Nova Scotia and afterwards of Newfoundland) for institution. This clause continued to be inserted in the governor's commission down to the year 1861. Since that time it has been omitted from the commissions and introduced into the instructions to the governors.

In explaining the reasons for refusing the writ de vi laica removenda, the Chief Justice, after stating that it was not competent to the Crown to alter the constitution of the Church in the colony by conferring by patent upon a bishop any coercive or judicial powers not granted by the Imperial Parliament or the local legislature, added, "Although the institution of a clergyman to a benefice is not an act of coercive or contentious jurisdiction, yet it is not a mere ministerial act, but is of a judicial nature." Strictly speaking, however, it is not so much the institution which is judicial as the previous examination of the fitness of the clerk presented; for if the clerk be really idonea persona, the bishop would be bound to institute him. But whether institution is to be regarded as a judicial or ministerial act is wholly immaterial.

The question is, whether the Crown has conferred an authority which was not within its competency. Now it is a fact which cannot be disputed that for more than a century the Crown possessed the power of collating to all the vacant benefices in the Burmudas by direct nomination, a power which it exercised by delegation to the successive governors, who were usually described as ordinaries in their patents, and who to a certain extent exercised the powers of that ecclesiastical officer. But when a bishop or ecclesiastical ordinary was duly appointed, with spiritual oversight of the Church in the Bermudas, the Crown, as patron, thought proper to leave to the governor the power of nominating the clerk, but recognized by the letters patent granted to the bishop the power of institution belonging to his office. The bishop, as has been said, is bound if the clerk be idonea persona to institute him. It cannot be supposed that when the Crown gave a clergyman a title to a living by one act of collation, the appointment was made without previous inquiry as to his qualifications. The whole effect of the alteration of the system of conferring benefices in the Bermudas is to transfer this inquiry from the governor to the bishop. It seems to have been supposed, however, that the cases Long v. the Bishop of Capetown (Moore's Rep. fol. ed. 781) and In re the Bishop of Natal (1 Moore P.C. N.S. 411) are authorities for the proposition that the Bishop of Newfoundland has no legal status, and cannot lawfully exercise any episcopal function within the Bermudas. The first case certainly does not go the length of that proposition, for it decided only that the Crown cannot confer coercive authority on a bishop in a colony possessing a constitutional form of government without the consent of the legislature. The Judicial Committee in deciding the case of the Bishop of Natal has certainly used expressions which would restrain the power of the Crown in the creation of bishops within even narrower limits.

It has been argued that the Master of the Rolls, in his judgment in Colenso v. Gladstone (36 L. J. Ch. 2), has greatly qualified the effect of the former judgment in the Privy Council. Their Lordships think that in the present case they are not called upon to express an opinion whether these two decisions can be reconciled. For they are clearly of opinion that the question whether the Bishop of Newfoundland has any lawful status, or can exercise any episcopal function, and particularly that of institution in the Bermudas, has been set at rest conclusively by the repeated recognition of his status and functions by the colonial legislature. The Acts of 1843, of 1864, of 1865 and 1866, mentioned in the memorandum of the Attorney-General of the Bermudas, all recognize the legal status of the bishop of the diocese.

The Chief Justice doubted whether the institution of Mr. Jenkins to the church of Smith was valid. Upon this point he said, "Supposing the bishop had authority to institute, it did not seem clear under the instructions of the governor, that a presentation could properly be made during the bishop's absence from Bermuda to his commissary, or that the commissary could admit and institute a clergyman to a benefice without the special direction of the bishop in each particular case." Now, as already shewn, the Bishop of Newfoundland has authority by his letters patent to exercise all his functions and authorities by himself or his commissary. And that a general authority may be given to the commissary, and that a special direction upon each occasion is unnecessary appears from a clause in the letters patent, "that during the vacancy of the see by the demise of the bishop or his successors, or otherwise, institutions to benefices and licences to curates may be given by the commissary or commissaries who were so as aforesaid named and substituted by the last preceding bishop, and were in possession of that office under such substitution and appointment at the time when the see became vacant."

Mr. Jenkins was duly presented by the governor to the rectory of the parishes of Hamilton and Smith by a formal presentation to the bishop, or, in his absence, to Mr. Coombe, his acting ecclesiastical commissary. And Mr. Coombe, reciting his authority derived from the bishop as commissary and that he was acting by virtue of it, instituted Mr. Jenkins to the rectory and issued a mandate for his induction; upon which he was quietly inducted into the church of Hamilton, but resistance was made to his being put into possession of the church of Smith. There can be no doubt that Mr. Jenkins was duly presented to the rectory, and was instituted by lawful authority. The only remaining question is as to the remedy which Mr. Jenkins sought to obtain for the obstruction offered to his induction into the church of Smith.

The writ de vi laica removenda may be regarded at the present day as an obsolete proceeding. Very little is to be found in the books as to the nature of the procedure upon this writ. The short account which is given of it in Fitz. N.B., p. 55, furnishes very slight information. There is no doubt that the writ issued out of the Court of Chancery (as, indeed, all original writs formerly did), and of course from the common law side of that Court. It also was applicable only to the case of an incumbent of the Established Church who was hindered or disturbed in his possession of the church. It is very difficult to see how this remedy could be applied by the Court of Chancery in the Bermudas to the case of the disturbance of a church in those islands.

A Court of Chancery was established by an Act of the legislature of the islands in the year 1814. By section 29. of this Act, after enacting the mode in which the Court is to be constituted, power and authority is given to it to examine, hear, judge, determine and decree all matters, causes and things whatever, as fully and amply to all intents and purposes whatsoever as the High Court of Chancery may and can do, and also to make and establish such rules, regulations and orders respecting the practice merely of the said Court as may be necessary or expedient. The words of this Act are very large, and confer jurisdiction in very full terms, but it may be questioned whether they are intended to apply to the case of ordering a specific form of proceeding to be applied to a particular cause of action. It may be said that they give power to judge and determine whether the facts were such as to call for a writ de vi laica removenda; but that would be to beg the preliminary question whether such a writ is issuable. It is probable that under the power subsequently given to make rules and orders respecting the practice of the Court, this form of remedy might be introduced, as the forms of writs and remedies are matters of practice of a Court. No rule has been made by the Court of Chancery in the Bermudas with regard to this writ de vi laica removenda; and there is great doubt whether the Court would be disposed to make any rule or order on the subject. The forms of procedure in the English Courts may or may not be appropriate in a colony, or capable of being properly addressed and put in use. This writ is not an essential mode of preserving and quieting possession, and all that was practically wanted in the present case was to put a minister in possession and enjoyment of his temporalities. It is not, therefore, ex debito justitiæ that the appellants should have this particular form of remedy. It is not universi juris wherever an Established Church exists; for it can issue only out of a Court of Chancery, and there may be no Court of Chancery in this sense, viz., with full authority to frame and issue the writ. The authority in this case, therefore, if it exist at all, must be implied, for it has never been used before. But why should it be implied? Is it a necessary incident of Chancery jurisdiction? If not, it is not conferred by the words creating the Court of Chancery in the Bermudas, words which (as already observed) apply to jurisdiction over matters in dispute, and not to modes of procedure. And an injunction would, probably, have served all the necessary requirements in the present case, and have restrained all interference with the induction of Mr. Jenkins. It seems to their Lordships that it would be an inconvenient precedent to imply the existence of a writ not known to the Court itself, nor necessary to the enforcement of the legal right obstructed, merely from the creation of a Court, and a general grant in large words of general jurisdiction.

Their Lordships entertain no doubt whatever of the lawfulness of Mr. Jenkins's institution to the rectory of Hamilton and Smith, and of his right to be inducted into the church of Smith. But they cannot say that the Court of Chancery was wrong in refusing to grant him the writ de vi laica removenda to prevent the obstruction to his induction, and therefore, upon this ground, and this ground only, they must humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed.

Canada—Old French Law—Usurious Contract—Acts and Ordinances of Lower Canada, 17 Geo. 3. c. 3. and 16 Vict. c. 80.—Construction of.

COLONY.—By the old French law, which prevailed in Canada, when upon a usurious contract the principal and legal interest have been fully paid, any money afterwards received by the lender beyond the legal amount may be recovered back, and such right of action is assignable.

By an Act of Lower Canada, passed in the year 1777 (17 Geo. 3. c. 3), it was provided that all bonds, contracts and assurances, whereupon or whereby a greater interest than 6*l. per cent. should be reserved or taken, should be utterly void, and that every person who should either directly or indirectly take, accept or receive a higher rate of interest should forfeit and lose treble the value.*

By an Act of Lower Canada, passed in the year 1853 (16 Vict. c. 80), it was provided, "That no contract to be hereafter made in any part of the province for the loan or forbearance of money at any rate of interest whatsoever, and no payment in pursuance of such contract shall make any party to such contract or payment liable to any loss, forfeiture, penalty or proceeding, civil or criminal, for usury, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." And it was further provided, that every such contract and every security for the same should be void so far, and so far only, as relates to any excess of interest, thereby made payable above the rate of 6l. for the forbearance of 100l. for a year, and the said rate of 6l. per cent. interest, or such lower rate of interest as may have been agreed upon, shall be allowed and recovered in all cases where it is the agreement of the parties that interest shall be paid.

The appellant, in the year 1845, received by way of loan from the respondents a sum of money at 6l. per cent. Payments were made on account of principal and interest up to the year 1855, when the appellant sued the respondents to recover back some of the interest paid on the ground that at the time the loan was contracted a sum of money was paid to the respondent as a bonus in addition to the interest:—Held, first, that the Act of 1853 did not prevent the plaintiff recovering back, in the action, any usurious interest which had been paid, as such action was not a "civil proceeding for usury"; secondly, that the words "such contract or security shall be void so far, and as far only, as relates to any excess of interest," &c., could only mean that the lenders should not recover more than 6l. per cent., and not that the contract itself should be affected by the stipulation for more than legal interest.

This was an appeal from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, dismissing an action commenced by the appellant against the respondents, to recover back payments made on the footing of a usurious contract, in excess of the sum actually advanced and lawful interest upon that sum.

The facts of the case were as follows:

On November 11, 1845, the appellant, on behalf of himself and of some other persons, entered into an obligation acknowledging that he owed to Dame Marie Louise Cousineau, represented in the deed by the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion, her attorney, a sum of 4,875*l.* currency, for money lent by the said Dame Cousineau; and by the said obligation the sum of 1,500*l.*, part of the said 4,875*l.*, was acknowledged to have been then paid to the appellant, and the sum of 3,375*l.*, residue of the said 4,875*l.*, was to be paid by the said Dame Cousineau to the appellant so soon as that sum could be received. And by the said obligation the sum of 4,875*l.* was agreed to be payable to Dame Cousineau at the end of eight years, with interest at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, payable annually.

In respect of this and of another loan, the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion admitted that he received a bonus of 1,500*l.* from the appellant; and it was in consequence of the receipt of this sum that the present litigation arose.

With respect to the 1,500*l.*, the appellant alleged that the sum of 1,500*l.* was never advanced or paid at all, but was retained by the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion. The respondents alleged that the whole of the said sum of 1,500*l.* was bonâ fide paid to the appellant as stated in the obligation, but that the appellant and his co-borrowers afterwards paid to the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion a sum of 1,500*l.* for his own sole use, and for his personal services in connection with the loan; and that he applied the said sum of 1,500*l.* accordingly, without accounting for any part thereof to the said Dame Cousineau.

Dame Cousineau died, leaving her three sons, the two respondents, Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion and Zéphir Dorion and Eustache Dorion, her universal legatees. The said Eustache Dorion afterwards assigned his interest in the estate of Dame Cousineau to the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion.

On October 21, 1862, the appellant brought an action against the respondent to recover back certain sums of money alleged to have been overpaid to them in respect of the obligation for 4,875*l.* so given to Dame Cousineau.

The respondents severed in their defence to the said action. The respondent J. B. T. Dorion admitted by his pleas that he had received 1,500*l.* from the appellant; but he stated that Dame Cousineau had never exacted any bonus on the said loan, and that she had never authorized her attorney to exact any bonus in respect of the said loan; but he stated that on his own behalf, without the knowledge of Dame Cousineau, as compensation for trouble taken by him, he had entered into an agreement for a bonus of 1,500*l.*; and that the bonus was his own, and that he had never accounted for the same to any one.

The other respondent, Zéphir Dorion, in his pleas, alleged in substance that Dame Cousineau never kept back, and never authorized Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion as her attorney to keep back any part of the 4,875*l.*; that if he did so he did it without her knowledge and without her receiving any part of it.

To the plea of the respondent Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion the appellant replied, in substance, that Dame Cousineau never in fact advanced or paid more than 3,375*l.*, and that it was consequently not only untrue but absurd to say that the transaction was really a payment of 4,875*l.* by her, and a repayment out of that sum, without her knowledge, to the respondent, her attorney, for his own benefit.

The replication to the plea of the respondent, Zéphir Dorion, was substantially similar to the replication to the plea of the other respondent. It pointed out that the 1,500*l.* retained out of the nominal loan, had, in fact, remained in the hands of Dame Cousineau; had not passed from her to the borrowers, and from them to Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion; and that it was she who had the benefit of it, and no one else.

The cause came on for hearing before the Supreme Court of Lower Canada; and judgment was delivered on December 31, 1863, in favour of the appellant, and the respondents were condemned to pay the sum demanded by the appellant, with costs.

Both respondents presented separate appeals from the judgment of the Superior Court to the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada. On June 9, 1866, the Court of Queen's Bench delivered judgment in both the appeals in favour of the respondents, and reversed the judgment of the superior Court. From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

At the time the contract was entered into for the loan the statute law as to usury which was in force in Lower Canada was contained in the following clause from the Revised Acts of Lower Canada, p. 312, section 5: "From and after the publication of this ordinance it shall not be lawful upon any contract to take directly or indirectly for loan of any moneys, wares, merchandises or other commodities whatsoever above the value of 6*l.* for the forbearance of 100*l.* for a year, and so after that rate for a greater or lesser sum in value, or for a longer or shorter time, and the said rate of interest shall be allowed and recovered in all cases where it is the agreement of the parties that interests shall be paid; and all bonds, contracts and assurances whatsoever whereupon or whereby a greater interest shall be reserved and taken shall be utterly void, and every person who shall either directly or indirectly take, accept and receive a higher rate of interest shall forfeit and lose for every such offence treble the value of the moneys, wares, merchandises and other things lent or bargained for, to be recovered by action of debt in any of the Courts of Common Pleas in this province, a moiety of which forfeiture shall be to His Majesty, and the other moiety to him or them that will sue for the same."

Certain changes took place in the usury laws of Lower Canada between 1845 and 1862. By the statutes of Canada for the year 1853 (16 Vict. c. 80), it was enacted as follows: "And be it enacted, that no contract to be hereafter made in any part of this province for the loan or forbearance of money or money's worth at any rate of interest whatsoever, and no payment in pursuance of such contract shall make any party to such contract or payment liable to any loss, forfeiture, penalty or proceeding, civil or criminal, for usury, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." "Provided always nevertheless, and be it enacted, that every such contract, and every security for the same, shall be void so far, and so far only, as relates to any excess of interest thereby made payable above the rate of 6*l.* for the forbearance of 100*l.* for a year, and the said rate of 6*l.* per cent. interest, or such lower rate of interest as may have been agreed upon, shall be allowed and recovered in all cases where it is the agreement of the parties that interest shall be paid."

H. W. Cole and Wickens, for the appellant.—The contract of November 11, 1845, was usurious and void. The remedy of the obligors in respect of the usurious nature of the obligation is in no way prejudiced or affected by the subsequent change of the law. The remedy of the appellant is not waived or suspended by any of the proceedings which were taken against them for the purpose of enforcing the contract. The appellant represents all the obligors in the bond, and is entitled to claim whatever any or all could have claimed in respect of it. The appellant is entitled to recover back from the respondents every sum, with interest thereon, which the obligors paid beyond the sum actually advanced when the obligation was executed, and interest on that sum at 6*l.* per cent. per annum.—They referred to Pothier (Traité de l'Usure, art. 113, 704, 761, 795, 1485); Civil Code of Canada (Art. 1570); Scurry v. Freeman (2 Bos. & P. 381); Fitzroy v. Gwillim (1 Term Rep. 153); M'Cade (vol. 3, p. 213); Bosanquet v. Dashwood (Cas. temp. Talbot, 38); Wilson v. Metcalfe (1 Russ. 530); and Montgomery v. Calland (14 Sim. 79).

Sir Roundell Palmer and Lindley, for the respondents.—The original decree was erroneous and was properly reversed. There was no usurious contract within the meaning of the Act of 1777. The action was a civil proceeding in respect of usury. The loan was in no sense usurious. The whole sum was bonâ fide advanced. But, even if the loan was usurious, it would not be competent for the appellant to recover back money paid in respect of it. Even if the loan was usurious within the meaning of the Canadian Act of 17 Geo. 3. c. 3, that Act was repealed in 1853, before any of the sums sought to be recovered by the appellant were paid. No usurious payment was made to or taken by or on behalf of the respondents whilst the Act of 17 Geo. 3. was in force.—They referred to Toullier (Droit Civil).

The Lord Chancellor delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court of that province in an action by the appellant against the respondents.

The action was brought to recover from the defendants, jointly and severally, as universal legatees of their mother, Marie Louise Cousineau, a sum of 5,329*l.* 10*s.*, alleged to have been paid to them by the plaintiff, in excess of the amount of legal interest payable under a contract for the loan of 4,875*l.* by Madame Cousineau to the plaintiff and his wife, Lewis Thomas Drummond and his wife, Samuel Cornwallis Monk and his wife, and Edward Silvester Count de Rottermund and his wife. The declaration in the action states, that, by an obligation dated November 11, 1845, the plaintiff, in his own name and in the names of the other borrowers, acknowledged to have received, by way of loan, from Madame Cousineau (represented by the defendant, Jean Baptiste Théophile Dorion), a sum of 4,875*l.*, which they bound themselves to repay to Madame Cousineau in manner mentioned in the obligation. That the plaintiff received from the defendant, Jean B. T. Dorion, acting as aforesaid, only 3,325*l.*, and that he retained the balance of 1,550*l.* as a bonus or premium, or illegal and usurious interest. The declaration states the death of Madame Cousineau, leaving the two defendants and their brother, Eustache Dorion, her universal legatees, and that the rights of Eustache Dorion having been ceded to Jean B. T. Dorion, the two defendants are the only representatives of their mother. It then states various payments made on account of principal and interest due on the obligation of November 11, 1845, which, on March 6, 1854, left a balance of 2,138*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*; and that on that day Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, two of the debtors in the obligation, sold to the Honourable Judge Mondelet part of the property charged with the payment of the loan; and that, on September 1, 1855, by an arrangement between Judge Mondelet and the two defendants and divers other creditors of the vendors, he paid to the defendants a sum of 78*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*, and afterwards another sum of 5,023*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, on account of principal and interest upon the obligation. That, as at this time there was due upon the said obligation only the sum of 2,138*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*, the defendants received, beyond the principal and legal interest at 6*l.* per cent., a sum of 2,963*l.* 10*s.* That this sum, with interest, amounts to 5,329*l.* 10*s.*, which the borrowers are entitled to recover from the defendants with interest. The declaration then states an assignment to the plaintiff of all the interests and rights of action of the other debtors in the obligation of November 11, 1845, to demand and recover the usurious premium of 1,500*l.* and interest, and all other illegal and usurious interests paid in respect of the obligation, by which, as the plaintiff alleges, he is alone entitled to maintain the action.

The plea of the defendant Jean B. T. Dorion alleges that the loan in question was made by Madame Cousineau through his agency, and that she never stipulated for or required any bonus or usurious interest upon such loan. That, upon his own responsibility and for his own interest, unknown to Madame Cousineau, and to indemnify him for the steps and proceedings taken by him in the interest and for the profit of the borrowers, he entered into an agreement with them, by which they bound themselves to pay him a bonus of 1,500*l.* And that, on November 11, 1845, after having made the beforementioned loan of 4,875*l.* for Madame Cousineau, the borrowers paid him, on his own account, the said sum of 1,500*l.*

The plaintiff, in his answer to this plea, says that the sum of 1,500*l.* was exacted by Madame Cousineau, acting by the defendant as her agent, and was retained, not for himself, but for and in the name of Madame Cousineau.

The defendant Zéphir Dorion put in a separate plea, in which all that it is necessary to notice is that he repudiated all interest in the bonus paid to the other defendant, and renounced all claim to any part of it.

Upon the issues thus raised between the parties, and after hearing evidence on both sides, the superior Court was of opinion that the plaintiff had proved the facts alleged in his declaration. That the 1,500*l.* was exacted by Madame Cousineau as a bonus upon the loan made by her, and was deducted from the sum of 4,875*l.* which she agreed to advance; and the Court condemned the defendants, as her representatives, to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 3,958*l.* 6*s.*, the amount of excess of interest which they had exacted and received from him, together with interest and the costs of the action.

The defendants appealed separately to the Court of Queen's Bench from this judgment. The principal grounds of appeal alleged by Jean B. T. Dorion were: That the plaintiff had not proved the facts alleged in his declaration; that it was proved that if Jean B. T. Dorion received money from the plaintiff, it was paid to him on his own account and for his own benefit, and was not received by Madame Cousineau, and therefore her legatees could not be made liable for it; and that the plaintiff and the other borrowers of the moneys confirmed and ratified the obligation of November 11, 1845. The other defendant, Zéphir Dorion, in the factum upon his appeal, said that the only difference which existed between his defence and that of Jean B. T. Dorion was that his mother, Madame Cousineau, never stipulated for the premium of 1,500*l.*, nor authorized her agent, Jean B. T. Dorion, to require any such premium for himself; that she never received any part of the premium which was taken by Jean B. T. Dorion for his own benefit; that Madame Cousineau incurred no responsibility in respect of it; and that he (Zéphir Dorion) repudiated every agreement which might have been made by Jean B. T. Dorion as to the premium of 1,500*l.*

The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for Zéphir Dorion, on the ground that the plaintiff in the Court below had not proved, as to him, the material allegations of his declaration. And upon the appeal of Jean B. T. Dorion, they reversed the judgment of the superior Court, because (as they held) the evidence established that the money claimed by the plaintiff, under and by virtue of the transfer of March 18, 1862 (the assignment by the other debtors on the obligation of November 11, 1845, of all their claims and rights of action in respect of the alleged usury), was paid through and by Lewis T. Drummond and his wife, who alone could claim the amount if usuriously and illegally exacted, and that the other assignors, who had paid no part of the money, had no right of action against the defendants. The present appeal is from both these judgments.

Their Lordships cannot acquiesce in the reasons assigned by the Court of Queen's Bench for reversing the judgment of the superior Court in the case of Jean B. T. Dorion. It seems clear that, by the old French law, which prevailed in Canada, when, upon a usurious contract, the principal and legal interest have been fully paid, any money afterwards received by the lender beyond the legal amount due may be recovered back from him—4 Pothier, Traité de l'Usure, p. 114, art. 113. A right of action, therefore, is vested in the person so paying such usurious interest; and by the law of Canada such right of action is assignable. The Civil Code of Lower Canada, which, though not established till 1866, embodies all such provisions relative to civil matters as were in force at the time of the passing of the Act respecting the codification of the laws of that province, may properly be referred to for the law on this point. By article 1570, "The sale of debts and rights of action against third persons is perfected by the seller and buyer by the completion of the title, if authentic, or by the delivery of it, if under private signature." And the only exception to the right of dealing with these subjects is to be found in article 1485, which prohibits "Judges, advocates, attorneys, clerks, sheriffs, bailiffs and other officers, from becoming buyers of litigious rights which fall under the jurisdiction of the Court in which they exercise their functions."

Assuming that Mr. and Mrs. Drummond were entitled to recover back what they paid beyond the amount of principal and legal interest, they had by law an assignable right of action. This right of action by the instrument of March 18, 1862, they transferred and made over to the appellant, in the fullest and amplest manner. The other parties named in the obligation of November 11, 1845, joined in this assignment. Whether they were bound to repay to Mr. and Mrs. Drummond their shares of the money so paid is immaterial. The right of action to recover back the money was vested either in Mr. and Mrs. Drummond alone, or in all the parties to the obligation jointly. If all of them were entitled to maintain an action, the appellant has the assignment of all; and if the sole right of action was in Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, they have transferred that right to the appellant, and the joinder in the instrument of assignment of any number of persons who had nothing to assign, cannot affect, or in any way prejudice, the validity of the assignment by the persons who alone were interested. It has very properly not been attempted to maintain the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench on the ground upon which it was placed in the case of the defendant, Jean B. T. Dorion.

The questions which their Lordships have been called upon to consider in this appeal are: First, whether the plaintiff has proved the allegation in his declaration that the contract between him and Madame Cousineau was a usurious contract by reason of her having stipulated for and received a sum of 1,500*l.* as a bonus or premium for the loan of 4,875*l.*, which was to be repaid with full legal interest of 6*l.* per cent. upon the whole sum lent; secondly, if the original contract was illegal and void by the usury laws of Lower Canada in force at the time of its being entered into, whether transactions which took place between the parties after a change of those laws either ratified and confirmed the contract itself, or substituted for it another contract founded upon good and valid consideration.

The first question is one entirely of fact. The plaintiff was bound to prove that the loan upon which the 1,500*l.* was retained was made by Madame Cousineau, and that the retention was for her benefit. If it were not, the respondents could not be liable in the character in which they were sued, that of her legatees. It was not necessary to shew that Madame Cousineau personally received or retained the 1,500*l.* for her own use. If she either authorized her agent, Jean B. T. Dorion, to retain it for himself out of the loan made by her, or, knowing that he had so retained it, ratified what he had done, her contract would have been usurious. The facts which appear to be clearly established are, that an advance of 10,000*l.* having been originally required, it was arranged that a sum of 1,500*l.* should be given by the borrowers for this advance, and that when it was afterwards found that no more than 7,000*l.* could be lent, no reduction was made in the sum to be paid in respect of the loan. These facts are quite independent of the question to whom and for what the 1,500*l.* was to be paid. The loan of 7,000*l.* was made in two sums, one of 4,875*l.* by Madame Cousineau, the other of 3,626*l.* by Jean B. T. Dorion out of an estate of which he was curator; but the 1,500*l.* was deducted and retained out of the sum advanced by Madame Cousineau. This is proved by the fact that obligations having been entered into for repayment to the lenders respectively of the sums each advanced, both dated November 11, 1845, that which was given to Madame Cousineau states that the 1,500*l.* was paid at the time of the execution of the deed, and received as part of the loan of 4,875*l.* This statement in the deed is directly opposed to the appellant's case. He is compelled, therefore, to rely upon witnesses to prove the essential fact upon which alone he can recover in this action, viz., that the usury which he alleges entered into the contract with Madame Cousineau.

The principal witness produced by him to prove his case was the notary Leblanc, who was employed by the appellant and the other proposed borrowers to negotiate for the loan. He went with the appellant to St.-Eustache, where Madame Cousineau was residing, and saw her in the presence of her son, Jean B. T. Dorion. He stated that, as well as he could recollect, the appellant addressed himself to Madame Cousineau, and that it was perfectly understood that the loan was to be made at a rate above the legal interest, and this by the payment of a premium of 1,500*l.* That on the occasion of the interview with Madame Cousineau, the appellant, to the best of the witness's recollection, remarked that the premium demanded was very high; to which Jean B. T. Dorion or Madame Cousineau—but he believed it was Jean B. T. Dorion—said they could place out their capital at a more advantageous rate; but, the witness added, this was said in the presence of Madame Cousineau. Upon his cross-examination, he said it was M. Kierzkowski who held the conversation about the premium, and with Jean B. T. Dorion, though in the presence of his mother, M. Leblanc spoke, as he was likely to do at the distance of eighteen years, very uncertainly as to the particulars of a conversation in which he did not take much part, and to which his attention had probably not been called in the intervening period. He stated that M. Kierzkowski took the principal part in whatever conversation took place, and that it passed between him, the appellant, and Jean B. T. Dorion. From the appellant, therefore, we should naturally expect the best information respecting this important interview with Madame Cousineau, but he spoke with even more uncertainty than M. Leblanc. He said, "I only saw Madame Cousineau once upon the subject of the loan in question, and I believe I spoke to her about the premium, and told her the premium was too much. I think she made the same remark as her son, that they could lay out their capital on more advantageous terms." This, at best, is but slight evidence to fix Madame Cousineau with the knowledge of, and make her a party to the alleged usurious transaction. But, weak as the evidence is, it is much more weakened by other witnesses produced by the appellant himself, and especially by the evidence given by M. Leblanc upon the subject of this loan in a suit of Mitchell v. Jean B. T. Dorion (not reported), in which he was a witness. Upon this occasion he never mentioned the name of Madame Cousineau in connexion with the loan, but stated that all the arrangements for the loan, and all the stipulations as to the premium, passed with Jean B. T. Dorion. Jean B. T. Dorion himself was called as a witness in that suit, and though he alleged that the sum of 1,500*l.* was actually deducted from the money advanced by Madame Cousineau, he admitted that it was retained as a premium in respect of the whole loan. It must be observed that in this other suit, if M. Leblanc had not kept Madame Cousineau's name out of the transaction, it would have prejudiced the plaintiff's case for whom he was called; and that if he had not proved in the present action that she took an active part in the negotiations for the loan and the premium, the appellant must have failed. The whole proof of Madame Cousineau's participation in the usurious agreement rests upon the appellant and his witness, M. Leblanc. He produced other witnesses, but their evidence either added nothing or was unfavourable to his case. M. Moreau, an advocate, stated that the transaction of the loan was conducted by Jean B. T. Dorion, Madame Cousineau not at all interfering in the matter; and Judge Monk, who was one of the borrowers named in the obligation, knew nothing of the transaction except what was reported to him by the appellant and M. Leblanc, but understood (of course, from them) that Jean B. T. Dorion agreed to lend the money, and exacted the bonus of 1,500*l*.

The appellant examined Jean B. T. Dorion, who swore in the most positive terms that the affair of the premium was his own personal affair. He said he required it to pay for all the time he had to occupy himself in the matter, and for the loss of his practice as a physician for twelve months while he was ascertaining the value of the property of the borrowers, searching the registers, remaining a great part of the time at Montreal, travelling a great deal, and incurring an infinite number of other expenses. He also said that his mother never spoke to M. Leblanc about a premium, that all she did was to consent to the loan, and that she died without knowing that he had received the premium. Of course, this evidence, if believed, was fatal to the appellant's case, but he probably thought that he might safely make Jean B. T. Dorion his witness, as in a former suit brought against him on behalf of the heirs of his brother Jacques Dorion, in which the question was on whose account he received the 1,500*l*. premium, he swore that it was not retained by him for the heirs of Jacques Dorion, but as agent to his mother, Madame Cousineau. He swore further that the affair was settled between the notary Leblanc and his mother, and that he remembered many and long conversations between them, which ended in her consenting to a certain loan at a certain premium, and, he added, it was only by the wish of his mother and upon what she told him, that he consented to act in the affair.

Upon comparing the evidence given by Jean B. T. Dorion with that which he gave in the present suit, it is impossible to place the slightest reliance upon his testimony, as he evidently swore just as it suited his interest upon the particular occasion. In the suit with the heirs of Jacques Dorion he could only protect himself from the claim made upon him by swearing that his mother exacted the premium and received it for her own benefit, and he swore accordingly. In the present suit, which alleged that the 1,500*l*. was exacted and retained by him for his mother, Madame Cousineau, if he had repeated this evidence, he would have established his liability as her legatee, and he therefore swore positively the other way. But by thus proving the contradictory evidence as to the transaction given by Jean B. T. Dorion, the appellant could not call upon the Court to believe what he had formerly sworn, and to discard his testimony in the present suit as worthless. There were no means of determining upon which occasion he had sworn truly or falsely. All that could properly be done was to regard his evidence as utterly unworthy of credit, and to dismiss it without further consideration.

The defendant Zéphir Dorion produced two witnesses to prove that, upon the occasion of the appellant and M. Leblanc going to the residence of Madame Cousineau at St.-Eustache, in 1845, she was unwell, and in her bedroom, and never came downstairs or spoke to them while they were there. It is unnecessary to dwell upon this evidence, which is certainly open to the objection that it refers to events which occurred many years before, and in which one of the witnesses (at least) had no interest to retain it in his memory.

In the opinion of their Lordships the appellant failed entirely to prove the allegation in his declaration that the contract with Madame Cousineau was tainted with usury. That she should have taken a prominent, or, indeed, any part in the transaction, after she had entrusted the management of it to Jean B. T. Dorion, and especially when he was present, seems, from the account given of her want of education and the state of her health, to be highly improbable. There is great reason to believe that Madame Cousineau gave Jean B. T. Dorion the sum she was to advance upon the execution of the deed, and that he either retained it or paid it over and received it back at that time. M. Leblanc, in his evidence in another suit, speaking of the transaction, said, "After the execution of the obligation, I saw Kierzkowski count the money, but I did not count it myself, nor did I know how much money was given upon the occasion."

The only money that could pass at that time is the 1,500*l.*; for by the obligation the sum of 1,500*l.* is stated to have been counted and delivered in the presence of the notaries to Kierzkowski, who thereby acknowledged the same. And the sum of 3,375*l.*, the remainder of the advance by Madame Cousineau, was only to be paid when she received it from the Corporation of Montreal, who were indebted to her in that amount. The appellant's case might be disposed of upon the ground of its having failed upon the facts, but their Lordships are unwilling to dismiss the appeal without considering the defence in point of law, which has been argued upon the assumption that the case of usury has been proved against the defendants. It was contended on their behalf that the contract was either subsequently ratified, or that a new contract was substituted for it, founded upon a sufficient consideration. At the time of the agreement for the loan, the Act respecting usury, which was in force in Lower Canada, was that of 1777, which provided that "all bonds, contracts and assurances whereupon or whereby a greater interest (than 6*l.* per cent.) should be reserved and taken, should be utterly void; and that every person who should either directly or indirectly take, accept and receive a higher rate of interest should forfeit and lose treble the value," &c.

There can be no doubt that if the 1,500*l.* had been retained on the loan by Madame Cousineau, that the moment 6*l.* per cent. was paid upon the entire sum, usury would have been committed, for which the lender would have been liable to the penalty; but no excess of interest could have been recovered back till the payments had amounted to a sum exceeding the principal and legal interest. In this case there was no excess of payment before March 24, 1853, when an Act was passed in Lower Canada which altered the law of usury. That Act enacted, "that no contract to be hereafter made in any part of this province, for the loan or forbearance of money at any rate of interest whatsoever, and no payment in pursuance of such contract shall make any party to such contract or payment liable to any loss, forfeiture, penalty or proceeding, civil or criminal, for usury, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." And it provided "that every such contract, and every security for the same shall be void so far, and so far only, as relates to any excess of interest, thereby made payable above the rate of 6*l.* for the forbearance of 100*l.* for a year, and the said rate of 6*l.* per cent. interest, or such lower rate of interest as may have been agreed upon, shall be allowed and recovered in all cases where it is the agreement of the parties that interest shall be paid."

It was contended on the part of the respondents that this Act prevented the plaintiff from recovering back any usurious interest which was paid in excess of principal and legal interest under the contract. But an action to recover such excess could not properly be called "a civil proceeding for usury," though it would be brought on account of usury; the words of the Act evidently pointing to a proceeding upon the fact of usury itself, and not upon claims which resulted from it.

On the part of the appellant it was argued that the Act of 1853 leaves a usurious contract still a void contract, as it was before the passing of the Act. But the words "such contract or security shall be void so far, and as far only, as relates to any excess of interest, &c.," can only mean that the lender shall not recover more than 6*l.* per cent.; not that the contract itself shall be affected by the stipulation for more than legal interest. The whole effect of this Act is, that a usurious contract shall no longer subject a party to any penalty or forfeiture; but that it shall be invalid so far as it stipulates for more than 6*l.* per cent.

Upon the subject of the alleged ratification of the usurious contract, the appellant's counsel cited the authority of many eminent writers upon French law, to shew that any number of confirmations, or compromises made while the debtor was under the pressure of the usury, could not be urged as a defence to his action to recover back the money paid by him beyond the legal rate of interest. To which it was answered that the transactions which recognized and ratified the contract, all took place after the Act of 1853, which had made usurious contracts no longer unlawful. And Toulier, under the head of Contrats et Obligations Conventionnelles, vol. 4, article 561, was cited, where, upon the subject of the ratification of contracts, which are void from regard to public order or the general interests of society, after stating that "la ratification serait elle-même infectée des mêmes vices que l'acte ratifiée," he adds, "Cependant si les choses en étaient venues au point où la convention cesserait d'être illicite et pourrait prendre naissance, elle pourrait alors être ratifiée, soit expressément soit tacitement." But the contract of November 11, 1845, could not have had a legal existence, nor have been enforced in its entirety after the Act of 1853; it would only have been available to the extent of enabling the lender to recover the legal interest of 6*l.* per cent. Therefore, no subsequent confirmation or ratification of it, supposing it to have been originally usurious and void, could afterwards have given it complete validity.

But the case of the respondents does not rest upon mere ratification. They assert that the old contract has been entirely done away with, and a new one substituted for it upon a good and sufficient consideration, and that it was under the latter contract the payments sought to be recovered were made. No payment beyond the amount of principal and legal interest was made until the year 1855. But on May 7, 1853, a deed was executed by Mr. Fraser, as agent for Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, and for the Count and Countess Rottermund, and Jean B. T. Dorion, acting for the legatees of Madame Cousineau, by which the first-named parties became bound to pay the balance of interest due on November 11 then next, and in consideration of this the Dorions granted a delay of four years to pay the capital of the two obligations of 4,875*l.* and 3,626*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, and at the end of that time the capital of the two obligations was to be paid in one payment. And Mr. and Mrs. Drummond gave a new security for the debt by mortgaging to the Dorions property belonging to them in Montreal. This was not a ratification of the contract of November 11, 1845, but a new contract made upon totally different terms, and in consideration of forbearance, and with an additional security given for performance. It is not pretended, however, that there was any actual taking of usurious interest until after September 1, 1855, when Judge Mondelet purchased some property of Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, and a deed was executed whereby he agreed to pay the purchase-money in satisfaction of debts of the vendors, and amongst them what was due to the Dorions, who were parties to the deed. The transaction was to this effect: the Drummonds had contracted to sell their property to Judge Mondelet; the Dorions having a charge upon the property intervened with other creditors; the amount then due to them was settled and stated; they agreed to take payment in a certain way from Judge Mondelet out of the purchase-money. The deed expressly states that they entered into this engagement in order to take from Judge Mondelet any reasons he might have for abandoning the contract of purchase. By the deed also the Dorions give up to the Drummonds the additional security for the debt which they had given by the deed of May 7, 1853. These are new considerations moving from the Dorions sufficient to support the transaction of September 1, 1855, as a new contract. Under that deed the Dorions received a large sum of money from Judge Mondelet, which made the payments to them greatly exceed the amount of principal and legal interest due upon the loan from Madame Cousineau. But the payment by Judge Mondelet cannot be said to have been in respect of the obligation of November 11, 1845, but of the new contract of 1855, to which the Drummonds, on whose account the money was paid, were parties. This being so, there was not even a taking of illegal interest upon the usurious contract itself, and the case of the appellant must have failed upon this ground. After the execution of this deed the amount due to the Dorions, which was expressly stated in it, could not fairly be disputed. It is clear that the Drummonds were bound by the arrangement thus entered into, for the Dorions not only forbore to demand immediate payment of what was due to them, but relinquished a security which they held upon the lands of the Drummonds for their debt.

Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that if the appellant had proved a case of usury against the respondents, there would have been a good defence to the action upon the ground stated, and they will, therefore, humbly recommend to Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Practice—Appeal—Entry of Appeal—Inaccurate Description—Hearing ex parte—Petition to Re-hear—Registrar, Duties of.

COLONY.—The Judicial Committee will not re-hear an appeal which has been heard ex parte through a mistake, except under very special circumstances, and only when the ex parte hearing has not been occasioned by any default in the party applying for a re-hearing.

On a petition to re-hear an appeal which had been heard ex parte and the decree of the Court below reversed, it appeared that the petitioner, one of several respondents in the appeal, had given instructions to his agents in England to enter an appearance for him, and to take all the necessary steps for maintaining the decree of the Court below; that the agents of the petitioner had no notice that the appeal had been entered; and that on inquiry at the Council Office the agents were informed that no such appeal had been entered; but that the misinformation was owing to an inaccurate description of the appeal given by the petitioner to his agents. Their Lordships refused to re-hear the appeal.

It is no part of the duty of the Registrar of the Judicial Committee to give notice to the parties to an appeal of the arrival of the record of the proceedings in the Court below. Parties to an appeal must examine for themselves at the Council Office.

This was a petition by one of the respondents in this appeal, praying that the Judicial Committee would recommend Her Majesty to cancel or amend an order made upon the ex parte hearing of the appeal. The petition stated that on or about August 19, 1864, the petitioner obtained a judgment in his favour in the High Court of Judicature in Bengal, in a suit brought by the appellant, Ranee Surno Moyee, against the petitioner and others. That the said Ranee Surno Moyee appealed to Her Majesty in Council from the said judgment; but that various proceedings were taken in India with a view to compromise the suit. That on or about the month of September, 1867, the petitioner instructed his agents in England to appear for him in the said appeal, and directed them to take all the necessary steps on his behalf, with a view of maintaining the judgment of the High Court. That on or about October 23, 1867, the petitioner's agents attended at the Council Office and made inquiry with reference to the said appeal, and were informed that the record in the said appeal had not arrived in England. That the petitioner's agents thereupon wrote a letter to the Registrar of the Judicial Committee in the following terms:

"Ranee Surno Moyee, appellant,
and
"Kisto Nauth Roy, respondent.
"In appeal from Bengal.

"We are instructed on behalf of the respondents in the above appeal, and shall be obliged by your giving us notice when the transcript of proceedings arrives in this country, and by your entering an appearance in due time in our names on behalf of the respondents."

That in the month of October, 1867, the petitioner, by his agents, retained counsel on his behalf; that the progress of the appeal was delayed by further attempts to compromise the same in India, but in the month of September, 1868, the petitioner again instructed his agents in England that negotiations for compromise were broken off, and that the case must be taken to a hearing; and the petitioner at the same time remitted funds to his agents for the purpose of having the appeal argued on his behalf.

That the petitioner's agents, in the month of October, 1868, again attended at the Council Office and made inquiry as to the said appeal, and were informed that the record had not arrived in England, and the petitioner's agents wrote to the petitioner to this effect.

That the said appeal was, notwithstanding the many inquiries and diligence on the part of the petitioner, heard ex parte in the absence of the petitioner, in the month of December, 1868, and judgment was given in favour of the appellant.

The petition then alleged that in the certificate of the Registrar of the High Court of Bengal, accompanying the record, the title of the appeal given was as follows: "Mussumat Ranee Surno Moyee v. Shoshee Mokhee Burmonia," without adding the words "and others"; and that the appeal was thus entered in the index at the Council Office, and that the appellants having many appeals, the officers at the Council Office were misled thereby.

The petition also stated that there were numerous other parties defendants in the suit, which suit was entitled in the original plaint, "Ranee Surno Moyee v. Ausince Cooman Roy and others," and the suit was continued under the same title, and in the memorandum of regular appeal to the High Court of Judicature from the judgment of the deputy-collector of Zillah Nuddea.

That the petitioner and one Shoshee Mokhee alone appealed from the said order of the Zillah Court to the High Court of Judicature, and in the proceedings in the High Court the petitioner's name sometimes stood first and sometimes the name of Shoshee Mokhee; and upon the judgment of the High Court being given in favour of the petitioner, and appeal being made thereupon, the petitioner alone, whose case differs in certain respects from those of the other parties, defendants to the original suit, instructed his agents in England to have the appeal argued on his behalf.

The petition concluded with a prayer that their Lordships would recommend Her Majesty to cancel or amend the order made upon the ex parte hearing of the said appeal, and give liberty to the petitioner to attend and argue the appeal by counsel on his behalf, and that Her Majesty would make a further or other order therein.

Manisty and Doyne appeared in support of the petition.—The hearing of this appeal took place under circumstances over which the petitioner had no control. He took every step with a view to an appearance at the hearing. It was only through the mistake of the officers of the Council Office that the petitioner was misinformed as to the arrival of the record in this country. The petitioner had retained counsel, and only waited till the appeal was likely to be heard to instruct his counsel to appear on the hearing. The recommendation of their Lordships to Her Majesty would have been to maintain the decree of the Court below if the case had been heard. If their Lordships refuse to re-hear the appeal it will be a great hardship on the petitioner. They referred to Rajundernarain Rae and another v. Bijai Govind Sing (1 Moore P.C. 117).

Cave, contra.

Lord Chelmsford delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This is a petition for the re-hearing of an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, which was heard ex parte on the appearance of the appellant alone, and in which their Lordships agreed to recommend to Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, and the decree of the Court below be reversed.

The petitioner, one of the respondents in the appeal, prays for a re-hearing on the grounds that he had fully intended to appear in support of the decree, and had given instructions to his agents in England to enter an appearance for him, and take all necessary steps for maintaining the decree, but that neither he nor his agents had any notice that the appeal had been entered, nor were they aware of its having been fixed for hearing until after the hearing had taken place and the report to be made to Her Majesty in Council had been agreed to.

In support of the petition the case of Rajundernarain Rae and another v. Bijai Govind Sing (1 Moore P.C. 117) was relied upon to shew that it is competent to their Lordships, even after a report to the King and the confirmation of the report, to recommend that there shall be a re-hearing. Such an unusual indulgence, however, ought never to be granted except under very special circumstances, and only where the ex parte hearing has not been occasioned by any default in the party applying for a re-hearing. The case referred to was one of this exceptional character. The hearing was ex parte upon the appearance of the respondent alone, and the Committee, adopting a form of order which had been used on previous occasions, affirmed the decree of the Court below, and dismissed the appeal with costs upon a petition by the appellants praying to have the order for dismissing the appeal and affirmance of the judgment recalled, and for leave to prosecute their original petition of appeal. Their Lordships considered that a simple dismissal was to be regarded as the order which must have been in their contemplation, and that no more could have been intended in substance, although the objectionable form importing affirmance was followed, and upon the application for a re-hearing, Lord Brougham, in delivering the opinion of the Committee, stated that the case for indulgence was a strong one, provided there was power to grant the application. The parties were infants under the Court of Wards in Calcutta, and appeared by a public functionary through the appointment of that Court as their guardian ad litem; this person neglected the case altogether, and not only did not provide funds for carrying it on, but absconded with funds in his hands which had been allowed for the expense of the suit, and he was not to be found when the agent here desired to communicate with him, nor had he since returned. Their Lordships therefore thought, "in the particular circumstances of the case," His Majesty should be advised to amend the order, and to let in the appellants to be heard notwithstanding the dismissal, that is to say, "to restore the appeal," but the conditions were imposed of payment of the respondent's costs occasioned by the default at the time of the ex parte report, and also by the application for a re-hearing.

In the present case it cannot be truly alleged that the ex parte hearing took place without any default on the part of the petitioner or his agents. The appeal was from a decision of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, in favour of the defendants, in a suit in which Mussumat Ranee Surno Moyee was plaintiff, and Shoshee Mokhee Burmonia, the petitioner Kisto Nauth Roy and several others, were defendants.

In the certificate of the Registrar of the Court, accompanying the transmission of the record, the only defendant named in the title of the appeal was Shoshee Mokhee Burmonia, without the addition of the words "and others"; but in the record itself the words "and others" were added to the name of the defendant. The petitioner's instructions to his agents probably named only himself as the respondent in the appeal, because a letter dated October 23, 1867, was written by them to the Registrar of the Privy Council in these words—

"Ranee Surno Moyee, appellant,
and
"Kisto Nauth Roy, respondent.
"In appeal from Bengal.

"We are instructed on behalf of the respondent in the above appeal, and shall be obliged by your giving us notice when the transcript of proceedings arrives in this country, and by your entering an appearance in due time in our names on behalf of the respondents."

The agents made inquiries at the Council Office on the day this letter was written, and also subsequently in the same month of October, whether the record in the appeal had arrived. As there was no appeal with the title named in the letter, they were of course answered in the negative. The misinformation as to the non-arrival of the proceedings in this country was owing to the inaccurate description of the appeal given by the petitioner to his agents. This inaccuracy is inexcusable, because he knew perfectly well that there were many other respondents besides himself, and that his name did not stand the first amongst the defendants in the title of the suit. All the ignorance of the proceedings taken on the part of the appellant resulted from the petitioner having thus originally misled his agents in his instructions to them. The agents themselves, too, are not wholly free from blame. They should not have been satisfied with having requested the Registrar to give them notice of the arrival of the proceedings, which it was no part of the duty of his office to do; but they should have examined for themselves at the Council Office, and, having the name of the appellant accurately given, they would have ascertained that there was an appeal by him, and upon the production of the proceedings, they would have found that to the name of the respondent there were added the words "and others," which would have led to a further examination, and to the discovery that it was the appeal in which the petitioner was interested, and in which they were instructed to appear for him. Under these circumstances, to grant the indulgence of a re-hearing to the petitioner would be to give him the benefit of his own and his agents' default.

It is necessary to distinguish this case from that of Macleary v. Hill and others (not reported), which was heard by this Committee on June 30, 1868, and in which their Lordships intimated their opinion that the decree appealed from ought to be varied and amended, and directed minutes of the proposed report to be prepared by the counsel for the appellant. This was accordingly done; and on July 2 the minutes were approved and adopted by their Lordships, and were afterwards, on July 7, submitted to Her Majesty for approval. Immediately after the Order in Council had been made, the Registrar, in drawing the final order, discovered that the appellant's solicitor had omitted to take out and issue the usual process, requiring four out of the five respondents to appear to the appeal, although he had issued the regular process against the fifth respondent. The Registrar reported this fact to their Lordships, and, on July 10, their Lordships reported to Her Majesty that the order of July 7 ought to be revoked. The appeal then stood over for further directions, and the appellant was ordered to serve a personal notice of the appeal on each of the four respondents who had not appeared.

The distinction between that case and the present is that, in Macleary v. Hill and others (not reported), the appellant had neglected to take an essential step in the appeal, and was therefore not entitled to set down the case ex parte as against the respondents. In the present case, although no appearance had been entered on behalf of the respondents, or either of them, the appellant had done all he was required to do by the practice and rules of the Judicial Committee, and the omission and neglect is that of the petitioner, who now asks for a re-hearing of the appeal.

The petition must be dismissed with costs.

Banker — Securities, Deposit of — Gratuitous Bailee, Liability of — Negligence, Evidence of.

BAILMENT. BANKER AND BANKING COMPANY.—A customer deposited with his bankers securities for safe keeping. The securities were stolen by a clerk in the employ of the bankers:—Held, that the bankers were not liable unless the loss was occasioned by their gross negligence.

The appellant deposited with his bankers a box containing securities, of which he kept the key. The box was kept in a strong room of the bank, where was the manager's box containing the securities of the bank. Access to the strong room was only obtained by passing through a compartment where a cashier sat by day and a messenger slept by night. In this compartment was a door leading to the strong room, which room had two iron doors opened by separate keys, which during the day were kept by the cashier who occupied the compartment. This cashier stole the appellant's securities. The bank received no consideration for taking care of the securities of their customers:—Held, under the circumstances, that there was no evidence of negligence to render the bank liable to the appellant for the loss of his securities.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria.

The action was brought by Richard Lewis, since deceased, against the respondent as inspector of the Union Bank of Australia, to recover damages from the Union Bank of Australia.

The first count of the declaration charged the bank with negligence as bailees for reward, and the second count as gratuitous bailees in keeping certain debentures of the said Richard Lewis, whereby the same were lost. To this declaration the respondent, as such inspector, pleaded a traverse of the delivering to, and receipt by, the bank of the debentures, and also not guilty, upon which pleas issue was joined.

The issues came on to be tried on November 8, 1865, before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and evidence, both oral and documentary, was given, and the jury found that the bankers were not bailees for reward, and gave a verdict for the said Richard Lewis for 10,450*l.* The Supreme Court subsequently granted a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit, which rule was made absolute, and on May 18, 1867, final judgment was signed for the respondent.

Richard Lewis petitioned the Supreme Court for leave to appeal, and such leave was granted. Richard Lewis died at Hobart Town, on November 8, 1867, having made his will, whereby he appointed the appellants his executors.

The facts of the case are stated in the judgment of their Lordships.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. Coleridge), Watkin Williams and Beresford, for the appellants.—The evidence given at the trial was sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. The question of negligence is one of fact for the jury, and the finding of the jury in favour of the appellants should not have been disturbed. The rule to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit ought to have been discharged. The appellants are entitled to judgment for the amount of the damages found by the jury.—They referred to Shiells v. Blackburn (H. Black. 158); Foster v. the Essex Bank (17 Mass. Mellish, J. Brown and W. Murray, for the respondent.—There was no sufficient evidence that the debentures were in the custody of the bank at the time they were stolen. There was no evidence of a bailment of the debentures to the bank on the terms alleged in the second count. There was no sufficient evidence that the bank kept the debentures in a negligent manner, as alleged in the second count of the declaration. If the debentures were stolen by a clerk from the bank whilst in the custody of the bank, the bank is not liable for the loss without negligence; and there was no evidence of negligence.—They referred to Coggs v. Bernard (1 Smith's Lead. Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Chelmsford now (Feb. 19) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit of the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria, in an action by the appellant's testator against the respondent. The action was brought against the defendant, as inspector of the Union Bank of Australia, to recover damages for the negligent keeping of certain railway debentures delivered to the bank to be safely kept and taken care of. The plaintiff, who resided at Hobart Town, in Tasmania, had an account with the Union Bank of Australia from the year 1857. From the earliest period of his becoming a customer of the bank he had placed in their care a box, of which he kept the key, containing securities, deeds and debentures. The bank received no consideration for taking care of the deposits of their customers. In the month of January, 1862, the plaintiff purchased the railway debentures in question and put them in his box. The box appears always to have been kept in a strong room underground, in which the boxes of other customers of the bank were placed. There were also in this strong room the manager's box, containing bills for discount and collection, worth from 1,500,000*l.* to 2,500,000*l.*, teller's boxes, worth 50,000*l.* and securities of the Royal, Central and Agra banks, in which the Union Bank was interested. The access to this room could only be obtained by passing through a compartment of the office which was separated from the part where the clerks were employed by a partition about five feet high. In this compartment Fletcher, the cashier, always sat during bank hours, and a messenger slept there during the night. There was a wooden door in this compartment, which opened upon a flight of steps leading to the room where the plaintiff's box was deposited. This room had two iron doors, which were opened by separate keys. Fletcher always kept the key of the wooden door, and also, during the day, the keys of the two iron doors, but at the time the debentures in question were placed in the box one of the keys of the iron doors only was kept by him at night, the other being taken care of by another officer of the bank. Beyond the room where the box was there were two other rooms; in the outer of the two uncoined gold was kept, in the inner, bullion and unsigned notes of the bank. The manager kept the key of the outer of these two rooms, and one of the directors of the bank that of the inner one. The plaintiff had frequent opportunities of seeing how and where his box with the debentures was kept. The customers were permitted to have access to their boxes during the bank hours, but always in the presence of a bank clerk. The plaintiff occasionally went down to the strong room to take the coupons from his debentures for collection, but generally the box was brought up to him. The coupons, when taken from the debentures, were always given by the plaintiff to Fletcher to collect for him.

On April 19, 1864, the plaintiff went to the bank and asked for his box; Fletcher brought it to him. The plaintiff opened the box, took out his debentures and carried them away. He then cut off the coupons, took back the debentures, replaced them in the box, locked it, and gave the coupons to Fletcher to collect for him as usual. Before the plaintiff's next visit to the bank, Fletcher had abstracted the debentures. The exact time at which this act of dishonesty was committed cannot be ascertained, but it must have been before the month of July, 1864, as Fletcher then left the bank on leave of absence and never returned. Up to the time of his leaving he had always maintained a good character. The plaintiff did not come again to the bank till July 3, 1865. He then went into the strong room and took out of his box some gas shares. On the following day he returned to the bank and had his box brought up to him, when he discovered that the debentures were gone. All the material facts above stated were proved in the course of the plaintiff's case—that the bank were gratuitous bailees, that the plaintiff had known for years the manner in which the bank kept the property of their customers deposited with them, and the means which they employed for its protection, and that the debentures were dishonestly taken away by Fletcher.

At the close of the plaintiff's case, the counsel for the defendant applied for a nonsuit, on the ground that the bank being gratuitous bailees no evidence had been given of such negligence as would render them liable for the loss of the debentures. The Judge refused to stop the case, but reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. The defendant thereupon went into his case and called witnesses. The only material additions which he made to the facts proved by the plaintiff's witnesses were the keeping in the strong room in which the plaintiff's box with the debentures was placed, not only of the boxes of other customers, but also of the before-mentioned valuable property belonging to the bank; the good character of Fletcher, and his leaving the bank in the end of the month of July, 1864; and that after Fletcher left, but before the loss of the plaintiff's debentures was discovered, a rule was made in the bank that two clerks instead of one (as formerly) should go with a customer wishing to examine his box in the strong room. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff upon an issue as to the delivery of the debentures to be kept by the bank without reward, and also upon the plea of not guilty (which raised the question of negligence); and they assessed the damages at 10,450*l*.

The defendant, upon the leave reserved at the trial, moved for and obtained a rule from the Supreme Court to set aside the verdict, and to enter a verdict for the defendant or a judgment of nonsuit. That rule was afterwards made absolute, the Chief Justice stating that, "in the opinion of the Court, the defendant was entitled to a verdict; but that as at the trial, when leave to enter a verdict was reserved, there was an understanding that the rule, if absolute, should be for a nonsuit, and not to enter a verdict, the rule would be absolute accordingly." In the argument of the appeal, the counsel for the appellants, admitting that the bank were gratuitous bailees, and therefore not responsible except for the highest degree of negligence, usually styled "gross negligence," insisted that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the bank had been guilty of this species of negligence, and that the Judge would not have been justified, at the close of the plaintiff's case, in withdrawing the question from the jury and directing a nonsuit; and that after the defendant's case had been gone into, and the jury had pronounced a verdict upon all the evidence on both sides, it was not competent to the Court to give a judgment of nonsuit, or to do more than to direct a new trial upon the question of negligence. The learned counsel contended that the bank had been guilty of negligence, because, there being two iron doors with protecting locks to the strong room where the plaintiff's debentures were, the cashier was permitted to keep both keys. And they urged that the bank by their own act admitted that they had not been sufficiently careful, as, after Fletcher left, they made a rule that two clerks should always accompany the customers to the strong room instead of only one, as had previously been the practice.

The first question to be considered is, whether the Supreme Court was right in directing a nonsuit to be entered. It was the duty of the Court to do what the Judge ought to have done at the trial; and if, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there was not evidence upon which the jury could reasonably and properly find a verdict for him, the Judge ought to have directed a nonsuit. Formerly it used to be held that, if there were what was called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the Judge was bound to leave it to the jury. But a course of recent decisions—most of which are referred to in the case of Ryder v. Wombwell (38 L. J. Ex. 8)—has established a more reasonable rule, viz., that, in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury there is a preliminary question for the Judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed. If, therefore, the plaintiff's evidence in this case was such that the Judge ought to have considered that it fell short of proving the bank to have been guilty of that species of negligence which would render them liable to an action, he ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury, and directed a nonsuit. But the appellants' counsel insisted that, as the defendant at the trial did not rest upon his objection to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's case, but went into evidence of his own, he did it at his peril; and that if he proved any facts which were favourable to the plaintiff, they might be used in answer to the application to the Court for a nonsuit, upon the leave reserved at the close of the plaintiff's case. It is unnecessary to determine whether this position is correct or not, because the counsel for the respondent agreed that the appellants' counsel might be at liberty to use in argument any facts which they could extract from the defendant's evidence in support of their case. But it may be convenient to see how the plaintiff's case stood upon his own evidence, before considering whether it was at all improved by any facts obtained from the defendant's witnesses. Did the plaintiff, then, give any evidence of the bank having been guilty of that degree of negligence which renders a gratuitous bailee liable for the loss of property deposited with him? From the time of Lord Holt's celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 171), in which he classified and distinguished the different degrees of negligence for which the different kinds of bailees are answerable, the negligence which must be established against a gratuitous bailee has been called "gross negligence." This term had been used from that period, without objection, as a short and convenient mode of describing the degree of responsibility which attaches upon a bailee of this class. At last, Lord Cranworth (then Baron Rolfe), in the case of Wilson v. Brett (11 Mee. & W. 113; 12 L. J. Ex. 264), objected to it, saying that he "could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet." And this critical observation has been since approved of by other eminent Judges. Of course, if intended as a definition, the expression "gross negligence" wholly fails of its object. But as there is a practical difference between the degrees of negligence for which different classes of bailees are responsible, the term may be usefully retained as descriptive of that difference, more especially as it has been so long in familiar use, and has been sanctioned by such high authority as Lord Holt, and Sir William Jones in his Essay on the Law of Bailments. In the case of Grill v. the General Iron Screw Collier Company (37 L. J. C.P. 205), Mr. Justice Willes, after agreeing with the dictum of Lord Cranworth, and stating that the same view of the term "gross negligence" was held by the Exchequer Chamber in Beal v. the South Devon Railway Company (3 Hurls. & C. 337), said: "Confusion has arisen from regarding negligence as a positive instead of a negative word. It is really the absence of such care as it was the duty of the defendant to use." It is hardly correct to say that the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in the case referred to, adopted the view of Lord Cranworth as to the impropriety of the term "gross negligence." Mr. Justice Crompton, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "It is said that there may be difficulty in defining what gross negligence is; but I agree in the remark of the Lord Chief Baron in the Court below, where he says, 'There is a certain degree of negligence to which everyone attaches great blame. It is a mistake to suppose that things are not different because a strict line of demarcation cannot be drawn between them;'" and he added, "For all practical purposes the rule may be stated to be, that the failure to exercise reasonable care, skill and diligence is gross negligence." Mr. Justice Montague Smith, in the case in which the above-mentioned observations of Mr. Justice Willes were made, said: "The use of the term 'gross negligence' is only one way of stating that less care is required in some cases than in others, as in the case of gratuitous bailees, and it is more correct and scientific to define the degrees of care than the degrees of negligence." The epithet "gross" is certainly not without its significance. The negligence for which, according to Lord Holt, a gratuitous bailee incurs liability is such as to involve a breach of confidence or trust, not arising merely from some want of foresight or mistake of judgment, but from some culpable default. No advantage would be gained by substituting a positive for a negative phrase, because the degree of care and diligence which a bailee must exercise corresponds with the degree of negligence for which he is responsible, and there would be the same difficulty in defining the extent of the positive duty in each case as the degree of neglect of it which incurs responsibility. In truth, this difficulty is inherent in the nature of the subject, and, though degrees of care are not definable, they are with some approach to certainty distinguishable; and in every case of this description in which the evidence is left to the jury, they must be led by a cautious and discriminating direction of the Judge to distinguish, as well as they can, degrees of things which run more or less into each other.

It is clear, according to the authorities, that the bank in this case were not bound to more than ordinary care of the deposit entrusted to them, and that the negligence for which alone they could be made liable would have been the want of that ordinary diligence which men of common prudence generally exercise about their own affairs.

The case resembles very closely one that was mentioned by the counsel for the respondent, which was decided in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, the case of Foster v. the Essex Bank (17 Mass. Rep. 479). The plaintiff in that case deposited with the bank, for safe custody, a cask containing a quantity of gold doubloons. This was placed with other deposits in a vault in the bank, and the agent of the plaintiff was in the habit of coming to the bank to see that his deposit was safe. There was no evidence how the vault was secured. Whenever the plaintiff gave orders to the bank (which he frequently did) to deliver some of the gold doubloons deposited, the cask was opened by the cashier or chief clerk, who delivered the doubloons pursuant to the orders. The cashier and chief clerk, both of whom had previously sustained a fair reputation, fraudulently took from the cask doubloons to the amount of 32,000 dollars, with which they absconded. The action was tried upon the general issue, and the jury found a special verdict. The Court, after argument, gave judgment for the defendants. The Chief Justice, who delivered the opinion of the Court, entered fully into the law of bailments applicable to the case, holding that "as far as the bank was concerned, the deposit of the gold was a mere naked bailment for the accommodation of the depositor, and without any advantage to the bank which could tend to increase its liability beyond the effect of such a contract." "That the bank was answerable only for gross negligence or for fraud, which will make a bailee of any character answerable, and that gross negligence certainly could not be inferred from anything found by the verdict, as the same care was taken of the plaintiff's property as of other deposits, and of the property belonging to the bank itself." And the Court held that the bank was not responsible for the fraud or felony of the cashier and clerk, as when they abstracted the plaintiff's gold from the cask they were not acting within the scope of their employment; "and the bank was no more answerable for their act than it would have been if they had stolen the pocket-book of any person who might have laid it upon the desk while he was transacting some business at the bank."

Their Lordships entertain no doubt that it was the duty of the Judge at the close of the plaintiff's case, upon the application of the counsel for the defendant, to have ordered a nonsuit, or, if the plaintiff refused to be nonsuited, to have directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, as there was an entire failure of evidence of the want of that ordinary care which the bank was bound to bestow upon the plaintiff's deposit.

But the Judge having refused to nonsuit, the defendant thereupon went into his case, and called witnesses, and having done so the counsel for the appellants contend that there being evidence on both sides, the question could not be withdrawn from the jury, and that as the Judge could not have nonsuited at that stage of the trial it was not competent to the Supreme Court to give a judgment of nonsuit. It is not, however, correct to say that the Judge could not have nonsuited the plaintiff after the defendant had entered upon his case, as it was decided in the case of Davis v. Hardy (6 B. & C. 225) that the evidence given by a defendant may be used for the purpose of a nonsuit.

The defendant's evidence added to the plaintiff's case the important fact that in the strong room in which the plaintiff's debentures were kept, there were, besides the boxes of other customers, bills, securities and specie, the property of the bank, to a very considerable amount. It may be admitted not to be sufficient to exempt a gratuitous bailee from liability that he keeps goods deposited with him in the same manner as he keeps his own, though this degree of care will ordinarily repel the presumption of gross negligence. But there is no case which puts the duty of a bailee of this kind higher than this, that he is bound to take the same care of the property entrusted to him as a reasonably prudent and careful man may fairly be expected to take of his own property of the like description. This was in effect the question left to the jury in Doorman v. Jenkins (2 Ad. & E. 256; 4 L. J. K.B. 29), where Lord Denman told them that "it did not follow from the defendant's having lost his own money at the same time as the plaintiff's that he had taken such care of the plaintiff's money as a reasonable man would ordinarily take of his own, and that the fact relied upon was no answer to the action if they believed that the loss occurred from gross negligence."

No one can fairly say that the means employed for the protection of the property of the bank and of the plaintiff were not such as any reasonable man might properly have considered amply sufficient. But the appellants' counsel insisted that the fact appearing for the first time in the defendant's case, that the bank, after Fletcher had abused the confidence reposed in him, had introduced additional precautions to prevent the recurrence of a similar act of dishonesty, amounted to an admission that their former safeguards were not such as prudent men ought to have been satisfied with. This argument goes the length of contending that if a gratuitous depositary does not multiply his precautions so as not to omit anything which can make the loss of property entrusted to him next to impossible, he is guilty of gross negligence.

Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff failed upon his own evidence to prove a case of negligence against the bank, and that the evidence produced by the defendant shewed more strongly the absence of any such negligence for which they would have been liable. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal be dismissed with costs.

SALE OF GOODS. SHIPPING.—L. & Co., merchants, carrying on business at Hong Kong, purchased goods of a merchant in Manchester, to be shipped to their firm at Hong Kong, to be paid for at certain credit. The goods were shipped deliverable to the order of L. & Co., and bills of lading signed. Before the goods arrived at Hong Kong, L. & Co. being insolvent, and being indebted to the respondents, the agent of L. & Co. at Hong Kong agreed to assign to the respondents all the estate of L. & Co., including the bills of lading in respect of the said goods, and such bills of lading were in pursuance of the said agreement afterwards indorsed to the respondents. At the time the bills of lading were so transferred, no money was advanced or benefit conferred on L. & Co. by the respondents:—Held, that there was no sufficient transfer of the bills of lading for a valuable consideration so as to defeat the right of an unpaid vendor to stop the goods in transitu.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Hong Kong.

The respondents sued the appellants for having converted to their own use 305 bales of merchandise, laden on board the ship "Min."

The appellants pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, a denial of the goods being the goods of the respondents.

Upon these pleas issues were joined.

The cause came on to be tried, on June 3, 1867, before the Hon. John Smale, her Majesty's Chief Justice at Hong Kong, when the jury found a verdict for the respondents.

On June 25, 1867, the appellants moved to set aside the verdict, and instead thereof that a nonsuit should be entered, or a new trial had.

The Supreme Court of Hong Kong, on June 29, 1867, refused the motion with costs.

The facts of the case were as follows: The appellants were owners of the said ship "Min."

The respondents, the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, were a banking corporation, of which Herman Kaiser was manager at Hong Kong, and the other respondents, the Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China, were also a banking corporation, of which William Kaye was the manager at Hong Kong.

The 305 bales of merchandise laden on board the ship "Min" were purchased for the London firm of Messrs. George Lyall & C. Frederick Still, of which London firm as well as of the Hong Kong firm of Lyall, Still & Co. the said George Lyall and C. F. Still were members, and were shipped to the said Hong Kong firm through Killick, Martin & Co., general shipbrokers, of London.

The remaining facts are stated in the judgment of their Lordships.

Sir R. Palmer, Manisty and Baylis.—There was no valuable consideration for the transfer of the three bills of lading so as to defeat the right of stoppage in transitu by the unpaid vendors. The respondents could only acquire the same rights which belonged to Lyall & Co., whose title to the goods was subject to the right of stoppage in transitu by an unpaid vendor. No consideration passed from the respondents to Lyall & Co. at the time of the transfer. The bills of lading were transferred to secure an antecedent debt, and the transfer was therefore invalid. The bills of lading did not come to the hands of Lyall & Co. as absolute owners, but subject to certain trusts for sales and for the specific appropriation of the proceeds thereof. They had no power to transfer the same to the respondents as a security for an antecedent debt.—They referred to Mangles v. Dixon (3 H.L. C. 702); Whitworth v. Gaugain (3 Hare, 416); Cuming v. Brown (9 East, 506); Virtue v. Jewell (4 Campb. 31); Haille v. Smith (1 Bos. & P. 563); Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376); Gurney v. Behrend (23 L. Mellish, Kaye and Holl, for the respondents.—At the time when the attempt was made by the vendors to stop the goods they were not in transitu. The respondents became bonâ fide and without notice transferees for valuable consideration of the bills of lading; the vendor's right to stop the goods in transitu was thereby defeated. Lyall, Still & Co. were not factors, but owners of the goods. The stipulation as to the remission of the proceeds of the goods to meet the drafts accepted for the price thereof, was a mere term of the contract for those goods, but did not under the circumstances affect the goods with any trust or equitable lien. The respondents became assignees of the goods and indorsees of the bills of lading bonâ fide for valuable consideration, and without notice of any trust or equitable lien affecting the goods, and therefore such trust or equitable lien (if any) could not overreach the title of the respondents. If it were intended to affect the transferees of the bills of lading with any trust it should have appeared on the face of the bills of lading. Lyall, Still & Co. had a first charge on the goods, which they were in a position to, and did by the assignment transfer to the respondents. The mere fact of a man being insolvent does not make a transfer fraudulent. There must be notice that there is an unpaid vendor. They referred to "The Marie Joseph" (3 Moo. P.C.C. N.S. 556); Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Smith, L.C. 398); Jones v. Smith (1 Hare, 43); Raphael v. the Bank of England (17 Com. B. Rep. 161; 25 L. J. Sir R. Palmer, in reply.

SIR J. NAPIER (Feb. 19) now delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This was an action of trover, brought by the respondents against the appellants, in the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, for 305 bales of merchandise which were shipped at London for Hong Kong on board a vessel called the "Min," by the direction of George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, of London, deliverable to Lyall, Still & Co., or their assigns, according to the bills of lading, of which the respondents became the transferees. The appellants were the owners of the "Min." They pleaded a denial of the conversion, and also a denial that the goods were the goods of the plaintiffs (the respondents) as alleged. The case was tried at Hong Kong, before the Chief Justice and a special jury, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the amount of the value of the goods. A motion was afterwards made to have this verdict set aside and a nonsuit entered, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial, on the ground that the plaintiffs had not proved that they were indorsees of the bills of lading for valuable consideration without notice, so as to pass property, or that a new trial should be directed on this and other grounds of objection. An order was made that the motion be refused with costs.

This appeal has been brought for the purpose of having this order and the verdict found for the plaintiffs set aside and judgment of nonsuit entered, or a new trial directed.

It appears on the Chief Justice's notes of the evidence of the plaintiffs that the goods in question were purchased from merchants at Manchester, in the autumn of 1866, by George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, of London, for their firm at Hong Kong, which traded there under the style of Lyall, Still & Co. Mr. George Frederick Maclean was the resident partner and manager at Hong Kong. One parcel of these goods was purchased from B. Liebert & Co., on a ten months' credit, which was the usual course in such transactions as between Manchester and Hong Kong merchants. It was part of the contract that remittances of proceeds of sales should be made from Hong Kong to meet the acceptances of George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, given for the price of the goods, on receipt of the bills of lading. The second parcel was purchased from Samuel Mendel, on a nine months' credit, with a stipulation of a similar character as to remittances. The third parcel was purchased from Calvert & Co. on a six months' credit, without any special stipulation. The object of the long credit was to give ample time for realizing proceeds, so as to make remittances according to agreement. When the time arrived for forwarding the goods from Manchester, Lyall & Still, of London, employed Killick, Martin & Co. as shipping agents there, to secure tonnage in the "Min," which was then in the berth for Hong Kong. When this was secured, Lyall & Still directed the vendors at Manchester to forward the goods to Killick, Martin & Co. for shipment in the "Min"; and they also directed Killick, Martin & Co. to receive the goods so as to be forwarded to them simply for the purpose of the shipment. In accordance with these instructions the goods were packed and marked at Manchester ready for shipment, and were sent up to Killick, Martin & Co., with whom Lyall & Still had contracted for the carriage from Manchester to Hong Kong. All the charges were included in one through freight. The goods were shipped on board the "Min"; bills of lading for them, deliverable to Lyall, Still & Co. or their assigns, were signed by the master, and were handed over to Lyall & Still, who accepted the draft of the vendors for the price in each case. Before this period the firm at Hong Kong was in a failing condition; their deficit was about 4 lacs of dollars, and in November their condition had not improved. At the end of November and beginning of December, Maclean had bill transactions with the respondents (two banking firms at Hong Kong), by which he got large advances on the undertaking to furnish shipping documents for silk cargoes, to be ready for the mail of December 15, from Hong Kong.

On December 13, the transactions of the firm were at a stand; they had ceased to make purchases or shipments of tea or silk as theretofore; they were under the necessity of returning bills of their correspondents, and had refused payment of their acceptances to the amount of 150,000 dollars. This was well known at the time at Hong Kong. On December 14, Mr. Kaiser, the manager of one of the two banks, addressed a letter to Lyall, Still & Co., requiring them to furnish, in the course of the day, the shipping documents according to their undertaking; to which Mr. Maclean replied, that they were unfortunately unable to comply with this request. On the 17th, Mr. Kaiser wrote another letter, insisting on getting the documents or a return of the advance made on the faith of the undertaking to furnish them, and he concludes his letter in these words: "I must ask your immediate attention to this matter and beg to warn you that my now offering to receive back the money obtained by you must not be looked upon as in any way binding me to treat the matter as one of debt, as I shall hold myself perfectly at liberty to deal with the matter as one of a much more serious character than a mere debt, if it be not at once satisfactorily arranged."

Mr. Kaye, the resident manager of the other bank, had had a conversation with Mr. Maclean, in reference to the refusal of Lyall, Still & Co. to pay their acceptances. He also became impatient and urgent for an arrangement, on account of the advance made by his bank. The two banks then combined, and Maclean was pressed, as he could not give them the documents he promised, to give them all he had. He was asked, "What can you give us?" He made out a memorandum, which he handed to Mr. Pollard, the counsel for the banks, in order that he might prepare a formal assignment. This was prepared, and was executed, on December 22, by Mr. Maclean in the name of the firm, which was at this time insolvent, with liabilities uncovered to the amount of 8 lacs of dollars.

The assignment states the consideration of it to be, first, a debt of 85,714 dollars 28 cents, owing by Lyall, Still & Co. to one of the banks, and of 50,000 dollars to the other; next, the agreement to furnish bills and shipping documents, upon the faith of which the advances were made, which constituted the debts to the banks and the release of all claim upon the part of the banks in respect of this agreement. It then proceeds to make over to the banks, "the whole of the property, premises and chattels specified in the schedule at the foot, with all the estate, right, title, interest, claim or demand of Lyall, Still & Co. therein or thereto, or arising thereout or therefrom. It further provides for doing all acts that might be required to give full and formal effect for securing and perfecting the assignment. In the schedule, the first item is a share in the Hong Kong Club. There are other items of shares in various insurance companies; an equity of redemption, and two items in these words: "All goods and bills of lading or other documents for all goods now on the way hither to arrive in December, 1866, or January, 1867." "All goods or documents for goods alluded to in a telegram dated November 9, 1866, from London partners to Hong Kong firm, received by steamer "Clan Alpine," via Calcutta, in the words, 'are shipping more goods; shirtings thirteen six, shipment remitted'; and all goods or documents for goods purchased and shipped and now on the way hither."

The documents arrived on December 27, 1866, and January 1, 1867, including the bills of lading for the goods shipped in the "Min." These were indorsed, and handed over by Mr. Maclean (together with the policies on the goods) to Mr. Kaiser, in performance of the agreement in the assignment. After the arrival of the "Min" at Hong Kong, a demand was made on the part of the unpaid vendors, by persons authorized on their behalf, to claim possession of the goods, and this demand was acceded to on behalf of the owners of the "Min." Subsequently the respondents, as transferees and holders of the bills of lading, made a like demand, which was refused.

In order to decide between the rival claimants, two questions have to be answered: first, did the transitus terminate before the demand was made on behalf of the appellants? secondly, was the transfer of the bills of lading made to the respondents for valuable consideration, and without notice of such circumstances as rendered them not fairly and honestly assignable, and so as to transfer to the respondents a property in the goods freed and discharged from the proprietary lien of the unpaid vendors? The general rule is, that where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination named by the vendee, the right of the unpaid vendor to stop them continues until they arrive and are delivered there according to the bills of lading. The transitus continues whilst they are in the charge of some third party contracted with as carrier for the purpose of forwarding them, and who has them in charge simply for this purpose. It may suffice to refer to the recent case of Berndston v. Strong (L. R. 4 Eq. 481). The documents in evidence as well as the oral testimony in the present case, establish beyond doubt that Hong Kong was the destination agreed upon between vendors and vendee; and the other parties who intervened, for the purpose of having the goods forwarded to their destination, had them in charge for this purpose only. Their Lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that the transitus had not ended before the arrival at Hong Kong. The second is the real question in the case. The respondents contend that they gave value for the bills of lading; that they had no notice of any special terms of agreement between the vendors and vendees of which they say that they were not informed, and as to which they also say that they were not bound to make inquiry.

The managers of the banks (Messrs. Kaiser and Kaye) were not examined as witnesses at the trial; but it plainly appears on the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs (the respondents) that the insolvency of Lyall, Still & Co. was known to the banks at the time of the assignment, and it is but reasonable to suppose that they were quite familiar with what also, on the same evidence, appears to be the usage of trade as between Manchester and Hong Kong—see Newsome v. Thornton (6 East, 19). At the time the bills of lading were handed over to them no money was advanced, no benefit was conferred or promised on the faith of these securities. They were transferred simply (as stated in the evidence of the plaintiffs) in performance of the agreement in the assignment. We have, therefore, to refer to the assignment itself to see what was the interest in these bills of lading that was agreed to be transferred, as part of what was assigned for the consideration expressed. The general rule so clearly stated and explained by Lord St. Leonards in the case of Mangles v. Dixon (3 H.L. C. 702) is, that the assignee of any security stands in the same position as the assignor as to the equities arising upon it. This as a general rule was not disputed, but it was contended that the case of a bill of lading is exceptional, and must be dealt with on special grounds. Doubtless, the holder of an indorsed bill of lading may in the course of commercial dealing transfer a greater right than he himself has; the exception is founded on the negotiable quality of the document. It is confined to the case where the person who transfers the right is himself in actual and authorized possession of the document, and the transferee gives value on the faith of it, without having notice of any circumstance which would render the transaction neither fair nor honest. In such a case, if the vendor is unpaid, one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third; and it is reasonable that he who by misplaced confidence has enabled such third person to occasion the loss should sustain it—Lickbarrow v. Mason (2 Term Rep. 70). But in this case, at the time of the assignment, Maclean had not possession of the documents; nothing was advanced on the faith of them. There is merely a general description of documents expected to arrive, without knowing their contents or how far they might be limited or qualified. The property of the firm in the goods expected was not only subject to special stipulations in the contracts of sale in the case of two of the three parcels, but was also subject in all the three to the lien of the unpaid vendors. And can it be contended that before Maclean got possession of the documents when his firm was in a condition of undoubted insolvency, and the terms of the documents were not disclosed, there was conveyed to the respondents by this assignment the benefit of a prospective breach of trust and violation of contract? There is not a word in the instrument that could be held to convey a greater interest than the assignors had. The power they might afterwards acquire of committing a fraud upon the vendors is not "property, estate, interest, claim or demand, legal or equitable." "It is," says Sir Edward Coke, "a general rule that whensoever the words of a deed or of the parties without deed may have a double intendment, and the one standeth with law and right, and the other is wrongful and against law, the intendment that standeth with law shall be taken." Co. Lit. 42, a, Constructio legis non facit injuriam; as it is pithily said in the passage from Sheppard's Touchstone, referred to by Sir Roundell Palmer in his able argument: "The law in its genuine construction prefers a less estate by right to a larger estate by wrong." The rule that words shall be construed most strongly against him who uses them gives place to a higher rule; higher because it has a moral element—that the construction shall not be such as to work a wrong. The lien of the unpaid vendor is allowed by law for the very purpose of protecting him against the insolvency of the vendee; and the assignment in this case, which left the assignors in insolvency, even if it could be said that it did not find them so, would be sufficient to originate the very right which, according to the argument for the respondents, it is also sufficient to extinguish. In the case of Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376) the vendor's right was asserted as against property which had so far passed into the hands of the consignee that he was enabled, by mortgage of the bills of lading, to pass the interest in the goods to the extent of that mortgage; but the right of stoppage in transitu was upheld as against the surplus, in preference to a claim of the mortgagee to apply it to liquidate the balance of a general account. This (as Vice-Chancellor Wood observes in the case already referred to on the question of transitus) was, in some degree, an extension of what was supposed to be the right of the consignor, and it shews the desire to give this right a full and equitable protection. Doubtless the vendor's claim cannot prevail against the claim of a transferee for value given on the faith of a negotiable security fairly and honestly taken; to the extent to which he has so given value, he has a prior claim. But the rule is founded on the reason of it, as already explained; cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex. Where there is no advance made or value given upon the faith of the documents; where the object is simply, by a sweeping clause, to gather in whatever may be got to recoup the creditor of a debtor who had become insolvent for an improvident advance made upon the faith of a totally different security; where, upon the true construction of the assignment, no interest passed that would place the assignee in a better position than the assignor, and the bills of lading which subsequently came to hand were transferred expressly in performance of the agreement in this assignment, and without other consideration whatsoever; it appears to their Lordships that such a transfer, so made and under such circumstances, cannot be held sufficient to defeat the vendor's claim. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that the Chief Justice ought to have nonsuited the plaintiffs, inasmuch as, upon their evidence, it did not appear that they had acquired a property in the goods sufficient to sustain the action of trover for the conversion alleged, which took place after the assertion of the right of stoppage. They will therefore recommend Her Majesty that the order appealed against should be set aside, together with the verdict found for the respondents, and that a judgment of nonsuit should be entered.

St. Lucia—Old French Law—Family Name—Property in.

COLONY.—By the old French law, which prevails in St. Lucia, a family has no property in their family name, and no action will lie to restrain a stranger from assuming the patronymic of a family.

The ordinance of April 11, 1803[1], prohibiting a change of name without certain formalities, never became part of the law of St. Lucia.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, reversing a decree of the Royal Court of St. Lucia.

The appellants were a father and brothers, members of an ancient family, in the Island of St. Lucia, which family had for many generations used and been called by the name of Du Boulay, and to whom, it was contended, the name as of right belonged.

The respondent was the illegitimate son of a Mulatto woman named Rose, who was formerly a slave of the Du Boulay family.

(1) That ordinance enacted—Art. 4. "Toute personne qui aura quelque raison de changer de nom en addressera la demande motivée au gouvernement.

Art. 5. "Le gouvernement prononcera dans la forme presente pour les règlements d'administration publique.

Art. 6. "S'il admet la demande il autorisera le changement de nom par un arrêt rendu dans la même forme, mais qui n'aura son exécution qu'après la révolution d'une année, à compter du jour de son insertion au bulletin des lois.

Art. 7. "Pendant le cours de cette année toute personne y ayant droit sera admis à présenter requête au gouvernement pour obtenir la révocation de l'arrêté autorisant le changement de nom, et cette révocation sera prononcée par le gouvernement s'il juge l'opposition fondée, &c. The said Rose was manumitted on June 25, 1831, and was in the "Acte d'Affranchissement" registered in respect of such manumission described as "Rose" only, by which name she had always been called and known. In the "Acte de Naissance" of the respondent, dated March 26, 1835, the said Rose was referred to by the name of "Rose," and the respondent by the names of "Jules Réné Herménégilde," without surname in either case. On February 22, 1844, the respondent, being then nine years old, stood godfather upon the baptism of one Françoise. In the certificate of such baptism he was referred to as "Jules Réné," and signed the register of the parish, on the same occasion, in such names only. The respondent alleged that, at the age of sixteen, he assumed the name of Du Boulay, which had in the mean time been assumed by his mother, Rose, and he claimed to bear and use such name; but he did not claim to be in any way related to the family of Du Boulay. The appellants, on April 21, 1865, filed their bill of complaint against the respondent in the Royal Court of St. Lucia, praying that the respondent might be prohibited from taking or bearing the name of Du Boulay.

On July 20, 1865, the Royal Court pronounced judgment in favour of the appellants, and ordered "That the name of Du Boulay belonged to the appellants, with defence and prohibition to the said Jules Réné Herménégilde, to take, bear and sign in future the said name of Du Boulay under all the pains and penalties of the law." The respondent appealed against this decree to the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, which Court delivered the judgment in the following terms: "The present appellant is the issue of a manumitted slave, and has assumed and for some time borne the name of Du Boulay, and the present suit is instituted to deprive the appellant of this patronymic, and the Court is to inquire whether there be any law in force in St. Lucia by which the object of such a suit can be attained. It was stated from authority at the bar that there was a time when in France names were changed without any solemnity, but such a latitude was prohibited by an ordinance of April 11, 1803. That ordinance is not in force in St. Lucia. No ordinance in France was deemed to be in force in her colonies unless registered there or extended to the colonies by the order of the parent State. The Coutume de Paris was the law of the French colonies. The 33rd article of the Arrêt of the "Conseil d'État du Roi" of May, 1664, establishing the West India Company, expressly declares its obligatory effect in the West India colonies as it had been established in the French colonies in the East. The Coutume de Paris is still continued as the law of St. Lucia. It does not appear that the ordinance of April, 1803, was extended by its terms, or by any other edict of the French government, to the colonies, and it has not been registered in St. Lucia. The history of St. Lucia throws some further light on this subject. About two months after the ordinance of 1803, that is to say, on June 22, 1803, St. Lucia capitulated to the British arms under General Greenfield, and it has remained a British colony ever since. Now regard being had to the unsettled condition of France in its state of transition at the time of the passing of this ordinance, to the existence of war, by which the irregularity in the communication then existing between Europe and the Antilles was necessarily increased, to the length of time consumed in a voyage across the Atlantic in those days, and to the slowness that attends on all government action, it is not too much to presume, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that this edict was unheard of in St. Lucia at the time of its conquest in 1803. The judgment of the Court below must be reversed, with the costs of the suit there and in this Court.

The Chief Justice of St. Lucia, however, dissented from this judgment, and assigned his reasons, as follows: "1. That Du Boulay is clearly shewn to be, and to have been for centuries past, the patronymic name of the appellants. 2, That by both the ancient and modern law of France, a family name is a property that belongs to that family, and can never be taken by persons who have no right to it either by descent or inheritance. 3, That the last-mentioned rule is ex necessitate applicable to the courts of St. Lucia, which are still governed by the ancient laws of France in all matters of property and inheritance. 4, That the ordinance of April 11, 1803, prohibiting the change of names without certain specified formalities, was and is still in force in the colony of St. Lucia."

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Field and A. J. Lewis, for the appellants.—The decree in the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands is erroneous. The question depends on the law of France as it existed prior to the ordinance of 1803. According to the law of France, as it existed prior to April 11, 1803, the name of Du Boulay was, as between the appellants and the respondent, the property of the appellants and their family, and ought therefore to be protected by law from usurpation by the respondent. By the law of France prior to the date aforesaid, no person could change or add to his name without an express authority from the ruling power so to do. Coloured persons, free or manumitted, were forbidden to take the surnames either of their reputed fathers or of their masters of white complexion. But if this be not so, the ordinance of April 11, 1803, became part of the law of St. Lucia, and prohibited the assumption of the name by the respondent. Further, the appellants are entitled to restrain the respondent from using the name Du Boulay, notwithstanding the lapse of time during which the appellants have allowed the respondent to use the name of Du Boulay in the island of St. Lucia.—They referred to Dictionnaire du Notariat[2], De Lacarelle v. De Lacarelle[3], and Lawless v. Pierre[4].

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

Lord Chelmsford delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, reversing a decree of the Royal Court of St. Lucia in favour of the appellants. The suit was instituted in the Royal Court of St. Lucia, for the purpose of having it ordered and decided that the name of Du Boulay belongs to the appellants and their family, with defence and prohibition to the respondent to take, bear and sign in future the said name of Du Boulay.

The question to be determined upon this appeal is, whether an action of this description is maintainable under the French law, which at the present time is the governing law in the island of St. Lucia. When a Judge is called upon to decide a question depending upon foreign law, there is always some danger of his being influenced by notions derived from that law which he is in the daily habit of administering. In this country we do not recognize the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger. The right to the exclusive use of a name in connexion with a trade or business is familiar to our law; and any person using that name, after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another, is considered to have been guilty of fraud, or at least of an invasion of another's right, and renders himself liable to an action; or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction. But the mere assumption of a name, which is the patronymic of a family, by a stranger who had never before been called by that name, whatever cause of annoyance it may be to the family, is a grievance for which our law affords no redress. The appellants, however, say that by the French law, which is in force in St. Lucia, they have a right to maintain a civil action against the respondent for assuming their family name of Du Boulay.

The following are the facts admitted in the case: The name Du Boulay had been the family name of the appellants for a very long period. The respondent is the illegitimate son of an emancipated female slave, named Rose, and was born at Martinque on February 17, 1835. Before his birth his mother had assumed the name of Du Boulay, and was so called in a judicial proceeding of the Tribunal of First Instance of St. Pierre, Martinque, on August 20, 1831. In 1840 she left Martinque and took up her abode in St. Lucia, where she was publicly called and known by the name of Rose Du Boulay down to the time of her death in 1854. The respondent continued in Martinque till after the death of his mother, when he removed to St. Lucia, being at that time about the age of nineteen. It does not appear when he first took the name of Du Boulay. He certainly had not done so in the early part of the year 1844, for on February 22 in that year (though only nine years old), he stood godfather to a child, and signed the register by the name of Jules Réné. In the year 1852, he had a passport granted to him, and registered in the registry of passports for the interior of the island of Martinque, in which he is described as "Mr. Du Boulay Jules Réné Herménégilde, seventeen years old." In the year 1855, having then fixed his residence in St. Lucia, he advertised in an island newspaper his intention to commence business under the firm of "Du Boulay Brothers & Co.," and in the following year he advertised the dissolution of this firm, and his intention to continue the business in his own name. In 1856, the respondent's brother died, and he was nominated administrator of his brother's succession. Public notice of this nomination was given by the Royal Court by advertisement in the official gazette, in which the respondent was called "Jules Réné Herménégilde Du Boulay, alias Herman Du Boulay." From the time of his use of the name of Du Boulay, in St. Lucia, down to the time of the institution of the suit by the appellants on April 21, 1865, his right to use it was never questioned. During this period he carried on business publicly and notoriously under the name of Du Boulay, and the fact must have been well known to all the Du Boulay family resident in St. Lucia. The appellants describe themselves in their plaint as dwelling in the Quarter of Souffrière, in the second district of the island. The reason given by their advocate for their not having proceeded against the respondent sooner, as stated by him upon their authority, is, "that during the period mentioned by the respondent, those of the members of the Du Boulay family who could have protected their family name were in Europe for their education, or for other purposes." And "the head of the family, Mr. Belisle Du Boulay, was then affected with a chronical disease which deterred him from attending to any kind of business."

It was necessary for the appellants, in order to establish their case against the respondent, to shew,—first, that the existing law of St. Lucia entitled them to maintain their action; and, secondly, that delay in asserting their right, or acquiescence in the use of the name of Du Boulay, by the respondent, did not prevent their proceeding against him.

Upon the first question, the learned counsel for the appellant undertook to prove that by the old French law, which prevails in St. Lucia, a family had a property in their patronymic, and might prevent any person calling himself by their name who had no right or title to do so. For this purpose he quoted a modern work, the Dictionnaire du Notariat, s. 3, tit. 'De la Propriété des Noms,' where it is said, "Le nom que chaque individu porte est pour lui une propriété. Il a le droit de s'opposer à ce qu'il soit pris par un autre. L'usurpation d'un nom donne lieu à une action devant les tribunaux. Cette action est purement civile." The learned counsel, upon being pressed for some instance of an action of this description having been brought under the old French law, confessed that he had no early precedent to produce. The only cases which he mentioned were two, which are to be found in the record of the proceedings. One of them is the case of De Lacarelle v. De Lacarelle, before the Tribunal of Villefranche, in the year 1859, respecting which nothing is stated except the opinion of the tribunal, that a person who has the right to bear a name is entitled to prevent another from usurping it, without being compelled to account for the motive of his proceeding; and the other, Lawless v. Pierre, before the Tribunals of Martinique, in the year 1860, which, like the present, was the case of the assumption of a name after emancipation from slavery. It is extremely doubtful whether, prior to the ordinance of 1555 (to be presently mentioned), the assumption of a name by a person who had originally no right to call himself by it, was the subject of any proceeding, penal or civil. Merlin, in his Répertoire de Jurisprudence, tit. ' Nom,' s. 3, after stating that by the Roman law changes of names were absolutely free, says: " Il fut un temps en France où conformément à cette loi on changeait de nom sans aucune solennité." He then gives a variety of instances prior to 1555, in which changes of name had been made without authority, and without any solemnity. He then proceeds, " Mais comme cette licence de changer ainsi de nom et d'armes produisait les plus grands abus, le Roi Henri II. y remédia par une ordonnance donnée à Amboise le 26 mars, avant Pâques, 1555, art. 9." The right, therefore, to bring a civil action in St. Lucia for the usurpation of a family name must be founded either upon this ordinance of 1555 or upon some law subsequently passed, and introduced into the island. The ordinance of 1555 gives no right of civil action for an unauthorized change of name; and according to Merlin, in the passages just cited, such an action could hardly have been previously maintained. The ordinance subjects the person changing his name without authority to penal consequences only. It says, " Pour éviter la supposition des noms et des armes, défenses sont faites à toutes personnes de changer leurs noms, et leurs armes, sans avoir obtenu des lettres de dispense et permission, à peine de 1000 livres d'amende, d'être punis comme faussaires et être exautorés et privés de tout degré et privilége de noblesse." There seems to be great doubt whether this ordinance of 1555 ever had any practical operation, even in France. Merlin, in his Répertoire, tit. ' Promesse de changer de Nom,' says the ordinance, not having been registered, never became law in France. But Dalloz, in his Dictionnaire, tit. ' Nom et Prénom,' after mentioning this opinion of Merlin, says, " Mais la Jurisprudence est contraire à cette opinion." At all events, it is not shewn that this unregistered ordinance ever formed part of the law of St. Lucia. It is to be observed that the Chief Justice of St. Lucia founds his judgment in favour of the appellants upon a different ordinance, never referring to the ordinance of 1555 as having any existence, or at least, as having any bearing upon his decision. He says, " In France, under the law ' De Mutatione Nominis,' names were changed according to the whim or caprice of individuals without any solemnity or formality, but such an unrestrained licence brought forth great confusion; names of living families were arbitrarily taken, and towards the commencement of the 19th century, to wit, on April 11, 1803, a law was made to check that dangerous system." And he adds, " It is not amiss to observe that that law is not only still in force in this colony, but has been retained entire by the modern legislators of France, and now forms part of the existing law of that country."

Notwithstanding the opinion of the Chief Justice that the ordinance of 1803 is in force in St. Lucia, it may fairly be questioned whether it ever became part of the law of the island before it was taken by this country, on June 23, 1803. On that day a proclamation was issued which " assured and guaranteed to the inhabitants the full enjoyment of their property under the laws which existed in the island at the time immediately prior to the last session." It is not very probable that the ordinance of 1803 was one of these laws. It was passed in France a little more than two months before St. Lucia was brought under British dominion, and not being of any peculiar local importance, it was not likely, in the critical position of the French West Indian colonies at this juncture, that any care would be taken to transmit it, in order that it might form part of the law of the island. If the Chief Justice is right in saying that this law was made to prevent persons arbitrarily taking the names of living families, it would seem to shew that before 1803 no civil action could be brought, or at all events, that none was ever brought to protect a family name from usurpation. If the law of 1803 is out of the question, it is difficult to see upon what other foundation the appellants can rest their right to maintain the action. The old French law, on which their learned counsel mainly relied, has already been considered. The ordinance of 1555, or one of a similar description made in 1629, was the only law upon the subject of changes of name at the time of the French Revolution. That ordinance fell with the kingly authority. In 1794, during the revolutionary government, an ordinance was passed which absolutely prohibited any change of name, but the learned counsel was unable to shew that this ordinance, any more than that of 1803, ever had the force of law in St. Lucia. He failed altogether in his endeavour to prove that the existing law of the island entitled the appellants to maintain their action, whether he relied upon the old French law independently of the ordinances, or upon proof that the ordinances ever formed part of the law of St. Lucia, or even if they did, that they gave a family a right to proceed by civil action against a person calling himself by the family name without authority, and to compel him to discontinue to use it.

Their Lordships are unwilling to dispose of the case without adverting to the question arising from the delay of the appellants in instituting their suit. Supposing an action of this kind to be maintainable, there must be some reasonable limit within which a family ought to be bound to proceed. In the present case, the family of Du Boulay, resident in St. Lucia, could not have been ignorant that for ten years the respondent had been carrying on business openly under the name of Du Boulay, that he had been recognized by that name in public acts, and that he had undoubtedly acquired the name by reputation. At what time some of the appellants were absent from St. Lucia, and when they returned, is left in uncertainty; but the head of the family appears to have been continually resident in the island, and no sufficient reason is assigned for his not taking earlier steps to protect the family name from the respondent's alleged unauthorized assumption of it. Under these circumstances, whether any other member of the family might have questioned the title of the respondent to call himself by the family name is unnecessary to be considered, but all the appellants have placed themselves under a personal exception by standing by (as it is called) and permitting the respondent to become known to the world by the name of Du Boulay. After their long acquiescence, it would be unreasonable and unjust to sanction the attempt of the appellants to deprive the respondent of his right to use a name which he had acquired by reputation, and by which alone he had been known in the island during the whole period of his residence there.

Their Lordships will recommend to Her Majesty that the decree appealed from be affirmed.

A testatrix, who was unable to write, directed a notary to prepare her will. The notary drew up a will in accordance with the direction of the testatrix and delivered it to the testatrix. The testatrix afterwards attended before two notaries (one being the notary who had drawn up her will), and she repeated in their presence all the dispositions contained in the testament, though not in the exact terms of the testament, and the will was executed:—Held, that the words of art. 289, " dicté et nommé par le testateur aux dits notaires " do not require in express terms that the will should be written by a notary at the time of dictation, and that the provisions of art. 289. had been sufficiently complied with.

This was an appeal from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, the one dated June 20, 1865, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court of the Province of Canada, district of Quebec; and the other, dated March 18, 1867, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court, in an action en pétition d'hérédité instituted by the appellants against the respondent. The judgments appealed from dismissed the appellants' action and established a testament of Dame Marie Anne Evanturel, late of Quebec, widow, deceased, dated May 18, 1861, as valid by the law of Lower Canada.

The validity of this testament was the only question to be decided on the appeal.

The respondent was the only son and sole executor and residuary legatee in usufruct of Madame M. Evanturel.

The appellant Emilie Malvina Evanturel was a married daughter of Madame Evanturel, and sued with her husband, the other appellant.

The suit was begun by a claim to the succession of the late Madame Evanturel (pétition d'hérédité) filed by the appellants in the Superior Court of Lower Canada, on December 7, 1863. The petition alleged in substance that Madame Evanturel died on November 10, 1863, leaving five children surviving her, namely, the respondent, Marie Marguerite Evanturel, wife of Alfred Paré; Sophie Evanturel, wife of Louis Timothé Suzor; the appellant Emilie Malvina Evanturel, wife of the appellant Édouard Rémillard, and Elmire Aglaé Evanturel, unmarried; that such five children constituted the sole heirs of Marie Evanturel, and that each of them was entitled to one-fifth share of her property; that nevertheless the respondent had unlawfully possessed himself of the whole of the property of the deceased, to the exclusion of his sisters; and the petition concluded with a prayer that the respondent should be ordered to deliver up to the appellants one-fifth share of such property, with all profits accrued thereon, and to pay the costs of the suit.

To this petition the respondent replied by a peremptory and perpetual exception in law (exception péremptoire en droit perpétuelle), in which he pleaded a will made by his late mother, dated May 18, 1861, being the will the validity of which was in question in the suit.

This will, after ordering payment of the testatrix's debts, and giving directions as to her funeral, and after making certain bequests to her other children, gave all the residue of her property, real and personal, to her son the respondent, for the enjoyment and usufruct thereof, with remainder to his children, charged, however, with annuities of 15*l.* a-piece to three of the sisters of the testatrix, and of 25*l.* a-piece to the four daughters of the testatrix, but any one of these last legacies was to be at once annulled and destroyed in the case of any daughter who should attempt to dispute the validity of her will. The testatrix discharged her son from all accounts and claims against him as her agent or attorney during her lifetime, and appointed him sole executor of her will. The testatrix was unable to write. The manner in which the will was executed was stated on the face of it as follows:

" These presents were made, dictated and expressed (' fait, dicté et nommé ') by the widow of François Evanturel, the testatrix, to the undersigned notaries. And her present will having been read and re-read to her by M. Joseph Petitclerc, one of the said notaries, in presence of M. Phillippe Huot, his colleague, summoned for that purpose, the said Dame Evanturel said that she well understood and comprehended it, and gave a formal adhesion to it at Quebec, in the study of M. Joseph Petitclerc, one of the said notaries, in the year 1861, the 18th day of the month of May, afternoon, under the number 11,686. And that the said widow of François Evanturel declared herself unable to write or sign, whence arose the necessity that it should be read and re-read.

On January 9, 1864, the appellants replied to the respondent's exception by general answers, traversing the exception of the respondent; and by a special answer, in which they denied the validity of the will propounded by the respondents, on the grounds of incapacity and undue influence, and also on the ground of insufficient and informal execution. On the same day the appellants moved the Superior Court of Lower Canada that they might be at liberty " de s'inscrire en faux " against the will pleaded by the respondent, to take proceedings for the purpose of shewing that the will was not duly executed as a testamentary instrument; and on February 4, 1864, they applied for and obtained an order that the will should be lodged in the office of the Prothonotary of that Court.

On February 9, 1864, the appellants filed a statement of their objections to the due execution of the will, " moyens de faux." The objections so pleaded were as follows: " First, that the pretended will of the said late Dame Marie Anne Bédard, under date May 18, 1861, was not ' dicté et nommé ' by the said lady to M. Jh. Petitclerc and his colleague, notaries public, as falsely alleged in the pretended will. Secondly, that the said pretended will was not ' dicté et nommé ' by the said late lady to M. Jh. Petitclerc and his colleague, notaries public, on May 18, 1861, as falsely alleged by the said pretended will. Thirdly, that important parts of the said pretended will (other than the preamble) appeared to be manuscript written or altered in a strange hand, other than that of either of the said two notaries, who passed the said will."

On the objections so pleaded issue was joined.

In order to support their objections the appellants called as witnesses the two notaries before whom the will was passed, Joseph Petitclerc and Phillippe Huot, and the testatrix's legal adviser, Napoléon Casault. The statements of these three witnesses as to the execution of the will agreed in every material point, and were to the following effect: M. Petitclerc, the family notary, was summoned by the testatrix on May 16, 1861, and went to her in the afternoon of that day. He found her alone, and she said at once that she wanted to make her will, and then and there dictated her wishes, of which he made a memorandum. This memorandum contained, in an abbreviated form, all the dispositions and bequests which appear in the will. The testatrix then told him to draw up her will according to these instructions, and to send it to her that she might have it examined by her counsel. He drew up the will according to these instructions the same day or the day following and sent it back to Madame Evanturel. On the afternoon of the 18th Madame Evanturel came to his office to execute her will, bringing with her the draft which had been sent to her. M. Petitclerc took it, and examined it, and finding some words on the fifth page in a strange hand he scratched them out at once. He then sent for his colleague, M. Huot, to assist at the execution. On M. Huot's entrance M. Petitclerc requested the testatrix to say what her last wishes were, and she repeated in brief all the bequests and dispositions contained in the will. M. Petitclerc took the will, read it, and having done so asked Madame Evanturel if she wished to add or alter anything. Madame Evanturel then made some trifling emendations, and then desired him to add the words which he had already found in the margin, written in a strange hand, to the effect that if any of her daughters tried to dispute her will, the legacy to such daughter or daughters should be void and fall into residue. At her request he added these words in his own handwriting, and he and his colleague verified the addition by affixing to it their initials.

The law which governed the execution of wills at the time when Madame Evanturel's will was made was composed of the 289th article of the Coutume de Paris, and of an imperial statute, 14 Geo. 3. c. 83, which extended to the people of Canada the power of making wills in English form. The provisions of the Coutume de Paris are as follows:

" Art. 219.—Pour réputer un testament solennel, il est nécessaire qu'il soit écrit et signé du testateur; ou qu'il soit passé pardevant deux notaires, ou pardevant le curé de la paroisse du testateur, ou son vicaire-général, et un notaire; ou du dit curé ou vicaire et trois témoins; ou d'un notaire et deux témoins: iceux témoins idoines, suffisans, mâles et agés de vingt ans accomplis, et non légataires; et qu'il ait été dicté et nommé par le testateur aux dits notaires, curé ou vicaire-général, et depuis à lui relu en présence d'iceux notaires, curé ou vicaire-général, et témoins; et qu'il soit fait mention au dit testament qu'il a été ainsi dicté, nommé et relu; et qu'il soit signé par le dit testateur, et par les témoins; ou que mention soit faite de la cause pour laquelle ils n'ont pu signer."

The cause came on to be heard, on June 10, 1864, in the Superior Court of Lower Canada.

At the trial the respondent, in order to shew how the law had been construed in Lower Canada in practice, called one of the principal notaries of Montreal and ten of the most distinguished and respectable notaries of Quebec, who all confirmed the practice of M. Petitclerc, stating that they had seldom, if ever, except in the case of illness or immediate necessity, made wills in any other way.

The appellants, on the other hand, produced eight notaries from various country districts, who stated that they were in the habit when they made a will of writing it down once at the dictation of the testator in the presence of another notary or of two witnesses. But it did not appear that they adopted this practice from an idea of its being the only lawful one, but on grounds of convenience, their clients being generally people from the country round, who came into town for the day, and who could not wait or come again when a will had been put into proper form.

Of three notaries in Quebec whom the appellants called in support of their view, two had but seldom practised as notaries, and had never had a will of any importance to draw, and the third, M. Pruneau, admitted that he had quite recently drawn up several wills in the very way in which Madame Evanturel's will was drawn, and his admission was confirmed by the respondent's witnesses.

The superior Court maintained the objection to the validity (inscription en faux) made by the plaintiffs en faux against the will, as being illegally executed, —that is to say, as not having been dictated and expressed by the testatrix to the notaries public who drew the said will,—with costs against the defendant, and declared such will null for all legal purposes.

Against this decision the respondent appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada. The appellants also appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench against a part of it, which amounted to a decision against them on the merits.

The Court of Queen's Bench, on June 20, 1865, delivered judgment on the appeal of the present respondent. This judgment reversed the decision of the Court below.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Bowring, for the appellants.—The question in this appeal depends entirely on the construction to be put on the 289th article of the Coutume de Paris, as declared by the Parliament of Paris in 1580. The provisions of this article have not been complied with by the testatrix. The testament of May 18, 1861, was not validly " dicté et nommé " by the testatrix to two notaries, as required by article 289. The testatrix ought to have declared the disposition she desired to make, and both the notaries, or at all events one, ought to have taken down the will at the time. Unless these formalities are observed the testament is invalid. The formalities are essential. They are intended to prevent fraud and for the greater protection of ignorant testators who cannot write. This testament may have been obtained by undue influence (fraude, suggestion, captation et ménaces). A testament executed in the manner in which this was may not be the expression of the free will of the testatrix. To permit testaments to be so executed would tend to defeat the policy of the law as provided for by the article.—He referred to Merlin Rep. 'Testament,' vol. 5. s. 2, Toulier, 'Don. et Test,' vol. 5, No. 410, Burge, 'Colonial Law,' vol. 4, p. 426, Ancien Denizart, p. 698, Duranton, vol. 5. No. 66, Troplong, 'Donations et Testaments,' vol. 3. No. 1552, and Mercadée, 'Commentaries sur l'Article 972.'

Wickens, for the respondent.—No doubt article 289. of the Coutume de Paris, is the law on the subject, but the language of the article does not in express terms require that the will should be written by a notary at the time of dictation. There is no declaration that the will must be executed in the manner prescribed under pain of nullity. It is said that the testament was not "dicté et nommé" by the testatrix as required by the article 289, and it is said that the provision can only be satisfied by one or perhaps both notaries taking down the dispositions of the testator. But the language of the article does not require that the instrument should be taken down by a notary at the time of dictation. The provision of the Code Napoléon may serve to shew that when the formalities there prescribed are to be enforced, they will be required under pain of nullity. There is no such provision in the Coutume de Paris. He referred to Ordinance des Testaments, 1735, art. 23, Code Napoléon, arts. 972, 1001, Ferrière, Coutume de Paris, vol. 4. p. 133; Dalloz, vol. 16, tit. 4, c. 2, 'De l'Ecriture par le Notaire.'

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir R. Phillimore (March 15) delivered the judgment of their Lordships. —This is an appeal against two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, one of June 20, 1865, which reversed the judgment of the Superior Court of September 5, 1864, and the other of March 18, 1867, which affirmed the judgment of the Superior Court of May 16, 1866.

The subject of these judgments and of the present appeal is the validity of the testament of the late Marie Anne Evanturel, widow, of Quebec. She died on November 10, 1863, leaving five children surviving her, among whom were the appellant, Emilie Malvina, wife of Édouard Rémillard, and the respondent, the Hon. François Evanturel. These five children, if she had died intestate, would have been entitled in equal shares to her property.

The suit was begun by a claim to the succession of Madame Evanturel, entitled "pétition d'hérédité," filed by the present appellants in the Superior Court of Lower Canada, on December 7, 1863.

In answer to this petition the present respondent, on January 5, 1864, replied by a peremptory and perpetual exception in law (exception péremptoire en droit perpétuelle), by which he pleaded a testament made by his late mother, dated May 18, 1861. To this exception the appellants replied by a general answer and by a special replication, in which they impugned the validity of the testament, on the ground of incapacity or undue influence (fraude, suggestion, captation ménaces employés par le défendeur).

It may be convenient here to state that this allegation was disproved in the opinion of all the Judges in the Canadian Courts, and has not been insisted upon before their Lordships.

The appellants in their special replication also relied on the invalidity of the execution of the testament. The mode of raising this latter issue is, according to the law of France and Lower Canada, to enter, by permission of the Court, a process which is called "inscription en faux." The appellants having duly obtained this leave filed their "moyens de faux," which were as follows:

"1. That the pretended testament of May 18, 1861, was not dicté et nommé by the deceased to two public notaries, as falsely asserted in the pretended testament. 2. That it was not dicté et nommé by her to two public notaries on May 18, 1861, as falsely asserted in the pretended testament. 3. That an important part of the alleged testament other than the preamble, was written and altered by some stranger's hand, other than that of the two notaries who passed the testament."

It appears from the evidence that M. Petitclerc, a notary, went to the testatrix, in obedience to a summons, on May 16, 1861; he found her alone: she told him that she desired to make her testament; she then and there expressed the dispositions and bequests which it was to contain. M. Petitclerc drew up a memorandum in which they were concisely stated. The testatrix then told him to prepare her testament in conformity therewith, and to send it to her in order to its being examined by her counsel. He drew up the testament on the same or on the following day. Madame Evanturel, on the 17th, had an interview with her counsel, M. Casault, whom it appears that she had consulted on the subject of her will on May 15 and 16: he wrote in the margin of the will an alteration, subsequently cancelled and re-written by the notary; and on the afternoon of May 18 Madame Evanturel went to the office of M. Petitclerc, bringing with her the draft testament, which he opened, and on perceiving M. Casault's alterations, drew his pen through them. He then sent for a brother notary, M. Huot, who arrived. There was also present M. Casault. M. Petitclerc then asked the testatrix what were the dispositions which she desired to make, and she repeated in brief ("en raccourcis"), as M. Huot says, "as if she had known them by heart," all the dispositions which are contained in the testament, though not exactly, it would appear, in the same terms and in the same order. M. Petitclerc then read the testament: she suggested certain corrections, and the addition of the following condition attendant on the bequests to her daughters: "Et que quant à celle ou celles qui voudront contester mon dit testament, le legs à elles fait de la dite rente soit non avenu et caduc." It appears that M. Petitclerc then re-read the testament with the corrections and addition which have been mentioned. The testatrix then declared that she could not write; and what Mr. Justice Taschereau calls the "énonce sacramental," the essential formula, was put in the following words:

"Ce fut ainsi fait, dicté et nommé par la dite Dame veuve François Eventurel, testatrice, aux dits notaires soussignés, et son présent testament lui ayant été lu et relu par Maître Joseph Petitclerc, l'un des dits notaires, en présence de Maître Philippe Huot, son confrère, pour ce mandé, la dite Dame Evanturel a dit le bien entendre et comprendre, et y a persisté, a Quebec, en l'étude de Maître Joseph Petitclerc, l'un des notaires, l'an 1861, le 18me jour du mois de Mai, après-midi, sous le numéro 11,686. Et la dite Dame veuve François Evanturel a déclaré ne savoir ni écrire ni signer de ce requise, lecture faite et refaite.

"Signé sur la minute, demeurée en la dite étude.

"PHI. HUOT, N.P.
"JH. PETITCLERC, N.P."

It may be convenient here to dispose of the two "moyens de faux" which relate respectively to the date of the testament and to the alterations in a strange hand. It has scarcely been contended before this Court that the testament was "dicté et nommé" on May 16, and such a contention, in their Lordships' opinion, cannot be sustained. The question of the execution of testament must be confined to the date of May 18. With respect to the alterations in a strange hand, they are fully accounted for by the testimony of the witnesses, and can in no way affect the decision in this case. In the evidence given by the witnesses, MM. Petitclerc, Casault and Huot, some discrepancies occur, and also in the two depositions of M. Petitclerc, made at different times; but their Lordships entirely concur with the remarks of Mr. Justice Taschereau upon this subject, and are of opinion with him that their discrepancies are insignificant, and do not affect the real and only question in this case, namely, the true construction of the law which governs the execution of this testament. There is no controversy as to what the law is. It is the 289th article of the Coutume de Paris, as declared by the parliament of Paris in 1580, and is in these words—(his Lordship read the article).—It is contended by the appellants that the provisions of this regulation have not been complied with, and that the testament is therefore invalid. They maintain that, according to the true construction of that regulation, and especially of the words " dicté et nommé par leur testateur aux dits notaires," the testator must declare the dispositions which he desires to make, and that one notary at least, if not the two, must then and there write down these dispositions, and that unless this requisition of the law be obeyed, the testament is null. This construction of the Coutume was adopted by Mr. Justice Taschereau in the Superior Court of Lower Canada; and, accordingly, he sustained the inscription en faux, and pronounced against the validity of the testament. From this sentence an appeal was prosecuted to the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada. That Court reversed this decision, holding that the testament was duly executed. The Court was composed of five Judges; of these, three, Chief Justice Duval, Mr. Justice Aylwin and Mr. Justice Meredith, delivered their judgments in favour of the validity of the testament; while two, Mr. Justice Drummond and Mr. Justice Mondelet, dissented, and agreed with Mr. Justice Taschereau. From this sentence the present appeal has been prosecuted. The case has been fully argued before their Lordships, and we have now to deliver our opinion upon the true construction of the 289th article of the Coutume de Paris, in its application to the testament which is the subject of this litigation.

Some preliminary observations occur which it will be well to mention in this place. First, that the language of this Coutume does not require in express terms that the will should be written by a notary at the time of dictation; though it does require that the will should be read over in the presence of the notaries and of the testator; and, secondly, that there is no declaration like that which is to be found in the Code Napoléon, that the formalities enjoined shall be observed on pain of nullity. In respect to these particular words, " dicté et nommé," it appears to their Lordships that they must be considered as conveying one idea, the latter word being only used to strengthen the former; and in this opinion their Lordships are justified by the opinion of the learned editor of Ferrière, and of the decision to which he refers: " La première chose à observer est qu'il faut que le testament soit dicté et nommé par le testateur, sur quoy on a demandé autrefois, si des mots équivalents suffisoient, comme proferez de sa propre bouche, il a été décidé qu'ils ne suffisoient pas, la Coutume disant ' dicté et nommé '; mais que si un notaire ne mettoit que l'un des deux, ou dicté ou nommé, comme ils sont synonimes, qu'il n'y auroit point de nullité." (Vol. 4, page 133.)

It was admitted by the counsel for the appellants that it was not necessary that the notary should write " mot à mot " the dispositions of the testament as dictated by the testatrix, that he might put them in proper language and in proper order, and with whatever amplifications were necessary to give them due legal force and effect, and that the testatrix might dictate from a written and previously prepared instrument. And their Lordships are clear that this view is correct, having regard both to the reason of the thing and to the decisions which have been given upon the particular Coutume, as well as those which have been delivered upon the far more rigorous language of the article in the Code Napoléon, which are collected in Dalloz, vol. 16, tit. 4, c. 2. s. 4, article 2, s. 2. (' De l'Écriture par le Notaire.') In forming our judgment upon the general construction of the Coutume, one of the primary considerations has necessarily been to ascertain what was the mischief which this law was framed to remedy, and upon this point there is really no room for doubt. The authority of the commentator Claude de Ferrière has been much relied upon by both parties, and it is entitled to considerable weight in the explication of this law. After mentioning the various ways in which a testament solennel may be made under this Coutume, he adds: " Notre Coutume outre cela requiert dans les testamens plusieurs solemnitez, pour empêcher les fraudes et les suggestions. La première formalité est, qu'il ait été dicté et nommé par le testateur à celuy qui l'a reçu. La deuxième, qu'il soit relu au testateur, et qu'il soit fait mention qu'il a été dicté, et nommé, et relu. La troisième, qu'il soit signé par le testateur et par les témoins." (Ferrière, Coutume de Paris, vol. 4, p. 18, ed. 1714.) And, again, the same author, speaking of a will made ad interrogationem alterius, says: " La validité d'un testament ainsi fait, dépend beaucoup des circonstances, car les formalitez ne sont pas requises dans les testamens pour empêcher de tester, mais pour empêcher qu'ils ne fassent contre la volonté et l'intention des hommes, ainsi il paroît par les circonstances, que la disposition faite ad interrogationem alterius a été l'esprit de celuy qui l'a faite, elle doit être confirmée, ainsi cela dépend de la prudence des Juges " (pp. 105, 106).

The mischief of a fraudulent, or false, or extorted, or even suggested, disposition, instead of the genuine expression of the testator's wishes, is certainly not incurred where, as in this instance, the testator is asked what his wishes are, where he deliberately expresses them, and where the instrument which contains them, though previously written, is read over to and approved by him. Their Lordships agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Taschereau on this point: " Il y a peu de doute que dans le cas présent, le testament argué de faux en cette cause présenterait à mon esprit une idée très forte de l'expression vraie et complète des volontés de Madame Evanturel." The execution of this testament not having sinned against the mischief which the law was intended to prevent, the consideration next in order appears to be, what interpretation did this law receive from contemporaneous exposition? This exposition is derived from the " arrêts," or judicial decisions on the question, and is evidenced by the usage and practice of notaries public.

1. In considering the various arrêts cited both in the Courts below and at the bar before us, we must distinguish those in which the testament was merely acknowledged in the presence of two notaries, though twice read in their presence and approved by the testator, from the present case, in which there was an actual dictation by the testatrix of the whole of her testamentary dispositions, though the writing did not follow that dictation. Even with respect to arrêts of the former description, there are three reported by Ferrière: that of Machéco, in 1597; that of Pisany, in 1602; and that of Claude Pollaët, in 1616, which latter arrêt was also confirmed by the Appellate Court, in which the testaments, acknowledged indeed and in the last case also signed by the testator in the presence of two notaries, but not dictated, were pronounced to be valid. It will be borne in mind that the date of the declaration of the Coutume is 1580; these arrêts, therefore, so far as their authority extends, have the force of a contemporaneous exposition.

There are, it is true, on the other hand, various arrêts to be found in the books, in which testaments acknowledged and approved by the testator in the presence of two notaries, and twice read over, have been pronounced null, on the ground of their not having been " dictés et nommés," according to the Coutume; but there does not appear to be one in which a testament, " dicté " as this testament was, has been set aside on the ground, either that the dictation was insufficient, or that the writing ought to have followed the dictation. And lastly, upon this point it is to be observed, that in the cases of Robitaille v. Bonneville and Routier v. Robitaille (Stuart's Lower Canada Rep. 440), decided by the Court of Queen's Bench for the district of Quebec, by Chief Justice Sewell and Mr. Justice Ker in the year 1829, in which cases the testament was " inscrit en faux," on the ground that it was not legally executed as a " testament solennel," that is, not " dicté et nommé " according to the law and as certified by the notary, Mr. Justice Meredith says, and no doubt with perfect accuracy: " The evidence adduced in that case has been placed before us, and from the depositions of the two notaries and other evidence it appears that the second notary was not present when the will was written. And yet the will was held to be a good will. The case went to appeal and was disposed of, as the gentlemen of the bar are aware, upon a different ground, and all that is said in the report respecting the point now under consideration is, the Court below, however, considered that the will had been regularly made, and rejected the 'inscription en faux.'" There is no doubt that jurists, both in Canada and in France, have differed upon the construction of this article of the Coutume. Their discordant opinions are more or less reflected by the conflicting decisions above referred to, and also by the difference in the practice of notaries in Canada. The interpretation put by the usage of these officers, who perform a public duty in the preparation of wills, is by no means unimportant; and the result of the evidence upon this head is, that the practice of the leading notaries in the principal Canadian towns of Montreal and Quebec greatly preponderates in favour of the mode of executing a testament adopted in the case before us. It appears, therefore, to their Lordships that, even if the French authority were admitted to be in favour of the stricter construction of the article in question, the latter interpretation has, both by decision and by long usage, acquired the force of law in Lower Canada.

The 23rd article of the Ordonnance des Testaments of 1735 and the 972nd article of the Code Napoléon have been referred to, and the decisions with respect to them were considered by the Judges of the Court below, whose opinions were adverse to the validity of this testament. Their Lordships do not think it necessary or expedient to enter into an examination of these decisions. There is, however, an observation arising from the consideration of these two later acts of French legislation, which is, perhaps, not irrelevant to the question before us. The Ordonnance requires that the notaries, or one of them, "écriront les dernières volontés du testateur telles qu'il les dictera," and the article of the Code Napoléon, that the testament "doit être écrit par l'un des notaires tel qu'il est dicté; and a subsequent article provides that the prescribed formalities shall be observed under pain of nullity. The inference from the insertion of these additional formalities, and of the penalty by which they are guarded in this later legislation, is certainly not unfavourable to the liberal construction of the Coutume declared in 1580, under the authority of which the testament before us was made.

After a careful consideration of the law, and of the authorities applicable to this case, inasmuch as it appears to their Lordships that the mode in which this testament has been executed is not obnoxious to the mischief which the Coutume intended to guard against, the testament being the expression of the undoubted wishes of the testatrix; and, inasmuch as the force of contemporaneous exposition embodied and continued in the practice of notaries down to the present time is in favour of the validity of such an execution—an exposition in itself reasonable and sound—and having regard to the principle of the comparatively recent decisions of the Canadian Courts in Robitaille v. Bonneville their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed, the validity of this testament pronounced for, and the costs of this appeal paid by the appellants.

Principal and Agent— Acts of Principal—Implied Warranty of Authority of Agent.

COMPANY. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—The appellants, two directors of a public company, wrote to the respondents, their bankers, informing them that one C. had been appointed manager of the company, and had authority to draw cheques on the account of the company. At the date of the letter the account was, to the knowledge of the appellants, overdrawn, and C. further overdrew the account. The appellants, as such directors, had no authority to overdraw:—Held, that there was evidence of an implied warranty on the part of the appellants that C. had authority to bind the company, and that the appellants were personally liable.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria.

The appellants were two of the directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, engaged in mining for gold at the Loch Fyne Quartz.

The respondents were a banking corporation carrying on business at Melbourne, and had branch banks at Matlock and Wood's Point, in the colony of Victoria.

The action was commenced by the respondents against the appellants in February, 1867, to recover 4,127*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, being the amount paid by the bank on cheques drawn by one Charles Ernest Clarke.

The declaration stated that in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would honour and pay on account of the company the cheques of Charles Ernest Clarke, the defendants promised that he was duly authorized by the company to make cheques for them as their agent; and the plaintiffs alleged that, relying on such promise, they did honour such cheques on account of the company, but that the said Charles Ernest Clarke was not authorized by the company to make the same.

Amongst other pleas the defendants pleaded, fourthly, that the promise was in the words and figures following:

"The Manager of the Colonial Bank of Australasia, Matlock.

"Wood's Point, Dec. 4, 1865.

"Sir,—We have to inform you that we, as directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, have appointed Mr. Charles Ernest Clarke to be legal manager of the company, and have authorized him to draw cheques upon the account of the said company.—We remain, Sir, yours truly,

"THOMAS CHERRY, } Directors, Loch Fyne
JOHN M'DOUGALL. } Q.M. Co., Regd."

And that the said Thomas Cherry and John M'Dougall therein mentioned were the defendants, and the Colonial Bank of Australasia therein mentioned were the plaintiffs, and the said Charles Ernest Clarke was the person of the same name in the declaration mentioned. Sixthly, that as to 4,000*l.*, parcel of the money claimed, cheques of the said Charles Ernest Clarke to that amount were drawn by him on the bank by way of overdraft, and there was not at the time of their being drawn any money standing to the credit of the company in the bank, out of which the same were payable.

The plaintiffs demurred to these pleas, and joined issue on the other pleas. The defendants joined in demurrer.

The cause was tried, on June 4, 1867, when the following facts were proved: That the appellants were directors of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company. That previous to the month of December, 1865, the company had opened an account with the respondents' branch bank at Matlock. That at the commencement and before the 4th of that month, the account of the company with the branch bank was overdrawn, of which the appellants had notice. That on the 4th of that month the appellants wrote and signed the letter set forth in the fourth plea, and sent it to the respondents. That thereupon Clarke drew cheques, which were honoured by the bank, which increased the overdraft. That the account was then, by consent of the appellants and respondents, transferred to the branch bank at Wood's Point. That Clarke drew a cheque for 2,336*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* on the Wood's Point branch of the respondents' bank, in order to pay off the overdraft of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company at the Matlock branch. That the pass-book was regularly furnished to Clarke; that he subsequently drew several cheques, which were all honoured, the amount of the overdraft being the amount claimed in the action. It was further proved that the appellants did not form a quorum of the directors of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company, and were not empowered to give Clarke the authority mentioned in their letter to the respondents, or to authorize him to draw cheques on account of the company.

Upon these facts the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount of their claim.

On June 27, 1867, a rule nisi was obtained by the appellants to set aside the verdict, and to enter a nonsuit on these grounds: That the authority given to Clarke was a limited one, and that he was not justified in exceeding such authority. That there was no evidence of any authority to Clarke to pledge the credit of the company or overdraw, but only to draw on the funds of the company in the bank. That the authority given to Charles Ernest Clarke was not as stated in the declaration, but limited to drawing cheques on the plaintiffs' branch bank at Matlock, and that there was no evidence of any personal responsibility on the part of the defendants. That there was no such promise as that declared on, and that the letter signed by the defendants varied from the allegation in the declaration. That there was no evidence of any promise by the defendants that Clarke was authorized and empowered by the company to make drafts or cheques for them as their agent. That there was no evidence of any consideration as stated in the declaration.

On September 6, 1867, the Supreme Court gave judgment in favour of the respondents, on the points raised by the rule, but ordered the damages to be reduced by 2,245*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, on the ground that cheques to that amount were drawn in respect of a balance incurred before the date of the letter, the judgment being that the verdict should stand, and that the damages be reduced by the amount of 2,245*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*; and on the demurrers the judgment was for the respondents.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Mellish and Griffits.—The action is founded on contract, but no contract was proved. The letter relied on contains no words of contract and stipulates for no consideration, and there was no intention on either side to make a contract. There is no contract that the manager had power to draw cheques for the purpose of borrowing money. The reasons for implying a warrant of authority in the case of contracts made by one person on behalf of another do not extend to notifications of acts done by the directors of a public company in the exercise of their powers as directors. The letter does not purport to authorize Clarke to overdraw. There was no evidence that the loss was consequent upon any contract contained in the letter. The respondents would have sustained the same loss if the letter had been accurate. There was no evidence of any warranty to draw on the respondents, except at the Matlock branch. The appellants only acted as directors of the company.—They referred to Rashdall v. Ford (35 L. J. Ch. 769); Wilson v. Goodman (4 Hare, 54); Ricketts v. Bennett (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 686); Fuller v. Wilson (3 Q.B. Rep. 58; 11 L. J. Q.B. 251); Collin v. Wright (8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215).

Sir J. Karslake and Macnamara, contra.—The appellants represented Clarke to be the duly authorized agent of the company. The appellants are therefore liable to the bank for such damage as accrued to the bank through such representation. The sum for which the verdict stands was, in fact, money paid by the respondents for the appellants at their request and for their benefit. At all events, upon the facts proved there was evidence to maintain the action. It was very probable that the appellants should have intended to give Clarke authority to overdraw, and that the respondents should suppose that Clarke had such authority. If a person holds out another person as his agent there is an implied warranty for all the acts of such person. Even if the appellants had no authority to overdraw, this letter gave Clarke power to overdraw, and there was no limit to such power. They referred to Hughes v. Græme (33 L. J. Q.B. 335); Thompson v. Davenport (2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 340); Marzetti v. Williams (1 B. & Ad. 415; 9 L. J. K.B. 42); Taylor on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 57; Lewis v. Nicholson (18 Q.B. Rep. 503; 21 L. J. Q.B. 311).

Cur. adv. vult.

SIR J. NAPIER (on July 19) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—This was an action of assumpsit brought by the Colonial Bank of Australasia against the defendants, who were two of the directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company (Registered).

The declaration states that in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would honour and pay on account of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, &c., the drafts or cheques of one Charles Ernest Clarke, to be directed to the plaintiffs, the defendants promised the plaintiffs that the said Charles Ernest Clarke was duly authorized and empowered by the said company to make drafts or cheques for them as their agent; and that the plaintiffs, relying on the promise of the defendants, did honour and pay on account of the said company divers drafts or cheques of the said Charles Ernest Clarke, directed as aforesaid. It also states that Clarke was not authorized by the company to make the said drafts or cheques as their agent, by reason whereof the plaintiffs lost the amount advanced upon them. To this declaration defences were pleaded, in which the making of the promise by the defendants, the drawing of the cheques, and the payment on account of the company as alleged were respectively denied, and issues were joined thereon.

The statement of the consideration was not expressly traversed, nor the allegation that Clarke was not authorized by the company to make the drafts or cheques as their agent. There were other pleas pleaded by the defendants, which were demurred to on the part of the plaintiff, but it was conceded that it was not necessary to notice these more particularly.

It appears from the evidence given at the trial that, before the month of December, 1865, the company had opened an account with the branch bank of the defendants at Matlock, and that cheques were from time to time drawn upon the bank by the then manager of the company, which were duly honoured and paid by the bank on account of the company. The account was overdrawn to the knowledge of the defendants at the time when they signed the following letter, and handed it to Clarke, who gave it to the manager of the bank:

"The Manager of the Colonial Bank of Australasia, Matlock.

"Wood's Point, Dec. 4, 1865.

"Sir,—We have to inform you that we, as directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, have appointed Mr. Charles Ernest Clarke to be legal manager of the company, and have authorized him to draw cheques upon the account of the said company.—We remain, &c.

"THOMAS CHERRY, } Directors, Loch Fyne
"JOHN M'DOUGALL, } Q. M. Co., Regd."

After this letter was deposited by Clarke with the manager of the bank, advances were continued by the bank on cheques drawn by Clarke, purporting to bind the company. These cheques were duly honoured by the bank on the faith of this letter. Under the 21st section of the Colonial Act the credit of the company could have been pledged for advances on overdrafts, provided the borrowing had been authorized by a majority of the shareholders, but not otherwise. No evidence was offered to prove that such authority was given. The case proceeded on the assumption that Clarke had not authority to bind the company by the cheques which he drew. There was no imputation of fraud in the transaction.

It was contended by Mr. Mellish that, on the face of the letter, it appears that the defendants acted merely as directors of the company, and never meant to bind themselves otherwise than as directors; that, therefore, they cannot be made personally liable. If the question was, whether the defendants, in fact, intended to bind themselves personally, it might be admitted that such was not their intention. But it remains to be considered whether, upon the view which the jury were entitled to take of the evidence, the law does not imply a warranty to the bank, on the part of the defendants, that Clarke had authority to bind the company so as to make them responsible to the bank for the advances on the cheques.

In the case of Downman v. Williams (7 Q.B. Rep. 112; 14 L. J. Q.B. 226), Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, states, that where a contract appears, upon its legal construction, to have been entered into by an agent on behalf of his principal, the only ground on which the agent could become personally liable thereon is that which has been stated by Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Law of Agency. The ground therein stated is said to be "a plain principle of justice; for every person so acting for another, by a natural if not by a necessary implication, holds himself out as having competent authority to do the act, and thereby draws the other party into his reciprocal engagement." According to the opinion of that eminent jurist, if a person represents himself as having authority to do an act when he has not, and the other side is drawn into a contract with him, and the contract becomes void for want of such authority, he is liable for the damage which may result to the party who confided in the representation, whether the party making it acted with a knowledge of its falsity or not. "In short," says Mr. Justice Story, "he undertakes for the truth of his representation." This doctrine of an implied warranty in such cases seems to have met with the approval of the learned Judges who decided the case of Lewis v. Nicholson (18 Q.B. Rep. 503; 21 L. J. Q.B. 311), although expressed with some reserve, as it was not necessary for them to decide the question. It became necessary to decide it in the case of Collin v. Wright (8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215), and the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in that case must be considered to have settled the law upon the subject, in conformity with the view of Mr. Justice Story. The remedy by a special action, where there is fraud or deceit, is a distinct matter upon which no question is made.

It appears to their Lordships that there was evidence upon which it was open to the jury to find that the defendants, professing to act on behalf of the company, had led the plaintiffs to believe that Clarke had authority to draw cheques as the agent of the company, and thereby induced the bank to make advances on the cheques on the supposition that, as between the bank and the company, the latter was bound. It can make no difference that the engagement into which the plaintiffs were thus drawn by the defendants has to be collected by inference from the evidence laid before the jury. When it has been ascertained as a matter of fact, the legal effect is the same as if it had been express. The warranty which the law implies depends on the position of the parties and on the nature and effect of the representation. The representation in this case was admitted on the record to be untrue.

Their Lordships agree with the Judges of the Supreme Court in thinking that, in this state of things, the law implies the warranty or undertaking on the part of the defendants, as stated in the declaration, and that there was no ground for entering a nonsuit.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court should be affirmed with costs.

Felony—" Venire de Novo."

CRIMINAL LAW.—In a charge of felony where the indictment is good and the prisoner has been given in charge to a jury in due form of law empanelled, chosen and sworn, and a verdict has been returned and judgment given, the proceedings are final, and a venire de novo will not lie.

COLONY.—The respondent was tried for murder at a sessions of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery in New South Wales, and convicted and sentenced to death. Afterwards the Supreme Court of that colony made a rule absolute for a venire de novo, on the ground that the jury had before giving their verdict been allowed access to newspapers containing reports of the case:—Held, that the Supreme Court had no power to order a venire de novo in such a case.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

An information was filed in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, at the sittings of the Court held at Darlinghurst, as a Court of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery, by Her Majesty's Attorney-General for the colony, charging that Michael Murphy, the respondent, did, on November 22, 1865, at South Creek, in the colony, feloniously and wilfully, and of his malice aforethought, kill and murder one Samuel Hassen.

The said Michael Murphy pleaded " not guilty," and issue was joined thereon. On September 10, 1867, the said Michael Murphy was brought up for trial before the said Court, and was there on September 11, 12, 13 and 14, 1867, tried before one of the Judges of the said Court, and a jury of twelve persons duly empanelled and sworn to try the issue so joined upon the said information as aforesaid, and thereupon the jury found a verdict of " guilty," and the Court sentenced the prisoner to death.

On September 19 the Supreme Court of the said colony, sitting in banco, upon the motion of the counsel for the prisoner, and upon reading the affidavit of the attorney for the prisoner, granted a rule nisi, calling upon the Attorney-General of the colony to shew cause why a venire de novo should not issue, for the trial of the said Michael Murphy, upon the issue so joined on the information as aforesaid, upon the ground that after the jury had been empanelled to try the said issue, on the said September 10, and before they delivered their verdict, they were allowed the free use of the newspapers of the day, which contained the reports of the trial, so far as it had gone.

The rule nisi came on for argument on September 24, 1867, when upon reading the said affidavit, and also upon reading the several affidavits sworn and filed in opposition to the said rule, and upon hearing counsel on the part of the Attorney-General and also on the part of the said Michael Murphy, the Court gave judgment to the effect that the rule nisi should be made absolute, and that a venire facias de novo should issue for the trial of the prisoner upon the aforesaid charge.

On February 29, 1868, leave was given to appeal from this judgment.

Sir R. Palmer and Cohen, for the appellant.—The order of a writ of venire facias de novo is in effect the granting of a new trial. The Court has no power to grant a new trial in a case of felony—The Queen v. Bertrand (36 L. J. P.C. 51). In all the cases in which a venire de novo has been granted, there has been some error apparent on the record. The matters complained of did not amount to a mis-trial. The Court had no jurisdiction in any way to set aside the verdict of the jury, or vacate, quash or avoid the judgment thereon. The Court had no power to order the issue of a venire de novo in any case of felony where the verdict has been given by a jury duly empanelled. But if the Court had the power to order the issue of a venire de novo in a case of felony where a verdict has been given by a jury duly empanelled, the matters relied upon in the present case did not warrant the exercise of such power.—They referred to Witham v. Lewis (1 Wils. 48); Davis v. Pierce (2 Term Rep. 126); The Queen v. Fowler (4 B. & Ald. 273); Winsor v. the Queen (35 L. J. M.C. 161; L. R. 1 Q.B. 313); The Queen v. Scaife (20 L. J. M.C. 229); Tidd's Practice (9th edit.), 922; Hale's Pleas of the Crown, c. 42, p. 306.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) and Archibald, for the respondent.—No doubt The Queen v. Bertrand (36 L. J. P.C. 51) is an authority to shew that there can be no new trial in a case of felony; but there is a distinction between a new trial and a venire de novo. This is recognized in all the text-books, and the whole question turns on this difference—Chitty's Crim. Law, vol. 1, 654; Deacon's Crim. Law, 1341; Archbold's Crim. Pleading, 164. There was a substantial miscarriage of justice in the course of the trial in allowing the jury the use of newspapers. This amounts to a mis-trial. The jury ought only to be instructed by the strength of the evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court. The reading newspaper reports of the trial as it proceeds has a tendency to interfere with the due and orderly administration of justice. They referred to Campbell v. the Queen (11 Q.B. 799; 17 L. J. M.C. 89); The Queen v. Yeadon (31 L. J. M.C. 70); The Queen v. Mansell (27 L. J. M.C. 4); The Queen v. Mellor (1 Dears. & B. 468); and The Queen v. Higgins (Cox's Crim. Cas. 585).

Sir R. Palmer, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir William Erle (July 17) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—Upon this appeal it appears, by the proceedings returned to this Court, that the prisoner Murphy was tried for murder at a session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery for the month of September, before Mr. Justice Fawcett, and was convicted and sentenced; and all the proceedings, as far as appeared, were regular and in due form of law. Afterwards, an application on behalf of the prisoner, upon an affidavit, was made to the Supreme Court sitting in banco, in term, for a rule to shew cause why a venire de novo should not issue for the trial of the said prisoner; and, upon further affidavits, the said rule was made absolute; and therein it was also ordered that a suggestion should be made on the record to the effect that, after the jury had been empanelled and before the verdict, the jurors were allowed, during certain adjournments of the Court for the night, by the officers of the sheriff having charge of them, to have access to and free perusal of certain newspapers containing reports of the evidence from day to day; and that the last-mentioned trial, by reason of the matters so suggested, was not according to law, but was irregular and void. This suggestion was followed by an entry, purporting to be an order, that, for the cause aforesaid, the judgment on the said verdict be vacated, and that the sheriff cause a jury anew to come. It further appears, by the same proceedings above referred to, that the only affidavit giving judicial knowledge to the Supreme Court of the alleged irregularity in keeping the jurors was that of the attorney for the prisoner, who deposed, " That he was informed by one of the jurors who acted on the said trial, and he verily believed, that after they had been empanelled to try the said case, and during their confinement at the hotel (where they were kept during adjournments), and before verdict, the jurors were allowed the free use of the newspapers of the day, which contained reports of the aforesaid trial as far as it had gone, in one of which newspapers the heading given was, the ' South Creek Murder Case.' " These are the proceedings in the Courts below, to which we think it necessary to advert as relevant to this appeal.

Upon the argument in this Court the question has been, whether the above-mentioned order for vacating the judgment upon the verdict and for a venire de novo in order for another trial was valid; and their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the answer should be in the negative, both on the ground which their Lordships relied upon in the case of The Queen v. Bertrand (36 L. J. P.C. 51), and also on the further grounds stated below: First, their Lordships consider that the present case is, in substance, an attempt, by the exercise of a discretion, to grant a new trial on the ground that the conviction was considered to be unsatisfactory by reason of some irregularity in the conduct of the trial. In Bertrand's Case (36 L. J. P.C. 51) the irregularity was, that the evidence of the witnesses was read to the jury from the notes of the evidence on a former trial. Here the irregularity was in so keeping the jury during the course of the trial, as that the jurymen may have had access to some newspapers during that time; but the law is clear that the discretional power vested in certain Courts and cases to grant new trials does not extend to cases of felony. The law on this subject was declared by their Lordships in that case, and we consider that the law so declared governs the present case.

Each of these cases falls within the rule that no person ought to be put in peril twice on the same charge. The application of the rule is shewn in detail by Blackburn, J., in Winsor v. the Queen (35 L. J. M.C. 161; L. R. 1 Q.B. 313), who there states, " When the jury have been brought together, and the prisoner has been given in charge, and the trial has commenced, the right course, if practicable, is, that the jury should give their verdict convicting or acquitting the prisoner. When the jury have once found a verdict of conviction or acquittal, the matter has become res judicata, and after that there can be no further trial." He further shews that a venire de novo on the same indictment would be erroneous and a new indictment on the same charge would be defeated by a plea of autrefois acquit or convict. These remarks relate to a verdict returned upon a good indictment for felony before a competent tribunal. Their Lordships cite this statement of the law to shew the finality of a verdict upon a charge of felony when the indictment is good and the prisoner has been given in charge to a jury, in due form of law empanelled, chosen and sworn, and a verdict of conviction or acquittal has been returned.

In the present case, if the prisoner should have been tried and convicted upon the venire de novo ordered to issue by the rule here appealed against, according to the passage just cited, a judgment thereon would be erroneous. The cases in which a verdict upon a charge of felony has been held to be a nullity and a venire de novo awarded have not been classified in the Digests; there are cases of defect of jurisdiction in respect of time, place or person,—cases of verdicts so insufficiently expressed or so ambiguous that a judgment could not be founded thereon: but we have not discovered any valid authority for holding a verdict of conviction or acquittal in a case of felony delivered by a competent jury before a competent tribunal in due form of law to be a nullity by reason of some conduct on the part of the jury which the Court considers unsatisfactory. As to the two supposed exceptions to this rule against new trial in cases of felony, The Queen v. Scaife (20 L. J. M.C. 229) was noticed in The Queen v. Bertrand (36 L. J. P.C. 51), and the other case of The Queen v. Fowler (4 B. & Ald. 273) was explained to be no decision in the course of the argument on this appeal. Secondly, the further grounds for sustaining the present appeal beyond those expressed in the judgment in Bertrand's case (36 L. J. P.C. 51) relate both to the form of the proceeding in the Supreme Court when exercising appellate jurisdiction under which the rule appealed against was granted, and also to the sufficiency of the evidence on which that Court acted in granting that rule. Their Lordships are not aware of any principle either of the law of England or of this colony by virtue whereof the Supreme Court sitting in banco, in term, could take cognizance as a Court of appeal of the judgment pronounced by Mr. Justice Fawcett at the session of oyer and terminer, which had come to an end before the session in banco began; and although the relation of the Courts to each other in respect of appellate jurisdiction has not been ascertained by us with precision, still, whatever be that relation, we find no form of proceeding analogous to that which is required by the common law in proceedings when the aid of a Court of error or appeal is invoked, but the form is the form adapted to an application to the discretion of the Court for a new trial. Then as to the sufficiency of the evidence of the facts on which the Court acted in granting the rule appealed against, their Lordships do not find any strictly legal evidence of any fact; they find nothing beyond an affidavit of mere hearsay information, obtained from a person who had been on the jury, but was then discharged, and this information, if admitted to judicial notice at all, shewed possible access to newspapers, without shewing that they contained matter which tended to influence the jury improperly, or that the jury ever did, as a matter of fact, read the newspapers. There is also the further objection, that the supposed informant had been one of the jurymen, and the Courts here have at times expressed a reluctance which we consider salutary against receiving the separate statements of any of the individuals who had in combination formed a jury, in order to impeach the verdict. The whole of the proceedings in the Supreme Court are referred to the Judicial Committee, and as their Lordships consider that the rule nisi for a new trial, and the rule absolute founded thereon, were each granted on insufficient grounds, both rules fail to produce any effect, and the conviction stands unimpeached thereby.

We do not examine the authorities cited for the respondent, because none of them appear to us to sanction the notion that a verdict even in a civil case could be set aside upon an imagination of some wrong without any proof of reality. The suggestions upon which verdicts have been so set aside in civil cases have alleged traversable facts, material and relevant, to shew that the verdict had actually resulted from improper influence, and we refer to the special verdict reported in 11 Hen. 4. f. 17, as affording an example of such facts as would, if stated in a suggestion on the record, have had the effect of setting aside the verdict.

The case in the Year Book, 11 H. 4, f. 17, we translate as follows (the original is transcribed below, in the note[1]: "The plaintiff in an assize had delivered an escrowment [writing to be used in case of need?] to a juryman on the panel, for evidence of his matter; and after the same juror, with others, had been sworn, and put into a house to agree on their verdict, he shewed the writing to his companions, and the officer who kept the inquest shewed this matter to the Court, through which the Justices took the writing from the jurors, and took their verdict; and by the examining (per l'apposaile) of the jurors the time of the delivery of the writing was inquired into, and it was found (i.e., by the jurors) to be as above stated; and as the verdict was for the plaintiff, now he prayed judgment. Gascoigne and Hull said that the jury, after that they were sworn, ought not to see or carry with them any evidence, except that which was delivered to them by the Court, and by the party put in Court as the evidence shewn; and inasmuch as they did the contrary, the plaintiff ought not to have judgment."

This case, with the words of Gascoigne and Hull, has been frequently referred to in abridgments and treatises, by Brooke, Rolle, Hale, Viner and others; but the general words of those Judges, as well as of Judges in general, are to be limited in some degree by reference to the facts of the case in respect of which they were spoken, and the issue of this case is not altered by transcription. We take one reference to this case, as an example, from Bro. Abr., tit. 'General Issue,' p. 85, thus: "After stating that an inquest must not take evidence privily, he adds, 'Et par Gascoigne et Hull, s'ils preignent escrowe extra curiam et passent pur le plaintiff, si ceo appiert sur examination par le Court, ceo est cause d'arrester le jugement."—(11 H. 4, f. 17.) So that the result of the examination, viz., that the verdict was not "according to the evidence," but upon evidence taken out of Court, from one party without the assent of the other, appeared by the finding of the jury, and was upon the record, as Brooke understands the case, or the judgment could not have been arrested. The special verdict here reported may be contrasted with the suggestion in the present case. In the case of 11 H. 4, 17, the Court which had jurisdiction both to try the suit and to arrest the judgment ascertained the fact of the misconduct of the plaintiff by examining the jurors, while acting as jurors and by their verdict. Judicial knowledge from this source is in contrast with the affidavit above described. Also the interest of a plaintiff as a party may be contrasted with the supposed interest of the Queen (referred to in the judgment of the Chief Justice in the Court below) in an indictment in which, although it runs in her name, she has no interest beyond that of truth and right. Neither is the sheriff her agent, as also there suggested: he emanates from the people, and is neither appointed by, nor can be dismissed by, nor is he paid by the Queen; furthermore, the mere omission of his bailiffs to clear a room in an inn where jurors are confined of the newspapers coming there by the course of the inn, is in contrast with the culpable craft of the plaintiff who prepared a statement of his case, and sought out a juryman into whom he probably infused a prejudice in his favour, and so influenced the verdict.

In conclusion, their Lordships desire to add that they are sensible of the importance of guarding the channels for information through which the minds of the jury are led to their verdict, and concur with the learned Judges of the Court below in their zeal for the prevention of any such misconduct in future; but they think that the Court was wrong in granting a new trial, as a remedy for this misconduct, and that the mischief would be greater if uncertainty was introduced respecting the course to be pursued in administering the law relating to charges of felony. If irregularity occurs in the conduct of a trial not constituting a ground for treating the verdict as a nullity, the remedy to prevent a failure of justice is by application to the authority, with whom rests the discretion either of executing the law or commuting the sentence. As there was, in the opinion of the Court below, irregularity in the trial of the respondent sufficient to vacate the judgment, their Lordships have no doubt that, upon proper application on behalf of the respondent, which they recommend to be made, such weight will be given to these remarks as they may appear to deserve. But, as between the appellant and respondent, their Lordships will advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be sustained without costs, and that the order for a new trial should be reversed.

Natal—Crown Grant—Ecclesiastical Purpose—Form and Effect of Grant.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—In the year 1850, a piece of land in the colony of Natal was granted by the Crown "in freehold to the appellant, the Bishop of Capetown and his successors in the said see, in trust for the English Church at Pietermaritzburg," in the colony of Natal, and a church was erected on the land.

At the time of the grant Natal was part of the diocese of Capetown, but was subsequently created a separate see, of which the respondent was appointed bishop, and the church so erected became the cathedral church of the diocese of Natal. In the year 1863, the appellant took possession of the said church and excluded the respondent from the use of the same:—Held, in an action of ejectment by the respondent to recover possession of the said land, first, that the appellant had no estate or title in the land so granted either as a trustee or otherwise; secondly, that the respondent had a right as against the appellant to use and have access to the said church; thirdly, that, in an action of ejectment, the Supreme Court had no power to deal with the actual estate in the land.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the colony of Natal, in a suit wherein the Right Rev. John William Colenso, in his capacity of Lord Bishop of Natal, was plaintiff, and the Right Rev. Robert Gray, of Capetown, in his capacity of Lord Bishop of Capetown, was defendant.

The declaration in the suit stated that, on March 19, 1850, the then administrator of the government of the district of Natal granted in freehold to the defendant and his successors in the see of Capetown, in trust for the English Church at Pietermaritzburg, a certain piece of ground in the town of Pietermaritzburg, with full power and authority thenceforward to possess the same in perpetuity; that thereafter the defendant, in his capacity as Lord Bishop of Capetown, caused the said piece of ground to be taken possession of for the use of the English Church in Natal, in the terms of the said deed, and occupied the same and continued in possession until October, 1853, when the defendant resigned his said see of Capetown, which was dissolved by Her Majesty, and thereout various sees were created, viz., the sees of Capetown, Grahamstown and Natal; that the said newly-created see of Capetown, to which the defendant was appointed bishop, was totally distinct from the former see of Capetown and entirely excluded the colony of Natal, and that from the date of his resignation the defendant ceased to have any right to hold the said property under the said trust; that, by letters patent of Her Majesty, dated November 23, 1853, the colony of Natal was created into an independent and separate bishopric, to which the plaintiff was appointed bishop and became the successor in office of the defendant with reference to the said trust so far as relates to the colony of Natal; and that the defendant by force and violence continued to keep partial and adverse possession of the said piece of ground and the buildings and premises erected thereon, to wit, the cathedral church known as St. Peter's, to the damage of the plaintiff, &c., to the value of one farthing. The declaration then prayed that the defendant be ejected from all or any possession he might have of the said piece of ground or the said buildings erected thereon as aforesaid, and that the said deed of grant be reduced or altered or amended by substituting the plaintiff's name and his successors in office in the said deed as the holders or trustees of the said property for the said purpose in the colony of Natal, with full costs of suit.

The defendant by his pleas denied every allegation of fact in the declaration contained, and the plaintiff joined issue on the defendant's pleas.

The facts of the case were as follows: By letters patent, under the great seal of the United Kingdom, bearing date at Westminster, September 25, 1847, the colony or settlement of the Cape of Good Hope, with its dependencies and the Island of St. Helena, was erected into a bishop's see and diocese, called the "Bishopric of Capetown"; and by the same letters patent it was signified to the then Archbishop of Canterbury that Her Majesty had appointed Robert Gray, doctor in divinity, the appellant, to be the bishop of the said see and diocese, and the said archbishop was thereby commanded to consecrate, and did consecrate the appellant as such bishop, and the appellant thereupon entered into and possessed and became the bishop of the said see. The appellant was by the said letters patent granted to be a body corporate, and was constituted to be a perpetual corporation and to have perpetual sucession; and upon him and his successors was conferred the title of Lord Bishop of Capetown; and the appellant and his successors were, by the title aforesaid, empowered to hold and enjoy lands and hereditaments of what nature or kind whatsoever. At the date of the said letters patent the district of Natal was a dependency of the colony or settlement of the Cape of Good Hope, and was within the see or diocese created by the said letters patent. On March 19, 1850, the administrator of the government of the district of Natal granted a piece of land situate in the said district to the appellant, by a deed which was in the words following: "I do hereby grant in freehold unto the Right Reverend Father in God Robert Lord Bishop of Capetown and his successors of the said see, in trust for the English Church at Pietermaritzburg, a certain piece of ground containing one acre, two roods and thirty-two perches, situated in the town of Pietermaritzburg, in the district of Natal, being that marked No. 17, in Longmarket Street on the general plan of that town, and bounded north-east by lot 18, south-east by Longmarket Street, south-west by lot 16, and north-west by Church Street (as will more fully appear by the diagram framed by the surveyor and hereunto annexed), and with full power and authority henceforth to possess the same in perpetuity, subject, however, to all such duties and regulations as are either already or shall in future be established with regard to such lands." The appellant afterwards took possession of the land under the terms of this deed.

By the letters patent dated September 25, 1847, whereby the appellant in manner aforesaid appointed and consecrated to be bishop of the see and diocese therein constituted and described, it was declared that if the appellant or any of his successors should by instrument under his hand and seal delivered and sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being, and by him accepted and registered in the office of faculties of the said Archbishop, resign the office and dignity of Bishop of Capetown, such bishop should from the time of such acceptance and registration cease to be Bishop of Capetown to all intents and purposes, but without prejudice to any responsibility to which he might be liable in law or equity in respect of his conduct in his said office.

In October, 1853, the appellant duly exercised the right of resignation, and by an instrument under his hand and seal resigned the office and dignity of Bishop of Capetown.

On November 23, 1853, letters patent were issued under the great seal for the purpose of erecting the district of Natal into a separate see or diocese. The letters patent, after reciting amongst other thangs that the said see or diocese of Capetown was vacant, that it was of inconvenient size, and that it was expedient that the same should be divided into three bishoprics or sees, to be styled the Bishoprics of Capetown, Grahamstown and Natal, the bishops of the said sees of Grahamstown and Natal and their successors to be subject and subordinate to the see of Capetown and the bishop thereof and his successors in the same manner as any bishop of any see within the province of Canterbury was under the authority of the archiepiscopal see of that province, named and appointed the respondent to be ordained and consecrated bishop of the said separate see and diocese of Natal, and further ordered that the respondent and every bishop of Natal should within six months after the date of their respective letters patent take an oath of due obedience to the Bishop of Capetown for the time being as his metropolitan. The respondent and his successors were by the letters patent granted to be a body corporate, and he was constituted a perpetual corporation, and upon him and his successors was conferred the said name or title of "Lord Bishop of Natal," and the city of Pietermaritzburg within the colony or settlement of the Cape of Good Hope was ordained and constituted to be a bishop's see and the seat of the respondent.

By letters patent under the great seal, dated at Westminster on December 8, 1853, the appellant was appointed bishop of the see or diocese therein particularly described, and ordered thenceforth to be called the Bishopric of Capetown and also metropolitan bishop in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope and its dependencies, and the Island of St. Helena, and the said appointment was signified to the then Archbishop of Canterbury. By the letters patent the appellant was granted to be a body corporate, and he was constituted to be a perpetual corporation, and to have perpetual succession, and upon him and his successors was conferred the name and title of "Lord Bishop of Capetown"; and they were thereby empowered under the said name and title to hold and enjoy lands and hereditaments of what nature or kind whatsoever.

The appellant entered into, and possessed the said bishop's see as bishop thereof, and was in possession of the same and in the enjoyment of the title and dignity of Lord Bishop of Capetown; and to him, as Lord Bishop of Capetown and Metropolitan, the respondent took an oath of due obedience. After the consecration of the respondent, as Bishop of Natal, he applied to, and procured from the appellant a certain power of attorney to act for and represent the appellant as trustee of certain lands and churches in the colony and see of Natal, which said lands and churches were vested in the see of Capetown, and were enregistered in the name of the appellant, and the said land particularly described in the deed of grant dated March 19, 1850, together with a church erected thereon, formed a portion of the "lands and churches" in respect of which the appellant gave to the respondent a power of attorney to act for and to represent him as trustee.

On April 13, 1864, the said power of attorney was cancelled by the appellant. The respondent from that time ceased to be empowered to act for or to represent the appellant as trustee, and the appellant resumed possession of the said land particularly described in the said deed of grant, and of the church erected thereon.

In the month of November, 1865, the dean and incumbent and the churchwardens of the said cathedral church, acting on the advice and by the direction of the appellant, forcibly obstructed the use of the said cathedral by the respondent and the members of the English Church at Pietermaritzburg.

The cause was heard on January 10, 1867, before the Supreme Court of the Colony of Natal; and on January 31, 1867, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff for one farthing damages, and decreed that the land in question and the buildings thereon at law should stand vested in the plaintiff in his corporate capacity and his successors as Bishop of Natal, with costs.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Sir R. Palmer and Charles, for the appellant.—The respondent is not the successor of the appellant in the see of Capetown within the meaning of the grant dated March 19, 1850. He is not, therefore, entitled to have the land and buildings thereon vested in him and his successors as Bishop of Natal. The appellant is the person designated as trustee in the grant. Nothing has ever been done to divest the appellant of his estate in the land. The appellant is the successor in the see of Capetown of the said Robert, Lord Bishop of Capetown, and is as such successor trustee of the said land and buildings thereon, and the same are vested in him as trustee. The action in the Supreme Court was an action of ejectment. The appellant can, therefore, only recover by the strength of his own title; but he has no title to the legal estate. This is a legal proceeding. There can, therefore, be no power to vest the estate in the land in the respondent. The Court below must, therefore, have been wrong in attempting, as they do by their judgment, to vest the estate in the land in the respondent. They referred to Long v. the Bishop of Capetown (1 Moo. P.C. N.S. 411; Brod. & Fre. Ecc. Cas. 309); The Bishop of Natal v. Gladstone (3 L. R. Eq. 1); The Queen v. Eton College (27 L. J. Q.B. 132); Dr. Warren's case[1]; and In re the Bishop of Natal (3 Moo. P.C. N.S. 115).

Wickens and Westlake, for the respondent.—The grant of March 19, 1850, nominally made to the bishop of the then see of Capetown and his successors, must be read according to the true meaning thereof, viz., that the piece of land thereby granted should be held in trust by the bishop of the diocese for the time being. The respondent and his successors in the see of Natal became, and are, the successors in office of the appellant within the true intent and effect of the grant. Even if the trust of the land became vacant in the year 1853, through the resignation of the appellant and the extinction of the corporation sole to which the grant was made, the respondent and his successors in the see of Natal became trustees of the vacant trust, by virtue of the letters patent of November 23, 1853; even if no appointment or grant was made, yet the respondent and his successors in the see of Natal were the persons entitled to the trust, as constituting the corporation sole for the purpose of the trust for which the grant was made. If the trust was filled by the appellant, it is right that such substitution should be made in the trust as is made by the decree. The grant is no longer in the appellant and his successors in the see of Capetown, but in the respondent and his successors in the see of Natal. The appellant was a mere conduit-pipe to keep the land for the benefit and for the purpose of the see of Natal. They referred to Mühlenbruch[2]. Land vested in any person for pious use is not vested in any particular person, but in the use itself.

Charles, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Justice Giffard (on July 20) delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—The appeal in this case is from a judgment or order of the Supreme Court of the colony of Natal. That judgment or order, after setting forth certain proceedings in which the Right Rev. John William Colenso, in his capacity of Lord Bishop of Natal, was plaintiff, and the Right Rev. Robert Gray, of Capetown, in his capacity as the Lord Bishop of the diocese of Capetown, was the defendant, and shewing that these proceedings referred to land, buildings and premises comprised in a grant from the Crown, dated March 19, 1850, gave judgment for the plaintiff for one farthing damage, and "did decree that the land in question, and the buildings thereon, at law, do now stand vested in the plaintiff, in his corporate capacity, and his successors in office, as Bishop of Natal, with costs." The grant was in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty, and purported to grant "in freehold unto the Right Rev. Father in God, Robert Lord Bishop of Capetown, and his successors of the said see, in trust for the English Church, at Pietermaritzburg, a certain piece of ground, containing 1 acre, 2 roods and 32 perches, situated in the town of Pietermaritzburg, in the district of Natal, and with full powers and authority henceforth to possess the same in perpetuity; subject, however, to all such duties and regulations as are either already or shall in future be established with regard to such lands."

The plaintiff's declaration, on which the judgment or order proceeds, after referring to the grant of March, 1850, continued as follows: "And the plaintiff saith that thereafter the defendant, in his capacity as such Lord Bishop of Capetown, caused the said plot of ground to be taken possession of for the use of the English Church in Natal, in terms of said deed, and occupied the same, and so continued in possession until on or about the month of October, 1853, when the defendant resigned his said see of Capetown, which was by Her most gracious Majesty dissolved, and thereout various sees or dioceses created, namely, the see or diocese of Capetown, the see or diocese of Grahamstown, and the see or diocese of this colony of Natal. And the plaintiff saith that the said newly created see of Capetown, to which the defendant was appointed bishop, was totally distinct from the former see of Capetown, and entirely excluded the colony of Natal, or any part thereof, and from the date of such resignation the said defendant ceased to have any right to hold the said property under the said trust. And the said plaintiff further saith that, by letters patent of Her Majesty, dated November 23, 1853, this colony was created into an independent and separate bishopric, to which the plaintiff was appointed bishop, and so became the successor in office of the defendant with reference to the said trust as far as relates to this colony of Natal. And the plaintiff lastly saith that the defendant by force and violence continued to keep partial and adverse possession of the said plot of ground aforesaid, and the buildings and premises erected thereon, to wit, the cathedral church known as St. Peter's, to the great damage of the plaintiff and against the peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, wherefore he saith he hath suffered damage to the value of one farthing, and brings this suit, praying the judgment of this honourable Court that the defendant be ejected from all or any possession he may have of the said plot of ground or the said buildings erected thereon as aforesaid. And that the said deed of grant be reduced or altered, or amended, by substituting the plaintiff's name and his successors in office in the said deed as the holders or trustees of the said property for the said purposes in the colony of Natal, and with full costs of suit."

The declaration is dated September 10, 1866. Issue was afterwards joined, the defendant putting the plaintiff to proof of his case, and insisting that the whole suit ought to be dismissed with costs. Evidence was entered into on both sides, that of the defendant being documentary, and consisting, amongst other things, of certain letters patent, dated June 25, 1847, on which he relied; that of the plaintiff consisting both of documentary and oral evidence. There is proof as between the plaintiff and the defendant of the plaintiff's title, and there is also proof that he was excluded from St. Peter's Church, as well as obstructed in having access thereto, and in taking part in and performing the accustomed religious services there as bishop. From the whole result of the evidence, documentary and oral, their Lordships can come to no other conclusion than that the defendant was the cause of and authorized this exclusion and obstruction; and regard being had to the letters patent put in on his behalf, and to the course pursued by him, he must be taken to have done so under a supposed title, alleging that the plaintiff has no right of any description, and that he, the defendant, had, and has, an estate in the land, and was, and is, trustee under the grant. Under these circumstances, the first matter to be considered is, as to the form and scope of the proceedings in the suit; and as to these, while on the one hand they are not so framed, especially in point of parties, as to have enabled the Supreme Court to alter or rectify the grant, or to remove the defendant from being a trustee, if he be one, or to appoint the plaintiff a trustee, yet, on the other, their Lordships are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled, as between him and the defendant, to a judgment to some extent in his favour, provided he has, as against the defendant, a right, either legal or equitable, to use or have access to the church in question. In order to determine whether he has or has not any such right, their Lordships think it unnecessary to follow in detail the very able and elaborate arguments which have been directed more or less to the various questions arising, or supposed to arise, on the three cases of Long v. the Bishop of Capetown (1 Moo. P.C. N.S. 411; Brod. & Fre. Ecc. Cas. 309); of In re the Bishop of Natal (3 Moo. P.C. N.S. 115); and of The Bishop of Natal v. Gladstone (3 L. R. Eq. 1). Their Lordships think it sufficient for them to say that the following propositions are not at variance with any conclusions which have been arrived at in any one of those cases, have scarcely been disputed, and cannot be successfully controverted: viz., that the patents were not wholly void; that there was, by virtue of the patent of 1847, a corporation capable of taking as such under the grant; that there was a valid resignation by the defendant of the office held under the patent of 1847; and that by the two patents of 1853, of which the plaintiff's was the earlier, there was a creation of two new corporations, both capable of taking under a grant from the Crown, but neither coming within the terms of the grant of 1850, and consequently not taking an estate under it. The defendant's second patent, if the terms at the end of it be looked to, plainly creates a new corporation. A corporation, to be capable of taking an estate under the grant alone, must be the corporation described in it, and have existed at its date. Having regard to these propositions, and to the terms of the grant of 1850, be it remembered a grant from the Crown, "subject to all such duties and regulations as are or shall be established with regard to such lands," having regard, also, to the fact of Natal being separated from the Cape, to the circumstances and state of the colony of Natal, and the inception of the church there, we consider that it was competent for the Crown, in the words of the Natal patent of 1853, to "ordain and declare that the church (now in course of erection and not yet consecrated or dedicated), in the said city of Pietermaritzburg, shall henceforth be the cathedral church and see of the said William Colenso and his successors, Bishops of Natal;" and this being so, that the effect of the grant and the plaintiff's patent of 1853 was at least to give the plaintiff the right of access to the church, the right to officiate there as a bishop, and the right to perform there all the religious services which are or ought to be performed by a bishop in a cathedral consistently with the laws and usages of the Church of England, so far as the same are applicable to the church and colony in question.

There can be no doubt but that the plaintiff exercised all these rights, and had possession and occupation and access for these purposes, from the date of his appointment in 1853 until the end of 1863, a period of ten years. There was during this time no title but under the grant of 1850, and the plaintiff's patent of 1853.

Their Lordships, founding their judgments on all these considerations, and having regard also to the former decision of this Board in the matter of the Bishop of Natal, do not hesitate to state, with respect to the defendant, that he had, and has, no estate or title as trustee or otherwise, and no right to interfere; and, with respect to the plaintiff, that he has the rights expressed by that which is, in their opinion, the order which ought to have been made by the Supreme Court of Natal. That order their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to substitute for so much of the existing order as begins with the word decree, and it is as follows:

Decree.—"That the plaintiff, the Bishop of Natal, do have free and uninterrupted access to the land and premises in the grant of March 19, 1850, mentioned, for the purpose of enjoying and exercising all rights, privileges and immunities which have hitherto been enjoyed and exercised, or ought to be enjoyed or exercised, by the Bishop of Natal as such bishop or otherwise, in reference to or within the cathedral thereon and its appurtenances, and that the defendant, the Bishop of Capetown and his agents, do abstain from in any manner interfering with such access, enjoyment or exercise; saving, however, to any except the defendant, any rights in reference to the cathedral as they also enjoyed."

Their Lordships recommend an order thus qualified because their Lordships' decision relates only to the questions in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Their Lordships, in coming to the conclusion at which they have arrived, have not failed to take into consideration the power of attorney which was revoked by the defendant's deed of April 13, 1864, and that part of the defendant's letters patent of 1853 which is in these terms: "We are, moreover, pleased to order and direct that the said Bishop of Capetown, under that title, may take up, continue and proceed with every act or engagement lawfully commenced, done or entered into as Bishop of Capetown under the letters patent heretofore granted to him as bishop of the said see of Capetown."

The plaintiff's rights depend on the grant of 1850, and his patent of 1853. That patent was subsequent to the defendant's resignation, but preceded the defendant's patent of the same year. The fact that the defendant gave, and that the plaintiff accepted, a power of attorney, may be evidence of what they at one time may both have supposed their relative rights and positions to be; but the power of attorney could not call rights or interests into existence which did not otherwise exist, nor does its revocation preclude the plaintiff from asserting the continuance or existence of the rights conferred on him by the Crown. It has already been determined that the Bishop of Capetown has no jurisdiction, coercive or consensual, over the Bishop of Natal; the words quoted from the Bishop of Capetown's patent are plainly insufficient to give him any estate in the land and premises in question, or to continue any estate in him. He ceased to be trustee when he resigned. He then ceased to have any interest, legal or otherwise, under the grant. Without an estate there could not be, and, in our opinion, there was not intended to be, any continuance in him of the trust created by the grant. Even if the estate had remained vested in the defendant, and he had continued a trustee, he, as trustee, would have no right to obstruct or exclude the plaintiff, as has been done. The conclusions at which their Lordships have arrived would be the same whether considered with reference to English law and equity, or Roman-Dutch law.

It is manifest from what we have stated that we differ from the Supreme Court, so far, at all events, as the defendant is concerned, in form more than in substance. The judgment of the Supreme Court purported to deal with the actual estate in the land, church and premises, and, as we conceive, with the trust. This, in our opinion, could not be properly done in a suit constituted as the present suit is; therefore we have recommended the substitution of the order which has been read for that which was originally made by the Supreme Court. So far the appeal has been successful; but as we are of opinion that the defendant has no estate, and was wholly wrong in the course he thought fit to take, we shall humbly advise Her Majesty to the effect that no costs of the appeal be given, and that that part of the judgment in the Supreme Court which gave the plaintiff his costs there be not disturbed. As between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff was substantially right, and the fact that he asked for more than he was entitled to led to no additional issues or evidence.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty in conformity with this judgment.

Practice—Action at Law—Reversal of Judgment—Nominal Damage.

COLONY.—The Judicial Committee will not recommend Her Majesty to reverse the judgment of an inferior Court in a suit in which nominal damages alone are to be recovered.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople.

The action was brought in the Consular Court of Smyrna, by the appellant, a French subject, resident at Smyrna, against the respondent, an English merchant carrying on business there.

The petition alleged that the respondent demised to the appellant certain farms, for a term of years, computed from October 1, 1860, at certain rent, and subject to certain conditions. That in the month of July, 1861, without any forfeiture having been committed by the appellant, the respondent wrongfully re-entered and took possession of the said farms and of the furniture, farming implements, live stock and other property thereon, and appropriated them to his own use. The petition also alleged that the appellant mortgaged to the respondent a farm and its appurtenances, as a security for the rent of the before-mentioned farms of the respondent, the condition of the said mortgage being that in the event of the appellant faithfully observing the covenants in the lease of the said farms, the respondent should re-convey to the appellant his farm free of all mortgage or other charges. The petition then alleged that the respondent had, without the consent or authority of the appellant, wrongfully sold the farm so mortgaged by the appellant, and prayed that the respondent might be decreed certain damages for breach of contract committed by the respondent in re-entering and re-taking possession of his farms, and for the wrongful seizure by the respondent of the appellant's property thereupon, and also for the wrongful sale of the appellant's farm.

The respondent filed his answer to this petition, alleging that subsequently to the execution of the lease referred to in the petition, a judgment was delivered by the French Consular Court at Smyrna, by which the appellant was ordered to deliver to the respondent the estate mentioned in the said lease, and to repay to him, the respondent, certain sums of money for his account for farming purposes. That the appellant appealed from this judgment to the Imperial Court at Aix, and that the said appeal was, on May 13, 1863, dismissed with costs. That in the month of September, 1861, the appellant, for certain illegal acts committed by him in the said farm, was by the Ottoman Supreme Criminal Tribunal at Smyrna condemned to three months' imprisonment, and was forbidden ever to re-enter on the said farm. That the appellant never paid any portion of the rent due whilst in occupation of the said farm, and committed divers and sundry breaches of covenants.

From this judgment the appellant appealed to Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, which Court affirmed the judgment of the Consular Court of Smyrna, and dismissed the appeal with costs.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Bere, for the appellant.

Manisty and Butt, for the respondent.

Sir William Erle delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—The petition on the part of the appellant in this case was, in substance, for damages in consequence of his being wrongfully deprived of his property in a certain farm, and the stock that was thereupon. The matter was litigated in the Court at Smyrna, and afterwards in the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople. The judgment of the Consular Court at Constantinople is, that the appellant had no right to the damages which he sued for, and upon the appeal from that judgment the question is raised whether such judgment is right, and their Lordships have come to the conclusion that it is their duty to recommend that the appeal should be dismissed. The interest of the appellant in the farm in question is derived under the indenture of demise, which gave him an interest of six years, to commence in October, 1860. There were the usual terms between landlord and tenant for the reparation of a farm in the country where these farms are situated, and covenants for the payment of rent, for the keeping in repair, and for some course of cultivation, as to which their Lordships would make the general remark, that it was essential that the lessee should continue in the occupation in order that he might be enabled to do his duty as tenant, in respect of those covenants.

There is another provision in the deed, which bears upon the stock. There was a covenant on the part of the lessor for advances to be made by him amounting to 1,055 Turkish liras, 555 down, and 500 by way of further advances; and the lessee, Giraud, in consideration of those advances, and by way of security for them, mortgaged, pledged, and made over to Mr. Paterson all the stock upon the farm. It appears that Mr. Giraud entered upon the farm and continued in occupation. There are provisions about rights to the labour of the labourers, and other rights which led to contests, and which led to an unsatisfactory conduct of the farm. Before a year had elapsed there were proceedings, perhaps of a criminal nature, against Mr. Giraud for assault, under which he was arrested and taken to prison, where he was confined for forty-seven days. Before the time of his going to prison, there had been an omission on the part of Mr. Giraud to collect in the crops at the time when they were ripe, and persons were put upon the farm to collect in those crops for the mutual interest of the landlord and the tenant. Upon the whole of the evidence, as it was reviewed by the Judge of the Consular Court, and as far as it has been brought to our attention, the fact of Mr. Paterson putting in persons to come upon the farms and collect in the crops in 1861 was not an eviction by Mr. Paterson of Mr. Giraud. Very much turns upon the point whether or no Mr. Paterson can be considered to have been the cause of, or in any way accessory to bringing about the arrest of Mr. Giraud and taking him to prison. The imputation has been made. It has been attempted to be supported here by a report heard by Mr. Giraud from some of the witnesses that they had been paid by Mr. Paterson to come; but their Lordships are of opinion that there is no sound ground upon which they can rely in fixing upon Mr. Paterson an imputation of such very grave guilt as procuring Mr. Giraud to be wrongfully arrested and confined in prison in order that during the time that he was so confined he might take advantage of his absence, take possession of his farm, and otherwise damage him in respect of his property. Their Lordships can find no ground for that imputation.

Then, having cleared the ground so far, their Lordships come to that which is the cardinal point on which their opinion turns; and the cardinal point upon which the judgment of the consul in the Court below turned. He states that the point is, who first by his own act annulled this contract? Mr. Giraud says the imprisonment was substantially the breaking of that contract, but it is not found that that was caused by Mr. Paterson. Then, whilst Mr. Giraud was in prison, it seems that he had formed the intention of what may be described as abandoning the farm. He came to the conclusion that his imprisonment had been procured through Mr. Paterson, and his evidence is in effect that he did not return to Bergaine because he knew it was in possession of Mr. Paterson's agents, whom he had seen there,—the agents that were put there to collect the crops, as we understand the evidence. He goes on to say, "I did not go near Mr. Paterson after I was released, and I did not go back to the farm, and did not intend to go, as I intended to sue him, Mr. Paterson; and as far as I was concerned, I did not care what became of the farm."

Their Lordships in this case find a great conflict of evidence about many of the facts, but the cardinal fact of the case, in their judgment, is established by the plain explicit statement of Mr. Giraud himself. They have no hesitation in relying upon that statement, and they gather from it that he, knowing that the farm was vacant, intentionally avoided returning to that farm, intentionally left it for Mr. Paterson at his peril to deal with it as he might choose, but it was a vacant possession which the tenant had abandoned; and according to the passage which I have read, it is an abandonment, not without example, probably, in many parts of the British dominions, where the tenant, believing that he has got an interest for some time, does not intend to do his duty as tenant and cultivate the farm, and keep up as well as he can a performance of the duties which are cast upon him by the lease, but means to keep the nominal interest in the farm and rest entirely upon the litigation and the damages which he may obtain in the course of the litigation. We do not at all pretend to judge between Mr. Giraud and Mr. Paterson further than as to the facts upon which our judgment is founded. Mr. Giraud was of opinion that Mr. Paterson was the cause of his imprisonment. If he was wrong in that, we think that he was not justified in abandoning that farm, and not justified in bringing any litigation upon Mr. Paterson for preventing that farm from being ruined, and taking possession of it, and taking care of it. Mr. Giraud did not intend to go back. So far as the interest in the farm is concerned, their Lordships think that there would be no claim to damages. Then, with respect to the stock which was left on the farm, the amount of the stock is a matter upon which there is much conflicting evidence. Upon one side, Mr. Giraud makes a large claim; on the other side, there is no evidence upon which the consul in the Court below could rely, and the provision of the indenture of lease that the whole of the stock on the farm should be considered as mortgaged to secure repayment to the plaintiff of the advances of 1,055 Turkish liras, comes in aid of Mr. Paterson to prevent any claim for substantial damages in respect of the stock that was upon the farm, and which was charged as a mortgage security. The term had not, in time, come to an end, but the term virtually, as between landlord and tenant, was at an end; the interest of the tenant was abandoned, and in substance the intention of the parties to that mortgage would be carried out by holding that the landlord, with that mortgage, was entitled to secure himself by the stock upon the farm.

This being a suit in which damages alone are to be recovered, if there was a nominal interest which might be the subject of an action in some of the Courts of common law, that species of nominal interest for the mere nominal claim for damages would be no ground before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to recommend that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and the appellant to be entitled to their Lordships' judgment. Their Lordships will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

SIR J. COLVILE, SIR J. NAPIER, and LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD. July 6, 1869.

Debtor and Creditor—Lower Canada—Civil Code — Compensation — Liquidated Debts.

COLONY. COMPANY.—Clause 1187 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada provides that "where two persons are mutually debtor and creditor of each other, both debts are extinguished by compensation which takes place between them."

Clause 1188 provides that "compensation takes place by the sole operation of law between debts which are equally liquidated and demandable, and have each for object a sum of money or a certain quantity of indeterminate things of the same kind and quality."

The respondent, a shareholder in a company in Lower Canada, upon whose shares calls remained unpaid, was also a creditor of the company to an amount equal to the calls for salary as manager of the company:—Held, in an action by a creditor of the company against the respondent, for a debt due from the company, that compensation had not taken place between the company in respect of calls and the respondent in respect of salary, a shareholder not being liable to pay a call till twenty days after a call was made, and no call having been made.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court for Lower Canada, in the district of Montreal, by which the respondent was condemned to pay to the appellant 638*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* currency, with interest on the sum of 612*l.* 10*s.* from September 13, 1854, together with the costs of suit.

The respondent was sued as a shareholder in the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company, the action being founded on the provision of a provincial statute, which, by section 19, enacted that, "Each shareholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of the company to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock held by him for the debts and liabilities thereof, and until the whole amount of his stock shall have been paid up, but shall not be liable to an action therefor before an execution against the company shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, and the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with costs, against such shareholders."

The declaration in the action alleged that by a judgment rendered on April 30, 1856, in a cause wherein Joseph Doutre was plaintiff and the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company were the defendants, the said company was condemned to pay to the said Joseph Doutre 612*l.* 10*s.* with interest from September 13, 1854, and costs afterwards taxed at 21*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* That at the time of the rendering of the said judgment, and for more than six months immediately preceding that time, the said company was and had ever since continued to be, and still was, insolvent, en déconfiture. That the company having failed to satisfy the aforesaid judgment, the plaintiff had, on October 19, 1857, sued out execution against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the said company, which execution had been afterwards by the sheriff of the district, to whom it was addressed, returned unsatisfied either in whole or in part, in which execution the said plaintiff had incurred costs to the extent of 4*l*. That the said Joseph Doutre had sold and transferred to the plaintiff for good and valuable consideration all his right and interest in the said judgment and execution. That on May 4, 1853, the said Alexandre Maurice Delisle subscribed for and became a shareholder to the extent of forty shares, of 25*l*. each, to wit, to the extent of 1,000*l*. of the capital stock of the said company, and that the said defendant had, ever since May 4, 1853, continued to be and still was a shareholder to the extent of the said forty shares or sum of 1,000*l*., on account whereof the said defendant had not paid anything, leaving the whole of the said stock so held by him as aforesaid unpaid. That at all the times hereinbefore referred to, the defendant had been the president and director of the said railway company. That by reason of the premises and by law the said defendant was individually liable to the said plaintiff, who was a creditor of the said company in the manner aforesaid for the debt so due by the said company to the said plaintiff, to an amount equal to the amount so unpaid on the stock so held by him as aforesaid, to wit, to the amount of 1,000*l*.

The respondent pleaded two pleas of compensation and the general issue. By the first plea, upon which the defence to the action mainly rested, he alleged in substance that he had been president and director of the said railway company for two years and a half, at a salary, and that the company had become indebted to him for salary accrued and for money laid out and expended, in the sum of 2,438*l*. 5*s*. 8*d*., as appeared by extract or statement from the books, and that the amount so credited operated as an extinguishment by compensation of any shares of unpaid stock.

Special and general answers and a replication were filed to the said pleas, by which the appellant alleged that the allegations in the pleas were untrue and insufficient in law.

At the trial, the respondent was, on the part of the appellant, examined as a witness, and admitted that, on or about May 4, 1853, he subscribed for and took stock in the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company to the extent of forty shares of 25*l*. each, to wit, to the extent of 1,000*l*.; but he alleged that he had paid a call of 100*l*. cash, and that the remainder was more than compensated by salary owing to him from the said company as president and director thereof. That a sum of 1,000*l*. was voted him for his services for the year ending on the first Monday of March then next (1854), and that on March 22, 1854, at a meeting of the directors of the said company, the respondent was again named and appointed president of the company, and his salary as president was fixed at 1,000*l*., to be computed from March 1, 1854. That no call had been made upon the respondent's unpaid stock beyond the one of 100*l*. claimed to have been paid by him, and it appeared that the company did not, in respect of the stock subscribed for by the respondent, credit itself with a set-off against the salary due to the respondent for any greater sum than the 100*l*. called up. The respondent admitted that at the close of the year 1855 the said company was insolvent.

The respondent called no witnesses, but it was contended that the amount due by him to the company for the balance unpaid upon the stock was compensated by the amount due by the company to him in March, 1854, for the salary as president up to that date, and article 1,188 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada was relied on. The said article 1,188 is as follows: "Compensation takes place by the sole operation of law between debts which are equally liquidated and demandable, and have each for object a sum of money or a certain quantity of indeterminate things of the same kind and quality; so soon as the debts exist simultaneously, they are mutually extinguished in so far as their respective amounts correspond."

On March 31, 1866, the Superior Court of Lower Canada gave judgment and overruled the exceptions of compensation pleaded by the respondent, found the respondent to be debtor to the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company in 900*l.* unpaid on his stock, approved the appellant's claim as a judgment creditor of the said company, having execution against the said company unsatisfied.

The respondent appealed from this judgment to the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada. And on March 5, 1868, the Court of Queen's Bench reversed the judgment of the Superior Court for Lower Canada.

From this judgment this appeal was brought.

J. Browne and A. Thesiger, for the appellant.—The statute gives a personal individual right to a creditor as against a shareholder, which continues until the whole stock is "paid up." The statute makes the shareholder personally liable to the creditors of the company. That liability can only be discharged either by payment or by "paying up" the stock. Compensation between the shareholder and the company cannot affect those rights. Article 1,196 of the Civil Code provides that "compensation does not take place to the prejudice of rights acquired by third parties." The requisites of compensation as declared by the Code did not in the present case exist, inasmuch as the company had not called up the amount remaining unpaid upon the shares. The amount did not become "a debt" within the meaning of article 1,187. The debts were not debts "equally liquidated and demandable," nor did they ever "exist simultaneously" within the meaning of article 1,188, for while on the one hand the respondent had an immediate title to the payment of his salary, the company on the other hand could not sue him for the amount unpaid on his shares until a call had been made. The question has been raised whether a company can prove for future calls under the bankruptcy of a shareholder, and it was held that it cannot—The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside (5 Ex. Rep. 129; 2 L. J. Ex. 120); The General Discount Company v. Stokes (34 L. J. C.P. 25); Hopkins v. Thomas (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 711; s. c. nom. Thomas v. Hopkins, 29 L. J. C.P. 117); Civil Code of Lower Canada, arts. 1,187, 1,188, 1,189; Pothier[1]; and Toulier, Droit Civil, vol. 7. p. 446.

Mellish and Kerr, for the respondent.—Compensation took place by operation of law between the balance due by the respondent to the company upon stock, the calls upon which were unpaid for by him, and the sum of money due to the respondent for his services as president of the company, which had been actually credited to him in the books of the company, and this was the case not only before judgment was recovered in the action against the company, but even before the debt, which was the basis of the action, had been contracted. It is clear a judgment debtor of the company's can only stand in the same position as the company. A judgment creditor of the company suing a holder of unpaid stock in the company, cannot stand in a better position than the company itself could if suing the shareholder.

GIFFARD, L.J., delivered the judgment of their Lordships.—The appeal in this case is from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lower Canada, reversing a judgment of the superior Court of the district of Montreal, with costs.

The judgment in the Montreal Court, which was delivered on March 31, 1866, found the respondent to be debtor to the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company in 900*l.*, on the stock held by him, and approved the appellant's claim as a judgment creditor of a company, having execution against the company unsatisfied, and condemned the respondent accordingly, as prayed for by the appellant.

The action in which that judgment was given was an action brought by the appellant, as a creditor of the company, against the respondent, a shareholder, as a defendant, and in that action it was proved that there had been a return by the sheriff of nulla bona to an execution against the company. The action was founded on the section of the General Railways Act which is under the head of "Shareholders," and is the first paragraph of section 19. By that section and paragraph it is enacted, that "Each shareholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of the company to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock held by him for the debts and liabilities thereof, and until the whole amount of his stock shall have been paid up, but shall not be liable to an action therefor before an execution against the company shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, and the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with costs, against such shareholder."

(1) Compensation, ii. 334.

The defendant referred to the Code, and the case made by him was, that there was due to him from the company for salary a sum very far exceeding anything that he was or could be made liable to the company for or in respect of calls; that the sums due to him from the company, in point of fact, extinguished his liability to the company, and that inasmuch as the company never could have maintained proceedings against him in respect of any calls that they might make, the creditor was in no better position than the company. We assume that no calls beyond calls for a sum of 100*l.* had been made on the part of the company; if any such calls had been made, it was the business of the defendant both to have alleged and proved that they had been made; there is neither allegation nor proof to this effect; the Courts below proceeded on the assumption that no calls beyond 100*l.* had been made; and there can be no doubt but that they were right upon the pleadings and facts before them in making that assumption.

What then are the provisions of the Code which were relied on? They were these: First of all, it is said in clause 1,187: "Where two persons are mutually debtor and creditor of each other, both debts are extinguished by compensation which takes place between them in the cases and manner hereinafter declared"; and then in clause 1,188, "Compensation takes place by the sole operation of law between debts which are equally liquidated and demandable, and have each for object a sum of money or a certain quantity of indeterminate things of the same kind and quality." As calls had not been made, there could have been no compensation as between this shareholder and the company at the time of the action being brought by the creditor, for when we turn to the Railways Act we see that before any action could have been maintained by the company as against the shareholder, there must have been calls made by the directors, and thirty days must have elapsed from the date of the calls. Moreover, at the time when the appellant brought his action as creditor, the respondent, if he had any claim at all, had a right to proceed against the company and recover payment from the company for the 2,000*l.*, or whatever sum was due to him, and the company could not have set up as against that action any counter-claim which they might have had in respect of his being a shareholder; it follows, therefore, that the amount payable on the stock held by the defendant was not actually paid, discharged and extinguished, and that the clauses in the Code which have been relied on do not apply to a state of circumstances in which, although there was a claim by the defendant against the company, there was no counter-right on the part of the company, and no compensation as between him and them, and consequently no extinguishment of the debt. The creditor under the Act is in a different position from that of the company, and can recover so long as anything remains unpaid on the stock held by the shareholder.

This being so, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed.

The result, therefore, will be to restore the judgment of the superior Court in Montreal; and their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant should have the costs in both the Courts below, and also the costs of this appeal.

Infant—Contract during Infancy—Goods Sold and Delivered—Subsequent Recognition of Debt—9 Geo. 4. c. 12. s. 5.

INFANT. A.—To a declaration for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleaded infancy, and the plaintiff replied a ratification of the debt after majority; in support of the replication a copy of the items of the account was put in evidence, at the foot of which the defendant, after he came of age, had written, "Particulars of account to end of year 1867, amounting to 162*l.* 11*s.* 6*d. I certify to be correct and satisfactory," with the addition of his signature:*—Held, not a sufficient recognition of the debt to satisfy the 9 Geo. 4. c. 12. s. 5; and that the construction of the document was for the Court, and not for the jury.

Declaration for money payable for goods sold and delivered, goods bargained and sold, and money due upon an account stated[1].

Pleas—Payment into Court of 153*l.* 4*s.*, and to the residue infancy.

Replication, that the defendant after he attained the full age of twenty-one years, and before action, by a writing made and signed by him, ratified and confirmed the said debts and promises in the declaration mentioned. Issue.

At the trial, which took place at the Cambridgeshire Summer Assizes, 1868, before Cockburn, C.J., it appeared that the action was brought to recover from the defendant, an undergraduate of Trinity College, the sum of 204*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, balance of the price of wines, &c. supplied by the plaintiff, a wine-merchant, carrying on business in Cambridge. In support of the replication, the plaintiff offered in evidence a copy of the items of the account, at the foot of which the defendant had written as follows:

"Particulars of account to end of year 1867, amounting to 162*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* I certify to be correct and satisfactory.

"J. B. HOPWOOD.

"Jan. 31, 1868."

The defendant had a verdict on the plea of infancy, and the learned Chief Justice being of opinion that the document written and signed by the defendant did not amount to a ratification of the debt under Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 5, directed a nonsuit, with leave to the plaintiff to move to set aside the same and for a new trial.

O'Malley now moved accordingly.—The document written and signed by the defendant after coming of full age is a sufficient recognition of the debt to satisfy the requirements of the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 5, which enacts that "no action shall be maintained whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification after full age of any promise or simple contract made during infancy; unless such promise or ratification shall be made by some writing signed by the party to be charged therewith." The contract of an infant, although it be not for necessaries, is voidable only, and no new consideration for a subsequent promise is necessary; and it is clear from the language of the enactment in question that either a promise to pay or a recognition without a promise will constitute a sufficient ratification of a debt contracted during infancy. In delivering judgment in Harris v. Wall (1 Ex. Rep. 122; 16 L. J. Ex. 270), Rolfe, B. says that "Apart from Lord Tenterden's Act, any act or declaration which recognizes the existence of the promise as binding, is a ratification of it"; and further,

(1) The writ was issued out of the Court of Pleas of the borough of Cambridge, but the action was subsequently moved into the Court of Queen's Bench by certiorari.

" Any written instrument signed by the party which, in the case of adults, would have amounted to the adoption of the act of a party acting as agent will, in the case of an infant who has attained his majority, amount to a ratification." Hartley v. Wharton (11 Ad. & E. 934; 9 L. J. Q.B. 209) and Cory v. Gertchen (2 Madd. 40) are also favourable to the plaintiff's construction of the document in question.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In Thrupp v. Fielder (2 Esp. 627) Lord Kenyon, C.J. held a mere acknowledgment of a debt to be insufficient, and required proof of an express promise to pay.]

At all events, the construction of the document was for the jury, and not for the Court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are of opinion that there should be no rule. To entitle a plaintiff to recover a debt incurred by the defendant during infancy, the statute requires that there should be a ratification thereof in writing after the debtor has attained his majority, and the construction of such a document is for the Court and not for the jury. I concur with the view taken by the Court of Exchequer in the case cited; but the document with which we have now to deal contains no such recognition of the debt as was there relied on. It seems that an account was handed to the defendant containing the items of the goods supplied, for the purpose of obtaining from him a recognition of the debt, and accordingly he writes thereupon what amounts simply to an admission that the items are correct, and adds his signature. That is not sufficient to enable the plaintiff to maintain this action, and we ought not in such a case to strain the language of the legislature, the object of which was that infancy should be a protection, unless, after the party has attained his majority, he should make a distinct and binding acknowledgment of the debt; and such I do not take to be the effect of the writing relied upon.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Equality—Suretyship of Creditor —Discounting Compositions.

BANKRUPTCY. N.—By a composition deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.) s. 192, the debtor assigned his property for realization and distribution to a creditor, who covenanted, as surety, with the general body of creditors, to pay to them by instalments 5*s. in the pound on their debts, which sum he was also himself to receive; provided that he should not be liable under such covenant for a greater amount in the whole than* 3,000*l. The deed also provided that the surety should apply any surplus, which might remain after the payment of the composition, towards the payment of the remaining* 15*s. in the pound on his own debt, it being thereby stipulated that he " should have the advantage of this security for the remainder of his debt, in consideration of his undertaking the liability of suretyship "*:—Held, that this stipulation created no such inequality as to avoid the deed.

The deed further provided, that if the surety should arrange with any creditor to make an immediate payment of the composition payable to him, with a deduction therefrom by way of discount in consideration of such immediate payment, the surety should be at liberty to repay himself out of the trust fund the full amount of the composition payable to such creditor, without deducting the sum allowed to the surety for discount:—Held also, that this created no such inequality as to avoid the deed.

The declaration contained the usual money counts.

The defendants pleaded a composition deed, of which the material part was as follows:

"This indenture made July 1, 1867, between William Jones the elder, William Jones the younger and Daniel Cripps Jones, of the city of Gloucester, trading in co-partnership under the style or firm of 'William Jones & Sons,' as builders and contractors for public and other works, and hereinafter called 'the said debtors,' of the first part; William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, of the city of Gloucester, timber-merchants, carrying on business under the style or firm of 'Price & Company,' of the second part; and all the creditors of the said debtors jointly, or of each or either of them separately, other than the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, of the third part: Whereas the said debtors are jointly indebted to the said Messrs. Price & Co. in the sum of 644*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*, and they are jointly or separately indebted to divers other creditors; and whereas the said debtors, being unable to pay their debts in full, it has been agreed that such arrangement shall be made between the debtors and their creditors as is hereinafter expressed: Now this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement in this behalf, and in consideration of the premises, the said debtors do hereby for themselves and every of them doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, their executors and administrators, that they, the said debtors, their heirs, executors or administrators, or some or one of them, will pay to the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, their executors or administrators, a composition of 5*s.* in the pound on the said sum of 644*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* owing to them as aforesaid, by the following instalments, that is to say, 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound at the expiration of four calendar months from May 2 now last past, and 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the said May 2. And the said debtors do hereby for themselves, and every of them doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, and the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker (as sureties for the said debtors, and by way of separate covenant) do hereby for themselves, and every of them doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the several persons parties hereto of the third part, and their respective executors and administrators, that the said covenanting persons or their respective heirs, executors or administrators, or some or one of them, will pay to the said persons parties hereto of the third part respectively, or their respective executors and administrators, a composition of 5*s.* in the pound, on the amount of their respective debts, by the following instalments, (that is to say) 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound at the expiration of four calendar months from May 2 now last past, and 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the said May 2: Provided always, that the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, or any or either of them, their or any or either of their heirs, executors or administrators, shall not be liable under the aforesaid covenant to a greater amount in the whole than the sum of 3,000*l.* And this indenture also witnesseth, that in further pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the premises, the said debtors do, and every of them doth hereby assign unto the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, their executors, administrators and assigns, all and singular the building materials, tools, utensils, stock-in-trade and effects now belonging, or which may at any time hereafter belong to the said debtors, or any or either of them, in or about the said business or in connexion therewith, and all sums of money now due, or which may hereafter become due, to the said debtors, or any or either of them, under or by virtue of any contracts already entered into, or which may hereafter be entered into, by or with them in relation to their said business (and a list of which now existing contracts is, for the convenience of the parties, but not so as to restrain the generality of the preceding description, set forth in the first schedule hereunder written), and the full benefit of all such existing and future contracts respectively; and all other moneys (if any) which may arise or become payable to the said debtors, or any or either of them, from or in respect of the said business; and all the right, life interest, claim and demand whatsoever of the said debtors, or any or either of them, in or to the said premises, or any part thereof: To hold the said premises hereby assigned, or expressed so to be, unto the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, their executors, administrators and assigns —Upon trust that the said William Philip Price, Richard Potter and Charles Walker, or the survivor or survivors of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, shall at such time or times, and in such manner, as they or he shall, in their or his absolute discretion, think fit, sell, call in, collect and convert into money the said premises, and shall apply the moneys to arise thereby, or which shall otherwise come to their or his hands by virtue of any of the provisions of these presents, in manner following; that is to say, first, in payment of all the costs and expenses of this arrangement, and the negotiation preparatory thereto, and all the costs and expenses attending the preparation and execution of these presents, or otherwise in relation thereto, and all the costs and expenses which may be incurred in or about the execution of the trusts or powers of these presents, or any of them, or otherwise relating to the premises; secondly, in or towards payment of the said composition of 5*s*. in the pound, at the times and in the manner hereinbefore mentioned in that behalf, in aid of the covenants for payment of such composition hereinbefore contained, and so as to indemnify the said sureties from their liability under their aforesaid covenant; and, thirdly, in or towards payment of the remaining 15*s*. in the pound of the said sum of 644*l*. 11*s*. 6*d*. due and owing to the said Messrs. Price & Co. as aforesaid;—it being hereby stipulated that the said Messrs. Price & Co. shall have the advantage of this security for the remainder of their debt in consideration of their undertaking the liability of suretyship as hereinbefore appears, and shall stand possessed of the surplus (if any) of the said moneys and premises in trust for the said debtors: Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that if the said W. P. Price, R. Potter and C. Walker, as such sureties as aforesaid, or any or either of them, shall arrange with any creditor to make an immediate payment of the composition payable to him under these presents, with a deduction therefrom by way of discount in consideration of such immediate payment, then and in every such case, the surety or sureties making such immediate payment shall be at liberty to repay themselves or himself out of the aforesaid trust premises the full amount of the composition payable to such creditor under these presents without deducting the sum so allowed to such surety or sureties for discount as aforesaid," &c.

Allegation of the performance of all conditions, &c. necessary to make the deed operative and available under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to release the defendants from the said debts, and to make the deed binding upon the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was an assenting party thereto, and was and is bound by the same.

Second replication, that the plaintiff was not nor is an assenting party to the deed as alleged.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Macnamara, in support of the demurrer.—There is nothing unequal in the stipulation in the deed under which Price & Co., who are parties thereto of the second part, may possibly get something over and above the two instalments, amounting to 5*s*. in the pound, which are to be paid alike to themselves and the general body of debtors. The property of the debtors is assigned to Price & Co., who covenant, as sureties, with all the other creditors to pay them the instalments as they become due, and such advantage as they may reap from the right to retain any sums remaining over and above, after such payments, towards the payment in full of their own demand is expressly stated in the deed to be in consideration of their undertaking the liability of suretyship, and there is nothing unreasonable in such a stipulation. Secondly, it is objected, on the ground of inequality, that Messrs. Price are enabled by the deed to make immediate payment of the composition due to any creditor, with a deduction therefrom by way of discount in consideration of such immediate payment, and afterwards to repay themselves out of the trust fund the full amount of the composition payable to such creditor without deducting the sum allowed as discount. So far from this being a disadvantage, it may be beneficial to a creditor to have his debt paid in advance, and if the sureties consent to accelerate the payment, it is nothing more than reasonable that they should be entitled to the rebate.—(He was then stopped,)

R. G. Williams, contra.—The provision under which Price & Co. are enabled to retain and apply any surplus after payment of the instalments towards the payment of their own debt in full renders the deed bad for inequality, as it is manifest that they may thus get more than the other creditors.

[LUSH, J.—Or they may get less. COCKBURN, C.J.—It may be quite worth the creditors' while to agree to a state of things under which the sureties might get something over the 5*s*., in consideration of this sum being guaranteed to themselves.]

This case goes much further than Wells v. Hacon (33 L. J. Q.B. 204), a decision, it should be stated, which this Court arrived at not without hesitation. There the surety, in consideration of his suretyship, was simply entitled to a priority of payment over the other creditors, upon whom it was compulsory to look to the trustee appointed under the deed for their dividends, which were only payable upon demand in writing. There is also a second objection to this deed, upon the ground of inequality. By it the debtors assign all and singular their property to Price & Co. upon trust (after payment of the costs, &c. of the arrangement) for the payment of the instalments of the composition as they become due. There is also a covenant on the part of the debtors, and of Price & Co., as sureties, to pay the instalments, with a proviso that the sureties shall not be liable for a greater amount in the whole than the sum of 3,000*l*. The deed further provides that if Price & Co., as such sureties, shall arrange with any creditor for the immediate payment of the composition, with a deduction by way of discount, they shall be at liberty to repay themselves out of the trust money the full amount of the composition payable to such creditor, without deducting the sum allowed as discount. By the terms of the deed, therefore, the creditors have the security of the covenant of the debtors, of the sureties and the trust fund for payment of the composition, and are entitled to insist that the trust fund shall, so far as is possible, be rendered available for that purpose. Then, suppose that the trust fund, augmented by the 3,000*l*., to which extent the sureties are bound by their covenant if necessary to contribute to it, should prove unequal to the payment to the creditors of more than 2*s*. 6*d*. in the pound, instead of 5*s*., it is possible for the sureties by discounting the claims of creditors and then charging the estate with the full amount of the composition to exhaust the fund, leaving the remainder of the creditors nothing but the covenant of the debtors to look to—Thompson v. Knight (36 L. J. Ex. 30; 2 L. R. Ex. 42).

COCKBURN, C.J.—With respect to the first objection, which is founded upon that part of the deed enabling the sureties, in case the estate should realize more than 5*s*. in the pound, to apply the surplus, so far as it will go, of their own debt in full, the case is governed by Wells v. Hacon (33 L. J. Q.B. 204). We must assume that the deed is for the benefit of all concerned, and the tendency of the Courts, on such questions, has been to look at these deeds as intended by the legislature to give a majority of the creditors of an insolvent the power of determining, notwithstanding the objections of the few, what arrangement as between themselves and the debtor can most advantageously be carried out. Looking at the present deed, it seems impossible to say that it contains anything either collusive, or so extravagant as to invalidate it. We have to deal with an insolvent estate, from which it seems to be admitted on all hands that the utmost the creditors can get is 5*s*. in the pound, and it is doubtful whether even so much can be realized; certain creditors of the estate are, however, so far satisfied that that amount will be forthcoming that they are willing to guarantee its payment to the general body of creditors, on the condition that if by their own diligence and good management of the insolvent estate they can realize more, they shall be at liberty to retain the surplus towards the payment of their own debt in full. In this there is nothing either collusive, or tending to give the sureties any undue advantage over the other creditors, and so far as the first objection goes we must hold the deed valid.

With respect to the second point, I think the objection raised must also fail. The sureties who are to realize the estate must be taken to have such knowledge of the probable amount which may eventually become distributable, as to enable them to judge whether or not they ought, in justice to the creditors in general, to discount any particular demand; and the effect of the proviso in the deed which enables them to pay any creditor in advance must not be read as authorizing them to deal with the estate otherwise than for the benefit of all.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute intended to leave it to the prescribed majority to make such arrangement as they think proper, provided that the arrangement be bonâ fide and for the equal benefit of assenting and dissenting creditors; and if these conditions be fulfilled, the deed is valid, and we are not to inquire whether any particular stipulation which it may contain is for the benefit of the creditors or not. It seems to me that the provisions of the deed before us apply equally to both classes of creditors, and we are bound therefore to uphold it.

County Court—Prohibition—Jurisdiction—Ejectment—Value not exceeding 20*l.*—30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 11.

COUNTY COURT. B.—At the trial of an ejectment in a County Court there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the value of the premises exceeded 20*l. by the year. The premises were held subject to a ground-rent, and by deducting the amount of such ground-rent, the Judge arrived at the conclusion that the value did not exceed* 20*l. by the year, that he therefore had jurisdiction, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff*:—Held, that although there was a conflict of evidence as to the value, this Court would grant a prohibition, as the Judge was wrong in deducting the ground-rent.—Held also, that a convenient way to determine the value, would be to consider the case as if it arose under the Poor Law Assessment Act, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1, and to find out what a tenant would give for it in the market.

Rule calling upon the Judge of the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Sheffield, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to restrain him from issuing a warrant or warrants of execution for the recovery of possession of tenements, and to prohibit other proceedings on a judgment on a plaint in the County Court.

It appeared that the action was brought to recover the possession of certain leasehold tenements, consisting of a dwelling-house and premises, held under a building lease granted by the trustees of the Duke of Norfolk to John Thomas Hall, at a yearly ground-rent of 9*l*. 17*s*. The plaintiff had purchased the premises, subject to the ground-rent; and the defendant had got possession under an agreement with Hall.

It was objected at the hearing that the Judge had no jurisdiction under section 11. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, as the value of the premises exceeded the sum of 20*l*., and the rent payable in respect thereof also exceeded 20*l*. by the year. There was contradictory evidence before the Judge as to what was the value of the premises, and he decided that the value did not exceed 20*l*., that he had jurisdiction, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

An application was made to Montague Smith, J., for a prohibition, and that learned Judge directed that the County Court Judge should be asked whether he had deducted the ground-rent in ascertaining the value or not. The County Court Judge declined to answer the question, and it was stated that his notes did not give the required information. Under these circumstances, a shorthand note of the judgment was obtained, which the County Court Judge admitted was substantially correct; and it appeared that, in ascertaining the value, he had deducted the ground-rent, the result of which deduction was that the value did not exceed 20*l*. The matter was again brought before Montague Smith, J., who, at the instance of the plaintiff, referred it to the Court.

Oppenheim shewed cause against the rule.—This rule has been obtained on the ground that the 11th section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. does not give jurisdiction to try this ejectment. That section is as follows: " All actions of ejectment where neither the value of the lands, tenements or hereditaments, nor the rent payable in respect thereof, shall exceed the sum of 20*l*. by the year, may be brought and prosecuted in the County Court of the district in which the lands, tenements or hereditaments are situate." Assuming that the Judge made the deduction of the ground-rent, as alleged by the defendant, it is submitted that he was right in doing so. The word " value " in the 11th section means the value to the litigant parties. That is shewn by In re Brown and Cocking (37 L. J. Q.B. 250; 3 L. R. Q.B. 652), which was a decision as to the meaning of the words " the rent payable in respect thereof," which occur in the same section.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The question is really like a question of rating, namely, what the premises would let for to a hypothetical tenant. COCKBURN, C.J.—Yes; in the Parochial Assessment Act, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1, we have a kind of legislative exposition of the words " net annual value," that is to say, the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, &c. That being so, would not the more convenient way be to ascertain what would be the value to let in the market?]

There are always some deductions to be made even in a rating case, and there is no reason why the deduction of the ground-rent should be held to be wrong. Secondly, this is not a case in which a prohibition ought to go. There was a conflict of evidence before the Judge as to the value; some witnesses saying that the value was above 20*l*., and others that it was less. It was a question, therefore, for the Judge to inquire into and determine; and Joseph v. Henry (19 L. J. Q.B. 369) shews that this Court will refuse a prohibition in such a case. See also The Guardians of the Lexden Union v. Southgate (10 Ex. Rep. 201; 23 L. J. Ex. 316).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There is not really any dispute as to the facts. As far as one can understand from the shorthand notes, the Judge seems to have said, " But for the ground-rent, I should have said the value would exceed the sum of 20*l*., but I deduct the ground-rent, and then I decide that I have jurisdiction." That is not a conflict of evidence, but the application of a mistaken rule of law upon admitted facts. LUSH, J.—The Judge refuses to say what he did, but it is pretty clear that he did deduct the ground-rent.]

It is submitted that that is not so clear; the affidavits are contradictory upon that matter.

Ryalls, in support of the rule, was not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. There are two questions for the decision of the Court. The first is, whether the County Court Judge, in ascertaining the value of the house or premises sought to be recovered, is empowered to deduct the amount of the ground-rent, which the immediate landlord is bound to pay to the ground landlord, so as to have jurisdiction to try the action. The second question is, whether the prohibition ought to go, under the circumstances of the case. Now, upon the first question, it seems that, irrespective of the deduction of the ground-rent, the Judge was of opinion that the value would be so great that he would not have jurisdiction to try the action. There is no doubt that the 11th section of the statute has left the meaning of the word "value" uncertain. It is quite true that there is a difference between the amount of the value to the tenant and of the value to the landlord, inasmuch as it may be worth while for the tenant to pay 200*l.* a year for a house in respect of which 20*l.* ground-rent has to be paid, while the house would only be of the value of 180*l.* to the landlord, as he would have to pay the ground-rent out of the 200*l.* which he would receive from his tenant. There must always be some such difference in the value to landlord and tenant; and that being so, what is the criterion of value which the Court ought to adopt? I think that the meaning may be found by analogy with a case by no means dissimilar, where the legislature has dealt with the question of value. In assessing houses or land to the poor-rate, the legislature has said that the criterion is the rent at which the house might reasonably be expected to let to a tenant from year to year. Taking this to be a legislative interpretation of the meaning of the word "value," I think that we ought to say that the best way is to take the market value of the property, and the rent given by the tenant to the landlord would probably be the rent to be obtained in the market; and therefore I come to the conclusion that the Judge was wrong, as by deducting the ground-rent, he has arrived at such a value as would give him jurisdiction, when in fact the case was beyond his jurisdiction. Next, I think that where there is a conflict of evidence as to facts upon which the jurisdiction of an inferior Judge depends, although the decision of the Judge may not be absolutely conclusive, wherever there is a reasonable ground for upholding his decision, this Court will not interfere by prohibition, there having been an honest exercise of his judgment upon the evidence before him. But where there is no fact in issue, and the Judge has arrived at an erroneous decision in point of law, and there has been an erroneous assumption of an authority which does not exist, this Court will interfere to get rid of the effect of a wrong decision. The rule must therefore be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I merely wish to add that, although I was not present when In re Brown and Cocking (37 L. J. Q.B. 250; 3 L. R. Q.B. 652) was decided, I perfectly agree with the decision. But it does not apply to the present case. There the question was, as to the rent payable in respect of the houses, and the fact that there were people who were willing to pay more than the amount of the rent payable by the defendant had nothing to do with the "rent payable" within the meaning of the statute. I also think that in the present case the County Court Judge took a wrong view of the meaning of the word "value" in the 11th section; I think that that word is to be construed very much in the same way as "value" in a poor law assessment Act. Upon the second point I do not know of any case in which the rule as to prohibition in such a case was more properly laid down than in Thompson v. Ingham (14 Q.B. Rep. 710; 19 L. J. Q.B. 189), which might have been carried to a Court of Error. Patteson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "The Judge had clearly jurisdiction, primâ facie, to try a plaint for use and occupation. The pleadings, if there were any in the County Court, would not shew that the title is in question. The point whether it is or not, must of necessity arise upon the evidence, and as soon as it appears that it is, the jurisdiction of the County Court ceases. The Judge must, of necessity, determine that point for the time, because on it depends whether he hears the case on the merits. Is then his determination conclusive? We think that it is not. The objection is analogous to a plea to the jurisdiction in other Courts, which is indeed determined in the first instance by the Court in which it is pleaded, but is subject to a writ of error. The County Court Act gives no writ of error, or appeal of any sort; but then it is presumed that the Court deals only with matters within its jurisdiction. If a doubt arises as to that question, we think it impossible to contend that any of the provisions of the Act make the solution of that doubt by the Court itself final. If so, the question must be open to one of the Superior Courts on motion for a prohibition, by affidavit." Now, in the present case, the question being whether the Judge was right in holding that the value exceeded 20*l.*, I think the case is one for a prohibition. In a case like In re Brown and Cocking (37 L. J. Q.B. 250; 3 L. R. Q.B. 652), I agree that though the finding of the County Court Judge is not conclusive, for all practical purposes a strong case must be made out to justify us in coming to the conclusion that a prohibition must go. Upon the whole of the facts which are before us, it is clear that the Judge thought that if he deducted the ground-rent, the value would be below 20*l.*, but that if the ground-rent was not deducted the value would exceed 20*l.* I think, therefore, that he was wrong in holding that he had jurisdiction.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. In making this rule absolute we are only following the acknowledged rule which ought to prevail, namely, to give the words of the 11th section their plain meaning.—[His Lordship read the section.]—There is the cognate section which follows it, section 12, which gives power to try actions where title comes in question where neither the value nor the rent payable in respect thereof shall exceed the sum of 20*l.* by the year. If we were to construe the section as Mr. Oppenheim suggests, we must suppose the words to mean "the plaintiff's interest in the lands," &c., instead of "the value of the lands," &c., shall exceed the sum of 20*l.*; but that is not consistent with the language used in the section.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98)—Adoption of Act by Parish including a Corporate Borough but not the Parliamentary Borough.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. A.—By section 14. of the Local Government Act, 1858, "in cases where any place hereby authorized to adopt this Act includes within its limits any less place, which if it were not so included, would, of itself, be authorized to adopt this Act, such less place shall not be entitled to adopt this Act, unless the greater place, within the limits of which it is included, has refused to adopt the same; or unless it has been determined by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in manner hereinafter mentioned, that such less place ought, as respects the adoption of this Act, to be excluded from the limits of such greater place."

By section 17. a petition may be presented to the Secretary of State against the resolution for the adoption of the Act.

The corporate borough of L. was included within the parish of L, but the boundaries of the parliamentary borough of L. extended beyond the parish. The vestry of the parish resolved to adopt the Act. Some of the inhabitants of the corporate borough appealed under the above 17*th section, but the Secretary of State dismissed the appeal, and ordered that the Act should be adopted throughout the whole parish, including the corporate borough.*

This order having been brought up by certiorari was held to be good; section 14, in terms providing for such a case, where a borough, the less place, was included in a larger place having a known and defined boundary.

This was a rule calling upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to remove into this Court all and singular the orders made by the Right Honourable Spencer Walpole, the late Secretary of State for the Home Department, ordering the Local Government Act, 1858, to be in force throughout the entire parish of Lymington, in the county of Southampton, in order that the same might be quashed.

It appeared from the affidavits, that the parish of Lymington is in extent about 1,500 acres, and comprises within its area the corporate borough of Lymington, which is in extent about 100 acres. The borough is a corporate borough, mentioned in schedule B. section 2, of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, and its boundaries are defined by 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 64. schedule D, from which it appears that the parliamentary borough includes the parish and part of another. The portion of the parish without the borough is called the Tything of Lymington, and is a place having a known and defined boundary, being a manor of itself, and the inhabitants residing therein are separately assessed from those living within the borough for all parliamentary taxes and the police rates. The population of the borough at the census taken in 1861 was 2,416 and of the tything of 1,655.

On August 16, 1866, the vestry of the parish resolved to adopt the Local Government Act, 1858. Doubts arose whether the resolution was legal, on the ground, among others, that the corporate portion of the parish had not adopted the Act by its town council. The opinion of counsel was taken, and at a meeting of the inhabitants of the parish it was determined to appeal to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who however dismissed the appeal, and made the order now complained of.

A meeting was then held, and certain persons, against the will of the rest, formed themselves into a local board. A rule nisi for an information in the nature of a quo warranto was obtained against them, but was discharged, the Court intimating that the proper mode of proceeding was by certiorari, if there was any remedy at all.

The present rule was obtained at the instance of Mr. W. H. Grove, an inhabitant of the parish, and other inhabitants, and of many burgesses of the borough, who were opposed to the introduction of the Local Government Act into the parish.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. B. Karslake) (Archibald with him) shewed cause against the rule. The order of the Secretary of State is perfectly good. The parish of Lymington is a "place having a known or defined boundary within the meaning of the 3rd clause of the 12th section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98," and therefore has power under that section to adopt the Act. The 13th section shews how meetings are to be summoned, and in places having known and defined boundaries they are to be summoned by the churchwardens, as has been done in this case. By section 14. any less place, included in another which is authorized to adopt the Act, is not entitled of itself to adopt it, unless the greater place has refused, or unless a Secretary of State thinks it ought to be excluded from the limits of the greater. Section 17. gives an appeal to a Secretary of State, of which Mr. Grove has availed himself, but without obtaining redress, because the Secretary of State considered that it was right that the Act should be adopted by the whole parish. By section 18. power is given to order an inquiry into the matter. By section 81. the orders are to be binding and conclusive, and by section 137. of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. incorporated by section 4. of the Act now under consideration, the certiorari is taken away, though not, of course, where there is no jurisdiction to make the order.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There is some difficulty in seeing how the parish can oust the borough from its right to adopt the Act for itself.]

But the statute provides for all such matters being settled by the Secretary of State.

[HANNEN, J.—The Act gives him power to enter upon and decide this very question.]

[He was then stopped.]

Grove, in person, in support of the rule.—Sections 13. and 24. shew that the local board for this corporate borough ought to be the mayor, aldermen and burgesses acting by the council. The inhabitants of the parish outside the borough have no right to take away the right of the borough to adopt the Act and appoint their own local board. This case does not fall within the provisions of section 14. at all. It cannot be said that the borough is a less place included within a greater, which would of itself be authorized to adopt the Act, for the boundaries as fixed by 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 64. extend over a larger space.—He referred to The Queen v. the Northowram and Clayton Ratepayers (7 Best & S. 110; 35 L. J. Q.B. 90).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not think that the objection last taken by Mr. Grove, that it was not competent for the parish to adopt the Act, because the parish is comprehended within the parliamentary borough, which consists of this parish and of another, has really any bearing whatever upon the subject. It might as well be said, because a parish was not the county in which it was situate, that it could not adopt the Act. A parish is a place having a well-known and defined boundary. This parish happens, for parliamentary purposes, to have been united with another parish, and in the parliamentary returns for the borough of Lymington there is a district which is more than co-extensive with the parish of Lymington. I do not think that has any application to the question before us. I was no party to the decision in The Queen v. the Northowram and Clayton Ratepayers (7 Best & S. 110; 35 L. J. Q.B. 90), but I do not quarrel with that case; it does not govern the present one. Then comes the question, whether the 14th section includes it? I think that it does, according to its terms, and, looking at the great inconvenience which would result if we were to say that the borough could prevent the parish from adopting the Act, I think that we ought not to put such a limited construction upon the statute. With regard to the machinery provided by the 13th section, I think that the answer to Mr. Grove's position is this: that the statute having provided for corporate boroughs and places under the jurisdiction of the Improvement Commissioners, and the others, then makes provision, in section 13, for the way in which the meeting for the purposes of the 12th section shall be formed, and by whom the petition in writing shall be issued, and then it follows, that the three sub-sections of section 12. referred to corporate boroughs, to places under the jurisdiction of the Improvement Commissioners, and then to all other places having a defined boundary, and not being corporate boroughs. It is by the light of the 14th section that we must see whether, when a corporate borough, being a less place, is included in the larger, the parish, the provision applies. If a borough purposes to insist upon its right to adopt the Act, and to keep within its own more limited jurisdiction, instead of adopting it in compliance with the rest of the parish, of which the borough forms a part, that matter must be brought before the Secretary of State, who will exercise, no doubt, a sound discretion with reference to what is more convenient and preferable to be adopted.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the 14th section in its terms comprehends this case, and I cannot help thinking that it was intended to comprehend it. When one looks to the inconvenience which would result from the opposite view, we find it would be very great. There are the different items of sewerage, lightage, watering, and so on. The intention seems to have been to make the area as large as possible within the fair meaning of the statute. Then it is contended that this borough does not come within the 14th section, as being a less place included within the limits of a larger, because in the Act assigning an area for parliamentary representation, it has assigned to it a limit round the parish of Lymington for the purposes of that particular Act. I do not think that that brings the case within the provision of this particular Act any more than the association of a number of parishes within a poor-law union would make the whole union a place within this Act. I think, therefore, that this parish is the larger, and the borough the smaller place within it.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Municipal Corporation—Quo Warranto—Town Councillor—Reg. Gen. H. T. 7 & 8 Geo. 4. 1827—Burgess Roll—Right to Vote—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.

QUO WARRANTO. B.—The Gen. Rule of H. T. 7 & 8 Geo. 4, that the objections intended to be made to the title of a person against whom an information in the nature of a quo warranto is to be filed, shall be specified in the rule to shew cause, is a rule applicable to the pleadings only, and does not prevent the relator at the trial of the information going into objections which may not be specified in the rule.

ELECTION LAW. B.—After a burgess-roll has been made up in the manner provided by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, the persons whose names are upon that roll are entitled to vote at the election of councillors, and upon the trial of an information their right cannot be questioned.

Information, in the nature of a quo warranto, to shew by what authority the defendant claimed to exercise the office or franchise of councillor of the borough of Scarborough, in the county of York.

The defendant pleaded that the borough of Scarborough was an ancient borough; that the bailiffs and burgesses were one body corporate and politic in deed, fact and name, by the name of the bailiffs and burgesses of the borough of Scarborough; that within the borough there of right ought to be one mayor, divers, to wit, six aldermen, and divers, to wit, eighteen councillors, to be elected in the manner specified by the Act of Parliament, passed in the sixth year of the reign of the late King William the Fourth, intituled, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Municipal Corporations in England and Wales"; that the borough is divided into two wards, namely, the north ward and South ward; that nine of the eighteen councillors were apportioned to each of such wards; that on November 1, 1867, an election was duly held for the election of three councillors to supply the places of those who went out of office in the south ward, before an alderman of the borough and two assessors; that the defendant was an enrolled burgess and duly qualified to be elected to be a councillor, and that the burgesses of the south ward did elect him to be a councillor; that he was declared to be duly elected, and that he then and there accepted the office, &c.

Replication, that the burgesses of the south ward did not elect the defendant as alleged.

At the trial, which took place before Hannen, J., at the last York Spring Assizes, it appeared that the borough was divided into the north and south wards, as alleged in the plea, and that on November 1, 1867, the defendant was declared to have been elected a councillor for the south ward. There were six candidates, among whom were the defendant and the relator, Dr. Jackson. The number of votes which were given for the defendant was 281, and for the relator 279.

The rule nisi for the information was obtained upon the affidavits of several persons, but it did not specify the reasons for which the election was alleged to be bad, nor did it set out the names of the voters or the votes which were objected to. The affidavits upon which the rule was granted shewed that four votes which were recorded for the defendant were bad, two because the persons supposed to be voting were dead, one because the person supposed to be voting was at sea, and the fourth because the voter had already, at the same election, voted for the north ward.

The relator also sought to shew that certain voters on the burgess-roll, who voted for the defendant, were not duly qualified.

A verdict was entered for the Crown, with leave to the defendant to move to set that verdict aside and enter a verdict, instead thereof, for the defendant, if the Court should be of opinion that it was not competent to the relator to go into other objections besides those on which the rule for the information had been obtained, or to question, at the trial, the qualifications of persons appearing on the burgess-roll.

A rule having been obtained,

Overend and Shepherd shewed cause.—The rule must be discharged. There is no reason why the relator should not be allowed to question other votes as well as the four which were mentioned in the affidavits. The defendant relies, as to the first point, on the rule of Hil. Term, 7 & 8 Geo. 4. 1827, which may be found set out at page 267, in 6 B. & C., and which is as follows: "Whereas much vexation and expense has been occasioned to defendants in informations in the nature of a quo warranto, by the practice of raising issues upon various matters distinct from the ground on which the information was granted by the Court" .... "Now, for providing a remedy in this behalf, it is ordered that from henceforth the objections intended to be made to the title of the defendant shall be specified in the rule to shew cause, and that no objection not so specified shall be raised by the prosecutor on the pleadings without the special leave of the Court or of some Judge thereof."

[BLACKBURN, J.—That rule seems only to apply to the pleadings.]

Yes, it has no application to the point now before the Court—see the observation of Coleridge, J., in The Queen v. Thomas (8 Ad. & E. 183; 7 L. J. Q.B. 141). In The Queen v. Preece (5 Q.B. 94, 95, h; 12 L. J. Q.B. 335) it was objected that the rule did not comply with the above rule of Court, because it did not shew that the defect in the defendant's title intended to be relied upon was the defect in his election as alderman, and that if the defendant pleaded that he was councillor the relator might traverse it, and would thus bring forward an objection not specified in the rule nisi. To this Coleridge, J., said, "Surely they may traverse whatever you allege"; and Lord Denman, C.J., said, "The rule of Court merely requires that the rule nisi shall contain a statement of the intended objections in the nature of a bill of particulars. In shewing cause the defendant may set up a different title, which would put this out of question." In The Queen v. Edge (12 Q.B. 936; 18 L. J. Q.B. 69) it is said, in the marginal note, "In the rule nisi for a quo warranto information, it is not enough, under Reg. Hil. 7 & 8 Geo. 4, to state that the party against whom the application is made was not entitled to be appointed to the office and the relator was." Lord Denman, C.J., said, after the judgment of the Court had been given, "We ought to observe that the objection here is quite insufficiently stated."

The second question is, whether the relator could, upon the trial, question the right of certain of the electors to be upon the burgess-roll. It is said that the relator has no right to dispute their qualifications behind their backs. But a man's name may be on the burgess-roll without his being a burgess; and if so he cannot be entitled to vote, although, of course, if he be a burgess and has his name on the roll, he will be entitled. The question is discussed in Grant on Corporations, p. 214.

[MELLOR, J.—Section 29 of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, says, "that every burgess of any borough who shall be enrolled on the burgess-roll for the time being, &c., shall be entitled to vote.]

That section does not touch the point.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Section 22 says that the list, when revised, "shall be the burgess-roll of the burgesses of such borough entitled to vote," &c.]

It cannot mean that they are entitled to vote if they are not burgesses. An information in the nature of a quo warranto will not go to remove a disqualified person from the burgess-roll—In re Armstrong (25 L. J. Q.B. 238).

[MELLOR, J.—I see no reason why the revision of the burgess-roll should not be final, no disqualification being shewn at the time. In Rawlinson on Corporations it is stated, at p. 42, note 1, that the mayor's decision as to expunging a name under the 18th section is conclusive—see In re the Mayor of Hythe (5 Ad. & E. 832).]

Mr. Grant, at the page before referred to, says, "Perhaps, however, the rule is more accurately and precisely stated as follows: that when the qualification of the electors depends on the tenure of a corporate office or place, that qualification cannot be questioned through the medium of proceedings impeaching the title of a person elected by them to any office; but when the qualification depends upon inhabitancy or any other circumstance which cannot be directly challenged by a legal proceeding, then, from necessity, it may be questioned and tried through such medium," &c. The question was discussed in The King v. Hughes (4 B. & C. 368), which was an information in the nature of a quo warranto for usurping the office of Mayor of Monmouth; and Bayley, J., said, "In Symmers v. Regem (Cowp. 485) the issue was 'not duly elected,' and upon that issue everything may be brought in question which can be investigated in such a proceeding. If a prosecutor were at liberty to shew that any one who had voted was not duly qualified, the result would be that the party was not duly elected. The defendant in that case was therefore entitled to give any matter in evidence which would be open to the defendant on this record; and there it was held that he could not give evidence to impeach the votes of the corporators de facto. In The King v. Mein (3 Term Rep. 596) Lord Kenyon (who is a very high authority upon such points) says, 'It is objected that the titles of electors cannot be impeached through the medium of the elected, and the case in Cowper has been relied upon, but there the electors were members of a corporation whose titles might have been questioned in quo warranto informations.' He therefore recognizes Symmers v. Regem (Cowp. 485), and takes a distinction between that case and The King v. Mein (3 Term Rep. 596). These cases were before the 32 Geo. 3. c. 58, and I certainly do not think that by the 3rd section of that Act it was intended to extend the power of objecting to the titles of the corporators, and perhaps it was meant to be applicable to head or presiding officers, although that is certainly made doubtful by the introduction of the word election. The King v. Smith (5 M. & S. 271) stands upon a different footing. The defendant had been elected Mayor of Colchester, at a meeting holden before one Hedge, and unless Hedge were at the time mayor de jure, there could not be a good corporate meeting; consequently it was open to the prosecutor to question his title."

[BLACKBURN, J.—I think that Holroyd, J., in The King v. Hughes (4 B. & C. 368) was of opinion that you could not impeach the title of the electors. He says, "It is obvious that many nice questions may arise as to whether an officer is so de facto or not. Sometimes that may be so combined with the question of title de jure that they cannot be severed. But when a person is in possession of the office his title cannot be thus questioned." No one was ever more accurate in expressing his meaning in language than that learned Judge. He cautiously chooses his words.]

In The Queen v. Quayle (11 Ad. & E. 508; 10 L. J. Q.B. 99) the title of persons on the roll to be there was allowed to be impeached, Lord Denman, C.J., saying, "As to opening the burgess-roll, the inconvenience may be very great; but it may well be doubted whether there would not be more mischief caused by our refusing so to do."—See also The Queen v. Parkinson (37 L. J. Q.B. 52; 3 L. R. Q.B. 11).

[MELLOR, J.—In The Queen v. Quayle (11 Ad. & E. 508; 10 L. J. Q.B. 99) the question was treated in a cursory manner, and I cannot help thinking that the inconvenience of opening the burgess-roll would be much greater than by refusing to allow it to be done. It is important that the number of burgesses should be known, and objections may be made next year to these names being retained.]

It is submitted that their title may be impeached within six years—see 32 Geo. 3. c. 58. s. 3.

Field and Simpson, in support of the rule.—Upon the first point, the rule of Hilary Term excludes the right of going into objections which are not specified in the rule nisi for the information. If it could be done, the object of the rule would be defeated. The object is to enable the defendant to know what objections he has to meet. The rule nisi simply calls upon the defendant to shew by what authority he claims to exercise the office.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Why did you not object, on shewing cause, that the rule was too vague? You cannot do it at the trial.]

On this point they referred to The Queen v. Thwaites (1 El. & B. 704; 22 L. J. Q.B. 238) and to The Queen v. Hammond (17 Q. B. 772; 21 L. J. Q.B. 153). Secondly, the burgess-roll cannot be questioned. The 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, by sections 15 to 23 and section 29, provides for the making out the roll, and shews that it was intended to be conclusive.

[MELLOR, J.—There is the fullest provision for any person making objections.]

BLACKBURN, J.—Upon the two questions raised upon the argument of this rule, one must be answered in favour of the relator, and the other in favour of the defendant. The rule nisi for the information was granted upon affidavits, which made it appear that although the defendant had apparently a majority, in reality he had not such a majority. The rule was made absolute, an information was filed, and there was a single replication that the burgesses did not elect the defendant. The contention of the defendant at the trial was, that the relator could not go into any objections other than those which were specified in the affidavits on which he moved for the rule nisi, and that contention rested upon the general rule which has been brought to our notice. In order to ascertain what was the object in view in making that rule, it is necessary to remember what is the character of the information in the nature of a quo warranto. This appears from the 9 Anne, c. 20, s. 4; the information cannot be filed without leave of the Court, and this Court has always said that, not only there must be something wrong in the defendant exercising or intruding into the office, but that the relator shall not be disqualified, and that the objections shall be such as are fit and proper to be made. If the Court thinks right, the information may be filed, and the Crown in its prerogative might traverse everything, and put the party holding the office to expense by replying several matters. An illustration of the hardship of this right in the Crown is to be found in The King v. M'Kay (4 B. & C. 351), where there were sixteen general replications, and thirty special replications setting up various customs as to the election or appointment of the bailiff of the borough, which office the defendant in that case was alleged to have usurped. The Court having, in the exercise of its discretion, granted the information upon one point, the relator raised, in all, forty-six points. In order to provide a remedy for this inconvenience, the rule in question was made.—[His Lordship read the rule.]—The effect of this rule is, that if any objections made to the title of the defendant, not specified in the rule, appear on the pleadings without the leave of the Court or a Judge, they may be struck out. It is argued by Mr. Field that the effect of this rule is, that the relator shall be confined to particular bits of evidence, but I do not think that when a single issue is raised, it was intended to exclude any evidence which should be relevant to such issue. If the rule is too vague, the defendant might apply for particulars. I have a strong impression that such particulars of the objections have been ordered to be given. Therefore upon this first point the relator would be entitled to have the rule discharged.

Upon the second point, it is said that at the trial the relator had a right to object to persons on the burgess-roll, on the ground that they were not qualified to be upon such roll. The question turns upon the construction to be put upon several sections of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. Without inquiring into the authorities which have been referred to, it seems to me that it must have been intended that the burgess-roll should be conclusive as to the persons upon it being entitled to be electors. By the 15th section the burgess-list is to be made out by the overseers; the list is to be published, and, as they may have been mistaken in making it out, provision is made by the 17th section that persons omitted may make claims, and persons not entitled to be on the list may be objected to. By sections 18 and 19 the mayor, together with two assessors, are to revise the lists, and determine upon the validity of the claims and objections, and sign the list in open Court. By section 22 the list, when revised, is to be copied into a book, and that book is to be the burgess-roll of the burgesses of such borough entitled to vote. Therefore most careful provision is made by the Act, and it seems to me that it was intended that the people whose names are upon the burgess-roll are entitled to vote, and that it is not open to the relator to say at the trial that they are not entitled to vote, or to question the roll. While the burgess-roll remains, it is intended to be conclusive. The 9th section says, that every male person of full age who has occupied, as provided in the Act, and shall have been an inhabitant householder, as provided, shall, if duly enrolled, &c., be a burgess, &c. It may be said that this language "If duly enrolled" is ambiguous, but we may read it in combination with the other provisions to which I have referred, and so reading it, I am of opinion that we ought to hold that the burgess-roll is conclusive. There is no decision against this view, except what was said incidentally in The Queen v. Quayle (11 Ad. & E. 508; 10 L. J. Q.B. 99), and that is not enough to shew that the proper construction is not that the burgess-roll shall not be opened upon the trial of the information.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the first point I do not wish to add anything. Upon the second, everything that I have heard in argument leads me to the conclusion in favour of the burgess-roll being held to be conclusive as to the right of those whose names are upon it to vote. The machinery provided by the Act seems to me to be complete and ample for ensuring that the roll shall truly represent who those persons are. Ample means are provided for questioning the title of the electors. In the 9th section there is, no doubt, some change in the language, but when you look at all the sections, I think the construction we put upon the language of the others consistent with the language of the ninth.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the General Rule of Hilary Term is at all applicable to this case. I think it was only intended that the class of objections should be stated, and if in the statement there is anything calculated to mislead, the relator may be required to state them in a more specific form; if that is not required, then all objections coming within the terms of the rule may be insisted upon at the trial. The contrary view would lead to results most unjust, because, while it would be open to one side to go into any number of objections, the other side would be confined to the particular objections specified. I cannot find that The Queen v. Thwaites (1 El. & B. 704; 22 L. J. Q.B. 238) is inconsistent with this view.

Upon the second point, the whole purview of the several sections is to secure that the burgess-roll should be conclusive, and I infer that it was never intended that it should be questioned in the manner now insisted upon.

The rule was ordered to stand over until the next term and then to be discharged or made absolute, according to the result of the calculation of the votes[1].

Railway Company—Lloyd's Bond—Assignee of Chose in Action—Equities between Company and Obligee.

COMPANY. F.—In an action upon a money bond made by a railway company, it was pleaded, on equitable grounds, that by a deed between the obligee and the company it was agreed that as certain instalments, which under the terms of the deed were to be paid in shares, became due, the company should, in addition, pay to the obligee 75l. per cent. of the nominal value of the shares in Lloyd's bonds; and that the obligee should pay and satisfy each bond as it became due, and should in the meantime pay all interest due upon them, and indemnify and save harmless the company from all losses, costs, charges, &c., to which they should become liable on account of the non-payment of the bonds or interest, or by reason of having entered into them. And the plea stated that the bond sued upon was a Lloyd's bond, issued and delivered by the company to the obligee in pursuance of the agreement. Replication that after the making of the bond, and before the action, the obligee assigned the bond sued upon for a good and valuable consideration to certain persons, of which the company had notice; and that the assignees had not at the time of the assignment, and never had till after the commencement of the suit, any notice or knowledge of the deed mentioned in the plea, or of any private arrangement between the obligee and the company with reference to the payment of the bond, or to the liability of the company upon it; and that they took the bond and accepted the security of it on the faith of the contract appearing on the face of it. The replication went on to state that the assignees from the date of the assignment to them had been the beneficial owners of the bond, and that the action was commenced and prosecuted by the obligee as a trustee for them, and for their sole use and benefit:—Held, on demurrer, that the replication was good, as the bond appeared to have been delivered to the obligee for the express purpose of raising money upon it, and it was not

In that report, the rule is said to have been to shew cause why judgment in the prosecution should not be entered for the defendant, non obstante veredicto. This was the form of the rule as entered in the Crown Office, but it was stated in the course of this argument that it was intended that the rule should have been to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered for the defendant; and that if it had been properly drawn up, it would be in the form given in this report.

reasonable to set up as an answer to a claim by the equitable owners, a secret arrangement by which the bond was not to be enforced.

Declaration—That the defendants, by their bond, dated October 7, 1864, became bound to the plaintiff in the sum of 1,000*l.*, to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff.

Second plea, on equitable grounds, that before the making of the bond a deed, dated September 29, 1864, was made and entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, whereby it was mutually covenanted and agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendants that, as and when certain instalments and sums, which, under the terms of the deed, were to be paid in shares of the defendants, became due the defendants should, in addition thereto, when so required by the plaintiff, from time to time pay to the plaintiff such further sums in Lloyd's bonds, having three years to run from the date of issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, as should be equivalent to 75*l.* per cent. of the nominal value of any such shares; and that the plaintiff should pay or satisfy the Lloyd's bonds to be from time to time so issued and delivered to him in accordance with the deed, as and when the same respectively became due, and in the meantime should pay all interest which might from time to time become due thereon respectively, and should indemnify and save harmless the defendants from and against the bonds or any of them, and also from and against all losses, costs, charges, damages and expenses whatsoever which the defendants might become liable or be called upon or compelled to pay for or on account of the non-payment thereof, or any of them, or any interest due thereon, or by reason of the defendants having entered into the same. Averment, that the bond declared upon was and is a Lloyd's bond issued and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff in pursuance of the covenants and agreements hereinbefore stated, and subject to the covenant and agreement of the plaintiff to pay and satisfy the same as and when the same became due, and to pay the interest, and so to indemnify and save harmless the defendants.

Replication—That after the making of the bond, and before this suit, the plaintiff assigned the bond mentioned in the declaration for a good and valuable consideration to R. Pigott, J. Mann the younger, J. Lloyd and W. L. Lloyd, of which the defendants had notice; and that the assignees had not at the time of the assignment, and never had till after the commencement of this suit, any notice or knowledge of the deed mentioned in the plea, or of any private arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendants with reference to the payment of the bond, or to the liability of the defendants thereon; but they took the bond and accepted the security of it on the faith of the contract appearing on the face of it. Averment, that the assignees, from the date of the assignment of the bond to them, as before mentioned, hitherto, had been the beneficial owners of the bond, and that the action was commenced and prosecuted in the name of the plaintiff as a trustee for the assignees, and for their sole use and benefit, and not for the use or benefit of the plaintiff or of his creditors under his bankruptcy.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Gray (Gadsden with him), in support of the demurrer.—The replication is bad. It must be taken as admitted on the record, that at the time when the bond was delivered to the plaintiff there was an agreement between him and the company that it should not be enforced. The instrument was, therefore, in the nature of an accommodation bill, and was not negotiable. There never was a moment when the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in respect of it, and there was no interest for the plaintiff to assign.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Does it lie in the mouth of the company, who put this bond into the hands of the plaintiff for the purpose of raising money, to say we gave this bond for the purpose of enabling the obligee to commit a fraud? LUSH, J.—The plea is a sort of bill in equity to restrain an action on the bond. Would not this replication be a good answer to such a bill?]

The assignees cannot have taken by this assignment a greater interest than that of the plaintiff. In In re the Natal Investment Company, Lim. (37 L. J. Ch. 362),—where a company purchased land and gave debentures for the price, whereby they undertook to pay certain sums to the purchaser, his executors, administrators or transferees, or to the holder for the time being,—it was held that the transferee of these debentures took them subject to all the equities existing between the company and the seller of the land.

[LUSH, J.—In that case there was a failure of consideration between the parties.]

Secondly, a bond like the present cannot be enforced, as it does not appear to have been given for work done and therefore the company acted ultra vires in issuing it. In Chambers v. the Manchester and Milford Railway Company (5 Best and S. 588; 33 L. J. Q.B. 268) it was held, that an action could not be maintained against the company on one of these bonds, which had been given as a security for money lent.

[G. Bruce, for the plaintiff, objected that this defence could only be properly raised under a plea of non est factum.]

It may be gathered from the facts stated in the plea, that the object of giving this bond was to raise money for the benefit of the company.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Consistently with this plea the arrangement was within the powers of the company.]

Lastly, the assignee of the bond could only recover, in equity, the amount which he had paid for it, but the replication does not allege that the assignees gave full value for the bond.

[LUSH, J.—That is not necessary, if there was an absolute sale of it.]

G. Bruce, for the plaintiff, in support of the replication, was not called on.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We need not call upon the other side to support this replication, as we have no doubt that it is good. It is a replication to a miscalled, equitable plea, and the facts alleged by it, when looked at in the view suggested by my Brother Lush, appear to be that the action is brought upon a bond made by the defendants, which primâ facie is good, but which they seek to get rid of by this plea. The plea must be looked at as if an action had been brought at law, and the defendants had gone into equity to obtain an injunction to restrain such action. They would then have had to allege that, having given these bonds to the plaintiff in order that he might obtain money on the security of them, there was a secret understanding between him and themselves that he should find money to discharge them when the time for payment came. The effect of this would be to enable the plaintiff to go into the market and raise money on the security of these bonds, when by a secret arrangement the bonds were not binding as between the parties, and the remedy which they purported to give was a deceptive one. In such a case, the plaintiff would merely have to allege, by way of answer, the facts stated in this replication, that the assignees had been deceived by means of these bonds, and that the plaintiff had by the assignment become a trustee for them, and, being such trustee, was bound to allow them to sue in his name. This would be a good answer in equity, for no Court of equity could resist such a case when the facts were brought before it. Now this is an equitable plea, and what would be an answer to such a bill filed in equity is a good equitable replication.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The terms of the plea are, that the bonds were given in pursuance of an agreement that when certain instalments payable to the plaintiff in shares became due, the defendants should pay to the plaintiff 75 per cent. of the value of the instalments in Lloyd's bonds; and that the plaintiff should take up these bonds as they became due, and should in the mean time pay all interest due upon them, and should furthermore indemnify and save harmless the defendants from all charges and expenses which they might become liable to in respect of them. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that the defendants gave these bonds to the plaintiff for the very purpose of enabling him to raise money upon them, and the indemnity in the deed shews that it was contemplated that the company might be sued on the bonds. In this state of things, now that the plaintiff has raised money upon them, it is not reasonable that the defendants should set up as an answer to the claim of the equitable owners that there was a secret arrangement that the bonds should not be enforced. If there had been a bill in equity to restrain an action on this bond, it could not for a moment be contended that it would be inequitable for him to say that he was suing only as trustee, but it would be a good answer to the suit. The case of In re the Natal Investment Company (Lim.) (37 L. J. Ch. 362) in no way conflicts with this position, but rather supports it. In that case a certain person had contracted to sell an estate to a company, and they delivered debenture bonds, whereby they undertook to make certain payments to him, or to his executors, administrators or transferees, or to the holders for the time being. It turned out afterwards that he had no estate to sell, and that he had deposited the debentures with a third person as a security for a debt; and it was argued that the person who advanced the money was not bound by the equities between the original parties to the contract. The argument proceeded on this,—that the bonds were payable not only to the seller of the estate, but to bearer. Now the whole gist of the reasoning on which the judgment of the Lord Chancellor is founded is, that the debentures were not given for the purpose of negotiating them. He says, in effect, that if there had been a previous bargain that these debentures should be negotiable, the company would have had no answer to proceedings for enforcing them, and the decision proceeds, in fact, upon the particular words of the instruments.

BISHOP v. KITCHIN AND ANOTHER.

38 L. J. Q.B. 20.

Contract—Restraint of Trade—Action for Consideration of Executed Agreement—Divisibility of Contract.

CONTRACT. E.—An action was brought to recover arrears of an annuity, the consideration for which was an agreement by the annuitant, a commercial traveller in the hop-trade, "that he would not, at any time thereafter, either on his own account or on account of any other person or persons whomsoever, excepting the defendants, solicit orders for hops from any of the customers in the West of England or in South Wales or any district whatsoever":—Held, without deciding whether the restraint of trade, so far as it regarded the West of England and South Wales, could be enforced; that the plaintiff, who had performed his part of the contract, was entitled to recover the consideration due in respect of it.

The first count of the declaration stated, in substance, that an agreement in writing was made between the plaintiff and the defendants, in which (after reciting that the plaintiff had been a commercial traveller in the hop-trade in the West of England and in South Wales, and that the defendants had agreed to purchase the good will and interest of the plaintiff in his connexion among the buyers of hops in consideration of an annuity and agreement for the employment of the plaintiff as traveller for the defendants) the plaintiff agreed that he would not, at any time thereafter, either on his own account or on account of any other person or persons whomsoever, excepting the defendants, solicit orders for hops from any of the customers, or from any of the persons in the district before mentioned, or any district whatsoever, but would introduce the names of the defendants to such customers and persons, and use his influence in endeavouring to make such customers and persons customers of the defendants; and, in consideration of the premises, the defendants undertook to pay to the plaintiff an annuity of 100*l.* during his life, and agreed to employ him as their traveller over the district before mentioned, at a salary of 250*l.* per annum, payable quarterly, with a proviso that, so long as the plaintiff should be so employed and in receipt of the salary, the annuity should be suspended. Averment of conditions precedent. Breach, non-payment of arrears of the salary.

Second count—That the plaintiff and the defendants agreed, as in the first count mentioned, and after the making of the agreement, and while the plaintiff was not employed as the traveller of the defendants or in receipt of the salary of 250*l.*, four quarterly payments of the 100*l.* a year became due; and the plaintiff did all things necessary to entitle him to be paid the same, and all things happened and all times elapsed to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the same, and to maintain this action for the breach of the agreement hereinafter alleged. Breach, that four quarterly payments of the annuity were still due and unpaid.

Demurrer to the second count and joinder in demurrer.

H. T. Cole (Lopes with him), in support of the demurrer.—There are two questions to decide; first, assuming that the agreement as set out is bad, as being in general restraint of trade, can the part of it which relates to trading in a particular district be separated from the rest? Secondly, whether the agreement thus limited is still unreasonable?

[Lush, J.—Price v. Green (16 Mee. & W. 346; 16 L. J. Ex. 108) is conclusive as to the first point.]

Even if the agreement be thus limited, the restraint is greater than is necessary for the protection of the defendants.

[Pinder, in support of the declaration, pointed out that the action was brought, not to enforce the agreement, but to recover the consideration for the restraint on the plaintiff.]

The action is practically an attempt to enforce an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Pinder, in support of the declaration, was not heard.

Per Curiam[1].—The agreement having been executed and the plaintiff having submitted to the restraint, he is clearly entitled to recover the consideration due in respect of it.

London. D. Negligence. B.—The defendant, a contractor, was engaged by the Metropolitan Board of Works to construct a sewer along a highway. It was necessary to cut a trench in the highway, and, after building the sewer, to fill in the trench, and restore and make good the surface of the highway. The sewer was built and finished; the trench was filled in and completed by the defendant; the work was properly done; the surface of the road was properly reinstated and made good, but, subsequently, a hole appeared in the highway which was caused, as the jury found, by the natural subsidence of the soil. Into this the plaintiff's horse fell and the plaintiff's wife was injured. The defendant did nothing to the highway after he had completed the work; but the jury found that the parish had not taken to it so as to relieve the defendant from the obligation of looking after the work and making good its subsequent defects:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench (see 36 L.J. Q.B. 166), that the defendant was not liable in an action brought against him by the plaintiff, he having done all that he was bound to do to the highway.

1. This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, pursuant to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, making absolute a rule to enter a nonsuit.

2. The declaration alleged that the defendant before, &c. was a contractor employed by the Metropolitan Board of Works to break up certain parts of a public highway called St. Mark's Road, Kennington, and afterwards to make good the surface; that he broke up the highway, but did not make good the surface, but negligently allowed holes and ruts to remain and be in and upon the surface of the highway without taking any precaution to guard against danger to horses and carriages passing along the highway, whereby a horse and cart of the plaintiff, being driven along the highway by the servant of the plaintiff, and in which the plaintiff's wife was, by the improper conduct of the defendant, came in contact with the said holes and ruts in the highway, whereby the horse and cart were thrown down, and the plaintiff's wife was thrown out of the cart, and damage ensued, as alleged in the declaration.

3. The defendant pleaded not guilty by the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 106, a public act; and also, that the horse and cart in the declaration mentioned were not the plaintiff's.

4. Issue was joined on the pleas, and by virtue of a suggestion duly entered, the cause was tried in London. The defendant, in answer to interrogatories delivered by order of a learned Judge, deposed "I do not know whether, in the months queried, I did open the highway; it was opened by men working for me and under the direction of my manager. But I have no personal knowledge of the matter or the dates, beyond the fact I know it was opened, and closed and filled in after my work was done. That I was employed by a contract to make a sewer and works for the Metropolitan Board of Works in St. Mark's Road, Kennington, and making such sewer involved opening the highway. The contract is, I believe, in the possession of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I say that I do not believe, in the months mentioned in this interrogatory, or at any other time, I caused any holes or ruts in the said road; I only caused in the road the excavation for the sewer, and the same was, to the best of my belief, properly filled up again when the sewer was built. I do not know and cannot tell the name or address of the person who filled up the same, or the date when it was done; if, indeed, it ever was."

5. At the trial, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, on February 24, 1866, the following facts were proved: That the plaintiff was a furniture-dealer, and, on February 17, 1865, was possessed of a horse and cart and harness, which horse and cart, about eight o'clock in the evening, was being driven along the St. Mark's Road, Kennington, in the county of Surrey, by the plaintiff's son, the plaintiff's wife riding in the cart. That the defendant was a contractor, and had been engaged to construct a sewer along the highway, and for that purpose it was necessary to cut a trench in the highway and, after building the sewer, to fill in the trench or opening and restore and make good the surface of the highway; and that the defendant, in fact, opened the highway in or about the month of May in the year 1864.

6. The sewer was built and finished, and the defendant afterwards filled in the opening or trench in the highway, and such filling in was completed in about two months after the road was first broken open, and was properly done; and when the defendant's men finished, in August, 1864, the surface of the road had been properly reinstated and made good, and the top metalling put in its proper position.

7. That some little time after the opening had thus been filled in, holes and ruts began to appear in the highway, and the same were caused by the subsidence of the filling in of the trench, and the defendant did nothing whatever to the road after he had first filled the trench. That a subsidence to a greater or less degree sometimes takes place six months or longer after an excavation of this description has been filled in.

8. That the horse and cart of the plaintiff on the day in question, about eight o'clock in the evening, were driven and fell into a hole in the highway, the hole being caused by the subsidence of the filling in executed by the defendant, whereby the injuries mentioned in the declaration were sustained.

9. That the highway was not a turnpike-road, nor had it been repaired by the parish in which it was situate, after the openings were made, and after the same were filled in by the defendant. Matthew James Jennings, the foreman of the defendant, stated that the parish foreman of the roads asked the witness to reserve some of the defendant's gravel for them to repair the roads with; and the witness stated that he had given gravel and brickbats for that purpose; and the witness also stated that he sent stuff from the depot of the defendant, and that the parish paid nothing for it, and that the stuff so sent was laid about the road generally. It was proved that notice of action was duly given, and no point arises thereon.

10. The Lord Chief Justice put the following questions to the jury: First, was there a hole in the highway? secondly, whether the subsidence was in consequence of the works of the defendant being defectively executed or arising from natural causes? and thirdly, whether the parish had taken to the road so as to relieve the defendant from any obligation to look after the work, and make good its subsequent defects? To which questions the jury answered: First, that there was a hole in the highway; secondly, that the hole was occasioned by natural subsidence; and thirdly, that the parish had not taken to the road so as to relieve the defendant from the obligation of looking after the work, and making good its subsequent defects. The learned Judge thereupon directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, and the jury assessed the damages at 40*l*.

11. A rule was obtained, on the part of the defendant, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict obtained in this cause should not be set aside, and a verdict for the defendant or a nonsuit entered instead thereof, or why a new trial should not be had between the parties, on the grounds,—first, that the evidence shewed that the defendant was not liable for the injury alleged in the declaration; secondly, that the defendant having properly restored and repaired the part of the highway where the accident complained of occurred, was not liable in respect of subsequent subsidences of the soil; thirdly, that the finding of the jury was in substance a finding for the defendant.

12. Cause was in due course shewn on the part of the plaintiff against the rule; and, after argument, the Court of Queen's Bench ordered that the verdict obtained should be set aside and a nonsuit entered instead thereof—[see 36 L. J. Q.B. 168.]

The question for the opinion of this Court was, whether the decision of the Court below, in making the rule to enter a nonsuit absolute, was correct in point of law.

Laxton, for the appellant.—The decision in the Court below was wrong, and the action is maintainable either at common law or under the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. That statute, by section 69, gives power to make, repair and maintain the sewers; and by section 110, whenever it is necessary for any person to break up the pavement, surface or soil of any street, he shall with all convenient speed complete the work on account of which the same is broken up, " and fill in the ground and make good the pavement or surface or soil so broken up," &c. After the answers of the jury to the questions put to them it must, no doubt, be taken that the defendant did fill up the trench which he had made, and with proper materials, in the first instance. He was bound to do so under the provisions of section 111, which imposes a penalty upon any person who, having broken up the pavement or surface of the street, does not " with due diligence cause the ground to be filled in, and the pavement to be reinstated, and the surface to be made good in a proper and substantial manner." The facts found in the case shew that it was reasonable to expect that a subsidence would take place, and it was therefore incumbent upon the defendant to take care, by a careful supervision, that there should not be any such subsidence as would cause danger to the public.

[BYLES, J.—It is clear that his liability ceased as soon as he had properly completed the work of filling in the trench and reinstating the surface.]

The very fact of the subsidence having taken place shews that the work could not have been properly completed. This Court, in Gray v. Pullen (4 Best & S. 981; 34 L. J. Q.B. 265), put a construction upon these sections which is in favour of the appellant.

[CHANNELL, B.—No; the only question which the Court had there to consider was, whether the defendant Pullen was liable, he not having done the work himself, but having employed one Hubble as a contractor. There was no decision which can help the appellant in this case.]

The 11th section shews that the defendant was bound to look after the work; he was liable to a penalty for every day during which it remained in an improper condition. The application of the penalties is provided for by section 234, and no part would come to the possession of the plaintiff. In the Court below, Lush, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, observed upon the 33rd section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, but that section only applies to turnpike-roads, and was referred to simply for the purpose of drawing the inference that if the liability of the contractor in the case of a turnpike-road, was not carried beyond the restoring the road to its original state, it would not be carried further in the case of a common highway. It is submitted the defendant, under the present statute, was bound to exercise a supervision which would prevent the public from being injured.

Montagu Chambers (Philbrick with him), contra, was not heard.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears that the defendant in this case, being a contractor under the Metropolitan Board of Works, had the duty imposed upon him of digging a trench for the purpose of the construction of a sewer, and afterwards of filling up the trench, and reinstating the road in which the trench had been cut. The case finds, or rather the evidence in the case states, that it was about the month of May that he commenced these works, and he completed them in the month of August, and it proceeds to state that he finished the sewer. In August, 1864, the surface of the road had been properly reinstated and made good, and the metalling was in its proper position. Upon the whole of the evidence given in the case, the Lord Chief Justice seems to have left it to the jury—first, whether there was a hole in the highway? About that there was no manner of doubt. Secondly, whether the subsidence was in consequence of the work of the defendant being defectively executed, or arising from natural causes? Upon that the jury found that the hole was occasioned by natural subsidence, that is, in other words, that the work was not defectively executed. Taking that, together with the evidence, we can entertain no doubt whatever that it was established that this trench, which had been cut for the purpose of the sewer, was well and completely filled up, and that the work was not defectively executed; and we must take it on that finding, on the language of the statute, it was completed either with the same or similar materials, of the like quality or thickness, and cemented or bound together in the same or in an equally substantial manner. That is all that the statute requires. If the work had been otherwise executed, the jury would have found on the question left by the Lord Chief Justice, that it was defectively executed. They find it was not defectively executed, but that the subsidence arose from natural causes. It appears, in fact, that the subsidence took place, as subsidences often do, some months afterwards, after the work had been completed. The highway was reinstated almost in the very terms of the Act of Parliament. The question is, whether the defendant is liable for the subsidence. It is said that the jury, in answer to the third question, whether the parish had taken to the road, found that the parish had not taken to the road so as to relieve the defendant from the obligation of looking after the works and making good its subsidence and defects. Now, if this finding had been warranted by the law, in the first instance, and then by the facts of the case, it might have presented a very different case for our consideration; but in the first place, it is perfectly immaterial whether or not the parish had taken to the road. If the defendant completed the work which he was employed to effect, he had no right to remain for a single moment afterwards on the road. He had no right to interfere with the road if he had done his duty according to the terms of the Act of Parliament; therefore it is perfectly immaterial whether the parish took to the road or not. Then the jury go on to say, "so as to relieve him from looking after the work and making good its subsequent defects." It seems certainly from that, that the jury have imagined that he was bound after the completion of the work to look after the road, and to make good its subsequent defects. All I would observe upon that is, that the jury were mistaken. It could only be by the terms of the Act of Parliament that any such duty was imposed upon the defendant; and when we look at the two sections relied on by Mr. Laxton, the 110th and 111th, all we find in those two sections taken together is, that when a trench of this kind has been cut, it is to be filled up with all practicable expedition, and the highway is to be reinstated and made good in a satisfactory and substantial manner. All that appears to have been done, and no authority or power to look after the spot or interfere with the road afterwards was conferred on the defendant by the Act; certainly there was no obligation imposed on him to make good a subsidence which might take place six months, or even a longer time, after the work has been completed. Under these circumstances, we think the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench perfectly right, and that it must be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the finding of the jury amounts to this, that this accident was attributable to a want of repair of the road, and not that it was the result of the want of a proper filling up of the trench.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the finding of the jury was in fact a finding for the defendant, unless there was an obligation, imposed by the Acts, to prevent subsidence after the road had been once filled in.

J. Bk. 41), and agreeing with that decision (Hannen, J., hæsitante) that the replication was good, and an answer to the plea.

The declaration contained counts upon several bills of exchange accepted by the defendant; also the usual money counts.

The defendant, in his first plea, pleaded a composition deed entered into on December 5, 1866, between himself, a trustee and certain of his creditors, being a majority, &c., as required by the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, whereby he covenanted to pay a composition of 2*s*. in the pound, by two equal instalments. The deed recited an agreement of October 25, 1866, for which the deed pleaded was to be substituted, as was alleged to have been agreed to by the said majority of the creditors.

To this plea the plaintiffs replied, upon equitable grounds, that the said pleaded deed in the said first plea mentioned was never executed by them or either of them, nor did they, nor did either of them, ever assent to or approve of the said deed; and that the plaintiffs were not, nor were either of them, parties to, nor did they, nor did either of them, ever assent to or approve of either of the said two agreements mentioned and referred to in the said pleaded deed, that is to say, the alleged agreement first therein mentioned and referred to, whereby it is alleged to have been agreed between and by all the parties to the said pleaded deed, to substitute for the covenants, trusts, powers and provisions contained in and expressed by the said indenture of October 25, 1866, mentioned in the said pleaded deed, the several covenants, trusts, powers and provisions contained in the said pleaded deed, and the said alleged agreement in the said pleaded deed secondly mentioned and referred to, whereby it is alleged that a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l*. and upwards, had agreed to accept the said composition of 2*s*. in the pound, payable as and secured in manner therein mentioned, in full discharge of their said several debts and demands, and to execute, or in writing assent to or approve of, the said pleaded deed. And the plaintiffs further say, that at the respective times when the said two agreements were made and entered into and assented to, and approved as aforesaid, and when the said pleaded deed was made and executed and assented to and approved of as aforesaid, by the said majority of the defendant's said creditors as aforesaid, as in the said first plea mentioned, the defendant had and was in possession of available assets sufficient for the payment to the said creditors of a much larger composition than 2*s*. in the pound, upon the amount of their said respective debts. And the plaintiffs further say, that the said two agreements and the said pleaded deed were not, nor were either of them, bonâ fide made or entered into or executed, or assented to or approved of by any or either of the defendant's said creditors, or by any or either of the said parties thereto, or by the said creditors who assented to or approved of the same, for the equal benefit of all the defendant's said creditors, mentioned in and within the meaning of, the said deed; and the same agreements, and each of them, and the said pleaded deed were respectively made and entered into and executed and assented to and approved of by the said parties thereto, and by the said majority of the said defendant's creditors, solely from motives of benevolence and kindness to and for the defendant, and for his sole and only benefit, and without any just regard to the rights or interests of the defendant's said other creditors; and to give the defendant a release and discharge from his said debts and demands, on the payment of the said alleged composition of 2*s.* in the pound upon the amount of their said respective debts in the pleaded deed and in the said secondly-mentioned agreement mentioned. And the plaintiffs further say that the same alleged composition of 2*s.* in the pound in truth and in fact was only a nominal composition, and wholly disproportionate to the said assets of the defendant of which he at the times aforesaid was possessed and had, and which could and might and ought to have been and were available towards the payment of the defendant's said creditors, their said debts and demands.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

[There were other pleas which were demurred to, but it is not considered that the arguments or judgments upon those demurrers need be reported.]

Henry James, for the plaintiffs.—The replication is good. It falls short of any averment of absolute fraud, but it sets up what is sufficient to invalidate a deed of composition by which it is sought to bind non-assenting creditors. It is essential to such a deed that the creditors who execute it should be actuated by perfect good faith, and that the deed should be free from all taint of fraud. It cannot be contended that the majority of the creditors have a right, from motives of kindness to the debtor, to bind the rest of the creditors to take a composition of 1*d.* in the pound.

[LUSH, J.—Dauglish v. Tennent (36 L. J. Q.B. 10) shews that such a deed must be executed in good faith between the debtor and his creditors.]

Just so. And further, there is a case of In re Cowen; Ex parte Foster (36 L. J. Bk. 41; 2 L. R. Ch. Ap. 563) which is precisely in point. This replication is drawn exactly in accordance with that judgment. There the composition was 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound; the debts amounted to 1,054*l.*, the assets being sufficient to pay much more than the composition agreed to. The assenting creditors were friends of the bankrupt, and had executed the deed for the benefit of the debtor without any regard to the rights and interests of the other creditors. Turner, L.J. (see page 43) said, "The power given by this section to a majority of creditors to bind the minority must, I think, be considered as or in the nature of a statutory power, the exercise of which would be binding only when it was fairly and bonâ fide exercised. Independently of what must, as I think, be presumed to have been the intention of the legislature, the words of the section seem to me to import that the absence of any taint of fraud and the bonâ fides of the arrangement with a view to the benefit of all the creditors, were meant to be essential to the validity of the deeds. The deeds are to be binding on the non-assenting creditors, not absolutely, but only as if they were parties to and had executed the same; and even creditors who were parties to and had executed the deeds could not, as I apprehend, have been bound by them if they were tainted by fraud or mala fides. Counts of law in dealing with deeds of this description, with reference to other provisions contained in them, have held that the deeds must be reasonable, and these decisions at law have been much pressed upon our attention in the course of the argument before us; but it would be very difficult to apply the test of reasonableness to cases like the present. How could a Court of justice determine what it would be reasonable for creditors to accept under all the varied circumstances of arrangements between debtors and their creditors? I think, therefore, that the cases at law afford us but little assistance in determining this case; and I am not disposed to go further than to say that, in my opinion, it is necessary, in order to render a deed of such a description as we have here to deal with, binding upon non-assenting creditors, that the deed should be free from all taint of fraud, and should be made and entered into bonâ fide with a view to the benefit of all the creditors of the debtor. In determining whether these conditions have been observed or not, I do not think that the Court will measure in golden scales the propriety of the arrangement which has been made between the debtor and his creditors, or will weigh with nicety the question whether the estate of the debtor would be capable of paying more than the composition agreed upon; but I think that in order to render such a deed as the one before us binding on non-assenting creditors, the conditions which I have mentioned must in substance have been observed." And the judgment of Cairns, L.J., adopted the same view. It is submitted that this case is decisive.

Sir G. Honyman (L. Kelly with him), contra.—The contention of the plaintiffs is quite novel. The statute expressly gives power to the majority of creditors to bind the rest, and the Court cannot look into the question of whether such creditors have been actuated by feelings of kindness to the debtor or not. The intention of the legislature was to allow the majority of the creditors to make a beneficial arrangement, which would avoid the necessity of proceeding in the Court of Bankruptcy in the regular manner.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It must be borne in mind that this replication is pleaded on equitable grounds. I think that the decision by the Lords Justices is in point, and is binding upon us. The question which would have to be left to a jury upon such an issue would, I think, be, was this agreement entered into for the benefit of the general body of the creditors, or was it entered into by the required majority for the benefit of the debtor, but at the expense of the rest of the creditors?]

It rather appears that the Lords Justices gave their decision under the peculiar circumstances of the case, which almost satisfied them that there had been absolute fraud and that the assenting creditors would get their debts paid in full.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—That is not given as the reason of their decision.]

Henry James was not called upon to reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are bound by the decision of the Lords Justices in In re Cowen; Ex parte Foster (36 L. J. Bk. 41; 2 L. R. Ch. Ap. 563). I entirely agree with that decision. It seems to me that the legislature intended, by the provisions in the Bankruptcy Act as to these composition deeds, to substitute a species of commercial domestic forum consisting of the debtor and the creditors in the place of the costly proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court which resulted in the eating up of a large portion of the bankrupt's estate, and they thought that it would be much better that the whole matter should be left to the more economical proceeding to be managed by the creditors. By the 192nd section it was intended that the arrangement which the majority in number, representing three-fourths in value, of the creditors whose debts should respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, thought was best, should be binding upon the rest; but it was never intended that such an arrangement should be binding upon non-assenting creditors, where it was made at the expense of those creditors and from motives of benevolence in which they did not concur. I conceive that the bonâ fides of such an arrangement depends upon its being entered into with the honest intention of doing what would be for the advantage of the general body of the creditors. I entirely concur in the principle of the decision in In re Cowen; Ex parte Foster (36 L. J. Bk. 41; 2 L. R. Ch. Ap. 563); and even if I did not do so, I should consider that we are bound by it.

LUSH, J.—I bow to that decision; but I also think that the arrangement to be good ought to be one entered into by the requisite majority of the creditors acting in the interest of the general body of creditors, and not simply for the benefit of the debtor without considering the interest of the general body of creditors.

HANNEN, J.—I agree that we are bound by the decision of the Lords Justices in In re Cowen; Ex parte Foster (36 L. J. Bk. 41; 2 L. R. Ch. Ap. 563), and that if a different construction ought to be put upon the section it must be done by a Court of error. I have not very carefully considered that case, and although, upon consideration, I might agree with all that was said by the Lords Justices, I at present think it right to say that I do not conceive the legislature intended to exclude from the operation of the section all such deeds as are executed by the requisite majority of creditors on the ground that they had been executed from motives of kindness and benevolence. I think that it was intended to guard against deeds being entered into under circumstances amounting to fraud. If all motives of kindness and benevolence are to be excluded, it will follow that if one creditor whose assent was necessary to make up the requisite majority was actuated by such motives the deed would be invalidated. I think it will be found that the decision of the Lords Justices does not involve that doctrine.

Bankruptcy—Act of Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Transfer—Bill of Sale to Execution Creditor—24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 73.

BANKRUPTCY. B. H.—Execution was levied upon goods on the premises of a trader, who was in insolvent circumstances and had ceased to carry on his trade, for a debt exceeding 50*l. The trader executed a bill of sale, by which he mortgaged all his stock-in-trade and effects to secure the judgment debt, and the sheriff withdrew*:—Held, that whatever might have been the case before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 73, the bill of sale was now an act of bankruptcy, for it prevented the creditors from treating the seizure and sale as an act of bankruptcy and obtaining a distribution of the property seized by means of an adjudication in bankruptcy; and that any benefit which might be expected to arise from postponing a forced sale was a benefit only to the execution creditor, and not to the rest of the creditors, who took no benefit under the security.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (reported 36 L. J. Q.B. 289), where the facts are fully stated. It will here be sufficient to mention that on May 1, 1866, the plaintiff recovered judgment against one Proudfoot for 10,634*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, and that on May 10 execution was levied at his private residence and a portion of the debt satisfied. On June 5 execution for the balance was levied on the stock-in-trade of Proudfoot at his manufactory. On August 17 Proudfoot executed two deeds in favour of the plaintiff, for the purpose of securing the balance of the judgment debt, a mortgage of the residue of his term in the premises where he carried on his business, and a bill of sale of the stock-in-trade, machinery, &c., upon these premises. On the 18th the sheriff withdrew; but on the 28th the plaintiff took possession of the premises, and on September 12 Proudfoot (who was in insolvent circumstances, and had ceased to carry on his trade when he executed the deeds) was adjudicated bankrupt. The Court of Queen's Bench held, that the effect of the bill of sale was to defeat the remedies afforded to creditors by section 73 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861[1], and that it was therefore an act of bankruptcy and void as against the defendant, the creditors' assignee. The plaintiff appealed to this Court.

Quain (Manisty and G. Bruce with him), for the appellant.—The plaintiff will submit, as in the Court below, that the bill of sale was no act of bankruptcy. Primâ facie a conveyance of the whole or a substantial part of the debtor's effects to a creditor is an act of bankruptcy. But exceptions have been engrafted on this rule by late decisions; and the question is whether the present case can be brought within any one of them. If the debtor had anything like an equivalent for the mortgage of his property, the transaction can be upheld. By granting this mortgage he obtained a short respite from utter ruin. The Court below based their judgment upon the proposition that the effect of the mortgage was to defeat the operation of section 73. But at the time of the deed it could not be positively affirmed that bankruptcy would be most beneficial to the creditors. The "equivalent" is a present equivalent to the bankrupt, not to his creditors under a future bankruptcy.

[CHANNELL, B.—An equivalent which may be, but is not necessarily, for the benefit of the creditors.]

Yes. The law as to the consideration which will prevent a conveyance of the debtor's property from being an act of bankruptcy is laid down in the cases of Whitmore v. Claridge (33 L. J. Q.B. 87) and Bittleston v. Cooke (6 E. & B. 296; 25 L. J. Q.B. 281), and they shew that if the consideration is substantial the deed will be supported.

S. Temple, for the respondent.—If the argument of the plaintiff is well founded, a friendly debtor and creditor may always get rid of the operation of section 73.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Do not the creditors get a benefit from the fact that the debtor is at liberty to turn himself round?]

The only equivalent suggested is, that the creditors are to be prevented from availing themselves of an act of bankruptcy. The equivalent should be one which, through the debtor, is for the benefit of all the creditors. In Bittleston v. Cooke (6 E. & B. 296; 25 L. J. Q.B. 281) Lord Campbell said: "I should think the transaction must have appeared to both parties likely rather to have benefited than to have defeated the creditors;" shewing that benefit to the creditors, and not to the debtor, is the test.

Quain, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[2] was delivered, on Nov. 26, by—

KELLY, C.B.—The question in this case is, whether a trader against whom a judgment had been obtained for 10,000*l.* and upwards, and the judgment creditor having levied between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*, and afterwards sent in a second execution and seized for 6,500*l.* and upwards, by executing to the judgment creditor a mortgage of the whole of his estate and effects, committed an act of bankruptcy.

The jury have found that the mortgage was bonâ fide, and executed to save expense, and to make the most of the property. But, notwithstanding this finding, we are of opinion that the trader has committed an act of bankruptcy. It is contended for the plaintiff, the judgment creditor, who sues the defendant, the assignee of the bankrupt, for the value of the property seized, of which he had possessed himself, that although in general the assignment of all the estate and effects of a trader is an act of bankruptcy, yet it is not so where the debtor takes what has been called an equivalent; and Bittleston v. Cooke (6 E. & B. 311; 25 L. J. Q.B. 289) and other cases shew that where, besides the assignment of the estate, the debtor obtains a further advance of money, this advance may be deemed an equivalent. In this case, however, there is no such equivalent, and, as far as we can see, no equivalent at all. The debtor had the choice of allowing the judgment creditor to sell the property seized, and so, by means of the proceeds, satisfy the judgment debt, or of executing this mortgage, by which he assigns and transfers the estate and effects, instead of the proceeds upon the sale, to the judgment creditor. By adopting this latter course, he divests himself of the whole of his property, and leaves not a single shilling to be applied in satisfaction of the claims of any one of his creditors. He, in fact, makes over the whole of his property to the one favoured creditor who has obtained the judgment, leaving nothing whatever for his other creditors. If he had allowed the law to take its course, and the judgment creditor to sell the property which he had seized, any other creditor might, under the 73rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, have treated the seizure and sale as an act of bankruptcy, and, by obtaining an adjudication within a fortnight, would have enabled the creditors, through the assignee in bankruptcy, to recover the money, the proceeds of the sale, from the judgment creditor, and apply it to the use and benefit of the creditors at large.

(1) By the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 73,) If any execution shall be levied by seizure and sale of any of the goods and chattels of any trader debtor, upon any judgment recovered in any action personal, for the recovery of any debt or money demand exceeding 50*l.*, every such debtor shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the date of the seizure of such goods and chattels; and unless in the meantime a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor be presented the sheriff shall proceed with the execution, and shall at the end of seven days after the sale pay over the proceeds to the execution creditor, who shall be entitled thereto, notwithstanding such act of bankruptcy, unless the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt within fourteen days from the day of the sale, in which case the money so received by the creditor shall be paid by him to the assignees under the bankruptcy.

(2) Kelly, C.B., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Byles, J. and Montague Smith, J.

In the state of the law before this statute, when the seizure and sale under an execution were not an act of bankruptcy, and the execution creditor was entitled to the proceeds upon the sale, it may have been indifferent, as between the execution creditor and the other creditors, whether the goods were sold under the execution or transferred by bill of sale to the execution creditor. But, in the altered state of the law, this is no longer so; and the plaintiff in this case clearly obtains, by means of the bill of sale, as between himself and the other creditors, payment of his whole debt, and takes away all the property of the bankrupt, which, if he had proceeded with the execution, would have been distributable among the general creditors under a bankruptcy. In Bittleston v. Cooke (6 E. & B. 311; 25 L. J. Q.B. 289), one of the cases referred to, it is observed, by Crompton, J., that "the old cases clearly establish the rule that the conveyance of a trader's property, leaving it no longer in his option whether he would continue his trade, was in law an act of bankruptcy as necessarily defeating his creditors." On this an exception has been grafted, "that the conveyance is not an act of bankruptcy if it be for an equivalent." In this case not only, as already observed, is there no new advance to constitute an equivalent, but there is no conceivable benefit whatever accruing to the creditors. It is said that the mortgage, by leaving the debtor in possession of his house and property, might enable him to carry on his business and retrieve his affairs. But here the debtor had ceased to trade two months before, and the saving of expense and the avoiding the sacrifice of property by a forced sale, which seem to have induced the jury to treat the mortgage as bonâ fide, were a benefit only to the judgment creditor, the mortgage, whatever might ultimately be the produce of the property, leaving absolutely nothing for the other creditors. If a transaction of this nature could be protected against the operation of the Bankrupt Laws, every debtor might at any time, by suffering a judgment and execution, and then assigning the property seized to the judgment creditor, convey away the whole of his estate to this one favoured creditor, defrauding every other creditor of the whole amount of his debt—the very evil which the 73rd section of the Bankrupt Act was enacted to prevent. We are, therefore, of opinion that the assignee is entitled to this property, and that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Bill of Exchange—Acceptor charged in Execution by Holder after Payment by Indorser—Indorser's Remedy over against Acceptor.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. I.—The drawer or indorser of a dishonoured bill of exchange becomes entitled, by paying the amount of it to the holder, to an immediate right of action against the acceptor, although the holder continues to retain the bill as security for costs; and the right of such drawer or indorser to sue the acceptor is not affected by the circumstance that the holder, after receiving the amount and before payment of his costs, has charged the acceptor in execution for the amount of the bill and then released him from custody.

The holder of a dishonoured bill of exchange brought actions against the acceptor and an indorser. On March 3 he recovered judgment against the acceptor. On March 21 the indorser paid to the holder the amount of the bill. The bill was kept by the holder till his costs were paid on April 13, when he handed it to the indorser, who transferred it to the plaintiffs. On March 29 the holder had charged the acceptor in execution on his judgment, but on the same day discharged him from custody:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to sue the acceptor notwithstanding his arrest and discharge from custody, as the right of action of the indorser, under whom they claimed, became vested as soon as he paid the amount of the bill on the 21st, and that the holder had after that day only a lien on the bill for his costs, and could not by his voluntary act in discharging the acceptor from custody, defeat the remedy over of the indorser.

Declaration against the defendant as acceptor of a bill of exchange for 300*l.*, drawn by Messrs. Cresswell & Sons, indorsed by them to H. W. Cresswell, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs; with the common counts for money paid, for interest and for money due upon accounts stated.

Plea—That when the bill became due the Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Co., Lim., were holders of it, who thereupon impleaded the defendant as the acceptor of the bill in an action for the recovery of the amount, in which action they recovered judgment against him for the amount of the bill, and all damages sustained by the Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Co., Lim., by reason of the non-payment thereof, together with their costs of suit; and afterwards the company issued a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum upon the judgment in the usual form, and duly indorsed to levy the debt, damages and costs against the now defendant, directed to the Sheriff of Middlesex, under which writ the now defendant was arrested by and detained in the custody of the sheriff until he was released and discharged therefrom by the company; and afterwards and after such release and discharge the company transferred the bill to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs took and received the same with notice of the premises. Second plea, to the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

Replication—First, a joinder in issue. Secondly, that after the bill had been indorsed to H. W. Cresswell, the banking company in the plea mentioned became the holders of the bill as transferees and indorsees of and from H. W. Cresswell, and that upon the maturity and dishonour of the bill H. W. Cresswell was liable to pay the amount of it to the bank as such holders thereof, by reason of his having indorsed the same in blank and transferred it to the banking company; and before the banking company recovered judgment and issued the writ of execution against the defendant as in the plea mentioned, H. W. Cresswell had been compelled by proceedings duly taken by and at the suit of the banking company to pay, and had paid to the company, the amount of the bill, and had taken up the same, and thenceforth became and was the lawful holder of the bill until he afterwards indorsed the same for valuable consideration to the plaintiffs as in the declaration mentioned; and the plaintiffs thenceforth became and were the bonâ fide holders of the bill for value, and the defendant did not at any time pay or discharge the amount of the bill or any part thereof to the banking company, or to any other person whatever.

Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Keating, J., at the Gloucester Summer Assizes, 1866, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 300*l.* damages, and 40*s.* costs of suit, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

The bill of exchange upon which the action was brought was a bill for 300*l.*, dated August 7, 1865, payable to drawer's own order four months after date, and drawn by Edward Cresswell & Sons upon, and accepted by, George Pell, the defendant. This bill was duly indorsed by Edward Cresswell & Sons, the drawers, to Henry William Cresswell, who indorsed it in blank and handed it to J. C. Hodges, who indorsed it to his bankers, the Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Co., who held the bill as such indorsees at maturity. The bank commenced three actions upon it, against the defendant, the acceptor, against E. Cresswell & Sons, the drawers, and against H. W. Cresswell, the indorser. In an action by the bank against H. W. Cresswell, the writ was issued on January 15, 1866. On March 13, 1866, H. W. Cresswell, for the purpose of taking up the bill, handed over to J. C. Hodges securities for an amount equal to that of the bill, and out of the proceeds of those securities, and on behalf of H. W. Cresswell, Hodges paid, on March 21, 1866, the amount due on the bill to the Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Co.; whereupon, on April 3, an order was made to stay proceedings on payment of costs. The bill remained in the hands of the bank until the costs were taxed and paid. The costs were taxed at 21*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, and that sum was, on April 13, 1866, paid to the bank by the plaintiffs, as solicitors for and on behalf of H. W. Cresswell, and on the same day the bill was delivered over to the plaintiffs as such solicitors. Two or three days afterwards, and before May 31, 1866, the plaintiffs, to whom H. W. Cresswell was indebted for costs in an amount larger than that of the bill, applied to him for money on account, and he transferred to them the bill in question (which had already been indorsed in blank by him as aforesaid) in part payment of their claim against him; but there was no further or other indorsement of the bill to the plaintiffs. In the action by the bank against the defendant, the acceptor, the writ was issued on December 29, 1865. Judgment was signed on March 3, 1866; and on March 6 the bank lodged a ca. sa. against defendant, on the judgment, with the sheriff of Middlesex, indorsed to satisfy 310*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*, being the amount due on the bill and costs, and 1*l.* 5*s.* costs of execution. On March 29, the defendant, having been arrested in another suit, was informed by the sheriff's officer that he held this ca. sa. The sheriff's officer communicated then with the bank, and received an order to detain the defendant under their execution, which he did accordingly, and subsequently, about four hours afterwards, the following order:

"March 29.

"Metropolitan Provincial Bank v. Pell.—Discharge the defendant as to this action on payment of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* and your fees."

This payment was made, and thereupon the defendant was released. No receipt was given by the sheriff for the payment made to him by the defendant; but on April 12, when the sheriff paid over to the bank the before-mentioned sum of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*, the following receipt was given:

"In the Exchequer of Pleas.—The Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Co. v. Geo. Pell.—Received, April 12, 1866, of Mr. Bunn, officer to the sheriff of Middlesex, the sum of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* in discharge of debt and costs herein.

"For Davidson, Carr & Bannister, plaintiff's attorneys,

"JAMES HOLDITCH.

"9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* 12/14/66."

This sum of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* was the amount of taxed costs due to the bank in their action against the defendant Pell. No further or other payment was at any time made by the defendant Pell in respect of the bill. The plaintiffs, on May 31, 1866, and after the bill had been transferred to them by H. W. Cresswell in manner aforesaid, commenced the present action.

It is agreed between the parties that the pleadings in the action on both sides shall form part of the case; also, that the Court shall be at liberty to draw any inferences of fact which, in the opinion of the Court, a jury ought to have drawn, and to make any amendments in the pleadings which the Judge before whom the cause was tried ought to have made.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, upon the facts stated, the defendants remained liable to pay the amount of the bill to the plaintiffs. If the Court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then the verdict is to be entered for the plaintiffs as aforesaid; but if the Court shall be of a contrary opinion, then a nonsuit is to be entered.

H. Matthews, for the plaintiff.—This case involves the question, which does not seem ever to have arisen before, whether the acceptor of a bill, who has been taken into custody for the amount, is liable to an action at the suit of a subsequent transferee of the bill. Admitting that a discharge of the acceptor from custody would release the other parties to the bill, it does not follow that his discharge is to deprive them of their remedy over against him. The indorser fills a double character: as regards the holder he is a surety, but as between himself and the prior parties to the bill he is a principal. It would, therefore, be extremely hard if the right which Cresswell, as indorser, had previously acquired should be taken away by a subsequent discharge of the acceptor, who, as regards Cresswell, is only a surety.

[HAYES, J.—How could the bank discharge a debt which was no longer due to them? It had been previously paid by Cresswell.]

The case of Thompson v. Parish (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 685; 28 L. J. C.P. 153) shews that, to discharge a debtor from custody is not to extinguish the debt to all intents and purposes. And although it would seem from Daglash v. Darley (2 B. & P. 61) that to discharge the acceptor from custody is to release the indorsees, this cannot apply to the present case where it is evident from the dates, that the right of Cresswell had accrued before the discharge of the defendant.

[LUSH, J.—When Cresswell paid the amount of the bill, did not the bank hold their judgment against the defendant as trustees for Cresswell?]

The money paid by Cresswell was money paid to the use of the acceptor, and he was entitled to have the judgment assigned to him, so as to continue the defendant in custody.—He cited Tarlton v. Allhusen (2 Ad. & E. 32; 4 L. J. K.B. 17); Callow v. Lawrence (3 M. & S. 97); and Byles on Bills, 8th edit.

A. S. Hill, for the defendant.—The defendant contends that, having been once arrested for the amount of the bill and then discharged from custody, he cannot be sued by any other party to the bill. His liability on the bill ceased when he incurred the liability of a judgment and execution. By reference to the dates, it will be seen that it was not until after the defendant had been discharged from custody that Cresswell became entitled to the bill. The absence of authority on this subject is an argument in the defendant's favour, as the same circumstances must often have arisen before. But the case of Jacques v. Withy (1 Term Rep. 557) shews that a judgment is extinguished for all purposes by discharging the debtor.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. It appears that the Metropolitan and Provincial Banking Company were the holders of this bill, and brought three actions upon it: one against the defendant, the acceptor; the second against the drawers, and the third against an indorser. In the action against the acceptor, they obtained judgment on March 3, 1866. They issued a writ of ca. sa. and lodged it with the sheriff on March 6. On March 21, before the defendant was charged in execution under this writ, Cresswell, the indorser of the bill, who had also been sued by the bank, paid over to the bank the amount of the bill. If Cresswell had paid the costs due to the bank, he would have been entitled to have the bill handed over to him, and on March 21 he would have been entitled to sue the defendant upon the bill. The defendant was charged in execution on March 29, and if Cresswell had paid all that was due on March 21 he would have been entitled to have the judgment obtained against the defendant assigned to him, and to proceed upon it, as the bank had not then discharged the acceptor from their custody. Cresswell's right of action was, therefore, vested on March 21. On March 29 the defendant was charged in execution, and it would be monstrous if his discharge from execution by the bank were to bar the remedy over against him. The result would be, as my Brother Hayes has said, that the voluntary act of a stranger would discharge the remedy over of the surety. We cannot hold that this is the case when we see that, if Cresswell had paid the debt and costs on March 21, there would have been no answer to this action. In my opinion, the whole effect of the non-payment of the costs was, that the bank had a lien on the bill until they were paid, so that it was just the same, as far as Cresswell's rights against the acceptor were concerned, as if he had paid them on the 21st. The surety's right of action had vested on that day, and could not be affected by any execution issued against the principal afterwards. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

HANNEN, J., and HAYES, J., concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Libel — Privileged Publication — Parliamentary Debates — Articles commenting upon Parliamentary Debates.

LIBEL AND SLANDER. E.—The publication of a faithful report of a debate in either House of Parliament is privileged, so that the publisher is not responsible for defamatory statements made in the course of the debate so reported and published; and the publication of articles fairly commenting upon the debate so reported and published is equally privileged.

A full and faithful report of a debate in the House of Lords was published in a newspaper. In the course of this debate the conduct and character of the plaintiff was attacked with great severity. An article was also published in the newspaper, commenting upon the charges made against the plaintiff in the course of the debate, and treating them as well founded:—Held, that the publication of the charges made against the plaintiff during the debate was privileged, and that the article, assuming it to be a fair comment upon these charges, was also privileged.

The first count of the declaration stated that, before the committing of the grievances thereinafter mentioned, Earl Russell, had, at the request of the plaintiff, presented to the House of Lords a certain petition in writing of the plaintiff, praying that a Committee of the House of Lords might be appointed to investigate certain charges made by the plaintiff in the petition against Sir FitzRoy Kelly; and thereupon the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published in a certain newspaper called the Times, in the form of a debate in the House of Lords, the words following. [The declaration then set out a report of a debate in the House of Lords, headed, "Parliamentary Intelligence. House of Lords. Tuesday, February 12." The debate was commenced by Earl Russell, who presented a petition from the plaintiff, Mr. Rigby Wason, against Sir FitzRoy Kelly, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, praying that their Lordships would appoint a Committee to investigate the charges made in the petition, and if they found those charges to be proved, then to concur with the other House of Parliament in praying that Sir FitzRoy Kelly might be removed from his judicial position. The petition contained charges of falsehood and deceit against Sir FitzRoy Kelly, to which it is unnecessary to allude at length. Lord Russell, in presenting this petition, stated the grounds for his belief that the charges in it were altogether unfounded; and the Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford), Lord St. Leonards and Lord Derby, who took part in the debate, attacked the conduct of the plaintiff in presenting the petition in terms of great severity, the Lord Chancellor charging him with falsehood, cowardice and rancorous malice.]

The second count charged the plaintiff with falsely and maliciously printing and publishing of the plaintiff, in a newspaper called the Times, the words following. [The count set out at length a leading article published in the Times newspaper on the morning after the debate, commenting upon the petition and the discussion which had taken place upon it, and treating the charges as false and malignant.]

Plea, not guilty, and issue thereon.

At the trial, before Cockburn, C.J., at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1867, the publication of the report of the debate and of the leading article in the Times newspaper was proved. The counsel for the defendant called the reporters of the newspaper to prove the accuracy of the report.

The Chief Justice then summed up the case to the jury, and directed them that, if they thought that the report of the debate was honest, bonâ fide and truthful, it was a privileged publication, and one which was not the subject of a civil action, and their verdict on the first count must be for the defendant. That the same principle which had been held to apply to the publication of proceedings in a court of justice appeared to his Lordship to apply with equal, if not with greater, force to the Houses of Parliament. With reference to the second count, the Chief Justice directed the jury that the debate and the charges which led to it were matters of public concern, upon which a public writer was justified in making such comments as the circumstances warranted, and which a jury should be of opinion were fair and reasonable with reference to the subject-matter of the discussion; and that the jury would have to say whether the article was, in their judgment, an unfair comment, one which could be ascribed to malicious and sinister motives, or only a fair comment which a public writer, exercising his privilege in discussing a matter of public concern, might fairly indulge in.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant on all the counts.

T. Jones had obtained, in Hilary Term, 1868, a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had between the parties for misdirection by the learned Lord Chief Justice, first, in directing the jury that the publication of the libel charged in the first count was privileged, if they should find the libel to be a true and faithful report of the debate in the House of Lords; secondly, in directing the jury to find their verdict for the defendant, if they thought that the comments contained in the libel charged in the second count, on the conduct of the plaintiff in presenting the petition to the House of Lords, and on the debate in the House of Lords, were fair comments and within the limits of fair criticism.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Karslake), J. D. Coleridge and C. W. Wood, shewed cause.—The direction of the Chief Justice was on both points correct, and the verdict ought not to be disturbed. The main question, whether the publication of a fair report of a parliamentary debate is privileged is not settled by any express decision, but strong opinions have been expressed in favour of deciding it in the affirmative. It will be remembered that the jury have found that the reports were fair and accurate, and that the debate was brought about by the plaintiff's own act in presenting his petition. The defendant has published the whole of this debate, and the Court will say whether he is liable to an action for libel. Although the subject is without any express authority there are cases in which the point before the Court appears to have been discussed. The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293) is the first. It was an application for a criminal information against a bookseller for publishing a libel on Horne Tooke. This libel was alleged to be contained in a report by the Committee of Secrecy of the House of Commons, a literal copy of which had been published by the defendant. The Court refused the information, Lord Kenyon saying that it was impossible to admit that a proceeding in either House of Parliament was a libel; and Lawrence, J., said, "The proceedings of Courts of Justice are daily published, some of which highly reflect on individuals, but I do not know that an information was ever granted against the publishers of them"; and the learned Judge goes on to refer to an action brought some years before by one Currie against Walter, proprietor of the Times, for publishing a libel in the paper called the Times, which supposed libel consisted in merely stating a speech made by a counsel in Court on a motion for leave to file a criminal information against Currie. Eyre, C.J., who tried the cause, ruled that this was not a libel nor the subject of an action, it being a true account of what had passed in Court; and in this opinion the Court of Common Pleas afterwards, on motion for a new trial, concurred. He proceeds—"Though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of Courts of Justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public more than counterbalances the inconveniences to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings. The same reasons also apply to the proceedings in parliament. It is of advantage to the public, and even to the legislative bodies, that true accounts of their proceedings should be generally circulated; and they would be deprived of that advantage if no person could publish their proceedings without being punished as a libeller. Though, therefore, the defendant was not authorized by the House of Commons to publish the report in question, yet, as he only published a true copy of it, I am of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged." It is true that in The King v. Creevey (1 M. & S. 273), where the defendant, a member of the House of Commons, was indicted and found guilty of a libel contained in a report of a speech delivered by the defendant in the house, and which he had caused to be published in a newspaper, the Court refused a new trial, and held that the publication was not privileged. But the question of privilege did not properly arise in that case, and it cannot be considered to have overruled The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293). There is all the difference in the world between the publication of a single speech and the report of the whole of a debate.

[LUSH, J.—It is just as if any one were to publish only the evidence in favour of one party at a trial.]

In The King v. Abingdon (1 Esp. 225) an information against Lord Abingdon for publishing in the newspapers a speech which he had delivered in the House of Lords, charging an attorney with unprofessional conduct, Lord Kenyon held that there was no privilege; but there also, not only was there no report of the whole debate, but only of part of the speech. The important decision of Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), where this Court held that a resolution of the House of Commons directing a report made to the House to be printed and published, did not protect the defendant, who had published the report, from the consequences of a libel which was contained in it, cannot be relied on by the plaintiff, as the report of a committee ordered by the House to be printed does not stand on the same footing as the report of a debate. The decision there was only on demurrer, and the question was simply whether the resolution justified the publication of the report.

[LUSH, J.—It was assumed that, apart from the resolution, there was no defence to the action.]

The judgment of Lord Denman (9 Ad. & E. 114; 8 L. J. Q.B. 296), where he says, that if calumnious speeches made in parliament were reported and published, the law would attach responsibility to the publisher, may be explained as relating to the publication of single speeches, as in The King v. Creevey (1 M. & S. 273) and The King v. Abingdon (1 Esp. 225). In Davidson v. Duncan (7 El. & B. 229; 26 L. J. Q.B. 104), where the question was as to the privilege attending the publication of the proceedings in a Court of Justice, Lord Campbell assigns as a reason for this privilege the public benefit from the publicity of the proceedings. His Lordship says, that the "balance of public benefit from the publicity is great. It is of great consequence that the public should know what took place in Court, and the proceedings are under the control of the Judges. The inconvenience, therefore, arising from the chance of the injury to private character is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity." If benefit to the public is to be assigned as a reason for conferring a privilege on the publication of any proceedings, no one can deny that the benefit to the public from the publication of full reports of parliamentary debates is great. In former times there were questions as to whether the publication of debates was not a breach of the privileges of the House, but at the present day every facility is given to enable the newspapers to prepare accurate reports of the debates, and a gallery is set apart for the use of the reporters. With regard to the question raised by the second count, it is for the Court to say whether the debate was so far a matter of public interest as that a fair comment upon it is privileged. The verdict of the jury negatives any improper motive on the part of the defendant; and the case of Campbell v. Spottiswoode (3 Best & S. 769; per Cockburn, C.J., 777; 32 L. J. Q.B. 185, 192) is abundant authority for holding that the proceedings of parliament are matters which a newspaper is at liberty to discuss. They also cited Stockdale v. Hansard (2 Moo. & R. 12); Lewis v. Levy (9 L. J. Q.B. 282; El. B. & El. 557); Turnbull v. Bird (2 Fost. & F. 508); and Lake v. King (1 Saund. 131 b).

T. Jones and R. E. Turner, in support of the rule.—It has never been decided that the report in a newspaper of what passes in parliament is privileged, but, on the contrary, it has always been assumed that no such privilege exists. In Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294) it is assumed that there would be no defence to an action like the present. The judgment of Littledale, J. (9 Ad. & E. 181; 8 L. J. Q.B. 316) establishes this proposition. The learned Judge said, "It is said that it is proper that the members of the House should have the right to send copies of all the parliamentary papers to their constituents to justify themselves in case their constituents should find any fault with their conduct in parliament. If the member whose conduct is blamed by his constituents wishes to vindicate his conduct, he may send what parliamentary papers he pleases, provided they do not contain any matter criminatory of individuals; but I think it can never be considered as justifiable to publish defamatory matter of other persons to justify his own conduct in parliament. As to the general information to be given to the public of all that is going on in parliament, I cannot conceive upon what ground that can be necessary. I do not consider as a matter of right that the public should know all that is going on in parliament. But as to the right of communicating the proceedings in parliament to the public, if it be meant to communicate any papers which contain matters defamatory as they think proper, that is a matter which, in my judgment, can only be done by an act of the legislature. And I do not think that the communicating defamatory papers to the public can be justified as a matter of necessity, or as reasonable to be done." And the learned Judge adds (9 Ad. & E. 182; 8 L J. Q.B. 316), "Then it is said that, though the defaming a man's character be an evil, yet it is an evil of small magnitude compared with the advantages that may result from the publication of defamatory papers. The advantages are altogether undefined and uncertain, and cannot, as a matter of law, be set off against the positive injury arising to a man from his character being defamed. But if such a principle of law could be admitted, it would be necessary to shew what was the advantage to be derived from such a publication."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Though I concur in the decision in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), I cannot agree with that learned Judge, that it is not of material importance for the public to know what passes in parliament.]

In the judgment of Patteson, J., that learned Judge says (9 Ad. & E. 211; 32 L. J. Q.B. 324), "But it is said that the constituents have a right to watch over the conduct of their representative, and therefore to know what passes in the House. The House itself is of a different opinion; for it is only by sufferance that any one is allowed to be present at its debates; it is only by sufferance that the debates are allowed to be published; and it is only by special permission of the House that its votes, proceedings and papers are communicated to the public, and that in the manner in which they think fit to order. If the constituents had a right to know all that passes, or if the House of Commons were an open Court, then, indeed, there might be some colour for saying that it was necessary to publish all its proceedings. It is upon the ground that Courts of Justice are open to the public that what passes there is public at the time, and that it is important that all persons should be able to scrutinize what is there done, that the publication of everything which there passes has been thought to be lawful. I for one do not go that length, but think, with some Judges of great name who have gone before me, that the doctrine is to be taken with much limitation; but I feel sure that it cannot apply to a Court which is not open, whose proceedings in contemplation of law are secret at the time they take place, and to whom ex parte statements, often grossly defamatory, are made without the defamed persons having any opportunity of being heard, and, indeed, often without the possibility of any inquiry being instituted."

[LUSH, J.—Do you contend that if there had been a debate on the subject of this report Hansard would have been liable to an action if he had reported it?]

Yes, if defamatory words had been spoken during the debate. In the discussions before parliament upon different bills by which it has been sought to amend the law of libel, it has always been assumed that no such privilege as that which is now claimed existed. This will be found by reference to the debates in Hansard[1]. With regard to the leading article, which is the subject of the

(1) Hansard, vol. 70, p. 1252, House of Lords, July 18, 1843. In Committee on the Libel and Defamation Bill: "On clause 7. permitting reports of proceedings in Courts of justice and in the two Houses of Parliament to be published, Lord Campbell said, that this was a most important clause. It was founded upon the tenth proposition of the recommendations of the Committee on the Law of Libel: 'That no action, indictment or information shall be maintainable for a faithful report of any proceedings of Courts of justice, or before magistrates acting in the discharge of their duty, or of any proceedings in either House of Parliament at which strangers have been permitted to be present, provided that such proceedings are not of such a nature that a report thereof would be contrary to good manners.'" Lord Brougham said (p. 1255), "The Courts never held, on the contrary, the rule was the other way, that any indemnity whatever should be given to the publisher for printing everything that was said in parliament." The clause was rejected.—Hansard, vol. 149, p. 947-8. Libel Bill. Second reading. Lord Campbell said, "In the discharge of his duty he had last session moved for a select committee to consider whether the same immunity might not be given to reports of the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament which were now given to reports of the proceedings in Courts of justice. . . . . He could not understand on what ground a difference should be made between the reports of the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament and second count, the writer might have ascertained, if he had carefully read the report of the debate, that certain of the charges against the plaintiff were founded on error.

[HANNEN, J.—The jury have found that the comments are fair.]

There was no evidence for the jury.

[LUSH, J.—Under Fox's Libel Act the jury were entitled to decide the question.]

The jury should have been directed to find for the plaintiff.—[They cited Davidson v. Duncan (7 El. & B. 229; 26 L. J. Q.B. 104), per Wightman, J., and Lewis v. Clement (3 B. & Ald. 702).]

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[2] was delivered on Nov. 25 by—

COCKBURN, C.J.—This case was argued a few days since, before my Brothers Lush, Hannen and Hayes, and myself, and we took time, not to consider what our judgment should be, because as to that our minds were made up at the close of the argument, but because, owing to the importance and novelty of the point involved, we thought it desirable that our judgment should be reduced to writing before it was delivered. The main question for our decision is whether a faithful report in a public newspaper of a debate in either House of Parliament, containing matter disparaging to the character of an individual as having been spoken in the course of the debate, is actionable at the suit of the party whose character has thus been called in question. We are of opinion that it is not. Important as the question is, it comes now for the first time before a Court of law for decision. Numerous as are the instances in which the conduct and character of individuals have been called in question in parliament during the many years that parliamentary debates have been reported in the public journals, this is the first instance in which an action of libel founded on a report of a parliamentary debate has come before a Court of law. There is, therefore, a total absence of direct authority to guide us. There are indeed dicta of learned Judges having reference to the point in question, but they are conflicting and inconclusive, and having been unnecessary to the decision of the cases in which they were pronounced, may be said to be extrajudicial. In the case of The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293), Mr. Justice Lawrence placed the reports of parliamentary debates on the same footing with respect to privilege as is accorded to reports of proceedings in Courts of justice, and expressed an opinion that the former were as much entitled to protection as the latter. But it is to be observed that in that case the question related to the publication by the defendant of a copy of a report of a committee of the House of Commons, which report the House had ordered to be printed, not to the publication of a debate unauthorized by the House. Again, in Davidson v. Duncan (7 El. & B. 232; 26 L. J. Q.B. 107), Mr. Justice Wightman seems disposed to treat the reports of proceedings in Parliament as entitled to the same privilege as reports of proceedings in Courts of Justice. But here, again, the question before the Court had reference to the report, not of a proceeding in Parliament but of the reports of Courts of justice. His bill, he should add, proposed to restrict the immunity to reports of proceedings within the Houses at which strangers should have been permitted to be present, and not when they were sitting foribus clausis." Lord Wensleydale said (p. 969), "The bill raised the question whether newspaper proprietors should be permitted to publish with impunity speeches vilifying the character of individuals, on the ground that those speeches had been made in parliament. That certainly ought not to justify the publication of slander. Among several witnesses examined before the Select Committee was the solicitor to the Times, who stated that the proprietors thereof had been sued for having printed a speech made by Dr. Lushington in the House of Commons, and had to pay the costs of the action brought against them by the party who considered himself aggrieved by the report of the speech. He appealed to their Lordships whether they did not expect that their proceedings should be reported carefully in the public journals; and if so, whether publishers of papers should be exposed to any risk in that course? No doubt a member of parliament attempting to abuse the privileges of parliament, for the purposes of slander, was the worst of slanderers, and he certainly should endeavour to secure the public against such a gross abuse."

proceedings at a public meeting of Improvement Commissioners of a particular locality in which the conduct of an individual had been assailed, and which report the Court held not to be privileged, without being in any way called upon to determine how far the privilege would have extended to a report of proceedings in Parliament. On the other hand, in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), Mr. Justice Littledale and Mr. Justice Patteson use language from which it may be safely inferred that they would have deemed the report of a parliamentary debate if containing an attack on character as not entitled to be held privileged in an action for libel. But here again the question was not how far the publication of parliamentary debates was privileged, but solely whether an order of the House of Commons directing a paper forming no part of the proceedings of the House, and containing libellous matter, to be printed and sold to the public, and a resolution of the House that such an order was within its privileges, protected the publisher of the paper from an action of libel. Any opinion expressed on the subject of the report of parliamentary debates was therefore beyond the scope of the inquiry, and must be considered as more or less extra judicial.

Several cases were cited in the course of the argument before us, but they turned for the most part on the question of parliamentary privilege, and therefore appear to us very wide of the present question. The case of The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293) approaches nearest to the one before us. In that case a committee of the House of Commons having made a report imputing to Horne Tooke seditious and revolutionary designs after his acquittal on a trial for high treason, and the House having ordered the report to be printed for the use of its members, the defendant, a bookseller and publisher, printed and published copies of the report. On an application for a criminal information, the Court refused the rule, apparently on the ground that the report of a committee of the House of Commons, approved of by the House, being part of the proceedings of Parliament, could not possibly be libellous. Lord Kenyon, C.J., says (p. 296), "This report was first made by a committee of the House of Commons, then approved by the House at large, and then communicated to the other House, and it is now sub judice; and yet it is said that this is a libel on the prosecutor. It is impossible for us to admit that the proceeding of either of the Houses of Parliament is a libel, and yet that is to be taken as the foundation of this application." Lord Kenyon and his colleagues appear to have thought that a paper, though containing matter reflecting on the character of an individual, if it formed part of the proceedings of the House of Commons, would be so divested of all libellous character as that a party publishing it, even without the authority of the House, would not be responsible at law for the defamatory matter it contained. If this doctrine could be upheld, it would have a manifold bearing on the present question, for as no speech made by a member of either House, however strongly it may assail the conduct or character of others, can be held to be libellous, it would follow, such a speech being a parliamentary proceeding, that the publication of it would not be actionable. But this is directly contrary to the decision in The King v. Lord Abingdon (1 Esp. 225) and The King v. Creevey (1 M. & S. 273), in which the publication of speeches made in parliament reflecting on the character of individuals was held to be actionable; and it must be admitted that the authority of the case of The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293) is much shaken, not only by the decision in The King v. Creevey (1 M. & S. 273), but also by the observations made by Lord Ellenborough in his judgment in the latter case. Beyond, however, impugning the authority of The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293), the two last-mentioned cases afford little assistance towards the solution of the present question. There is obviously a very material difference between the publication of a speech made in parliament for the express purpose of attacking the conduct or character of a person, and afterwards published with a like purpose or effect, and the faithful publication of parliamentary debates in their entirety with a view to afford information to the public, and with a total absence of hostile intention or malicious motive towards any one. The case of Lake v.

King (1 Saund. 131 b), which was cited in the argument before us, has no application to the present case. There a petition having been presented to the House of Commons by the defendant impugning the conduct of the plaintiff, copies of the petition had been printed and circulated among the members of the House, and it was held that the printing and circulating petitions, being according to the course and usage of parliament, no action would lie. The case of Stockdale v. Hansard[1], which was much pressed upon us by the counsel for the defendant, is in like manner altogether beside the question. In that case a report from the Inspectors of Prisoners relative to the gaol of Newgate, in which a work published by the plaintiff, a bookseller, and which had been permitted to be introduced into the prison, had been described as "of a most disgusting nature," and as containing "plates obscene and indecent in the extreme," had been presented to the House in conformity with the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 38. In another report, being a reply to a report of the Court of Aldermen on the same subject, the inspectors had reiterated their charges as to the character of the book, adding that it had been described by medical booksellers to whom they (the inspectors) had applied for information as to its character, as "one of Stockdale's obscene books." These papers the House had ordered to be printed, not only for the use of the members, but also, in conformity with a modern practice, for public sale, the proceeds to be applied to the general expenses of printing by the House. An action of libel having been brought by Stockdale against the defendants, the printers of the House of Commons, for publishing these papers, the defence as raised by the plea which this Court had to consider was, first, that the papers in question had been published by order of the House of Commons; secondly, that the House having resolved (as it had done), with a view to such an action, that the power of publishing such of its reports, votes, and proceedings as it should be deemed necessary was an essential incident to the functions of parliament, the question became one of privilege, as to which the decision of the House was conclusive, and could not be questioned in a Court of law.

From the doctrines involved in this defence, namely, that the House of Commons could, by their order, authorize the violation of private rights, and by declaring the power thus exercised to be matter of privilege, preclude a Court of law from inquiring into the existence of the privilege,—doctrines which would have placed the rights and privileges of the subject at the mercy of a single branch of the legislature,—Lord Denman and his colleagues, in a series of masterly judgments which will secure to the Judges who pronounced them admiration and reverence so long as the law of England and a regard for the rights and liberties of the subject shall endure, vindicated at once the majesty of the law and the rights which it is the purpose of the law to uphold. To the decision of this Court in that memorable case we give our unhesitating and unqualified adhesion. But the decision in that case has no application to the present. The position that an order of the House of Commons cannot render lawful that which is contrary to law, still less that a resolution of the House can supersede the jurisdiction of a Court of law by clothing an unwarranted exercise of power with the garb of privilege, can have no application where the question is, not whether the act complained of, being unlawful at law, is rendered lawful by the order of the House, or protected by the assertion of its privilege, but is, independently of such order or assertion of privilege, in itself privileged and lawful.

Decided cases thus leaving us without authority on which to proceed in the present instance, we must have recourse to principle in order to arrive at a solution of the question before us. And fortunately we have not far to seek before we find principles in our opinion applicable to the case, and which will afford a safe and sure foundation for our judgment.

It is now well established that faithful and fair reports of the proceedings of Courts of justice, though the character of individuals may incidentally suffer, are privileged, and that for the publication of such reports the publishers are neither criminally nor civilly responsible. The immunity thus afforded in respect of the publication of the proceedings of Courts of justice rests upon a twofold ground. In the English law of libel malice is said to be the gist of an action for defamation. And though it is true that by malice, as necessary to give a cause of action in respect of a defamatory statement, legal and not actual malice is meant; while by legal malice, as is explained by Mr. Justice Bayley in Bromage v. Prosser (4 B. & C. 247, 255), is meant no more than the wrongful intention which the law always presumes as accompanying a wrongful act, without any proof of malice in fact, yet the presumption of law may be rebutted by the circumstances under which the defamatory matter has been uttered or published; and if this should be the case, though the character of the party concerned may have suffered, no right of action will arise. "The rule," says Lord Campbell, in the case of Taylor v. Hawkins (16 Q.B. 308; 20 L. J. Q.B. 313), "is, that if the occasion be such as repels the presumption of malice, the communication is privileged, and the plaintiff must then, if he can, give evidence of actual malice."

It is thus that, in the case of reports of the proceedings of Courts of justice, though individuals may occasionally suffer from them, yet, as they are published without any reference to the individuals concerned, but solely to afford information to the public and for the benefit of society, the presumption of malice is rebutted, and such publications are held to be privileged. The other and the broader principle on which this exception to the general law of libel is founded is, that the advantage to the community from publicity being given to the proceedings of Courts of justice is so great that the occasional inconvenience to individuals arising from it must yield to the general good. It is true that, with a view to distinguish the publication of proceedings in Parliament from that of those of Courts of justice, it has been said that the immunity accorded to the reports of the proceedings of Courts of justice is grounded on the fact of the Courts being open to the public, while the Houses of Parliament are not; as also that, by the publication of the proceedings of the Courts, the people obtain a knowledge of the law by which their dealings and conduct are to be regulated. But, in our opinion, the true ground is that given by Lawrence, J., in The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293), namely, that though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast advantage to the public that the proceedings of Courts of justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public more than counterbalances the inconvenience to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings. In Davidson v. Duncan (7 El. & B. 232; 26 L. J. Q.B. 107) Lord Campbell says: "A fair account of what takes place in a Court of justice is privileged. The reason is, that the balance of public benefit from the publicity is great. It is of great consequence that the public should know what takes place in Court, and the proceedings are under the control of the Judges. The inconvenience, therefore, arising from the chance of injury to private character is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity." And Mr. Justice Wightman says: "The only foundation for the exception is the superior benefit of the publicity of judicial proceedings, which counterbalances the injury to individuals, though that at times may be great." Both the principles on which the exemption from legal consequences is thus extended to the publication of the proceedings of Courts of justice appear to us to be applicable to the case before us. The presumption of malice is negatived in the one case, as in the other, by the fact that the publication has in view the instruction and advantage of the public, and has no particular reference to the party concerned. There is in the one case, as in the other, a preponderance of general good over partial and occasional evil. We entirely concur with Lawrence, J., in The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293), that the same reasons which apply to the reports of the proceedings in Courts of justice apply also to proceedings in parliament. It seems to us impossible to doubt that it is of paramount public and national importance that the proceedings of the Houses of Parliament shall be communicated to the public, who have the deepest interest in knowing what passes within their walls, seeing that on what is there said and done the welfare of the community depends. Where would be our confidence in the government of the country, or in the legislature by which our laws are framed, and to whose charge the great interests of the country are committed—where would be our attachment to the constitution under which we live, if the proceedings of the great council of the realm were shrouded in secrecy, and concealed from the knowledge of the nation? How could the communications between the representatives of the people and their constituents which are so essential to the working of the representative system, be usefully carried on if the constituencies were kept in ignorance of what their representatives are doing? What would become of the right of petitioning on all measures pending in parliament, the undoubted right of the subject, if the people are to be kept in ignorance of what is passing in either House? Can any man bring himself to doubt that the publicity given in modern times to what passes in parliament is essential to the maintenance of the relations subsisting between the government, the legislature and the country at large? It may, no doubt, be said that while it may be necessary as a matter of national interest that the proceedings in parliament should in general be made public, yet that debates in which the character of individuals is brought into question ought to be suppressed. But to this, in addition to the difficulty in which parties publishing parliamentary reports would be placed, if this distinction was to be enforced, and every debate had to be critically scanned to see whether it contained defamatory matter, it may be further answered that there is perhaps no subject in which the public have a deeper interest than in all that relates to the conduct of the public servants of the state; no subject of parliamentary discussion which more requires to be made known than an inquiry relating to it. Of this no better illustration could be possibly be given than is afforded by the case before us. A distinguished counsel, whose qualifications for the judicial bench had been abundantly tested by a long career of forensic eminence, is promoted to a high judicial office, and the profession and the public are satisfied that in a most important post the services of a most competent and valuable public servant have been secured. An individual comes forward and calls upon the House of Lords to take measures for removing the Judge, in all other respects so well qualified for his office, by reason that on an important occasion he had exhibited so total a disregard of truth as to render him unfit to fill an office for which a sense of the solemn obligations of truth and honour is an essential qualification. Can it be said that such a subject is not one in which the public has a deep interest, and as to which it ought not to be informed of what passes in debate? Lastly, what greater anomaly, or more flagrant injustice, could present itself than that, while from a sense of the importance of giving publicity to their proceedings the Houses of Parliament not only sanction the reporting of their debates, but also take measures for giving facility to those who report them, while every member of the educated portion of the community, from the highest to the lowest, looks with eager interest to the debates of either House, and considers it a part of the duty of the public journals to furnish an account of what passes there, we were to hold that the party publishing a parliamentary debate is to be held liable to legal proceedings because the conduct of a particular individual may happen to be called in question.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff scarcely ventured, as of his own assertion, to deny that the benefit to the public from having the debates in parliament published was as great as that which arose from the publishing of the proceedings of the Courts of justice; but he relied on the dicta of Mr. Justice Littledale and Mr. Justice Patteson, in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), and on the opinions of certain noble and learned Lords in the course of debates in the House of Lords on bills introduced by Lord Campbell for the purpose of amending the law of libel. There is no doubt that in delivering their opinions in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), the two learned Judges referred to denied the necessity, and, in effect, the public advantage of the proceedings in parliament being made public. The counsel for the defendant in that case having insisted, as a reason why the power to order papers to be printed and published should be considered within the privileges of the House of Commons, on the advantage which resulted from the proceedings of parliament being made known, the two learned Judges, not satisfied with demonstrating by conclusive argument, as they did, that the House had not the power to order papers of a libellous character, and forming no part of the proceedings of the House, to be published, still less to conclude the legality of such a proceeding by the assertion of privilege, thought it necessary to follow the counsel into the question of policy and convenience, and in so doing took what we cannot but think a very short-sighted view of the subject. This is the more to be regretted, as their observations apply not only to the printing of papers by order of the House, the only question before them, but also to the publication of parliamentary proceedings in general, the consideration of which was not before them, and therefore was unnecessary. Lord Denman, in his admirable judgment, than which a finer never was delivered within these walls, and in which the spirit of Holt is combined with the luminous reasoning of Mansfield, while overthrowing by irresistible arguments the positions of the Attorney-General, was content to answer the argument as to the policy of allowing papers to be published by order of either of the Houses of Parliament, not by denying the policy of giving to the House power to order the printing and publishing of papers, but by saying that such power must be provided for by legislation. On the subject of the publication of parliamentary debates he said nothing, nor was he called upon to say anything. That the legislature did not concur with the two Judges in their view of the policy is manifest from the Act of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 9, passed in consequence of the decision in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), the preamble of which statute recites that "it is essential to the due and effectual exercise and discharge of the functions and duties of parliament, and to the promotion of wise legislation, that no obstructions or impediments should exist to the publication of such of the reports, papers, votes or proceedings of either House of Parliament, as such House of Parliament may deem fit or necessary to be published." After which the Act proceeds to provide for the prevention of actions being in future brought in respect of papers published by order of either House of Parliament.

As regards the attempt of Lord Campbell to fix the legality of the publication of parliamentary debates on the sure foundation of statutory enactment, we think it may be as well accounted for by the apprehension as to the result of any proceeding at law in which the legality of such publication should come in question produced in his mind by the language of the Judges in Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1; 8 L. J. Q.B. 294), as by any conviction of the defectiveness of the law. And as regard the opinions of the noble and learned persons in the debates of the House of Lords, we must observe that the discussion proceeded on the assumption that the publishing of parliamentary debates, if involving defamatory matter, was contrary to law and actionable, although no decision to that effect had ever been pronounced, and no argument or discussion on the point had ever taken place. We, before whom this question is now presented for judicial decision for the first time, and who have had the advantage of able and learned arguments at the bar to assist us, must endeavour to ascertain the law as applicable to the case, and if our minds are satisfied as to what the law is, must decide according to our convictions, undeterred by the authority of great names or the opinions of those who, although our superiors in all other respects, had not the advantage of forensic discussion, or the opportunity of a judicial consideration of the subject. And this is the more necessary as we observe that one of the main grounds insisted on for resisting Lord Campbell's bill was, that there was no necessity for legislation, inasmuch as no action had ever been brought in respect of the publication of a parliamentary debate. We cannot but think that had the noble and learned persons referred to foreseen that such an action as the present would be brought, in which a party, having by his own attack upon a public man given rise to a debate in one of the Houses of Parliament which he knew would in the ordinary course of things be reported, brings an action for the publication of the discussion which he himself has provoked, and which publication he would have hailed with satisfaction if the result of it had been favourable to himself and damaging to the object of his attack, they would have paused before they assumed that by the law such an action could be maintained, or at all events would have seen the necessity for an immediate amendment of a law so defective. We, however, are glad to think that, on closer inquiry, the law turns out not to be as on some occasions it has been assumed to be. To us it seems clear that the principle on which the publication of the reports of the proceedings of Courts of justice have been held to be privileged apply to the reports of parliamentary proceedings. The analogy between the two cases is in every respect complete. If the rule has never been applied to the reports of parliamentary proceedings till now, we must assume that it is only because the occasion has never before arisen. If the principles which are the foundation of the privilege in the one case are applicable to the other, we must not hesitate to apply them, more especially when by so doing we avoid the glaring anomaly and injustice to which we have before adverted. Whatever disadvantages attach to a system of unwritten law, and of these we are fully sensible, it has at least this advantage, that its elasticity enables those who administer it to adapt it to the varying conditions of society, and to the requirements and habits of the age in which we live, so as to avoid the inconsistencies and injustice which arise when the law is no longer in harmony with the wants and usages and interests of the generation to which it is immediately applied.

Our law of libel has in many respects only gradually developed itself into anything like a satisfactory and settled form. The full liberty of public writers to comment on the conduct and motives of public men has only in very recent times been recognized. Comments on government, on ministers and officers of state, on members of both Houses of Parliament, on Judges and other public functionaries, are now made every day, which half a century ago would have been the subject of actions or of ex officio informations, and would have brought down fine and imprisonment on publishers and authors. Yet who can doubt that the public are gainers by the change, and that, though injustice may often be done, and though public men may often have to smart under the keen sense of wrong inflicted by hostile criticism, the nation profits by public opinion being thus freely brought to bear on the discharge of public duties? Again, the recognition of the right to publish the proceedings of Courts of justice has been of modern growth. Till a comparatively recent time the sanction of the Judges was thought necessary, even for the publication of the decisions of the Courts upon points of law. Even in quite recent days Judges in holding the publication of the proceedings of Courts of justice lawful, have thought it necessary to distinguish what are called ex parte proceedings as a probable exception from the operation of the rule. Yet ex parte proceedings before magistrates, and even before this Court, as for instance on application for criminal informations, are published every day; but such a thing as an action or indictment founded on a report of such an ex parte proceeding is unheard of, and if any such action or indictment should be brought it would probably be held that the true criterion of the privilege is not whether the report was, or was not, ex parte, but whether it was a fair and honest report of what had taken place, published simply with a view to the information of the public, and innocent of all intention to do injury to the reputation of the party affected.

It is to be observed that the analogy between the case of reports of proceedings in Courts of justice and those of proceedings in parliament being complete, all the limitations placed on the one to prevent injustice to individuals will necessarily attach on the other. A garbled or partial report, or of detached parts of proceedings, published with intent to injure individuals, will equally be disentitled to protection.

Our judgment will in no way interfere with the decisions that the publication of a single speech for the purpose or with the effect of injuring an individual will be unlawful, as was held in the cases of The King v. Lord Abingdon (1 Esp. 225) and The King v. Creevey (1 M. & S. 273). At the same time it may be as well to observe that we are disposed to agree with what was said in Davidson v. Duncan (7 El. & B. 232; 26 L. J. Q.B. 107) as to such a speech being privileged if bonâ fide published by a member for the information of his constituents. But whatever would deprive a report of the proceedings in a Court of justice of immunity will equally apply to a report of proceedings in parliament.

It only remains to advert to an argument urged against the legality of the publication of parliamentary proceedings, namely, that such publication is illegal as being in contravention of the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament. The fact, no doubt, is that each House of Parliament does by its Standing Orders prohibit the publication of its debates. But practically each House not only permits, but also sanctions and encourages the publication of its proceedings, and actually gives every facility to those who report them. Individual members correct their speeches for publication in Hansard or the public journals; and in every debate reports of former speeches contained therein are constantly referred to. Collectively as well as individually, the members of both Houses would deplore as a national misfortune the withholding their debates from the country at large. Practically speaking, therefore, it is idle to say that the publication of parliamentary proceedings is prohibited by parliament. The Standing Orders which prohibit it are obviously maintained only to give to each House the control over the publication of its proceedings, and the power of preventing or correcting any abuse of the facility afforded. Independently of the Orders of the Houses, there is nothing unlawful in publishing reports of parliamentary proceedings. Practically such publication is sanctioned by parliament. It is essential to the working of our parliamentary system and to the welfare of the nation. Any argument founded on its alleged illegality appears to us therefore entirely to fail. Should either House of Parliament ever be so ill-advised as to prevent its proceedings from being made known to the country—which certainly never will be the case—any publication of its debates made in contravention of its orders would be a matter between the House and the publisher. For the present purpose we must treat such publication as in every respect lawful, and hold that while honestly and faithfully carried on, those who publish them will be free from legal responsibility, though the character of individuals may incidentally be injuriously affected. So much for the great question involved in this case.

We pass on to the second branch of this rule, which has reference to alleged misdirection in respect of the second count of the declaration, which is founded on the article in the Times commenting on the debate in the House of Lords, and the conduct of the plaintiff in preferring the petition which gave rise to it.

We are of opinion that the direction given to the jury was perfectly correct. The publication of the debate having been justifiable, the jury were properly told that the subject was, for the reasons we have already adverted to, pre-eminently one of public interest, and therefore one on which public comment and observation might properly be made; and that consequently the occasion was privileged in the absence of malice. As to the latter, the jury were told that they must be satisfied that the article was an honest and fair comment on the facts; in other words, that in the first place they must be satisfied that the comments had been made with an honest belief in their justice; but that this was not enough, inasmuch as such belief might originate in the blindness of party zeal, or in personal or political aversion; that a person taking upon himself publicly to criticize and to condemn the conduct or motives of another must bring to the task, not only an honest sense of justice, but also a reasonable degree of judgment and moderation, so that the result may be what a jury shall deem under the circumstances of the case a fair and legitimate criticism on the conduct and motives of the party who is the object of censure.

Considering the direction thus given to have been perfectly correct, we are of opinion that in respect of this alleged misdirection, as also on the former point, the ruling at Nisi Prius was right, and that consequently this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Sheriff—Escape—Irregular Order of Release by Registrar in Bankruptcy.

SHERIFF. C.—By the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 27, "any registrar of the Court may, during vacation, or during the illness or absence from any other reasonable cause of any Commissioner thereof, act for and as the deputy of such Commissioner; and any such registrar so acting shall have and exercise all power vested in the Court," &c. By the General Orders in Bankruptcy, 1852, rule 44. (a rule continued by No. 36. of the Rules and Orders under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861), "except in cases of emergency, the nature whereof shall be entered on the proceedings, no registrar shall sit or act for any Commissioner under section 27. without the express request in writing of such or some other Commissioner." In an action against the sheriff for an escape, he pleaded that he discharged the debtor in obedience to an order for his release duly made by a registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy. The plaintiff replied that the registrar had not been requested in writing by any Commissioner of the Court to sit or act for him, nor had any case of emergency, as in the General Order of 1852, arisen, nor was the nature of such emergency entered on the proceedings:—Held, on demurrer, that the replication was bad and the sheriff not liable; as, although the order might possibly have been reversed by the Lord Chancellor for irregularity, there was nothing on the face of it to give notice to the sheriff of its irregularity, and it was not his duty to inquire whether the registrar was duly qualified.

Declaration against the defendant, as sheriff of Lancashire, for allowing one Samuel Harris Brockelhurst, whom he had arrested under a ca. sa., at the suit of the plaintiff, to escape.

Second plea—That, after the passing of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1859 and 1861, the defendant, as and being the sheriff of Lancashire, took Brockelhurst into custody, and detained him in custody, in execution, as a prisoner for debt, at the suit of the plaintiffs in the action, under the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, as in the declaration set forth; and thereupon, afterwards, and whilst the defendant, as in the declaration mentioned, had and detained Brockelhurst in the custody and detainer of the defendant; and whilst Brockelhurst remained in such custody and detainer, Brockelhurst duly filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy in the Court of Bankruptcy for the Manchester district, at Manchester, and proceedings were so duly had and taken in and by the Court, in the matter of the bankruptcy, that Brockelhurst was duly adjudicated bankrupt, and afterwards surrendered and duly obtained his protection from arrest; and thereupon, afterwards, and whilst Brockelhurst was still so in the custody and detainer of the defendant, an order was duly made upon the defendant by the registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, duly acting and having jurisdiction in that behalf, according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Laws, for the immediate release and discharge of Brockelhurst from the custody of the defendant as to the detainer by the defendant and all other detainers, which order, and the summons thereon indorsed, were and are respectively in the words and figures following, and to the following tenor and effect:

"The Bankruptcy Act, 1861.—In Her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy at Manchester.—January 26, 1867.—I certify that Samuel Harris Brockelhurst, of No. 159, Tamworth Street, Stretford Hulme, in the county of Lancaster, builder and contractor, has this day been brought up before me by the within-named Henry Mapleston, in obedience to the within summons; and I did, upon the application of Mr. Coulson, solicitor for the said bankrupt, order his immediate release from the custody of the sheriff of Lancaster as to the present and all other detainers.

"DAVID C. MACRAE, Registrar."

(Seal of the Court.)

And the said summons above referred to was and is in the words and figures following, and to the following tenor and effect; that is to say:

"The Bankruptcy Act, 1861.—In the Court of Bankruptcy for the Manchester District at Manchester.—In the matter of Samuel Harris Brockelhurst, by whom a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy has been filed.—To Henry Mapleston, of the city of Manchester, sheriff's officer.—These are to will and require you, to whom this summons is directed, personally to appear before the registrar acting in the prosecution of the said petition, on Saturday, January 26 instant, at one o'clock in the afternoon precisely, in this Court, then and there to be examined by virtue of the said petition and of the above-mentioned act, and bring with you the body of the said Samuel Harris Brockelhurst; and herein you are not to fail at your peril. Given under my hand and under the seal of the Court this 26th day of January, 1867.

"D. C. MACREA, Registrar."

"Note.—This summons is issued on the application of Messrs. Grundy & Coulson, the solicitors for and on behalf of the said bankrupt."

Averment—That David C. Macrea, in the order and summons mentioned, and making the same, was and is the registrar duly appointed under the Bankruptcy Acts in the Court of Bankruptcy, and had jurisdiction in the matter; and Mapleston, in the summons mentioned, was the agent and servant of the defendant as such sheriff, and the summons was served on him as the agent and servant of the defendant, and the registrar of the Bankruptcy Court having jurisdiction in the matters aforesaid made the order of discharge; and the defendant thereupon, acting bonâ fide and in obedience to the order, and believing the same to be binding on him in law, released and discharged Brockelhurst; which are the acts complained of in the declaration.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder in demurrer.

Replication to the plea—That David C. Macrea, in making the order in the plea mentioned, claimed and assumed to act by virtue of the provisions of the 27th section of a certain Act entitled the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. And the plaintiffs say that, in pursuance of the powers therein contained, a general order was, upon October 19, 1852, duly made, which was and is in the words and figures following; that is to say: "Except in cases of emergency, the nature whereof shall be entered on the proceedings, no registrar shall sit or act for any Commissioner under section 27[1] (meaning the said 27th section before mentioned), without the express request in writing of such or some other Commissioner." And the plaintiffs say that, in pursuance of the powers contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, certain general orders were duly made,

(1) By the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 27, it is enacted, "that any registrar of the Court may, during vacation, or during the illness, or absence from any other reasonable cause, of any Commissioner thereof, act for and as the deputy of such Commissioner; and any such registrar so acting shall have and exercise all power vested in the Court, except the power of commitment, the hearing of any disputed adjudication, or the hearing or determining of any question of the allowance or suspension of any bankrupt's certificate."

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), s. 52, the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy shall have power to make adjudication of bankruptcy, to receive the surrender of any bankrupt, to grant protection, to pass the last examination of any bankrupt in cases wherein the assignees and creditors do not oppose, to hold and preside at meetings of creditors, to audit and pass accounts of assignees, and to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the Court, and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general orders, &c.

whereby it was provided, amongst other things, that the general order of October 19, 1852, should be acted upon for the purposes mentioned in the 45th section of the last-mentioned Act[2]. And that the order bearing date October 19, 1852, before mentioned, was, at the time of the making of the said order in the said second plea mentioned, and still is in full force and effect. And the plaintiffs further say, that David C. Macrea had not, before the making of the order in the plea mentioned, been requested in writing by any Commissioner of the Court to sit or act for him, nor had any case of emergency, as in the general order of October 19, 1852, mentioned, arisen, nor was the nature of such emergency entered upon the proceedings in manner provided by the general order.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

J. P. Murphy, in support of the demurrer.—The order of release by the registrar of the Bankruptcy Court which is pleaded by the defendant, is bad on the face of it. In Ex parte Morgan; In re Pennell (32 L. J. Bk. 61) the Lord Chancellor expressed his opinion that where an order was made by a registrar, acting for and in the absence of the Commissioner of the district Court of Bankruptcy, it was essential, not only that the order should be properly made, but that it should shew on the face of it that it was properly made, and that as there was nothing on the record in the case before the Court to shew that the Commissioner was absent "from illness or any other reasonable cause," or that the registrar had been expressly in writing requested to act for him, it was irregular.

[LUSH, J.—It would be one thing to hold this order bad on appeal to the Lord Chancellor, and another thing to hold that it was bad so as to afford no protection to third parties. How do you distinguish this case from Lloyd v. Harrison (35 L. J. Q.B. 153), where it was held that the sheriff was justified in discharging a debtor upon production of the certificate of registration of a deed of arrangement which afterwards turned out to be invalid?]

If the order is defective on the face of it, it ought not to protect the sheriff, and in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, the order ought itself to shew the circumstances under which the registrar was authorized to act.

[LUSH, J.—Your replication does not say that the order was not made during vacation. At any rate the registrar might have been duly authorized to make the order: and how is the sheriff able to inspect the proceedings in bankruptcy?]

The registrar is an officer with a conditional jurisdiction, and the sheriff ought to satisfy himself that these conditions have been observed.

Holker (Baylis with him), in support of the plea, was not heard.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the plea is good, and the replication bad. The Registrar, as regards the sheriff, must be taken to have had the power which he professed to exercise. By section 27. of the Bankrupt Act of 1849 the registrar may during vacation, or in case of the illness, &c. of the Commissioner, act for him for the purpose of granting orders like the one set out in the plea. By a general order made under the power of the Bankrupt Acts, the authority created by section 27. can only be exercised after certain directions have been fulfilled. But it is impossible for the sheriff to know whether these events have happened. It is true that the Lord Chancellor has jurisdiction over such an order upon appeal, and may direct it to be vacated; but if there is no such appeal, the order is like the certificate in Lloyd v. Harrison (35 L. J. Q.B. 153). It purports to be duly made by a competent officer, and the Court cannot throw on the sheriff the burden of inquiring whether it was in fact duly made.

CRIMINAL LAW. D.—The provisions of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21, enabling defendants held to bail on mesne process to be rendered in discharge of their bail to the prison of the Court out of which the process issued, or to the common gaol of the county in which they were arrested, apply to arrests by virtue of writs of capias under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

M. having been arrested in Yorkshire upon a capias under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the defendants executed a bail-bond, by which they undertook that if he should be condemned in the action he should satisfy the costs and condemnation or render himself to the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison:— Held, in an action on the bond, the declaration alleging that M. did not render himself to the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison, that a plea that M. in due time rendered himself to the common gaol of the county in which he was arrested, was good.

Declaration, that the defendants, on June 25, 1867, at Barnsley, in Yorkshire, came in their proper persons before one Edward Lancaster, then and there being a Commissioner duly appointed and empowered to take and receive all and every such recognizance or recognizances of bail or bails in and for the county as any person or persons should be willing to acknowledge or make before him in any action or suit depending in this honourable Court, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and then and there before him, so being such Commissioner, became pledge and bail, and each of them became pledge and bail, for one William Milner, and then and there did jointly and severally undertake that if William Milner should be condemned in an action of debt then depending against him in this honourable Court at the suit of the plaintiff, that he should satisfy the costs and condemnation or should render himself into the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison or that the defendants would do it for him which recognizance was afterwards brought into this honourable Court to be enrolled and recorded, and thereupon the recognizance, at the request of the plaintiff, was then and there duly enrolled and recorded in this honourable Court as by the record of the recognizance still remaining in this honourable Court fully appears; and although the plaintiff afterwards, by the judgment of this honourable Court, recovered in the action against William Milner 256*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* for her damages, which she had sustained as well by reason of the debt then owing by him to the plaintiff as for her costs and charges by her about her suit in that behalf expended, whereof W. Milner was convicted, as by the record and proceedings thereof still remaining in this honourable Court more fully appears, yet he hath not satisfied to the plaintiff the damages, being the costs and condemnation in the recognizance mentioned, or any part thereof, nor rendered himself on that occasion unto the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison according to the recognizance; and the recognizance and judgment still remain in force, and the plaintiff has not as yet obtained any execution or satisfaction of the judgment, whereby an action has accrued to the plaintiff to demand and have of the defendants the sum of 256*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* Breach, that the defendants had not nor had either of them paid the amount or any part of it. There was also the common count for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiff on a recognizance.

in the second count, and that William Milner was held to bail on a writ of capias issued under the Act 1 & 2 Vict. for, amongst other things, abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases, under which writ he was arrested in the county of York. Averment, that on the occasion in the declaration mentioned William Milner in due time rendered himself to the common gaol of the county in which he was so arrested, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Ryalls, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. The render relied on by the plea is not a render within the terms of the recognizance. The defendants will contend that the Act of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21.[1] enabling a defendant in custody under mesne process to be rendered to the gaol of the county where he was arrested, instead of to the prison of the Court where he was arrested, applies to an arrest under a capias, according to 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. But the former Act applies only to mesne process properly so called, and mesne process is altogether abolished by the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Under the old law a defendant in custody under mesne process could not be discharged except for irregularity, without extinguishing the debt, but if arrested under the new practice he may be discharged without any such difficulty. In Brown v. M'Millan (7 Mee. W. 196; 10 L. J. Ex. 147), it was held that the 7th section of 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 71, providing that no sheriff or other officer should upon any mesne process issuing out of the superior Courts, arrest or hold any person to special bail within certain counties, unless the process were indorsed for bail in a sum not less than 50*l*., did not apply to writs of capias issued under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; and Parke, B. says that the words mesne process are used in a different sense in the two acts. In Ireland v. Berry (1 Dowl. & L. P.C. 866; 13 L. J. Q.B. 140) it was held that rule 1. of Trinity Term, 3 Will. 4, did not apply to the case of a defendant in custody under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, as the detention was on a proceeding quite collateral, and not a custody under process within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 39.

[Forbes, in support of the plea, referred to rule 106. of Hilary Term, 1853[2].]

(1) By 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21, "A defendant, who shall have been held to bail upon any mesne process issued out of any of His Majesty's superior Courts of record, may be rendered in discharge of his bail, either to the prison of the Court out of which such process issued, according to the practice of such Court, or to the common gaol of the county in which he was so arrested, and the render to the county gaol shall be effected in the manner following; that is to say, the defendant, or his bail, or one of them, shall for the purpose of such render obtain an order of a Judge of one of His Majesty's superior Courts of Westminster, and shall lodge such order with the gaolor of such county gaol, and a notice in writing of the lodgment of such order, and of the defendant's being actually in custody of such gaolor by virtue of such order, signed by the defendant, or the bail, or either of them, or by the attorney or agent of any or either of them, shall be delivered to the plaintiff's attorney or agent, and the sheriff or other person responsible for the custody of the debtors in such county gaol, shall, on such render so perfected, be duly charged with the custody of such defendant, and the said bail shall be thereupon wholly exonerated from liability as such."

By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, "An Act for abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases," &c., after reciting that the present power of arrest upon mesne process is unnecessarily extensive and severe, and ought to be relaxed; it is enacted, "that from and after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act no person shall be arrested upon mesne process in any civil action in any inferior Court whatsoever, or (except in the cases and in the manner hereinafter provided for) in any superior Court."

By section 3, "If a plaintiff in any action in any of Her Majesty's superior Courts of law at Westminster, in which the defendant is now liable to arrest, whether upon the order of a Judge, or without such order, . . . shall, by the affidavit of himself or some other person, shew, to the satisfaction of a Judge of one of the said superior Courts, that such plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendant or defendants to the amount of 20*l*. or upwards, or has sustained damage to that amount, and that there is probable cause for believing that the defendant . . . . or any one or more of the defendants is or are about to quit England unless he or they be forthwith apprehended, it shall be lawful for such Judge, by a special order, to direct that such defendant or defendants so about to quit England shall be held to bail for such sum as such Judge shall think fit, not exceeding the amount of the debt or damages."

(2) By Regulæ Generales, 1853, 106, "on application by defendant or his bail, or either of them, for an order to render a defendant to a county gaol, it shall be specified on whose behalf such application shall be made, the state of the proceedings in the cause, for what amount the

That rule at the most only recognizes the possibility of a render to the county gaol after 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

[LUSH, J.—The Queen's Prison is discontinued as a place of imprisonment for debtors by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 104, and Whitecross Street prison is substituted for it. It is impossible, therefore, that the render can be literally according to the terms of the recognizance.]

The Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. contains no provisions as to the render of defendants in discharge of bail, and it was the duty of the defendants to have caused the recognizance to be framed in such a manner as that they might have been enabled to render the debtor to a county gaol.

Forbes, in support of the plea, was not called upon.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to our judgment. I speak on this subject with much more diffidence than I should have felt some years ago, but it is my impression that ever since the passing of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. there has never been a doubt but that the facilities for rendering defendants in discharge of bail introduced by 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21. applied to defendants in custody under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The act 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21, which enables a defendant to be rendered to the gaol of the county in which he was arrested instead of to the prison of the Court out of which the process issued, uses the words "held to bail upon any mesne process." But the term "mesne process" equally applies to process by writ of capias under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The distinction between the two kinds of process is, that whereas before the passing of this last Act mesne process might be issued at the will of the party and before the commencement of an action, it can now only be issued by special order of a Judge at chambers, and is entirely collateral to the action itself. It is an interlocutory process, the object of which is not to keep the debtor in prison as a satisfaction of the debt, but to secure his person so as to prevent him from going abroad. But I think that until now no one ever doubted that the existing power of arrest was within the meaning of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. I am clearly of opinion that assuming that the recognizance was properly framed, a render to the county gaol would have been a good discharge of the bail before this Act; and this brings us to the question, is it a good discharge of the present recognizance? I do not mean to say that the recognizance might not have been framed so as to express with more accuracy what the defendants were bound to do, but we must read it so as to give effect to the intention of the parties if the words enable us to do so. Now the words of the obligation are, "that W. Milner should satisfy the costs and condemnation or should render himself to the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison;" and the question is whether W. Milner has been rendered so as to discharge this obligation. No doubt when the form of the recognizance was first prepared the Queen's Prison meant the old prison belonging to this Court, but when the defendants entered into their obligation an Act of Parliament had forbidden that this prison should any longer be used for the imprisonment of debtors. The words "Queen's Prison" can now therefore be used in no other sense than that of any prison of the Queen to which the defendant may lawfully be rendered, and the plea affords a good answer to the action by shewing that there was a render to the county gaol, which, by 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70, was substituted for the prison of the Court out of which the process issued.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what have the bail agreed to do? They have agreed that the debtor shall satisfy the costs and condemnation or render himself into the custody of the Queen's Prison. Now, the defendant could not render himself to a prison which was no longer available for the imprisonment of debtors, and I take it that what was meant was that he should render himself according to the ordinary practice at the present time; defendant was held to bail, and by the sheriff of what county he was arrested, which facts shall be stated in the order; and that on such order being lodged with the gaoler of the county gaol in which such defendant was so arrested, the defendant may be rendered to his custody in discharge of the bail," &c.

and I see that, in the 9th edition of Chitty's Forms, in the form of recognizance of bail, the obligation is to render the defendant to the custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison, so that the old words are still used, I suppose because it was thought that they would receive the same construction as under the former mesne process. Now that the Queen's Prison as such has been abolished the words must mean that the render shall be to the prison which is in the place of the Queen's Prison. The Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. is intituled 'An Act for abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases,' clearly shewing that the legislature intended that in some instances mesne process should continue to exist, and the process by special order under this Act is something in lieu of mesne process, and therefore subject to the provisions of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 70. s. 21.

Shipping — Charter-Party — Discharge of Cargo — Reasonable Time — Contract implied by Law—Action.

SHIPPING. B. I.—Where a charter-party is silent as to the time to be occupied in the discharge of cargo at the port of destination, the law implies a contract to discharge within a reasonable time. But where delay in the discharge takes place owing to unforeseen circumstances at the port of destination, over which neither the charterer nor the shipowner, whose joint duty it is to deliver the cargo, had any control, and neither party has undertaken by contract, express or implied, that there should be no delay, any loss arising therefrom must remain where it lies, and cannot form the subject of an action.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiffs and the defendants agreed by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship called the "Craigie Lea," then being in the port of Liverpool, should immediately be made ready to receive cargo, and should then be loaded according to the defendants' orders, and proceed with all convenient speed to Lima or Valparaiso, and that the defendants should load her with a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise, which she should carry as aforesaid, and then deliver to the defendants' consignees, in consideration of certain sums in the said charter-party in that behalf respectively mentioned, and upon the terms (amongst others) that the said ship should be unloaded at the port of discharge by the defendants' consignees with all due and reasonable despatch, and within a reasonable time for so doing; that the said ship was made ready and loaded by the defendants under the said charter-party, and by their orders proceeded to Lima, and safely carried the said cargo to Lima aforesaid, and was then ready to deliver the same to the defendants' consignees according to the said charter-party, whereof they had also due notice; and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said charter-party performed by the defendants on their part, and to have the said vessel unloaded and discharged of her cargo by the defendants' consignees within a reasonable time in that behalf. Yet the defendants' consignees did not nor would unload the said ship at her said port of discharge with due and reasonable despatch, nor within a reasonable time in that behalf for so doing, and also delayed, kept and detained the said ship for divers long and excessive and unreasonable periods of time in unloading and discharging the cargo out of the same, whereby the plaintiffs during all those times aforesaid were deprived of the use of the said ship, and incurred expense in keeping the same and maintaining the master and crew thereof, and were put to extra cost in and about insuring the same, and lost and were deprived of the benefit of divers homeward charters which could and but for the aforesaid wrongful detention of the said ship would have been made. There were also counts for the demurrage of the ship, and for money upon an account stated.

Third plea—That it was by the said charter-party provided that the defendants should not be liable in respect of (amongst other things) any delay in the unloading of the said ship, or for any delay, keeping or detention thereof caused by the acts or restraints of princes and rulers; and that the defendants were always ready and willing to unload the said ship with due and reasonable despatch and within a reasonable time in that behalf, and the defendants did not delay, keep or detain the said ship for any long, excessive or unreasonable period in unloading the same, but used the best care and despatch in the premises; but that the said delay complained of by the plaintiffs in the unloading of the said ship was caused solely by the matters and things beyond the power and control of the defendants and by the said charter-party provided to be excepted, to wit, by the acts and restraints of princes and rulers, within the meaning of the said charter-party.

Issue thereon.

At the trial, which took place before Cockburn, C.J., at Guildhall, at the Sittings after Trinity Term, 1868, it appeared that the defendants, on July 24, 1865, chartered at a lump sum the plaintiffs' ship, the "Craigie Lea," from Liverpool to Valparaiso or Lima. The charter-party fixed the number of days for loading the ship, but was silent as to the time to be allowed the charterers for unloading at the port of destination, merely providing that the ship should proceed there, or as near as she could safely get, and then deliver the cargo in the usual and customary manner agreeably to bills of lading. The "Craigie Lea" arrived at Callao, the port of Lima, on February 26, 1866, and lay waiting to discharge from that day down to March 9. The Peruvian Government allow no cargo to be landed at Callao except through the custom-house, and the ordinary discharge of a ship at that port, owing to the dilatoriness both of the authorities and the persons employed about the port, the absence of the usual appliances and the total want of organization which prevails there, is very slow. At the time of the arrival of the "Craigie Lea," the usual difficulties attendant upon the unshipping of goods at Callao were increased in an extraordinary degree by reason of the political disturbances which prevailed in the country, and the fact that hostilities with Spain were imminent. The "Craigie Lea" commenced unshipping goods on March 9, and continued discharging small portions of her cargo from time to time as launches could be procured for the purpose, down to April 11. On that day news of the bombardment of Valparaiso by the Spanish Fleet arrived at Callao, and thereupon the custom-house authorites refused to permit the landing of more goods; and on April 18 issued orders to the captains of ships in the port to remove from their discharging places. The "Craigie Lea," nevertheless, remained at her moorings until April 26, on which day the Spanish Fleet arrived off Callao; and being in the line of fire she then removed under the direction of the Spanish Admiral from Callao to the north side of the bay. The blockade of Callao continued from April 26 until May 10, on which day the Spanish Fleet sailed away from Callao; and on May 12 the "Craigie Lea" returned to the discharging place, and recommenced unloading and completed the discharge of her cargo on June 21.

The Lord Chief Justice ruled that the charter-party being silent as to the time for unloading at the port of destination, there was an implied contract on the part of the defendants to discharge within a reasonable time, and left to the jury the questions, first, whether looking to the ordinary state of circumstances at the port there was any unreasonable delay on the part of the defendants; secondly, whether looking to the existing or extraordinary circumstances at the port there was any unreasonable delay, reserving for the Court the question whether the plaintiffs' claim was to be decided with reference to the ordinary or extraordinary state of circumstances, and directing the jury to assess the damages provisionally in respect of the seven days, from April 11 to April 18, during which the ship was at the discharging place, but unable to unload by reason of the refusal of the custom-house authorities to suffer goods to be landed. The jury found that there was no unreasonable delay on the part of the defendants under either the ordinary or extraordinary circumstances, and assessed the amount due for demurrage for the seven days (if any) at 15*l*. a day; whereupon the Lord Chief Justice directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiffs to move to set aside the verdict with respect to the seven days and enter a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Field obtained a rule, in pursuance of the leave reserved, calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiffs for 105*l*., or such further sum as the Court might direct, or for a new trial, upon the ground that the cargo was not discharged within a reasonable time, the delay having been caused by political and other extraordinary circumstances not within the contemplation of the parties; and also that the verdict was against the evidence.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court [1], prepared by BLACKBURN, J., was now read by HANNEN, J.—This was an action to recover compensation in damages for the detention of the plaintiffs' ship by the defendants.

On the trial, before the Lord Chief Justice, at Guildhall, it appeared that the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' ship from Liverpool to Lima or Valparaiso. By the charter-party, a specified number of days were agreed upon for loading the vessel at Liverpool; but there was no such agreement as to the discharge at her port of destination, the charter-party merely providing that the vessel should proceed there, or as near as she could safely get, and deliver the cargo in the usual and customary manner, agreeably to bills of lading, and so end the voyage. The contract being thus silent as to the time which is to be occupied in the discharge, the question arises, what is the agreement which the law implies in such a case?

It appeared on the trial that the vessel duly arrived at Callao, the port of Lima, and began to discharge in the manner usual there. The custom-house authorities will not allow any cargo to be landed except through the customs; and, in consequence of their dilatoriness and the general sluggishness of the population, the ordinary discharge of a vessel at Callao is very slow. The vessel remained discharging till, news having arrived of the approach of the Spanish fleet, the customs' authorities suspended all landing of goods, in order that they might remove those already in the custom-house out of the reach of the apprehended bombardment. The vessel consequently lay, with the cargo partly on board, for seven days, when she was ordered away, to be out of the danger of bombardment. She returned, and her discharge was finally completed.

The Lord Chief Justice ruled that, during the period when the vessel was not at Callao at all, there was no claim for damages. He reserved for the Court the question whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for the detention during the seven days when the vessel was at her discharging berth, but, owing to the unusual state of things, the customs' authorities would not allow the discharge to proceed. The damages for that detention, if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, were agreed to be 15*l.* for each day, amounting in the aggregate to 105*l.*

As to the rest of the detention, he left the question to the jury whether the detention was occasioned by anything beyond the usual and ordinary delays of the port. The jury found on this point for the defendants. Mr. Field obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs for 105*l.*, pursuant to the leave reserved, or for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. No complaint was made of the direction in point of law.

On the argument, in last Trinity Term, before my lord and my brothers Mellor and Lush, the Court refused to disturb the verdict, and took time to consider as to the point reserved.

The Court has come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. The question depends upon what the contract implied by law is, where there is a charter-party silent as to the time to be occupied in the discharge. We agree that whenever a party to a contract undertakes to do some particular act, the performance of which depends entirely on himself, so that he may choose his own mode of fulfilling his undertaking, and the contract is silent as to time, the law implies a contract to do it within a reasonable time under the circumstances; and if some unforeseen cause, over which he has no control, prevents him from performing what he has undertaken within that time, he is responsible for the damage. But where the act to be done is one in which both parties to the contract are to concur, and both bind themselves to the performance of it, there is no principle on which, in the absence of a stipulation to that effect, either expressed by the parties or to be collected from what they have expressed, the damage arising from an unforeseen impediment is to be cast by law on the one party more than on the other; and consequently we think that what is implied by law in such a case is not that either party contracts that it shall be done within either a fixed or reasonable time, but that each contracts that he shall use reasonable diligence in performing his part. It is on the application of this principle to a charter-party that the present question depends.

We think that delivering cargo is as much the duty of the shipowner as of the merchant; and consequently that the contract in a charter-party implied by the law, in the absence of any stipulation, is, that each party shall use reasonable diligence in performing his part of the delivery at the port of discharge,— the merchant being ready to receive in the usual manner, and the owner, by his captain and crew, to deliver in the usual manner. So that there is no contract implied by law on the part of the shipowner to allow his vessel to be kept there for the usual time, if, by reasonable diligence on the part of the merchant, the cargo might be sooner taken away; and no contract implied by law on the part of the merchants to take the cargo out within such usual time, though he could not by reasonable diligence perform it; though very commonly there are stipulations to that effect.

There is not much authority bearing on the point on which we have had most difficulty. We think it firmly established, both by decided cases and on principle, that where a party has, either expressly or impliedly, undertaken, without any qualification, to do anything, and does not do it, he must make compensation in damages although the performance was rendered impracticable by some unforeseen cause over which he had no control. In a charter-party, the merchant generally expressly contracts that he will provide a cargo to be put on board. The shipowner has nothing whatever to do with the mode in which the merchant is to fulfil this contract; and, accordingly, where the merchant is prevented by an unforeseen cause from fulfilling it, the shipowner is entitled to compensation in damages—Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S. 267). In the present charter-party, as is generally the case, the parties have agreed on a specified number of lay days for putting the cargo on board. Where a charter-party is silent, as it rests exclusively on the merchant to procure the cargo, the law would imply a contract to do so within a reasonable time after the vessel is ready to receive cargo; and we agree that, in estimating what is the reasonable time within which the cargo is to be provided, we are to consider what is a reasonable time under ordinary circumstances, and not to take into account any peculiar difficulty which may have arisen from the mode in which the merchant has chosen to procure the cargo—Adams v. the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 492; 28 L. J. C.P. 33); Kearon v. Pearson (7 Hurls. & N. 386; 31 L. J. Ex. 1). It may be different if the contract is framed with reference to any peculiar state of things—Harris v. Dreesman (9 Ex. 485; 23 L. J. Ex. 210).

It would rather appear, from the declaration set out in the report of Adams v. the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 492; 28 L. J. C.P. 33), that the contract expressly provided for a number of lay days and ten days on demurrage; but perhaps those were only allowed for the discharge of the cargo at St. Thomas's; otherwise, no question as to any implication of a reasonable time could have arisen. However this may have been, it is pointed out by Williams, J., that "the circumstances relied on to excuse the breach are circumstances which impeded, not the loading, but the procuring the coals wherewith to load the vessel;" and that was unquestionably true; the case was clearly rightly decided, but the present point did not arise. In Kearon v. Pearson (7 Hurls. & N. 386; 31 L. J. Ex. 1), Wilde, B., says that the stipulation in that case, "that the vessel shall be loaded with usual despatch," does not relate to the facilities which the charterers may have in their trade of getting the coal alongside the vessel (which, by express stipulation, was to be loaded in the Nelson dock), but to the putting it on board; but that, even if it were otherwise, there was an express stipulation that it should be loaded with usual despatch, not with usual diligence.

In this, also, we perfectly concur; but that case has no bearing on the question of what is implied when the contract is silent as to the time for discharging the cargo.

Whenever in the charter-party it is agreed that a specified number of days shall be allowed for unloading, and that it shall be lawful for the freighter to detain the vessel for that purpose, a further specified time, on payment of a daily sum, this constitutes a stipulation on the part of the freighter that he will not detain her beyond these two specified periods—Randall v. Lynch (2 Campb. 352). Lord Tenterden, Abbott on Shipping, 5th edit. p. 181, says, "And where the time is thus expressly ascertained and limited by the terms of the contract, the merchant will be liable to an action of damages if the thing be not done within the time, although this may not be attributable to any fault or omission on his part, for he has engaged that it shall be done." The last sentence is put in italics by Lord Tenterden, indicating that he thought it the reason why the merchant was liable. In the present case the time for discharging is not so limited; all that is said is, that the cargo shall be discharged in the usual and customary manner; that is to say, that the master and crew shall take that part which by the custom of the port falls upon them, and the freighter do the rest.

And as we have before observed, it is difficult to see on what principle delay in an act in which both sides are to concur is, in the absence of a stipulation in the contract, to fall on one more than the other, if neither be in fault. In Rodgers v. Forresters (2 Campb. 483), the express contract was that "the said freighter should be allowed the usual and customary time to unload the said ship at the port of discharge"; and in Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Campb. 488), where the contract was silent, Mansfield, C.J., said, that the law could only raise an implied promise to do what was in Rodgers v. Forresters (2 Campb. 483) stipulated for by an express covenant, viz., to discharge the ship in "the usual and customary time." On this Mr. Field based his argument, that the charter-party was to be construed as if a specified number of lay days for discharging the cargo had been inserted in it; the only difference being that instead of the parties fixing the number of days, they left that to be ascertained by subsequent inquiry, as to what was usual and customary in the port for such a vessel. And if that is so it would follow that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover; for it is clear that delay resulting from a threatened bombardment was neither usual nor customary. But we are aware of no authority for saying that the law implies a contract to discharge in the usual time, except what is said in Burmester v. Hodgson (2 Campb. 488), in which case it was not necessary for the decision. We think that the contract which the law implies is only that the merchant and ship owner should each use reasonable despatch in performing his part. That such was the opinion of Lord Tenterden appears to be implied from his ruling in Rogers v. Hunter (1 Moo. & M. 63), as to what was the obligation of the holder of a bill of lading.

If this be so, the delay having happened without fault on either side, and neither having undertaken by contract, express or implied, that there should be no delay, the loss must remain where it falls. It is true that at Callao, the usual course appears to be for the merchant to procure lighters, and the master and the crew have fulfilled their part of the duty of delivering the cargo, when they have assisted in getting the cargo out of the ship and putting it on board the lighters. It might have been physically possible for the merchant in this case to have procured so many lighters that the cargo might have been all taken out of the ship and put in those lighters, though the Customs' authorities would not permit any of those lighters to be unloaded; but the construction of the charter-party must be the same whatever by the custom of the port of discharge be the share of the shipowner in delivering cargo; and we do not think the merchant was bound to do so unreasonable a thing. If the contract be, as we construe it, only to use reasonable diligence in performing his part of the delivery, he was guilty of no breach whilst the landing of the cargo was rendered impossible by a cause over which he had no control. We think, therefore, that the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Power of Sale—Purchase-money allowed to remain on Mortgage.

MORTGAGE. O.—A mortgagee, who has bonâ fide contracted to sell according to the power of sale in his mortgage-deed, may allow part of the purchase-money to remain outstanding on a mortgage of the property, though the power of sale has no mention of any such privilege.

A mortgage, by way of sub-lease, contained a power to sell the premises upon default in payment of principal or interest, "by public sale or private contract, for such price or prices as could reasonably be gotten for the same, and with, under and subject to such conditions and stipulations as to title or otherwise as the mortgagee might deem expedient, with full power to buy in the same, or any part or parts thereof respectively, and to abandon and vary the terms of any and every sale or agreement for or relating to the sale thereof, and to re-sell the premises so bought in, or as to which the contract should have been so abandoned, or any part or parts thereof, at any future auction, or by private contract, with like powers from time to time of buying in, abandoning, varying and re-selling thereof, and in such manner as he should think advisable, without being liable for any loss occasioned thereby, or to demise, lease or let the premises, or any part of them, for such term of years, or from year to year, or otherwise, and either with or without taking any fine for the same, and upon such terms and in such manner as he should think proper;—and it was agreed that the receipt of the mortgagee for any money to arise from the sale, lease, &c., should discharge the persons to whom it was given from being answerable for the misapplication or non-application, or from being bound to see to the application of the money therein mentioned, or from being bound or concerned to inquire into the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, lease or leases, disposition or dispositions, which might be made by virtue of the mortgage-deed":—Held, that the mortgagee, after bonâ fide contracting to sell according to the power of sale contained in his deed, might allow part of the purchase-money to remain outstanding on a mortgage of the premises, and that the purchaser would obtain an unincumbered title to the property.

The declaration stated, that on December 14, 1859, by an indenture then made between Edward Mackeson of the first part, the defendant of the second part, and Luke James Marshall of the third part,—after reciting an indenture of lease on October 17, 1848, whereby certain lands in the parish of St. Mary, Battersea, in the county of Surrey, were demised by Richard Chambers to Henry Hart Davis for a term of 108 years, from September 29 then last past, and an indenture of November 18, 1848, whereby the lands were demised by Henry Hart Davis to the defendant for all the residue then unexpired of the term except the last five days, subject to a proviso for the re-assignment thereof by the defendant on payment of certain moneys therein mentioned, and that the indenture contained a power of sale, and that in pursuance of such power the defendant had sold the premises to Henry Paine for 550*l*., and that by an indenture, dated May 15, 1852, between the defendant of the first part, Edward Mackeson of the second part, and Henry Paine of the third part, the tenements were assigned by the defendant to Edward Mackeson for the term of 108 years, less the last five days thereof, upon the terms and subject to the powers therein contained; and also reciting an indenture of further charge for the considerations therein mentioned,—Edward Mackeson, at the request of the defendant, assigned, and the defendant assigned and confirmed unto Luke James Marshall the tenements comprised in and demised by the indenture of lease of October 17, 1848, and assigned by the indenture of May 15, 1852, to hold to Luke James Marshall, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the residue then to come of the term of 108 years, except the last five days thereof, subject as therein mentioned, and the defendant thereby, for his own acts only, covenanted with Luke James Marshall, his executors, administrators and assigns, that he, Lumsden Mackeson, had not at any time or times made, done, committed or executed, or knowingly or willingly permitted or suffered, or been party or privy to any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever, whereby or by reason or means whereof the messuage or tenement, ground and premises, or any part or parts thereof, were, was, could, should, or might be in anywise impeached, charged, incumbered or otherwise prejudicially affected; and afterwards, to wit, on December 18, 1863, by an indenture then made between Luke James Marshall, in consideration of 700*l.* then paid to him by the plaintiff, assigned, transferred, and set over unto the plaintiff the tenements demised by the indenture of lease, to hold to the plaintiff for the residue then to come of the term of 108 years, less the last five days thereof, subject as therein mentioned: Yet the defendant had not, in pursuance of such power of sale contained in the indenture of November 18, 1848, sold the premises to Henry Paine, and had, before making the covenant, made, done, committed and executed, and knowingly and willingly permitted and suffered, and been party and privy to an act deed, matter and thing whereby and by means whereof the said messuage, or tenement, ground and premises, were impeached, charged, incumbered, and otherwise prejudicially affected: by means of which premises the plaintiff was unable to assign the tenements and to complete a contract which he afterwards entered into for the grant of an annuity on the security of the leasehold estate and interest in the tenements so purported to be assigned to him, and divers expenses incurred by him in endeavouring to make out a title to the tenements under the contract became lost and useless to him; and by reason of not being able to complete the contract, he was unable to obtain an advance of money, and was thereby much injured in his trade and prospects, and was obliged to pay interest and commission on the amount which would have been, but was not, advanced, and the consideration-money paid by him for the purchase of the hereditaments became lost to him, and also the expenses of the purchase and other large sums paid by him in building on and improving the lands; and he was and is otherwise injured.

Pleas.—First, that the deed of December 14, 1859, is not the plaintiff's deed; secondly, that the deed of December 18, 1863, is not the deed of L. J. Marshall; thirdly, denial of breaches.

The defendant also demurred to the breach alleging that the defendant had not, in pursuance of the power of sale, sold the premises to Paine.

Joinder in issue on the pleas, and joinder in demurrer.

The issues in fact came on to be tried, at the Sittings in Middlesex, after Hilary Term, 1868, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, and by consent a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the following special case. And it was ordered that an arbitrator should settle the case if the parties differed, and that if the Court should decide in favour of the plaintiff, the Court should say on which of the heads of damage mentioned in the particulars the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and it was to be referred to the arbitrator to assess the damages if necessary.

CASE.

By indenture, dated October 17, 1848, made between Robert Chambers of the one part, and Henry Hart of the other part, Chambers demised certain premises at Battersea to Davis for the term of 108 years, from September 29, 1848, subject to a yearly rent of 12*l.*

By indenture, dated November 18, 1848, between Davis of the one part and the defendant of the other part, after reciting the indenture of lease of October 17, 1848, Davis, in consideration of 450*l.* paid to him by the defendant, and in consideration that the defendant had agreed to advance to Davis the further sum of 100*l.*, bargained, sold and demised the lands comprised in the indenture of lease to the defendant for all the residue then unexpired of the term, except the last five days, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the principal moneys intended to be thereby secured, and certain interest thereon. And it was by the indenture further provided that, "if default should be made in payment of the principal moneys intended to be thereby secured, or any part or parts thereof, or of the interest thereof, or of any part or parts thereof, contrary to the covenant thereinbefore contained for payment of the same, then and in such case it should be lawful for the defendant, his executors, administrators or assigns, to sell and dispose of the messuage or tenement, land and premises thereinbefore demised, or intended so to be, with their appurtenances, for all the remainder of the term thereby created, together or in parcels, and either by public sale or private contract, or partly by both, and as well before as after, and subject to any lease or letting which might have been granted or made of the premises respectively, under the power thereinbefore contained, for such price or prices as could reasonably be gotten for the same, and with, under and subject to such conditions and stipulations, as to title or otherwise, as the defendant, his executors, administrators or assigns, might deem expedient, with full power to buy in the same or any part or parts thereof respectively, and to abandon and vary the terms of any and every sale or agreement for or relating to the sale thereof, and to re-sell the premises so bought in, or as to which the contract should have been so abandoned, or any part or parts thereof, at any future auction or by private contract, with like powers from time to time of buying in, abandoning, varying and re-selling thereof, and in such manner as he or they should think advisable, without being liable for any loss occasioned thereby, or to demise, lease or let the several premises, or any part or parts thereof, for such term of years, or from year to year, or otherwise, and either with or without taking any fine for the same, and upon such terms and in such manner as he or they should think proper; and also, if they should think fit, to receive and take the rents and profits of the premises until sold; and also to make, do, give and execute all acts, deeds, receipts, assignments and assurances requisite for carrying every such sale, lease or letting into execution, either with or without the concurrence of Davis, his executors, administrators or assigns"; and it was thereby agreed and declared that "the receipt or receipts in writing of Lumsden Mackeson, his executors, administrators or assigns, for any money to arise from the said sale or sales, lease or leases, or otherwise payable to him or them by virtue of those presents, should effectually discharge the person or persons to whom the same should be given from being answerable or accountable for the misapplication or non-application, or from being in anywise bound to see to the application of the money therein respectively mentioned to be received, or from being bound or concerned to inquire into the necessity or propriety of any sale or sales, lease or leases, disposition or dispositions, which might be made by virtue of those presents."

On December 22, 1848, Lumsden Mackeson advanced to Davis the sum of 76*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*; on December 30, 1848, the further sum of 20*l.*; and on January 23, 1849, the further sum of 3*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*; making together the full further sum of 100*l.* agreed to be advanced by the defendant. Davis made default in payment of the said mortgage moneys and interest secured by the indenture of November 18, 1848, and afterwards became bankrupt. The defendant, on April 3, 1851, offered the property comprised in the mortgage for sale by public auction; but there were no bidders. On May 12, 1852, the defendant, by Edward Mackeson as his agent, entered into a contract with Henry Paine for the sale of the property for 550*l.*, a copy of which contract formed part of the case. (The contract simply stated that Paine had become purchaser of the property for 550*l.*)

the first part, Edward Mackeson of the second part, and Henry Paine of the third part,—after reciting, among other things, the indentures of October 17, 1848, and November 18, 1848, and that default had been made in the payment of the principal moneys and interest, and that the defendant, as mortgagee, and in pursuance of the power of sale in the indenture of November 18, 1848, contracted and agreed with and to Paine for the absolute sale to him of the messuage or tenement, land and premises mentioned in the indenture, at or for the price of 550*l.*, and that it had been agreed that the sum of 500*l.*, portion of the purchase-money of 550*l.*, should remain on mortgage of the premises, and should be secured as and in manner hereafter mentioned,—it was witnessed that, in pursuance and performance of the agreement, and in consideration of the sum of 50*l.* (portion of the purchase-money or sum of 550*l.* paid by Paine to the defendant), and also in consideration of the covenant thereinafter contained for payment of the sum of 500*l.*, the residue of the purchase-money or sum of 550*l.*, the defendant, in pursuance of the power or authority reposed in him by the indenture of November 18, 1848, as such mortgagee as aforesaid, and of every other power and authority in anywise enabling him in that behalf, did, at the request of Paine, transfer and bargain, sell and assign unto Edward Makeson the messuage and premises comprised in the lease of October 17, 1848, as are comprised in and demised by the indenture of November 18, 1848, with the appurtenances, to hold the messuage and premises thereinbefore assigned, or intended so to be, subject to the rent, covenants, conditions and agreements reserved and contained in the indenture of October 17, 1848, but freed and discharged from all principal moneys and interest intended to be secured by the indenture of November 18, 1848, unto Edward Mackeson, upon certain trusts for sale in case Paine should make default in payment of the sum of 500*l.* and interest; and it was thereby declared that Edward Mackeson should stand possessed of the proceeds of sale upon trust, in the first place, to pay the costs of the sale; and, in the next place, to pay, retain and satisfy the sum of 500*l.* and interest; and lastly, to pay, or cause to be paid, the residue of the moneys unto Paine, or other the person or persons for the time being entitled to the same, or as he or they should appoint; and it was thereby declared and agreed that, upon satisfaction of the trust, Edward Mackeson should assign the premises to Paine, and Paine thereby, amongst other things, covenanted for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, that he, his executors, administrators and assigns, should and would well and truly pay, or cause to be paid unto the defendant, his executors, administrators or assigns, the principal sum of 500*l.* and interest for the same after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum in manner following: that was to say, 100*l.* part of the principal sum and interest for the whole thereof at the rate aforesaid, on May 15, 1853, and the like sum of 100*l.*, other part of the principal sum, on May 15 in each succeeding year, until the whole of the principal sum should be paid, with interest at the rate aforesaid for so much of the principal sum as should from time to time remain unpaid; and in default of payment, it should be lawful for Edward Mackeson, at the request of the defendant, to sell and dispose of the messuage or tenement and premises,

The draft of the indenture of May 15, 1852, was perused by an independent solicitor on behalf of Paine, and he paid the 50*l.* mentioned in the deed on the execution of the deed. Paine was let into the possession of the premises, and he personally occupied them until some time after his bankruptcy hereinafter mentioned. During the time of his occupancy, Paine paid the ground-rent payable under the lease, and he also insured and repaired the premises. Paine paid the interest on the sum of 500*l.* referred to in the assignment to him, and paid 200*l.* on account of the principal. This sum of 200*l.* was paid as follows: May 12, 1852, 50*l.*; June 20, 1853, 50*l.*; May 1, 1854, 100*l.* The defendant credited the whole sum of 550*l.* to Davis. As before stated, there was a much larger sum due to the defendant, and Davis was bankrupt. His estate paid no dividend and there were no assets. The defendant did not prove under Davis's estate for the balance due to him.

on security of the property. On the occasion of the advance, a deed was executed, whereby Paine charged the premises with the payment of 150*l*. in addition to the 350*l*. due on the prior mortgage.

Paine made default in payment of the principal and interest secured by the indenture of July 7, 1854, and afterwards became bankrupt.

In the month of December, 1859, the defendant agreed to sell the premises to Mr. Luke James Marshall for 425*l*.

By an indenture dated December 14, 1859, and made between Edward Mackeson of the first part, the defendant of the second part, and Marshall of the third part, and which indenture was duly executed by the defendant and all the parties thereto, after reciting amongst other things the indentures of October 17, 1848, November 18, 1848, May 15, 1852, and July 7, 1854, Edward Mackeson, for the considerations therein mentioned, at the request of the defendant, assigned and the defendant confirmed unto Luke James Marshall the premises comprised in and demised by the above-mentioned indenture of lease of October 17, 1848, and assigned by the above-mentioned indenture of May 15, 1852, to hold to Marshall, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the residue then to come of the term of 108 years, except the last five days thereof, subject as therein mentioned, and thereby they, Edward Mackeson and the defendant, entered into the usual covenant that they had done nothing to incumber the premises.

Marshall took possession of the premises pursuant to the last-mentioned deed, and in or about the month of September, 1863, agreed to sell them to the plaintiff for 700*l*. By indenture, dated September 18, 1863, and made between Luke James Marshall of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, which indenture was duly executed by all the parties thereto, Marshall, in consideration of 700*l*., assigned unto the plaintiff the premises demised by the lease, to hold to the plaintiff for the residue then to come of the term of 108 years, less the last five days, subject as therein mentioned.

On the execution of this deed the plaintiff paid to Marshall the purchase-money of 700*l*., and was let into possession of the premises.

At the time of entering into the contract for purchase, and at the time of paying his purchase-money, the plaintiff had no personal knowledge of the contract of May 12, 1852, nor of any of the facts mentioned in this case, except so far as such facts are disclosed by the several deeds. Messrs. Mackeson & Goldring acted as the solicitors of the defendant in all the transactions entered into by him with respect to the property as above set forth. They also acted as the solicitors of Marshall with respect to the property, and also to the plaintiff's solicitors in preparing the indenture of September 18, 1863; and they were then aware of all the circumstances stated in the case, but did not communicate to the plaintiff the objection as to the title, if any, created by the deed of May 15, 1852. On the completion of the purchase from Marshall, all the original deeds set out in this case were delivered to the plaintiff, and they have ever since been, and are now in his possession, or in the possession of those claiming under him. The plaintiff has since the date of his purchase continued, and he is now, in the occupation of the premises. No application, process or proceeding of any kind has been taken or made by or on behalf of any person or persons whomsoever in any way to interfere with the beneficial occupation or enjoyment of the premises by the plaintiff; but upon the plaintiff's attempting to raise money upon the security of the premises, he was met by the objection that his title was bad for the reasons alleged in the declaration in this action.

It is agreed between the parties that the Court shall be at liberty to draw any inferences and find any facts which, in the opinion of the Court, a jury ought to have drawn or found.

The demurrer to the first breach is to be argued at the same time as the special case.

The questions for the consideration of the Court are, first, is the plaintiff entitled to succeed on the first breach in the declaration? Secondly, is the plaintiff entitled to succeed on the second breach in the declaration?

Digitized by Google

If the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on either breach, the third question for the opinion of the Court is, what is the proper measure of damages, and upon which of the items in the particulars of damage delivered in the action is the plaintiff entitled to recover?[1]

If the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on either breach, the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand, but for such an amount of damages only as shall be agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendant, or as shall be assessed (subject to the opinion to be expressed by the Court upon the third question above submitted) by the arbitrator. But if the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed on either of the breaches alleged in the declaration, then the verdict for the plaintiff is to be set aside, and a verdict to be entered for the defendant.

Joshua Williams, of the Chancery bar (Beresford with him), for the plaintiff. —There are two questions in this case: first, whether the power of sale in the mortgage-deed was properly executed by the sale in 1852; secondly, whether the defendant has committed a breach of his covenant against incumbrances in the deed of 1859. The first question is somewhat bare of authority; but looking at the jealous control which Courts of equity have always exercised over mortgage transactions, it is submitted that the power of sale ought to be strictly exercised, and that a sale which continues the mortgagee in the ownership of the property is not lawful. The obvious intention of the parties to the original mortgage was that there should be a power of selling for ready money only, and that the property should not be employed for the purpose of fresh mortgages. Here the mortgagee has used the power for his own convenience, and although he, no doubt, meant to act legally he was guilty of what was in strictness a fraud on the power. It is the same as if he himself had bought back the property within a week, which would clearly have been illegal—Robertson v. Norris (1 Giff. 421). Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) may perhaps be relied upon by the other side. But this case is no direct authority, as is shewn by Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit. 66, where Lord St. Leonards says, "In Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) it seems to have been considered that under such a power of sale a part of the purchase-money may be left on mortgage, but this point did not arise, as the mortgage was a distinct transaction, and the mortgagee who sold submitted to be charged with the whole of the purchase-money, and that one of the Lords Justices considered was the proper course." In Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) the power of sale in the mortgage deed was to sell the premises either together or in parcels, and by public sale or private contract, without the consent of the mortgagor, for the best price in money that could be reasonably obtained for the same, and to buy in when offered for sale, and to make and execute all necessary contracts with and conveyances unto or according to the direction of the purchaser or purchasers of the same hereditaments and premises respectively. It appeared that the mortgagee in selling the property allowed part of the purchase-money to remain outstanding on a mortgage. Lord Justice Knight Bruce says, "It was said that the arrangement by which part of the purchase-money was suffered to remain on a mortgage of the property sold was such as to reduce the price, and was otherwise unjustifiable. But that arrangement appears to me to have increased rather than diminished the price, if the price was at all affected by it. Nor can I say that it is beyond the right or authority of a mortgagee, with a power of sale, to effect a sale of which one of the terms shall be that even a considerable portion of the purchase-money shall be allowed to remain on mortgage of the property, that mortgage being as between the seller and those entitled to the equity of redemption, at the seller's risk, that is, he charging himself with the whole amount of the purchase-money in account with them, as has been done in the present instance." But the judgment of Lord Justice Turner is to a different effect. His Lordship says, "The agreement was that the mortgagee would either allow this part of the purchase-money to remain on mortgage or would procure the amount for the purchaser on mortgage; and it appears that the transaction was carried into effect by a mortgage being made by the defendant to a person who was believed on his part to have actually advanced the money. I doubt, therefore, whether this objection on the part of the plaintiff at all arises. But, supposing it to arise, I find on referring to the power of sale in the mortgage-deed that all arrangements made by the mortgagee are to be as binding as if the mortgagor had concurred, and I think, therefore, that this objection is wholly untenable." In the present case, the clause as to the receipt discharging the purchaser from seeing to the application of the purchase-money, shews that there could only be a sale for ready money.

[LUSH, J.—The clause as to the receipt only relieves the purchaser from seeing to the application of the purchase-money. It does not give the mortgagor greater rights. Must not the mortgagor be taken to have had the benefit of the whole amount of the purchase-money?]

It does not appear that the mortgagor was credited with the amount of the purchase-money.

[Mellish, for the defendant, drew attention to the fact that the property was conveyed freed and discharged from the principal, &c., secured by the first mortgage.]

With regard to the second question, it is submitted that the sale was conducted in such a manner as to be an act which might prejudicially affect the property. A covenant against incumbrances may be implied from the recitals in the deed of 1859.—He cited Stroughill v. Buck (14 Q. B. Rep. 781; 19 L. J. Q.B. 209); Lady Cavan v. Pulteney (2 Ves. 544); Severn and Clerke's case (1 Leo. 122); Calvert v. Sebright (15 Beav. 156); Bac. Abr., tit. "Covenant," (a.), Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit. 603.

Mellish (Gray, and W. W. Mackeson, of the Chancery bar, with him), for the defendant.—It is stated in the case as an admitted fact that there was a valid contract of sale. The power of sale in the mortgage-deed is not required for the purpose of making a good title at law to the property, but only for the purpose of barring the equity of redemption. This equity of redemption is barred as soon as there is a valid contract of sale, and it cannot matter how the conveyance is made. It is the settled practice in equity that in a suit for specific performance the mortgagor need not be made a party—see Corder v. Morgan (18 Ves. 344). This shews that in equity the contract constitutes the sale, and it cannot concern the mortgagor how it is carried out. This Court will only consider the question whether the title is good or bad. After crediting the mortgagor with the whole amount of the purchase-money the mortgagee, in an action on the covenant, could not have resisted a plea of payment nor could he have proved on the mortgagor's estate in bankruptcy.

[LUSH, J.—And if the amount of the purchase-money had exceeded the principal which was due, the mortgagor could have sued in equity for the balance.]

Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) is an authority in favour of the defendant. It is true that Turner, L.J., in that case refers to the clause by which arrangements by the mortgagee are to be as binding as if the mortgagor had concurred; but it does not follow that his decision turned upon that clause. Whether the purchase-money is paid down to the mortgagee or credited by him to the mortgagor cannot make a farthing's difference.

The COURT then called on the plaintiff's counsel to reply to the first point.

Joshua Williams, in reply.—It is admitted that there was a valid contract of sale, but though the parties agreed to sell according to the power in the mortgage-deed the transaction which followed was not a sale. The cases cited shew the importance of confining the mortgagee to the terms of his power. If the property had realized a surplus over the amount due it would be of great importance that the mortgagee should have the money in his hands to hand over to the mortgagor, as the second mortgagor might turn out to be an unsubstantial person.

LUSH, J.—The opinion which we have formed on the question which Mr. Williams has just argued makes it unnecessary to give any decision on the construction of the covenant in the deed of 1859, as we are clearly of opinion that the power of sale was duly exercised, so that there is an end of the case.

The question is, whether the mortgagee's power to sell on default of payment of the principal and interest was duly carried into effect by him. If it was so carried out the right of the mortgagor to redeem was barred. This power of sale is given in very extensive terms, and is not fettered by any such restrictions as those for which Mr. Williams has contended. The power of sale is in these terms.—[The learned Judge read the power of sale, including the proviso as to the mortgagees receipt discharging the purchaser.]—Now, Mr. Williams contends that the stipulation that the receipt of the mortgagee shall discharge the purchaser from seeing to the application of the purchase-money amounts to a restriction on the power, and makes it imperative on the mortgagee to enable him properly to execute the power that he should sell for money paid down, and give a receipt for the money. But I think that there is no such restriction on the power. The stipulation as to the receipt is an additional power given to the mortgagee, and is intended to facilitate the sale by not binding the purchaser in equity to see to the application of the purchase-money, and discharging him from any such obligation.

The only question is, therefore, has that power been bonâ fide exercised? I quite agree that if, under the pretence of a sale, there was some contrivance by which the mortgagee should clothe himself with the absolute, though not apparent, ownership, and this was done with the intention of barring the mortgagor of his equity of redemption, that the sale would not be valid. But the question is always, was the sale bonâ fide? if it is, then no matter how the payment is made, the mortgagor's right is barred. Mr. Williams admits that when the contract of sale was entered into it was a valid contract, and the right of the mortgagor was so far barred; but then he contends that the contract was afterwards varied so that the sale was not carried out. Now, it is quite conceivable that after such a contract had been made the parties might have come to a collusive arrangement. The mortgagee might have said, "I do not want you to have the property; I would rather keep it myself." And there might have been an understanding that the purchaser should not keep the property, but should convey it back to the owner. But I cannot find any evidence to lead to the conclusion, nor can I conceive it possible, that this was the intention of the parties here. After the contract was made it appears that the purchaser did not find it convenient to pay the whole of the money at once, and there was an agreement that a portion of the purchase-money should remain due on a mortgage of the property, and the mortgagee, in order to secure himself, instead of conveying the property over to the buyer, conveyed it to a trustee, upon trust to sell it in case the purchaser should make default in the payment of the purchase-money. This was merely a mode of carrying out the original contract of sale, which the parties had a perfect right to adopt, but which in no way concerned the mortgagor. So that the sale itself was carried out in the way in which the law allows it to be carried out. Mr. Williams contends that a mortgagee cannot exercise a power of sale of this description unless he receives the whole of the purchase-money; and that where the bargain is that the greater part of the money is to remain on mortgage, that there the power has not been duly executed. If any authority in equity had been cited to shew that the right of redemption was not under such circumstances extinguished, we should, of course, have been bound to hold that this title was incumbered. But in the only way in which I can look upon the case of Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) it appears to me stronger than the present one, for there the contract of sale provided that a portion of the purchase-money was not to be paid, and therefore the original bargain was not such a one as was made here. But even in that case the sale was held to be good, and a bonâ fide exercise of the power. We were referred to a very high authority (Lord St. Leonards), but I do not take the remarks of that very learned person in the sense which

Mr. Williams does, but rather as intimating that there may be a transaction, apparently a sale, but which is in reality not a sale, and which would be no execution of the power. He says that in Davey v. Durrant (1 De Gex & J. 535; 26 L. J. Ch. 830) the sale and the agreement as to the purchase-money were distinct transactions. There was a real sale, and therefore a real execution of the power. I think that upon the proper construction of the original mortgage this sale was a bonâ fide transaction, and it is the vendee who in reality mortgages the premises to secure the purchase-money. The right of redemption has therefore been destroyed, and the title is in no way incumbered.

Lien—Attorney—Costs.

SOLICITOR. K.—The lien of an attorney for costs is confined to cases where there are fruits of the litigation actually acquired, such as a clean verdict or a judgment or an acknowledgment of a debt; but the Court will not interfere to cause it to attach where after verdict and before judgment a rule for a new trial has been obtained, so as to prevent a settlement of the action between the parties, without prior satisfaction of the attorney's costs.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff and the defendant to shew cause why they or one of them should not pay to Mr. John Morrison, the plaintiff's attorney, his costs in this action, to be taxed by one of the Masters.

The plaintiff was a costermonger, and a pauper; the defendant was a contractor for public works; and the action was brought to recover compensation for personal injuries received by the plaintiff in consequence of his falling down a cutting not sufficiently protected by planking.

The action was tried, before a special jury, at Guildhall, on February 26, 1868, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for 25*l.* damages. The defendant, on April 19, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. This rule had not yet been reached, and therefor had not been argued. The plaintiff subsequently called, on August 10 following, on the defendant, Mr. Pearson, at his counting-house, and asked him to settle the action, as he was starving. The defendant gave him 10*l.* and took a receipt from him for the 10*l.* in settlement of the action and solicitor's charges, in full of all demands. On the 20th of the same month (August), Morrison (the plaintiff's attorney) wrote to the defendant's attorney, stating that he had a lien for his costs on the damages. On September 4, Morrison took out a summons calling upon the defendant to pay his costs, in consequence of his having fraudulently and collusively compromised the action, after verdict, with the plaintiff in person. The Judge refused to make any order, and indorsed the summons, "No order."

Hance (O. B. C. Harrison with him) now shewed cause against the rule on behalf of the defendant.—Where a judgment has been obtained, the Court has interfered to protect the attorney's lien for costs; but here no judgment has ever been got, and a rule has been obtained to set aside the verdict and for a new trial.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Are there any cases where the distinction has been made between the progress of the cause whilst the client is dominus litis and the period subsequent to the judgment?]

The cases are collected in 1 Chitt. Arch. Practice, p. 136, 11th ed. It is there said that the lien is only a claim to the equitable interference of the Court, and confines it to cases of judgments recovered, or money or costs awarded or ordered to be paid to the client in a cause where the attorney has been engaged. It is also said there that even after notice of his lien given to the opposite party or his attorney, the parties may compromise before verdict or judgment without regard to the attorney's claim for costs. Barker v. St. Quintin (12 Mee. & W. 441; 13 L. J. Ex. 144) was an action against a sheriff for false imprisonment, and the sheriff justified under a ca. sa., and there was a replication that before the writ was delivered or executed the plaintiff in the former action released the debt and gave notice to the sheriff, and forbade him to execute the writ. To this it was rejoined that the attorney of the plaintiff in the former action had a lien on the judgment for his fees, and that while the judgment stood and the fees were unpaid the release of the now plaintiff, the then defendant, and the then plaintiff was collusively and fraudulently agreed upon to defraud the attorney, and that the defendant had notice of the same, and was commanded by the attorney to excute the writ, and it was held that the rejoinder was bad, and there was judgment for the plaintiff. Lord Abinger there said, "The attorney is not the dominus litis, so as to marshal the proceedings on the judgment or the execution, as he may think fit." In Quested v. Callis (10 Mee. & W. 18; 11 L. J. Ex. 345) it was held that the attorney of a defendant has no right to prevent the defendant compromising the action without his consent. In Clark v. Smith (6 Man. & G. 1051; 13 L. J. C.P. 97), where the plaintiff and the defendant compromised the action after verdict for the plaintiff, and after the defendant had expressed his intention to move for a new trial, and the attorney proceeded to tax costs and sign judgment after notice of the compromise, the judgment was set aside. And the Court there said, nothing but clear proof of collusion between the parties would invalidate the compromise, and it lay upon the attorney to satisfy them of the collusion, which he then failed to do. Ex parte Hart (1 B. & Ad. 660) is to the same effect, and there the compromise was after notice of the lien and after notice of trial. Here there was no collusion, and the evidence of any notice of lien is unsatisfactory.

Willis, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff is no doubt dominus litis, and the compromise might be good if it were made bonâ fide; but where there is collusion, the Court will interfere to protect the attorney at any stage of the proceedings. In Ex parte Games (3 Hurls. & C. 294; 33 L. J. Ex. 317), after declaration, the plaintiff executed a release to the defendant, and gave his own attorney notice not to proceed. The release was pleaded; to this plea there was a replication confessing the release; judgment was signed for the costs, and a writ of execution issued. Notice was given by the plaintiff to the sheriff not to issue execution; thereupon the plaintiff's attorney obtained a Judge's order calling upon the plaintiff or the defendant to pay his costs, and the Court held the order to be properly made.

[BLACKBURN, J.—There appeared to be collusion in that case, but in the present case I see nothing at all like collusion.]

In Gould v. Davis (1 Cr. & J. 415; 9 L. J. Ex. 111), where the plaintiff and the defendant collusively settled an action, by the latter depositing a bill of exchange in the hands of a third party, the Court ordered the bill to be given up to the plaintiff's attorney. Bayley, B., says, "If the cause went on, the attorney would have had a lien on the fruits of the action." Here instead of a judgment a security is obtained, an undertaking by the defendant to pay at some future day. Part of this is clearly in satisfaction of the claim of the plaintiff's attorney.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That case seems to me to have gone on the ground that there were fruits of the litigation obtained by the attorney's exertions, and therefore they ought to pass through his hands.]

BLACKBURN, J.—This rule must be discharged. An attorney who has conducted a cause, and by the fruits of his exertions has obtained judgment, has a right to have the amount for which judgment has been obtained pass through his hands. This lien does not amount to an equitable assignment, but the Court will protect it where the judgment has been obtained and the fruits of the judgment acquired, and it sees that a proper case for its interference is made out. Where collusion appears, and the object is that the plaintiff should get more than he otherwise would, and the attorney should get less, the Court will interfere; but those are cases where the fruits of the judgment have been actually obtained. I do not say that it is a conclusive test that the judgment should be signed. Ex parte Games (3 Hurls. & C. 294; 33 L. J. Ex. 317) was the case of an actual judgment, and costs in respect of the judgment; and I should say that if there was a clean verdict, and nothing to be done but judgment to be signed, that case would not necessarily differ from the one where judgment has actually been signed. So in cases where there is an agreed debt obtained by the exertions of the attorney, and so much agreed to be given for the debt, and so much for the costs, if the attorney did not get his costs he would be defrauded; but here the plaintiff is a pauper, and obtained a verdict for 25*l.*, but a rule nisi for a new trial was obtained on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that rule would never have been granted unless the Judge had disapproved of it, considering the smallness of the amount of damages. Here these matters were at such a stage that it was doubtful whether the plaintiff would ultimately proceed, and the plaintiff was still dominus litis. The litigation had not arrived at the stage where the attorney had succeeded, and the fruits were ready to be gathered by his client. Beyond this, the defendant had good reason to give the 10*l.* It would save him from a new trial, and that was a sufficient reason, irrespective of the suggested motive, to deprive the attorney of costs. It was not at all a case of getting hold of the fruits of the judgment. Unless we lay down the rule that where an attorney commences litigation with a pauper for his client, that he has from that moment the power of preventing the plaintiff and the defendant settling the action except on the terms of discharging his lien for costs, we must discharge this rule. We are not prepared to go so far, and therefore this rule must be discharged.

Vendor and Purchaser—Abstract of Title—Objections to Deed from which Title is to commence—Conditions of Sale.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER. A.—Property described in the conditions of sale as a freehold residence was purchased at a sale by private contract. One of the terms of these conditions was, "the abstract of title will commence with a conveyance, dated April 17, 1860, and no purchaser shall investigate or take any objection in respect of the title prior to the commencement of the abstract." The deed in question conveyed the property in fee subject to the covenants and conditions in a deed of 1850. What these covenants and conditions were did not appear:—Held, that the defendants had not deduced a title to the property in compliance with their contract, as they were bound notwithstanding the conditions to shew that a clear freehold title passed by the conveyance of 1860.

This was an action to recover damages for the alleged non-performance by the defendants of a contract of sale by them to the plaintiff of a freehold residence, and by consent of the parties a CASE, of which the following is the material part, was stated for the opinion of the Court:

On June 5, 1867, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants for the purchase by the plaintiff from the defendants of a house described as a freehold residence, No. 2, Lombardian Villas, St. Mary's Road, Peckham, being lot 2. referred to in the particulars and conditions of sale, for 600*l.*, subject to certain conditions of sale, and paid a deposit of 120*l.*

By the third of these conditions the vendor was, within four days after the sale, to deliver to the purchaser an abstract of title of the premises. The fifth condition was as follows:

The abstract of title to lots 1, 2. and 3. (being the freehold portion of the property) will commence with a conveyance, dated April 17, 1860, and no purchaser shall investigate or take any objection in respect of the title prior to the commencement of the abstract."

On June 11, 1867, the defendants delivered to the plaintiff a document entitled "An Abstract of the Title of Mr. Simon Caldcleugh and Thomas Dunckley to freehold situate and being No. 2, Lombardian Villas," &c. This abstract commenced with a deed, dated April, 1860, between William Tomkinson Riley, Alexander Brodie Cochrane, and William Pearson of the one part, and Edward Mathews and George Beckett of the other part. This deed recited that by indenture, dated March 2, 1850, Richard Edmunds assigned to Eli Richards a parcel of ground in St. Giles's, Camberwell, with the messuages erected upon it; that Richards became bankrupt in April, 1855, and in August, 1855, under the authority of the Court of Bankruptcy, executed a conveyance of all his real estate to the use of trustees in fee; that the trustees had contracted with Edward Mathews and George Beckett for the sale to them of the hereditaments thereinafter described in fee simple, subject, so far as the same premises were subject thereto, to the covenants and conditions on the part of the grantee, his heirs and assigns, in the indenture of March 2, 1850, and to the payment of the apportioned rentcharge in lieu of tithes (if any), but free from all other incumbrances.

The property was then conveyed by the trustees to Mathews and Beckett as tenants in common in fee, subject to the several covenants and conditions in the indenture of March 2, 1850, and subject to the payment of the apportioned rentcharge in lieu of tithes (if any), and Mathews and Beckett covenanted with the assignors to perform these covenants and conditions so far as they related to the property conveyed.

The abstract concluded by deducting title from Mathews and Beckett to the defendants.

The plaintiff required the vendors to shew, notwithstanding any of the conditions of sale, that the covenants and conditions contained in the indenture of March 2, 1850, and referred to in the first abstracted deed, did not in any manner affect the property comprised in lot 2, and that the purchaser incurred no liability in respect of them, but the vendors declined to go further back in the title than April 17, 1860, and referred the plaintiff to the fifth condition.

The plaintiff refused to accept the title, and brought an action to recover the damages for the non-performance of the contract.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for such interest as the Master should assess, with the costs; if in the negative, judgment was to be entered for the defendants, with costs.

Dowdeswell (Raymond with him), for the defendants.—There has been no breach of the conditions of sale. This was a purchase by private contract, so that the purchasers had an opportunity of looking into the deed of 1860 before they purchased the property. It was the intention of the defendants to sell the interest which they had, and nothing more, and this intention is disclosed on the conditions of sale. In Souter v. Drake (5 B. & Ad. 992; 3 L. J. K.B. 31) it was held that unless there be a stipulation to the contrary, there is, in every contract for the sale of an existing lease, an implied undertaking to make out the lessor's title to demise as well as that of the vendor to the lease itself. But there were here no negative words limiting the right to take objections to the title.

[HANNEN, J.—You should have provided that the vendor must be satisfied with the title on the face of the deed of 1860.]

In Spratt v. Jeffrey (10 B. & C. 249), where leases were sold by the lessor "as he holds the same, and the vendee agreed to accept an assignment without requiring the lessor's title," it was held that the vendee was to purchase without inquiring into the title of the lessor, and could not refuse to complete because of an objection to that title. When the defendants say, "We produce our title under the deed of 1860," they in effect say, "We furnish that title as it appears on the deed of 1860, and nothing more."

He cited Corrall v. Cattell (4 Mee. & W. 734; 8 L. J. Ex. 225) and Hanks v. Pulling (6 E. & B. 659; 25 L. J. Q.B. 375).

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Unfortunately for the defendants they have not, in my opinion, framed the conditions of sale so as to shew what they really meant to convey. The contract is for the sale of a freehold residence, and if there had been no conditions of sale the purchaser would have been entitled to a full written title. The question is, to what extent the conditions qualify this right. Now, the fifth of these conditions is that—[the learned Judge read the condition]—so that it is provided that the abstract shall commence with a certain conveyance. It is no doubt intended to restrict the right of inquiry, and not to allow it during any period prior to the date of the conveyance; but this leaves the purchaser still entitled to have a freehold title disclosed on the face of the conveyance. I quite agree that if it had been a question whether this was an error or mis-statement which only gave the purchaser a right to compensation, the case might have been different. Well, the deed of 1860, when produced, shews that this property is conveyed in fee, subject to certain covenants and conditions contained in a deed of 1850, without intimating what they are. It therefore clearly does not shew the title to which the plaintiff was entitled under the sale, but a title encumbered with conditions of which no one knows anything. The purchaser is therefore called upon to take property which, for aught he knows, may be subject to a right of way, or liable to receive drainage upon it, or may be subject to covenants restricting the use of the house, and otherwise impeding the enjoyment of the property. Therefore, without trenching on any of the cases cited, we must hold that the limitation in the contract is to prevent the purchaser from taking any objection to the title prior to the deed of 1860, but that he must have a good title on the face of this deed. If he had referred to some of the cases which have been cited he would have had no difficulty in framing conditions according to his understanding of the contract.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Dowdeswell very properly said that the question for us to consider is, what is the meaning of the parties, so far as it can be gathered from the fifth condition? It seems to me that the objection taken by the plaintiff is not avoided by the language of the parties entering into this agreement. The plaintiff is not seeking to investigate the title prior to this abstract, but he proposes to inquire into the title really conveyed by the deed of 1860. It is necessary, in order that he should know whether he had a good title under that deed, that the nature of the deed should be disclosed. But for this purpose the covenants and conditions subject to which the property is conveyed should be forthcoming, otherwise it is impossible to know what contract the parties are making.

Landlord and Tenant—Implied Contract—Delivery of Possession—Under-Tenant holding over—Damages—Ejectment—Pleading—Amendment—Payment into Court.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—The defendant held a house and premises as tenant of the plaintiff, but without any lease or written agreement. He let part of the house to T, and, having received notice to quit on December 25, 1866, he gave notice to T. to quit on December 21. T. refused to go out; the defendant did all in his power to give up possession. The plaintiff brought an action of ejectment against him and T; judgment was signed on May 21, 1867, and on May 29 possession was given by the sheriff to the plaintiff:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover rent for one half-year, and also the costs of the ejectment, on the ground that there was an implied contract that the defendant would deliver up the absolute possession of the house and premises at the expiration of the tenancy.

PRACTICE. L.—The declaration contained a special count, alleging that the defendant was tenant upon the terms that he should at the determination of the tenancy give up possession to the plaintiff; that the tenancy was duly determined, yet that the defendant did not give up possession, whereby, &c. The defendant pleaded to this count, payment of 40*s. into Court*:—

The Court, being of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, the defendant could not have intended to admit that the plaintiff was entitled to recover more than the sum of 40*s., intimated that it would, if necessary, allow such an amendment as would leave the defendant at liberty to deny that there had been a breach of the contract alleged in the count.*

The first count of the declaration stated, that the defendant broke and entered a messuage and land of the plaintiff, that is to say, all that messuage being No. 73, Wardour Street, in the parish of St. James, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, together with the stable, outbuildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, and ejected the plaintiff from his possession thereof and kept him so ejected for a long time, and during that time took and received to the use of the defendant all the issues and profits, and the beneficial use and occupation of the said messuage, stable, outbuildings and appurtenances, whereby the plaintiff during all that time lost and was deprived of the issues and profits, and the beneficial use and occupation thereof, and was prevented from letting the same, and incurred great expense in recovering the possession of the said messuage, stable, outbuildings and appurtenances.

The second count alleged that the defendant became and was tenant to the plaintiff of a messuage, stable, outbuildings and premises, with the appurtenances, upon the terms (amongst other things) that the defendant should at the determination of the said tenancy give up possession thereof to the plaintiff, and the said tenancy was duly determined: Yet the defendant did not, at the determination thereof, give up possession of the said messuage stable, outbuildings and premises, with the appurtenances, to the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff lost the use and profits of the said messuage, stable, outbuildings and premises, with the appurtenances, and incurred expense in recovering possession of the same.

Pleas—First, to the first count, not guilty; secondly, to the second count, the defendant brings into Court the sum of 40*s*. and says that that sum is enough to satisfy the claim of the plaintiff in respect of the matter herein pleaded to.

Joinder of issue.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at the Sittings in Middlesex after Michaelmas Term, 1867, it appeared that the defendant was tenant of a house of which the plaintiff was owner, and part of which he had let to James Turner. The defendant paid rent for it since 1858. His tenancy was determined at Christmas, 1866, and he gave notice to Turner to quit on December 21; but was unable to give up possession to the plaintiff in consequence of Turner refusing to go out. The plaintiff accordingly, on May 4, 1867, brought an action of ejectment against the defendant and Turner. Judgment was signed on May 21, and on the 28th, Turner having previously refused to attorn to the plaintiff, a writ of possession was executed by the sheriff. The present action was then commenced to recover the amount of half a year's rent, and also the amount of the costs of the ejectment. The half-year's rent, deducting the 2*l*. paid into Court, was proved to be 40*l*. 10*s*., and the amount of the costs 13*l*. 10*s*. The learned Judge ordered the verdict to be entered for the defendant, but gave leave to move to set that verdict aside and enter a verdict instead thereof for the plaintiff, for the said sums of 40*l*. 10*s*. and 13*l*. 10*s*., or either of them, as the Court should direct.

Hawkins subsequently moved for and obtained a rule accordingly.

Field and Cave shewed cause against the rule.—The defendant had a right to let the rooms to Turner, and is not liable in this action at the suit of the plaintiff. Turner cannot be said to be his agent, inasmuch as he held the premises over without the consent of the defendant, and was a wrongdoer, there being no new contract with the plaintiff.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But is there not in the contract of tenancy an implied contract that the tenant will give up possession to the landlord at the end of his tenancy?]

No; not in the case of a simple demise of this kind. The only authority to that effect is Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57), which will be relied on by the other side, but that case differs from the present in respect of the demise being by lease, and also in respect of the action being in assumpsit for use and occupation. In a lease there would be a specific contract by the tenant to quit and deliver up possession at the end of the term; but here there was no obligation to deliver up possession. The contract between the parties amounts to this: the landlord says, "I will allow you to occupy the house up to the determination of the tenancy"; and the tenant says, "I will pay you rent up to that time."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Suppose the case of a book which is lent for a week: it must be delivered up at the end of the week; it would be no answer if the borrower were to say, I have lent it to another person and cannot get it back. BLACKBURN, J.—In Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57), Lord Kenyon's opinion upon the general proposition, irrespective of the demise being by lease, is very clear.]

[Hawkins here interposed, and said that upon the pleadings the contract was admitted; but the COURT intimated an opinion that, if necessary, the plea of the defendant might be amended, so as to shew that the admission by the payment into Court was limited to the sum of 40*s*., which it thought could not have been paid into Court in respect of the possession of the house not having been delivered up at the determination of the tenancy, and that therefore there would be no admission of the contract as set out in the declaration. The plea might be so amended as to leave the defendant at liberty to deny that there had been a breach of the contract alleged in the second count. In fact, no amendment was made, as the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, making the rule absolute.]

There is no case where the defendant has been held to be liable except where the holding over has been by his consent. Christy v. Tancred (7 Mee. & W. 127; 10 L. J. Ex. 229: also 9 Mee. & W. 438; 11 L. J. Ex. 109; in error, 12 Mee. & W. 316) was a case where premises were let to two persons, and one of them held over, after the expiration of the term, with the assent of the other, and it was held that both were liable, Lord Abinger, C.B. saying, " The case of two tenants is a stronger one than that of a tenant and an under-tenant: both in effect hold over till both deliver up possession." And Parke, B. said that he doubted whether there was not a distinction between the case of a co-tenant and that of an under-tenant. In Draper v. Crofts (15 Mee. & W. 166; 15 L. J. Ex. 92), which was also a case of co-tenants, one of whom held over without the consent of the other, it was decided that the latter was not liable for rent becoming due during such holding over. In Doe v. Harlow (12 Ad. & E. 40) the defendant was held liable for mesne profits for the period during which his sub-tenant held over, but he had received rent from such sub-tenant, and had declared that he was his tenant when the plaintiff demanded possession. It is also submitted that the costs of the ejectment cannot be recovered.

Hawkins and Raymond, in support of the rule, were not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I abide by the law as laid down by Lord Kenyon in Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57), that where there is a demise of a house or premises there is an undertaking by the tenant that he will at the expiration of the term deliver up possession to the landlord. This has been considered to be the law ever since that decision was given. It is referred to as law in the different text books. Woodfall, in his book on Landlord and Tenant, 6th edit. p. 322, says, " A tenant remains liable for rent unless he delivers up complete possession of the premises, or the landlord accepts of another in his room," and he cites Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57) as an authority for that proposition. Then there is the case of Christy v. Tancred (7 Mee. & W. 127; 10 L. J. Ex. 229; also 9 Mee. & W. 438; 11 L. J. Ex. 109: in error, 12 Mee. & W. 316), which is not indeed on all fours with Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57), being a case of a co-tenant holding over, but in which the doctrine laid down in Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57) was adopted by Parke, B. without an intimation of the slightest doubt—see the report 7 Mee. & W. 130. I think that we should be doing a great mischief by throwing any doubt whatever upon that doctrine. I can see a great distinction between the case of a co-tenant and that of an under-tenant; in the former the person who holds over has been let in by the lessor, but in the latter by the lessee only. The plaintiff therefore is entitled to recover, firstly, in respect of the possession not having been delivered up at the expiration of the term, and, secondly, in respect of the cost which he has been put to by reason of the action of ejectment which he has been obliged to bring as a necessary consequence to the not giving up possession at the expiration of the term.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The question is, whether there is not an implied contract by the tenant, not only to go out of possession, but also to restore the absolute possession to the landlord. The defendant did not secure that Turner should go out, and although there was no moral fault in that respect, yet if the law implies that when the landlord has given possession the tenant shall restore possession, the defendant must be responsible in damages. The first thing that strikes me is that if the tenant does not put his landlord in possession at the expiration of the term, he does not fulfil his contract. Then, in Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57), Lord Kenyon, C.J. said, " When a lease has expired, the tenant's responsibility is not at an end, for if the premises are in possession of an under-tenant, the landlord may refuse to accept the possession, and hold the original lessee liable, for the lessor is entitled to receive the absolute possession at the end of the term." Christy v. Tancred (7 Mee. & W. 127; 10 L. J. Ex. 229: also 9 Mee. & W. 438; 11 L. J. Ex. 109: in error, 12 Mee. & W. 316) was the case of a co-tenant holding over, and in that case the Court of Exchequer, including Parke, B., held that the co-tenants were liable in an action for use and occupation. In the same case, as reported 9 Mee. & W., p. 447, Parke, B. doubted whether there might not be a distinction between the case of a co-tenant and that of an under-tenant, but no doubt was ever raised whether Lord Kenyon was right in what he laid down. It is quite true that there is but little authority upon the matter, but after a long lapse of time there has been no decision to the contrary, and it strikes me as being most reasonable and natural that the tenant should be bound, at the expiration of the term, to restore the absolute possession which he had received from the lessor. Then, upon the question of damages, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the rent and the costs of the action of ejectment; we must take it that this was the best means of obtaining possession, and would therefore follow, as the necessary consequence of the act of the defendant, within the doctrine laid down by the Court of Exchequer[1].

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. In none of the cases which have been brought to our attention has the slightest doubt been thrown upon Lord Kenyon's ruling in Harding v. Crethorne (1 Esp. 57). That ruling has been acted upon ever since, and there is no authority against it, while, in addition, it is consistent with common sense and experience. It is usual to insert in a lease a covenant that the lessee will at the expiration of the term yield up the possession of the premises, but that is from abundant caution, and is not necessary; and the same expression is used in notices to quit. Then, there being an implied contract to deliver up possession, the damages to be recovered are those which are necessarily incident to the lessor getting possession. The proper and legitimate course was to bring an action of ejectment.

HAYES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule absolute.

Irish Bankrupt Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 60.)—Certificate—Protection—Arrest in England—Debt and Costs.

On November 20 the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt, on the petition of a creditor, in Dublin. On January 12, he obtained a first-class certificate, and also an order for protection from arrest. The certificate was retained in the Court, to allow of any creditors, within a month, appealing against its being granted. The plaintiff had, on October 2, commenced an action against the defendant, upon a promissory note given in respect of a debt owing from the defendant, and which the defendant had entered in his schedule. The defendant pleaded to the action, but did not appear at the trial, on December 10, when a verdict passed for the plaintiff. The costs were taxed on January 8, and the defendant was arrested on the 13*th, when he produced his order of protection*:—Held, dissenting from Maughan v. Vinesberg (37 L. J. C.P. 210), that, having obtained his certificate, the defendant was privileged from arrest in respect of the costs as well as of the debt, and that the arrest was unlawful.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Blackburn, J., ordering that he should be discharged out of custody, should not be rescinded.

It appeared from the affidavits, that the plaintiff and the defendant both carried on business in London. On October 2, 1868, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant upon a promissory-note. The defendant pleaded several pleas, but did not appear at the trial, on December 10, and a verdict was obtained by the plaintiff for 67*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* On January 8, 1869, the costs were taxed, a ca. sa. issued, and the defendant was arrested on the 13th. He then produced to the officer an order for protection issued by the Irish Court of Bankruptcy, dated January 12, and which was to remain in force until February 12. The officer refused to discharge him, and an application was made to Blackburn, J. to order his discharge. The affidavit upon which the order was granted, shewed that on November 20, 1868, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt in Ireland, upon the petition of one of his creditors. He entered the plaintiff in his schedule as a creditor in respect of the debt for which the action was brought. The last examination took place on January 12, and he then obtained an order of protection, which he produced upon his arrest, and also a first-class certificate, which remained in the Court, one month being allowed for any creditor to appear against the said certificate being granted. The learned Judge ordered that the defendant should be discharged, unless within four days a rule nisi was obtained to rescind his order.

Garth (Sharpe with him) shewed cause against the rule.—The defendant was entitled to his discharge, and the order of Blackburn, J. was right. The case relied on in moving for the rule was Phillips v. Allan (8 B. & C. 477), where it was held that a discharge in Scotland was no answer to an action in England; but that case was explained by Ferguson v. Spencer (1 Man. & G. 987; 10 L. J. C.P. 20), which decided that the personal estate of the bankrupt in England vested in the assignees appointed under the bankruptcy in Ireland. That decision was upon the repealed Act, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 14, but the terms of the present Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 60.) are similar. In delivering the judgment of the Court in Ferguson v. Spencer (1 Man. & G. 987; 10 L. J. C.P. 20), Tindal, C.J. referred to the case of Rogers v. Love (1 Huds. & Bro. 484), decided by the Irish Court of Exchequer, in these words: "The defendant traded in Ireland and England, and became indebted to persons residing in England, who issued a commission of bankruptcy against him under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16; he was also indebted to the plaintiff at the date of the issuing of the commission. The plaintiff's debt was contracted in Ireland. The defendant obtained his certificate in England, and gave notice of it to the plaintiff, who was also aware of the proceedings under the commission. The plaintiff arrested the defendant under a marked writ, and the defendant gave bail, and now moved that an exoneretur should be entered on the bail-piece on his entering a common appearance; and the motion was granted." In the present case the bankrupt was entitled to the protection afforded by the certificate as soon as it was completed on January 12.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We granted the rule because we were told that the final order of discharge had not been made at the time of the arrest, on the 13th.]

Shaw was then called upon to support the rule.—When the rule was moved for, it was understood that the final order had not been granted. It now appears that it had been completed, but inasmuch as, according to the practice in Ireland, it is retained in the Court for one month, it is submitted that the bankrupt is not entitled to the protection afforded by it until the expiration of that month.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—How can he be arrested here when he has obtained his final discharge in Ireland? When a man's debt has been discharged, he cannot be arrested for it. The debt with all its incidents is gone. Although he did not produce the certificate to the officer, the question now is, whether he can be liable to arrest when he has obtained his final certficate.]

The certificate remains in the Court, and is no protection.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It could not be intended that he should be kept imprisoned for the month during which the certificate remains in the Court. MELLOR, J.—Your argument amounts to this, that you may arrest him although the debt is discharged; but the cause of action is extinct; the protection is given that he may produce it to the officer while the certificate remains in the Court.]

But he is clearly not privileged from arrest with respect to the costs, however he may be with respect to the debt. The costs were not provable under the bankruptcy, and Maughan v. Vinesberg (37 L. J. C.P. 210; L. R. 3 C.P. 318) is an express authority to shew that he is not entitled to be discharged with respect to the costs. The two cases are exactly similar, except that in Maughan v. Vinesberg (37 L. J. C.P. 210; L. R. 3 C.P. 318) the bankruptcy took place in England.

Garth was then called upon to distinguish that case.—It may be difficult to distinguish it, but the decision is contrary to the law laid down in other cases. It has always been considered that the costs, as well as the debt, are barred by the certificate—Shelford on Bankruptcy, p. 608; Willett v. Pringle (2 N. R. 191); Scott v. Ambrose (3 M. & S. 326); Ex parte Pouchem; In re Cable (1 Glyn & J. 385); and Ex parte Hill (11 Ves. 646) referred to therein.

COCKBURN, C.J.—In the case of Maughan v. Vinesberg (37 L. J. C.P. 210; L. R. 3 C.P. 318) these authorities, which establish that the costs as well as the debt are barred by the certificate, were not brought before the Court of Common Pleas. They have not been overruled, unless they have been so by Maughan v. Vinesberg (37 L. J. C.P. 210; L. R. 3 C.P. 318). That case does not appear to have received much consideration, and it was not fully argued. I do not think that we are bound by it. The arrest here was in respect of the debt and costs, and the authorities are conclusive to shew that the arrest was bad and unlawful. The defendant must therefore be discharged.

MELLOR, J., and HAYES, J., concurred.

Quære—If the above section has any application to cases in which the County Court has no jurisdiction.

This was an action of slander, tried before Hannen, J., at the sittings for Middlesex after last Trinity Term. The verdict was for the plaintiff for 10*l.* The learned Judge was asked to certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court, but he declined to do so. Subsequently, an application for an order was made to a Judge at chambers, who referred the matter to the Court. A rule nisi was granted, calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be allowed his costs.

Francis (Nov. 16, 1868) shewed cause against the rule.—The Judge declined to certify, and this Court cannot interfere with the exercise of his discretion. The latter part of section 5. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, " unless the Court or a Judge at chambers shall, by rule or order, allow such costs," only applies where the plaintiff has omitted to ask the Judge, who tried the cause, for a certificate that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court.

[HANNEN, J.—I certainly thought that it was not a case for costs. The plaintiff's case created an unfavourable impression on my mind. I thought that the action was a frivolous one, and that the damages were excessive.]

The provision in section 5. is intended to include all actions, whether within the jurisdiction of the County Court or not. If the plaintiff brings the action in the superior Court, and recovers a sum not exceeding 10*l*., he is not to get his costs unless the Judge grants his certificate. If he is asked to do so and refuses, the plaintiff has no remedy. The words "action of tort" must include an action of slander. The 4th section, referring to the sale of ale, beer, &c., prohibits any action being brought in any Court, superior Court or County Court.

Anderson, in support of the rule.—It cannot be alleged that the plaintiff was not justified in bringing the action. The damages which he has recovered are substantial damages. If he could have brought the action in the County Court, there might be some ground for saying that the 5th section would apply; but, by section 58. of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, no action of slander can be brought in the County Court.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It may be that the legislature intended that such actions should not be brought at all, unless there was a substantial cause of action; but I doubt whether section 5. applies. The intention was to drive all actions of minor importance into the County Court; but that can hardly be said to apply to an action of slander, which cannot be brought in the County Court at all.]

It is submitted that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to have his costs taxed by the Master.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was now delivered by

HAYES, J.—This was a case relating to the effect of the late County Court Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, upon the costs of actions brought in the superior Court; but as this action was commenced after the passing of that Act, and was tried after it had come into operation, the question stood clear of the provisions of the previous statutes, and depended entirely upon the construction of the 5th section of the late Act.

The action was for slander, and was commenced in October, 1867, and tried at the sittings for Middlesex after last Trinity Term, before our Brother Hannen, when the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 10*l*. The learned Judge declined to certify, and the plaintiff, having applied for costs to a Judge at chambers, who referred the question to the Court, a rule for the allowance of the plaintiff's costs was obtained and argued in last term.

The prominent point discussed in the case was, that the plaintiff had no power of suing the defendant for this cause of action in the County Court, the 58th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, which excludes the County Court from original jurisdiction in slander, being still in force; and although by the 10th section of the late Act a defendant is enabled to apply, under certain circumstances, to have such an action remitted for trial to the County Court, no such application was made, and consequently the plaintiff was obliged to proceed to trial in the superior Court, or abandon his action altogether.

Under the elaborate enactments of the previous County Court Acts, the liability of plaintiffs to the loss of costs for proceeding in the superior Courts was carefully confined to cases in which the County Courts had jurisdiction—(see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. ss. 11, 12, 13, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 5).

Indeed, the very object and intention of such provisions hitherto has uniformly been to further the jurisdiction of the inferior Court, by practically compelling plaintiffs to sue there for causes of action within its jurisdiction.

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Hannen, J. and Hayes, J.

Digitized by Google

And it is obviously quite beside the general object of a County Court Act, to subject plaintiffs to the loss of costs for suing in the superior Courts for causes of action which could not be sued for elsewhere. What now gives rise to the question in this case is, that all the former enactments above mentioned, which expressly preserved the plaintiff's right to costs in cases in which the County Courts had no jurisdiction, were repealed by the late Act, section 33, Schedule C., and in lieu of the repealed enactments the right to costs is now governed by the brief provision contained in the 5th section of the late Act, which is as follows: "If in any action commenced after the passing of this Act in any of Her Majesty's superior Courts of record, the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding 20*l.* if the action is founded on contract, or 10*l.* if founded on tort, whether by verdict, judgment by default, or on demurrer, or otherwise, he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit unless the Judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in such superior Court, or unless the Court, or a Judge at chambers, shall, by rule or order, allow such costs."

The general and comprehensive words of the earlier part of this section would certainly appear capable of embracing a case like the present; and it was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that they did so, and that, as the learned Judge at the trial had declined to certify under the 5th section, the Court would not now review his decision. But it is to be observed that the jurisdiction given to the Judge at the trial, and that given to the Court or a Judge at chambers, are separate and distinct. The Judge, at the trial, is empowered to certify on a single point, namely, whether there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court. The power given to the Court, or a Judge at chambers, is generally to allow the plaintiff his costs. The words relating to the certificate of the Judge at the trial, are taken from those of the enactment previously in force on this point, which was contained in the 12th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61; and it is clear that they were there intended to apply to those cases only in which the County Court had jurisdiction, but in which, nevertheless, it was reasonable that the plaintiffs should sue in the superior Court. This is, in effect, the natural import of such a form of certificate, which is appropriate to express an option and reasonable election of the plaintiff to sue in the superior Court, as contrasted with the County Court, but appears quite inappropriate to refer to a case in which the plaintiff had no option, but was compelled to sue in the superior Court or not to sue at all. It appears to us that the certificate was intended to have the same meaning and application in the section now before us as a similar certificate had, under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 12. And if this be so, it seems to give rise to much doubt whether the 5th section of the late Act was really intended to have any application to cases in which the County Court had no jurisdiction. If, however, it was intended to apply to such cases, the general authority given to the Court or a Judge to allow the plaintiff his costs, would, at all events, enable them to do so in cases of this nature, where it appeared proper to make such allowance.

In making such allowance, we should not be reviewing or interfering with the discretion exercised by the Judge at the trial, who merely declined to give, in this case, a certificate which was not properly applicable to it, but was only applicable to cases in which the County Court had jurisdiction. And as it is plain that the legislature intended that plaintiffs who had the power of suing in the County Court, but elected, on reasonable grounds, to sue in the superior Court, were to be allowed their costs, it seems impossible to suppose that it was intended that such allowance should not be made to plaintiffs who had no such election, and whose only remedy was in the superior Court. We think, therefore, that as, in the present case, the plaintiff has recovered an amount much beyond what would have entitled him to costs under the general law applicable to actions for slander in the superior Court, and as he could not have sued elsewhere, that he ought to be allowed his costs in this action, and therefore that the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute with costs.

BILLS OF SALE. C. DISTRESS. A. MORTGAGE. L.—B., in consideration of advances from the defendants (his bankers), conveyed to them two pieces of ground by a deed reciting that one portion was already mortgaged in fee, upon trust for the sale of the land and application of the purchase money. By the terms of the deed B., as a further security for the principal and interest for the time being due from him in respect of the advances, attorned and became tenant to the defendants, their heirs and assigns, at and from the date of the deed, of such of the hereditaments and premises thereby conveyed "as was or were in his occupation, for and during the term of ten years," if that security should so long continue, "at and under the yearly rent of 800*l., to be paid yearly on every* 1*st day of October in every year, the first yearly rent to be paid and payable on the* 1*st day of October then next; provided that notwithstanding anything therein contained, and without any notice or demand of possession, it should be lawful for the defendants, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, upon or after the execution of the trusts of sale therein contained, to enter into and upon the mortgaged premises or any part thereof, and to eject B. and any tenant or person claiming or to claim under him therefrom, and to determine the term of ten years, notwithstanding any lease or leases that might have been granted by B." This deed was not executed by the defendants, the mortgagees, but B. continued his exclusive occupation of the premises until the defendants distrained upon him for arrears of rent, no rent having been paid by him:*—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that B. having executed the deed, and the defendants having assented to it by advancing money to him under it, he became tenant at will to them, either by estoppel or by the operation of the Statute of Frauds, and that the distress was lawful.

This was a writ of error upon a special case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The special case will be found set out at length in 37 L. J. Q.B. 242.

For the purposes of this report the following extracts from the special case will be sufficient:

The action was brought by the assignees of John Brown, a bankrupt, to recover damages for an alleged illegal distress by the defendants.

John Brown was devisee with two other persons of certain premises, called the Rivet Manufactory, upon certain trusts in the will mentioned, and was also seised in fee of other premises, called the Rolling Mills. By indenture, dated May 30, 1862, he conveyed the Rolling Mills to Frederick Horn, in consideration of 1,500*l.* paid to him by Horn, to the use of Horn, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to the proviso for redemption, and with the power of sale, in the indenture mentioned.

The defendants were the bankers of John Brown, who was indebted to them, on September 8, 1866, on the balance of his banking account in or about the sum of 1,300*l.*, and they subsequently made further advances to him to the amount of about 1,649*l.* 10*s.*, in part of a sum of 1,800*l.*, which they had agreed to advance to him; and by an indenture, dated September 12, 1866, made between the said John Brown of the first part and the defendants of the second part, reciting the indenture of May 30, 1865, and an indenture of further charge to Horn of 1,000*l.* upon the premises included in the last-mentioned mortgage, and reciting that under the will before mentioned, subject as therein mentioned, he was entitled in fee to one undivided moiety of all the real estate devised by the will, except, &c., and including in such real estate the Rivet Manufactory, and reciting that part of that real estate devised by the will (which part included the Rivet Manufactory) had by agreement and arrangement with the trustees and other parties beneficially interested in the will, been for some time and then was in the exclusive possession of John Brown, he conveyed to the defendants, in consideration of their refraining from taking proceedings against him for the balance, and of their making further advances to him, the Rolling Mills and the undivided moiety and all other share, beneficial estate and interest of him, John Brown, of and in the Rivet Manufactory, to have and to hold the land, &c. unto the defendants, their heirs, &c., according to the different natures or tenures thereof respectively, upon trust, &c.; "and as a further security for the principal and interest moneys for the time being due from John Brown, he did thereby attorn and become tenant to the defendants, their heirs and assigns, at and from the date of the last-mentioned indenture, of such of the hereditaments and premises thereby granted or otherwise conveyed as was or were in his occupation, for and during the term of ten years, if that security should so long continue, at and under the yearly rent of 800*l.* to be paid yearly on every 1st day of October in every year, the first yearly rent to be paid and payable on October then next; provided that notwithstanding any thing therein contained, and without any notice or demand of possession, it should be lawful for the defendants, their heirs, &c., before or after the execution of the trusts of sale therein contained, to enter into and upon the mortgaged premises, or any part thereof, and to eject John Brown and any tenant or person claiming or to claim under him therefrom, and to determine the term of ten years, notwithstanding any lease or leases that might have been granted by the said John Brown.

This indenture made September 12, 1866, was executed by John Brown on that day, but it was never executed by the defendants; nor was it ever registered as a bill of sale or otherwise.

The further advances were made by the defendants, and John Brown continued his exclusive occupation of the Rolling Mills and of the Rivet Manufactory.

On October 15, 1866, the defendants distrained for a year's rent (no rent having been paid) upon the goods and chattels which were upon those two sets of premises. In order to get rid of the distress, payment was made by the plaintiffs under protest, upon which the defendants withdrew.

The question was, whether the distress was legal; if it was not, the plaintiffs were to recover the money so paid by them to get rid of the distress.

The Court below gave judgment for the defendants, holding that the non-execution of the deed by the defendants was no objection to the right to distrain, as the effect of that deed was to create, not a term of years, but a tenancy at will; and secondly, that John Brown was estopped from denying that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between himself and the defendants.

Joshua Williams (Manisty, with him), for the plaintiffs.—The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was wrong on both points. The first question is, whether Brown was tenant at will? It is submitted that he was not. The intention of the parties was to create an estate for ten years; the deed speaks of such a term; if they had intended that Brown should be a tenant at will they would have said so. In Bac. Abr. tit. "Lease," (L) 3, citing Bro. Abr. tit. "Lease," 13, 22, it is said, "If one makes a lease for ten years at the will of the lessor, this is a good lease for ten years certain, and the last words are void for the repugnancy." That is like the present case, but stronger because there were the words "at the will of the lessor." A term of years is so called because there is a terminus beyond which it cannot go. If a tenancy at will had been created, it is obvious that at the end of the term there would be the same estate as before, i.e., a tenancy at will, but at the end of this term Brown would be a tenant at sufferance until he paid rent so as to become something more—see Co. Litt. 57 b. That it was not the intention of the parties that at the death of the lessors the estate should determine, is shewn by the attornment of Brown to the defendants, "their heirs and assigns." An estate at will would determine upon the death of the lessors, and so if the lessor makes a present lease to another—Disdale v. Iles (2 Lev. 88; see also Newport's case, Skinner, 421). Again, it is to be observed that power is given to the mortgagees to determine the term of ten years, notwithstanding any lease or leases that might have been granted by Brown. That is inconsistent with his being tenant at will, for a tenant at will who grants a lease determines the estate at will, if the granting of the lease be made known to the lessor—Pinhorn v. Souster (8 Ex. Rep. 763; 22 L. J. Ex. 266); Watkins on Conveyancing, p. 1, and Blunden v. Baugh (Cro. Car. 302). Further, the provision in the deed that the estate is to be determined by entry solely, is inconsistent with the notion that it was intended to be an estate at will.

[KELLY, C.B.—Looking at the estate rebus sic stantibus, there being no execution of the deed by the defendants, how can it be said that anything more than an estate at will was created?]

At law, there is no tenancy at all. Secondly, as the defendants did not execute the instrument, there was no deed as required by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 3, and there being no term there could be no power to distrain.

[CLEASBY, B.—But if there is no deed there would be a tenancy at will.]

Not a tenancy at will at the rent of 800*l*. If the parties intended that a term should be created at that rent, and Brown did not get the term, he cannot be liable to pay the rent.

[CLEASBY, B.—He attorned to the defendants at that rent.]

Swatman v. Ambler (8 Ex. Rep. 72; 22 L. J. Ex. 81) shews that the lessee is not bound until the lessor has executed, he never having received the consideration for which he has stipulated.

[KELLY, C.B.—In that case the demise was of an incorporeal hereditament, the tolls of a navigation. BYLES, J.—There was not any attornment, as there is in this case. KELLY, C.B.—And where the demise is of a corporeal hereditament the tenancy may be created by attornment.]

The decision did not proceed upon the ground of the hereditament being an incorporeal one, but upon the ground that the lessee had not got what he stipulated for, and the Court thought that the principle of the judgment in Pitman v. Woodbury (3 Ex. Rep. 4) applied. Here Brown did not get the estate for ten years, which he had agreed for. He had attorned to the defendants at the rent for a term of ten years, but as he did not get the term he is not liable for the rent.

[BYLES, J.—The only way of carrying out the intention of the parties is to construe it as the Court of Queen's Bench did. An attornment is as strong as payment of rent would be.]

In West v. Fritch (3 Ex. Rep. 216; 18 L. J. Ex. 50) Parke, B., said (see the report, 18 Law Journal Reports, 50), "The deed not having been executed by the mortgagee, it cannot operate as a lease." There the mortgagor had paid rent. Further, it is submitted that to create a demise there must be an act of the landlord. As to the effect of entry under a void lease coupled with payment of rent, see Cole on Ejectment, 450. Next, the ground upon which the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment, viz., that there was an estoppel, is incorrect. It is a principle of law that where the truth appears from the instrument there can be no estoppel—see Co. Litt. 352 b, "Where the veritie is apparent in the same record, there the adverse party shall not be estopped to take advantage of the truth, for he cannot be estopped to allege the truth where the truth appeareth of record." It here appears that, as to the Rolling Mills, Brown was tenant to Horn, and, as to the Rivet Manufactory, to the trustees. The defendants have not the legal estate. That being so, he cannot be estopped from disputing the tenancy under the defendants. The case of Pargeter v. Harris (7 Q.B. 708; 15 L. J. Q.B. 113) is inconsistent with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench.

[BYLES, J.—My Brother Blackburn referred to Cuthbertson v. Irving (4 Hurls. & N. 742; 28 L. J. Ex. 306)—see 37 L. J. 245—as shewing that so long as the lessee continued in possession, he cannot set up any defence founded on the fact that the lessor has no interest in the premises.]

It is submitted that case is very different from the present.

Further, it is submitted that as Brown appears to be tenant to Horn and the trustees, he cannot attorn to the defendants, the mortgage never having been forfeited—see 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 11; nor can he be liable to be distrained upon by them. In the Court below the judgment proceeded very much upon the authority of Dancer v. Hastings (12 B. Moore, 34; 5 L. J. C.P. 3) and Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547); but it is contended that too much weight was given to those cases. In Dancer v. Hastings (12 B. Moore, 34; 5 L. J. C.P. 3) the defendant was a receiver in Chancery, to whom the attornment was valid, and the plaintiff was rightly held to be estopped from disputing his right to distrain. That case is quite different from the present case, where the legal estate is in Horn and in the trustees. Evans v. Matthias (7 E. & B. 590) was decided upon the same grounds, and Saunders v. Merryweather (3 Hurls. & C. 902; 35 L. J. Ex. 115) gets rid of much of the effect of Dancer v. Hastings (12 B. Moore, 34; 5 L. J. C.P. 3) and Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547).

[KELLY, C.B.—Is there anything to shew that the relation of landlord and tenant was created between Horn and Brown? It may be that a man cannot be tenant of the same property to two persons at once, but I do not find that Brown was tenant to Horn.]

He must have been tenant to Horn.

[BYLES, J.—The 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 11, seems to apply to fraudulent attornments, and to cases which arise between the lessor and the lessee. If Brown had paid the rent of 800*l.* to the defendants, would he not have been estopped from denying their title? If so, would he not be equally estopped by the attornment?]

Even if this Court should think that Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547) was exactly in point, still it would not be conclusive. It was a reversal by Lord Chelmsford of a decision of the Master of the Rolls, and is at most a decision simply of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. If it had been intended that there should be a power to distrain, it would have been expressly given.

Next, if the estoppel authorizes a distress, it is opposed to public policy, as the deed would have the effect of a bill of sale, and under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, s. 7, would be invalid unless registered. It is a "licence to take possession of personal chattels" within section 7.

[CHANNEL, B.—That section must be read with the preamble and the 1st section. It would be going a long way to lay down that such a deed as this must be registered as a bill of sale.]

Kemplay, contra, was not heard.

KELLY, C.B.—The question to be decided in this case is, whether the distress can be supported. It has been contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the defendants were not entitled by law to distrain, inasmuch as they were not seised of the legal estate, and the relation of landlord and tenant, out of which the right of distress must have arisen, was never created between the parties; and that proposition is sought to be supported on two grounds, first, that it appears from the instrument itself that if there be any tenancy at all, it is a tenancy for ten years, a lease for ten years; and, secondly, that the lease not being under seal, the mortgage-deed not being executed by the defendants, there is no such tenancy. It is said further, that the power of re-entry, which follows upon the attornment, does not convert the supposed or intended lease for ten years into a lease or tenancy at will, and, consequently, that there is, in effect, no tenancy, and so no right of distress. Although these are objections of a highly technical nature, we are bound to give effect to them if they are sustained by law, and the more so, as they have been supported by a very learned argument, in which all the authorities, ancient and modern, bearing on the question have been fully brought before us, on the part of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs. And, first, as to the objection, that, the defendants not having the legal estate in them, they could have no right of distress. It is perfectly clear that they had not the legal estate, but then that may be said of all lessors where there is a lease, or a tenancy by way of estoppel, who have no title at all. Here the defendants had an equitable estate; they certainly had no legal estate. As that, standing alone, would have no effect, this being a lease or tenancy by way of estoppel, it becomes of primary importance in the present case, because it is contended that this being a tenancy by way of estoppel, and only available to the defendants by the law of estoppel, such law is inapplicable where the truth against which the estoppel is to operate appears on the face of the instrument itself. It may be taken that it appears on this mortgage of September, 1866, that the defendants were not seised of the legal estate, but that the legal estate was outstanding in the first mortgagee, Horn. Now, in support of this proposition, a number of cases have been cited, but when we look with attention to the facts of those cases, and to the ratio decidendi in one and all of them, we find that none are directly in point. They are cases either of actions upon covenant where, unless the covenantor can under the terms of the instrument enforce the covenant by action at law, it is clear no such action is maintainable; or where an action of ejectment having been brought on a clause of re-entry, it was perfectly clear that in order to maintain the action there must be the legal estate or title in the plaintiff, and it appeared on the face of the instrument and the evidence in the case, that the plaintiff in ejectment had not the legal estate, but that it was outstanding in another person, and the action was held not to be maintainable. But even if any of the dicta to be found in one or more of the numerous authorities referred to by Mr. Williams, were to lead to the conclusion that where the truth against which the estoppel is directed appears upon the face of the deed, no estoppel arises, that doctrine must be taken to have been overruled in the case of Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547), and that by the Lord Chancellor sitting on appeal, by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with that before which this case is now being decided. Even, therefore, if we were to find that which is binding on us by authority for the proposition contended for by the learned counsel, we should be bound to defer to the higher authority of the Lord Chancellor in Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547), which was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, and which is therefore binding even upon the Court of Exchequer Chamber. Now, when we look to that case we find that there was a mortgage, and an agreement between the parties, by way of attornment, or a sufficient clause in itself to constitute a tenancy, that the tenancy should subsist, not between the mortgagor and mortgagee, but between the mortgagor and a receiver, who is named in the instrument appointed by the Court of Chancery. It is perfectly manifest that the receiver having been so appointed, he had no interest whatever in the premises, either legal or equitable. It appears from the instrument itself that there was no legal estate in him; he claimed the power of distress by virtue of a tenancy of this nature, and in his character of receiver, and the absence in him of any interest whatever likewise appeared on the face of the deed. The Master of the Rolls certainly took a view of the case in accordance with that contended for here by the plaintiffs. That case was very elaborately argued, and Lord Chelmsford, as Lord Chancellor, reversed the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and there being there a tenancy by way of attornment, or by reason of a clause sufficient in itself to constitute as between the mortgagor and mortgagee a lease or tenancy at will, or for years, he held that though it appeared on the face of the same instrument which contained the clause creating the tenancy, that it was a tenancy between the mortgagor and the receiver, and that the receiver had no interest legal or otherwise in the premises, that did not do away with the tenancy or right of distress, which arose by implication of law from the relation of landlord and tenant, thus created between the mortgagor and the receiver. And his Lordship, after stating that it was contended that the clause as to the receiver had no operation by estoppel, said, "It appears to me that the circumstances of the truth of the case appearing upon the deed is a reason why the agreement of the parties, which it embodies, should be carried out, either by giving effect to their intention in the manner which they have prescribed, or by way of estoppel to prevent their denying the right to do the acts which they have authorized to be done." Then his Lordship refers to the cases of Cornish v. Scarell (8 B. & C. 471) and Dancer v. Hastings (12 B. Moore, 34; 5 L. J. C.P. 3), as supporting the conclusion at which he had arrived. There is a distinction between Jolly v. Arbuthnot (4 De Gex & Jo. 224; 28 L. J. Ch. 547) and the case now before us; there the mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as the receiver, were parties to the transaction and to the creation of the tenancy to which the distress was incidental, while it appears in the present case that there was a first mortgagee, who is not a party to this transaction or to the instrument in question. That is relied on by Mr. Williams, but when we consider the causes of the law and the true reason of the law which led to the creation of the doctrine in question, it will appear manifestly that the creation of the tenancy, and the arising of an estoppel out of a tenancy thus created, is the sole cause of the legal estate being superfluous and unnecessary, and that it is the relation of landlord and tenant, subsisting between the parties to the instrument, which creates the tenancy in question, and not the consent of any third party, not a party to the instrument. Therefore, the two cases may be said to be identical. If we had any doubt, which we have not, on the question, we should feel ourselves bound to defer to this authority. Under these circumstances, although the defendants have not the legal estate in the lands in question, although that fact appears by reference at least to the instrument now before us, we think that does not disentitle the defendants to the distress in question, and does not at all affect the relation of landlord and tenant, or the incidents of that relation created by and arising out of the terms of the instrument.

We come now to the instrument itself, and have to consider the question whether there is a tenancy at will; if so, whether it was a tenancy to which this right of distress was incident. We find on looking at the instrument itself that after the usual language of a mortgage-deed the deed proceeds to state, "and as a further security for the principal and interest moneys for the time being due from the said J. Brown under and by virtue of the said indenture, the said J. Brown did thereby attorn and become tenant to the defendants, their heirs and assigns, and as from the date of the said last-mentioned indenture for and during the term of ten years, at the yearly rent of 800*l*." Then follows the proviso that, notwithstanding anything therein contained, it should be lawful for the defendants at any time to enter on the premises, and seize and take possession. Now, it is insisted on the part of the plaintiffs that here there is no tenancy at will; and the ground on which it is put is, that this is, if anything, a lease for ten years, and, that being so, that it was the intention of the parties to grant a lease for ten years, and that the lease not being under seal is void under the Statute of Frauds. But the answer on the part of the defendants is, that by the terms of the Statute of Frauds a lease for ten years or the creation of a tenancy for ten years, not under seal, is not void if it be made only in writing or by parol. I will consider hereafter the effect of the Statute of Frauds, which is not the ground upon which the Court of Queen's Bench decided this case. It is likewise contended on the part of the plaintiff that it was the intention of the parties to grant a lease for ten years, and that it would be contrary to their intention to hold it to be a tenancy at will. Now, in the first place, in support of that proposition, there is the high authority of Brooke's Abridgment, recognized and repeated in Bacon's Abridgment, of a case which shews that where there is an express lease for ten years, and then a proviso that the landlord or the lord may enter and determine the lease at his pleasure, that does not convert the lease for ten years into a tenancy at will, but such a proviso shall be construed to be repugnant to the instrument, and void. And perhaps that might be so in the ordinary case which one could suppose of a mere lease for ten or twenty or twenty-one years between landlord and tenant; but in order to consider whether that has any application to the present case we must look to the whole of the instrument. If we find the instrument in effect a deed of mortgage, and the tenancy, or the relation of landlord and tenant, the liability to pay rent, and the power of distress reserved to the landlord, all arising in a mortgage-deed, which appears to be a mere security for the re-payment of the principal sum advanced, and the interest, then the authority of those cases and of others to the same effect is no longer applicable; and we must look to the real intention of the parties to be collected, as we are bound to collect it, from the whole of the instrument taken together. When we look at the whole of the instrument there is nothing repugnant in it at all. The parties may have contemplated that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, and of the landlord and tenant, might subsist for ten years, or for probably more; that the money should remain unpaid and the interest be regularly paid in the mean time. They probably thought that ten years was a reasonable time to assign for the duration of the term thus created and intended to subsist between them. And accordingly we find in the first instance that there is the grant of a lease for ten years; but when we proceed and see that there is a power to enter at any time and take possession of the premises without demand and notice, when we remember that the whole instrument is only a security for the repayment of money advanced on mortgage or the payment of interest, it is quite manifest that what was intended was this: that whatever might be the nominal duration of the tenancy thus created, the nominal contrivance of the relation of landlord and tenant, it was to be in the power of the landlord, at any time when it was necessary for security, to enforce the instrument into which they had entered, and put an end to whatever tenancy was created and to receive and take possession of the whole of the premises. Therefore, we think that the Court of Queen's Bench was perfectly right. Taking those two portions of the clause together, the attornment by the mortgagor as tenant, and for a term of ten years, but with a power to the mortgagee at any time and without demand or notice to enter, seize and take possession of the premises, we think that that converted the tenancy or term of ten years into a mere tenancy at will, because, by means of the exercise of the power thus conferred on the mortgagee, he had the means at his mere will and pleasure, without more, to determine the tenancy in question. And we think, therefore, considering the whole instrument together, that the mortgagor having attorned tenant in respect of these premises to the defendants, without going through the useless form of walking out of the premises and into them again, having in fact derived and acquired possession and the right to the continuation of possession under the mortgagee as his landlord, that he became the tenant, and that the tenancy for years was converted into a tenancy at will. It is said that a tenancy at will cannot be created to continue beyond the lives of the party or of the lessor. When we come to consider the whole of the law on this question we find that it is based on very fine distinctions, and it would rather appear that a tenancy at will may continue to subsist after the death of one of the parties, unless the heir should do something to testify in some way his intention to discontinue the tenancy. It is enough to say that the mere circumstance of this power being reserved to the lessor and his heirs, does not necessarily prevent the estate in question becoming a tenancy at will or for a term.

But even if any doubt could remain as to the effect of this instrument, as to whether there was, strictly speaking, a tenancy at will created by this deed, when the clauses belonging to it are all taken together, the operation of the Statute of Frauds puts an end to the question, because, supposing, as Mr. Williams contended, but for the non-execution by the mortgagee, that he was to be the tenant under a lease for ten years, yet as it was not executed by the lessor therefore it must be said to be a term or lease created by parol only, by the express terms of the Statute of Frauds it is not absolutely void, but may be taken to be a tenancy at will. It remains, therefore, from the time of the execution of the instrument, or the attornment by the tenant, until the rent shall be paid, strictly a tenancy at will. As soon as the rent is paid under it, it becomes a tenancy from year to year. In the mean time it is a tenancy at will, and a distress by the landlord would be lawful. I do not enter into the other points raised by the plaintiffs.

In the first place, we hold with the Court of Queen's Bench that this is a tenancy at will on the true construction of the instrument as entered into between the parties. I say between the parties, because, though there has been an objection, in one form or other, that the defendants have not executed this deed, it is quite enough that Brown, the mortgagor, the alleged tenant, did execute the deed, and that it was assented to by the defendants. And we find that the deed was executed by Brown, and that the defendants proceeded to advance very large sums of money, in addition to further advances, and they must be taken to have accepted the deed, although it was not formally executed. We think it is a tenancy created by these parties, in much the same way as if Brown had written a letter containing all these terms, the contract for the payment of rent and everything else which is in the instrument, and that the proposal had been assented to without being signed on the part of the defendants. That would have constituted a tenancy between them, notwithstanding the introduction of the term for ten years, either by estoppel, or under the operation of the Statute of Frauds, as has been already stated, a tenancy at will until the payment of rent; and after the tenant has come into possession and remained in possession, and on payment of rent,—from and after that a tenancy from year to year. We are, therefore, of opinion that under this instrument a tenancy was created on the one ground or the other, being a tenancy at will as long as there should be no payment of rent.

With regard to the point made in reference to the Bills of Sale Act, we have no power to draw inferences of fact; therefore, if it could possibly be contended that the mortgage-deed was a bill of sale, and was in effect an evasion of that Act, we have no power so to determine; we are not sitting as a jury, and can only look to the facts found in this case. If, looking at the instrument itself, we were to say this was a bill of sale within the Act, we must hold every mortgage-deed in which premises are mortgaged with a power of distress or re-entry to be a bill of sale. But no such doctrine can possibly be supported; and even if the question had arisen, we should hold that this deed is not an evasion of the Act, and is not a bill of sale requiring registration within the meaning of the Act; consequently that objection likewise fails. Under these circumstances we are all of opinion that the Court of Queen's Bench was right, and its decision must be affirmed.

Decision affirmed.

WREN AND ANOTHER v. WIELD.

38 L. J. Q.B. 88; L. R. 4 Q.B. 213; 20 L. T. 277.

Patent, Infringement of—Slander of Title—Particulars.

PATENT E. SLANDER OF TITLE.—The plaintiffs carried on the business of machine-makers, and in their business sold machines to certain persons. The defendant wrote letters and made verbal statements to such persons, alleging that the machines so sold were infringements of a patent which he had obtained for such machines, and making claims in respect of such alleged infringement and the use of the machines.

An action having been brought by the plaintiffs in respect of the injury caused by these letters and statements, the defendant pleaded not guilty.

The Court ordered him to deliver particulars to the plaintiffs, shewing in what part or parts the machines of the plaintiffs mentioned in the declaration were an infringement of the defendant's patents, and pointing out by reference to line and page of his specifications what part of the inventions therein described he alleged to have been infringed.

This was an application for a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why he should not deliver to the plaintiffs particulars shewing in what part or parts the plaintiff's spooling-machines mentioned in the declaration are an infringement of the defendant's patents of 1858 and 1860, or either of them, and pointing out by reference to the page and line of the defendant's specifications, which part of the inventions therein described they alleged to have been infringed.

The first count of the declaration stated that, before and at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs carried on the trade and business of engineers and machine-makers, under the style or firm of Wren & Hopkinson, and in their said trade and business lawfully made for sale and sold, and were lawfully making for sale and selling, from time to time, certain machines called spooling-machines, and by the making and selling of such machines as aforesaid were acquiring gains and profits, and the plaintiffs had sold some of the said machines to certain persons, to wit, persons carrying on trade under the style and firm of R. F. and J. Alexander & Co.; and thereupon the defendant, in a letter written and sent by the defendant to the said persons, falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiffs, in relation to their said trade and business, and in relation to the said machines being so made and sold by them as aforesaid, and in relation to the said machines sold by the plaintiffs to the persons as aforesaid, the words following: that is to say,

"It has come to our knowledge that you (meaning the said persons) have on your premises and are using spooling-machines made by Wren & Hopkinson (meaning the plaintiffs), of this city (and thereby meaning the said machines sold by the plaintiffs to the said persons), under an alleged patent of one Ermen & Smith, which have been advised is an infringement of our patent spooling-machine. You are perhaps not aware that other manufacturers have had similar machines, and when they became aware that they were an infringement of our patents they at once discontinued their use and returned them to the makers. We should regret exceedingly that any misunderstanding between us on this point should arise, but in justice to ourselves, should you think fit to dispute our claim, which is 25*l.* per spindle, we shall reluctantly be compelled to enforce it, along with damages, as we may be advised. Your reply per return, stating the number of spindles you have will oblige yours truly,

"WILLIAM WIELD & Co."

The second count alleged that the defendant, in a certain other letter written and sent by the defendant to the said persons, falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiffs, and of the plaintiffs in relation to their said trade and business, and in relation to the said machines being so made and sold by them as aforesaid, and in relation to the said machines so sold by them to the said persons as aforesaid, the words following: that is to say,

"We (meaning the defendant) have this day received your return, and inclosed we beg to hand you our account for royalty, and we give you the alternative that you must either return the two machines (meaning the said machines so sold by the plaintiffs to the said persons as aforesaid) to the parties you bought them from (meaning the plaintiffs), or pay the inclosed account in ten days from the date of this letter. If we are compelled to sue you for our royalty, as per the inclosed account, we will sue for damages also, as we may be, advised. We are at a loss to know what Wren & Hopkinson (meaning the plaintiffs) have to do in this matter as between us. We purpose dealing with them (meaning the plaintiffs) in another way, as we may be legally advised.—We remain, yours truly,

The third count alleged that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke to one Edmund Brookes, a member of the firm of "Jones, Brookes & Bros.," and published of the plaintiffs, and of the plaintiffs in relation to their said trade and business, and in relation to the said machines so being made and sold by them, the words following: that is to say,

"If you use their spooling-machine (meaning such a machine of the plaintiffs as aforesaid), I (meaning the defendant) will be forced to proceed against you for infringing my rights."

There were other similar counts.

The declaration concluded as follows: By means of the committing of which said several grievances by the defendant, the plaintiffs were and are greatly injured in their said trade and business, and in relation to the making and selling of such machines as aforesaid and otherwise, and divers persons, to wit, the said persons trading under the firm of R. F. and J. Alexander & Co., Jones, Brookes & Brothers, and Marshall & Co., the said Thomas Ainsworth and certain other persons trading under the firm of John Clark, jun. & Co., who respectively had theretofore purchased such machines as aforesaid from the plaintiffs, and who would otherwise have purchased other such machines as aforesaid from the plaintiffs, were prevented from so doing, and divers other persons who would otherwise have purchased such machines from the plaintiffs, were prevented from so doing, and the sale of such machines as aforesaid by the plaintiffs was greatly hindered and diminished, to the great loss and injury of the plaintiffs in their said trade and business, and otherwise.

Plea—Not guilty.

Issue thereon.

Webster, in support of the application.—The defendant has compelled the plaintiffs to ask for particulars. Instead of bringing an action for infringement, or proceeding by scire facias to repeal the plaintiffs' patent, he has written letters and uttered slanders against the plaintiffs as the maker of these machines, and having compelled the plaintiffs to bring an action against him, he pleads not guilty, without any plea of justification. It is impossible that the plaintiffs can go to trial safely without being furnished with particulars.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this is a reasonable application, but there is some difficulty in seeing what issue is raised upon the record upon which you can be entitled to particulars.]

It is submitted that the plea of not guilty raises such an issue. The case falls within the spirit of the rule that the plaintiff may be compelled to give particulars of the infringement of which he complains. He raises the issue whether his patent has been infringed or not, but by this novel mode of proceeding he has changed the position of the parties.

The COURT then granted a rule nisi.

Aston shewed cause in the first instance.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to these particulars. There is no rule of law under which the defendant can be forced to give them.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—A great injustice might be done to the plaintiffs if they were forced to go to trial in such a complicated matter without being made acquainted with the particular infringements upon which the defendant relies.]

If that is the opinion of the Court, no further opposition will be made to the rule being made absolute; but it is submitted that it ought to be so on the terms that the defendant should be entitled to begin and have the reply, in case evidence is adduced impeaching the validity of his letters patent, as is provided by the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 41.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The defendant has not chosen to proceed in the way pointed out in that section, and I do not think that we ought to give him the benefit of such a privilege.

MELLOR, J. and HAYES, J. concurred.

Rule absolute.

Arbitration and Award—Boat-Race—Jurisdiction of Referee—Stakeholder.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARD. B. GAMING AND WAGERING. C.—K. and S, two watermen, agreed to row a "right-away sculler's race" upon the river Thames, the start to take place at half-past two p.m., the rowing to be according to the recognised rules of boat-racing, and a referee to be chosen at the last deposit, "whose decision shall be final." In watermen's races it is the practice for the men to start themselves. A referee was appointed and the race commenced; but a foul having taken place, the men were ordered by the referee to row over again. On the following day they came to the starting-place. After several fruitless attempts to start, K. rowed up to the referee's steamboat, which had drifted out of sight of the men, and complained that S. would not start. The referee looked for S, but not seeing him, told K. to inform S. that he must start, and that if he would not to row over without him. K. then went away, and the referee afterwards saw him row over the course, but did not hear him speak to S. The referee having decided that K. was entitled to the stakes, it was found by the jury, in an action against the stakeholder, that the referee's order was not communicated to S, and that a fair opportunity of starting was not given to him:—Held, that under the agreement it was necessary, to empower the referee to award the stakes, that there should be a race or a start; and, assuming that the referee had power in certain cases to direct one of the men to start without the other, yet, as the terms of his order were not conveyed to S, there never had been a start. The referee was therefore without that which was the foundation of his authority to award the stakes, and his decision was void.

Declaration for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff, and for money due from the defendant to the plaintiff on accounts stated between them.

Pleas.—First, never indebted; secondly, as to the claim for the money received for the use of the plaintiff, that before the receipt of the money by the defendant the plaintiff and one Henry Kelley entered into an agreement in the words and figures following: "Articles of agreement between Henry Kelley, of Putney, on the one part, and Joseph Sadler, of Putney, on the other part. They hereby agree to row a right-away sculler's race from Putney to the Ship at Mortlake, the start to take place between the aqueduct and the steamboat pier, on Wednesday, November 27, for the sum of 300*l.* a side; the start to take place at half-past two p.m. The steamboats accompanying the race to be behind the men at starting; the cutter also accompanying the men to keep astern of the sternmost man. To row according to the recognized rules of boat-racing. The referee to be chosen at the last deposit, and whose decision shall be final, 50*l.* a side being now staked in the hands of the editor of the Sportsman (the defendant), Monday, October 7. The second deposit of 50*l.* a side to be made on Thursday, October 17, at the Sportsman Office; the third, of 50*l.* a side on Thursday, October 31, at the Sportsman Office; the fourth, of 50*l.* a side on Thursday, 14, at the Sportsman Office; and the final, of 100*l.* a side, at 'The Bells,' Putney, on Thursday, November 21, between the hours of eight and ten p.m. In the event of the referee not being agreed to, the editor of the Sportsman to name one. The editor of the Sportsman to be final stakeholder. Either party failing to comply with these conditions to forfeit all money down.

"HENRY KELLEY.
"J. H. SADLER.

"Witness, Robert B. Wormald."

Averment—That the defendant received the money claimed in the declaration, as to which the plea was pleaded, upon the terms of the agreement, as stakeholder, to pay the money to the winner of the race according to the decision of the referee; that a referee was chosen, and that the referee decided that Kelley was the winner of the race. Averment of performance of conditions precedent to entitle Kelley to receive and the defendant to pay him the money claimed in the declaration to which the plea was pleaded; and that the defendant, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and according to the decision of the referee, duly paid the money claimed in the declaration to which the plea was pleaded.

Replication.—First, a joinder of issue. Secondly, that the referee so to be chosen was to be a referee having jurisdiction only so far as the same was to be vested in referees by the recognized rules of boat-racing, and was appointed upon the terms, and subject to the conditions and with the powers, jurisdiction and restrictions to and with which such referees were and are subject and invested, that is to say, that he should decide any question connected with or arising out of the race according to the recognized rules of boat-racing, and only after it had commenced, nor should he direct either of the parties to start and row the race alone; of all which the defendant at the time of his receiving the deposit now sought to be recovered, and from thence hitherto, had notice. That before the payment of the money by the defendant on November 27, 1867, Kelley and the defendant came to the place for starting in the agreement mentioned prepared to start for the race, and started accordingly, and contested the race for some distance, and a foul took place, and the referee, considering both Kelley and the plaintiff in fault, and that the race so commenced was, as in fact it was, no race, ordered them to row again the following day, on November 28, 1867, subject to the conditions; and on the 28th Kelley and the plaintiff again came to the place for starting, and after several unsuccessful attempts to start, and whilst the plaintiff was ready and willing to start and row the race according to the agreement, the referee, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, wrongfully, and in violation of the terms, conditions, restrictions and recognized rules of boat-racing, ordered Kelley to row over the course alone, and thereupon Kelley did row over the course alone and arrived at the winning-post, whereby he became and was guilty of a breach of the agreement; and although by rowing over the course and arriving at the winning-post Kelley did not become the lawful winner of the race, nor entitled to the stakes, nor any part of them, but violated the agreement, yet the referee, wrongfully and in violation of the terms, conditions, restrictions and recognized rules of boat-racing, without having any power or authority so to adjudicate and declare, adjudicated and declared Kelley winner of the race.

Averment—that by reason of the premises there was no start and no race according to the recognized rules of boat-racing, and that Kelley was not the lawful winner of the race, and that the plaintiff by reason of the premises became entitled to a return of his stake, being the amount claimed in the declaration, all conditions having been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff to demand the stake, and that he did before this suit and within a reasonable time and before the defendant had actually paid it over to Kelley, demand a return of his stake so deposited by him, yet the defendant paid over the stake to Kelley as the lawful winner of the race.

Rejoinder, taking issue on the replication.

At the trial, before Cockburn, C.J., at Guildhall, at the Sittings after Hilary Term, 1868, it appeared that Kelley and the plaintiff had entered into the agreement set out in the plea and that a Mr. W. Biffin was appointed referee. A foul having taken place on November 27, as stated in the replication, the race was finally arranged for November 28, 1867. Upon the afternoon of that day Kelley and Sadler took up their stations at the starting-post. It is the practice in a waterman's race for the men to start themselves. The referee was on board a steamboat, which had drifted so far from the starting-place that it was not possible to see the men distinctly. There was a delay in effecting a start, and after several attempts had been made without success, Kelley rowed up to the referee's steamboat and complained that Sadler would not start fairly. The referee looked for Sadler, but could not see him, and then told Kelley to go to his station and tell Sadler that he must start, and that if he would not start, to start without him. Kelley then rowed off. The referee did not hear him say anything to Sadler, but shortly afterwards saw him row over the course, and awarded him the stakes without further inquiry. The referee being applied to for a written decision, wrote a letter saying that his decision was that Kelley was entitled to the stakes, and that he, the referee, ordered him to row over, assigning as a reason that from what he had seen he had come to the conclusion that Sadler did not intend to start[1]. The stakes were accordingly paid to Kelley, and the present action against the defendant commenced.

The jury, in answer to questions from the Chief Justice, found, first, that Sadler intended to start; secondly, that the referee had no materials for forming an opinion that Sadler did not intend to start; thirdly, that the referee's order was not communicated to Sadler; and, fourthly, that a fair opportunity of starting was not given to Sadler.

A verdict was thereupon directed for the plaintiff, with liberty for the defendant to move.

Ballantine, Serjeant, having obtained, in Easter Term, 1868, a rule nisi for the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant, on the ground that the decision of the referee was for the purposes of the action final,

Henry James and Brickwood shewed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict entered in his favour. The referee in the decision which he gave entirely departed from the powers conferred upon him by the agreement. By the express terms of this agreement, the referee cannot intervene until the start has taken place, and no start ever did take place. It may be doubted whether in any event he was justified in telling one man to row over the course. But it is unnecessary to decide this question. The plaintiff takes his stand upon the broad ground that the referee acted without jurisdiction. If it were otherwise, who is to say when the powers of the referee are to commence? It surely could not be said that he might have awarded the stakes before the time fixed for the race, because he did not think that Sadler intended to start. Again, in the circumstances under which the referee gave his decision he was guilty of judicial misconduct. He decided against Sadler without giving him an opportunity of being heard; and it is clear that on this ground his award might be set aside—In re Brook; Delcomyn and Badart (33 L. J. C.P. 246). The award might also be set aside on the ground that by the referee's own admission it was given under the influence of a mistake—In re Hall and Hinds (2 Man. & G. 847; 10 L. J. C.P. 210). The decision was therefore given upon an occasion where the parties had not agreed to be bound by the decision of the arbitrator, and it was given upon an occasion where one of the parties was heard in the absence of the other and while the arbitrator was under an erroneous impression. It is impossible that such an award can stand, and no decision can be cited in the defendant's favour.—They cited Benbow v. Jones (14 Mee. & W. 193; 14 L. J. Ex. 257).

(1) It is not necessary to give the words of this letter, which is mentioned in the judgment of Hannen, J.

Garth and Tennant, in support of the rule.—The defendant was justified in paying over the stakes, and his decision that Kelley was entitled to them is final. But, assuming that any of the objections to his decision are well founded, it is clear that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy, for he cannot obtain relief in an action at law. Misconduct of the referee in not hearing one of the parties can only be redressed by an application to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court. Thorburn v. Barnes (36 L. J. C.P. 184), where the arbitrators made an award in favour of the plaintiff without giving the defendant any opportunity of being heard, is a conclusive authority to this effect, and the point is treated as decided in the note to Veale v. Warner (1 Wms. Saund. 327 a). It is there stated that before the Act 9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 15, it was only where the arbitration was by rule of Court that the Courts of common law would refuse to enforce the performance of the award on the ground of misconduct in the arbitrator, so that relief could only be obtained in equity. But now, since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 17, an agreement of reference like the present one may be made a rule of Court; and Parkes v. Smith (19 L. J. Q.B. 405) shews this power would apply to an agreement to refer future disputes, so that the plaintiff had a remedy but did not avail himself of it.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Here there has been no race according to the terms which the arbitrator prescribed.]

When the jurisdiction of the referee has once commenced he is the final judge of the facts.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But how do you shew that his jurisdiction has ever commenced?]

So soon as the parties had tendered themselves for the race any question of fact was for the referee.

[HANNEN, J.—Has he jurisdiction to say that there shall be a start by one in the absence of the other?]

The Court is not at liberty to take any portion of the facts and say that the referee ought not to have decided upon it. The steward of a horse-race has always a right to say whether there is a start or not. The referee thought that Sadler had not bonâ fide intended to start. Suppose either of the two men had rowed for about forty yards and then stopped, the referee would surely be entitled to say whether he had started. In Carr v. Martinson (1 E. & E. 456; 28 L. J. Q.B. 126) the plaintiff and H. entered into an agreement to run one horse against another on a specified day, and that W. should be the starter, and the money paid over according to the decision of a named judge. W. did not appear on the ground, and the plaintiff's horse walked over the course, and was declared the winner by the judge, H. refusing to run the race. It was held that the judge had no power to award the stakes, but only because W, the starter, was absent, and therefore the race could not come off.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If in the case cited the starter had refused to act, could the judge have awarded the stakes?]

It is contended he could.

Digitized by Google

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The case cited seems an authority against you. Here the men start themselves; and if they fail to do so, the arbitrator cannot award the stakes.]

It was for the referee to decide any question of fact which arose after the men had taken up their quarters at the starting-place. They cited Brown v. Overbury (11 Ex. Rep. 715; 25 L. J. Ex. 169); Benbow v. Jones (14 Mee. & W. 193; 14 L. J. Ex. 257); Walmsley v. Mathews (3 Man. & G. 133); Maryatt v. Broderick (2 Mee. & W. 369; 6 L. J. Ex. 113); Milner v. Field (5 Ex. Rep. 829; 20 L. J. Ex. 68); Smith v. Littledale (15 W. R. 69); Munro v. Butt (8 E. & B. 738); Evans v. Pratt (4 Sc. N.R. 370; 11 L. J. C.P. 87); Scott v. the Liverpool Corporation (3 De Gex & Jo. 334; 27 L. J. Ch. 641); Scott v. Avery (5 H.L. C. 811); and Russell on Arbitration, 3rd edit. 293.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of the opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action is brought to recover 300*l.* deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant, with the view to a sculler's race between the plaintiff and a waterman named Kelley, upon the terms of a written agreement. According to this agreement the race was to be a sculler's race, and the winner was to be entitled to the stakes deposited; and the decision of the referee was to be final. The referee has undoubtedly decided that the stakes should be awarded to Kelley; and if this decision is one which cannot be questioned, and which was conclusive, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action against the stake-holder. This is the question we have now to decide.

Now, according to the conditions of the race, as contained in the contract when properly interpreted, the race was to be begun by a start to be made by the men between themselves. The referee was not to interfere in that start. Whether that is a convenient mode of starting a race of this description may be seriously questioned, after the experience we have had in the matter before us; but it was part and parcel of the agreement. We must assume, however, that, according to the true construction of the contract, if these men failed to start through the default of either or both, the referee would have authority to intervene. I think it a grave question whether under the agreement the referee could interfere with the start; but, as far as my memory and my own decided conviction go, the point was abandoned at the trial, and it has not been pressed during the arguments before the Court. Therefore we must take it as admitted that in the event of default on the part of the men the referee would be entitled to intervene. We must also take it that there was delay and difficulty in the start. In consequence of this, and upon application being made to the referee, he gave an order that Kelley should inform Sadler that he (the referee) insisted on a start being made, and that if Sadler did not start, he, Kelley, was to be at liberty to row over the course without him. We must take it as a fact that this order was not properly communicated to Sadler, and that, inasmuch as the order implied that Sadler should have an opportunity of a fair start, that opportunity was not afforded to him by his opponent; in other words, we must take it as an established fact that the order given by the referee was never carried into effect. We must therefore assume that, if these facts had been present to the mind of the referee, he would have decided otherwise than he did decide. If these facts had been present to his mind, he never could have come to the conclusion that the start had been made, so as to entitle Kelley to row over the course, and have the stakes. The merits of the case were clearly in accordance with the verdict of the jury as I directed it to be entered. The stakes should never have been given up to Kelley, as there was no race. If Kelley had placed his boat alongside that of Sadler, and communicated to him intelligibly the order of the referee, and Sadler had then refused to start, it would have been very different as regards both law and justice. But it has been proved to the satisfaction of the jury that Kelley did not give his opponent a fair opportunity of starting, and that he did not make known to him that he was about to row over without him. Kelley, therefore, took an unfair advantage of Sadler. Such are the merits of the case; but it is said that the decision of the referee was final, whatever may be the justice and equity of the case. This proposition is maintained upon the authority of two sets of cases. In the first place it is said that this was essentially an arbitration, and that the decision of the referee is in substance an award, and the validity of an award cannot be disputed in an action by reason of misconduct or miscarriage in the arbitrator until the award has been set aside. Another class of cases has been cited, in which Courts of law have held, that in races and other similar cases, and where wagers of money are at stake, and where it has been agreed that stewards should be the sole judges of the result, that these judges cannot be superseded. I think, however, that this case is distinguishable from both classes of authorities. I quite agree that where parties have agreed that the result of a race, or any other subject-matter of wager, shall be determined by the decision of a particular judge chosen by themselves, they must abide by the decision of the person whom they constitute judge. But in all the cases called to our attention the event had come off. The race or subject-matter of the wager had taken place, and the Court said, "You must wait until the decision of the judge appointed has been taken, supposing that no decision has been given, or, if the decision has been given, we cannot interfere with it." This case is very different, because the event on which the arbitrator was to decide has never taken place at all. And that brings us to another question, namely, the effect of the authorities by which it has been held that an award, made by a person to whom the parties have agreed to refer any present or future differences, cannot be questioned unless that award has been invalidated or set aside. I think these cases are distinguishable. Here, by the terms of the contract, the referee had no power to start the parties; they were to start themselves. But let it be granted that, upon their failing to start themselves, he had authority to dictate how, and in what way a start should be made, and, as an alternative, to decide whether, if no start took place between the men themselves, one of them should be at liberty to row over the course; and let us assume that the referee had authority to make the order, still, the order he made was plainly a conditional one. It was that a start should be made, and that if a start were not made one of the parties should be at liberty to go over the course. His jurisdiction to make such an order may have come into operation in the circumstances which presented themselves; but, assuming that he did give that order, and that it was competent to give it, the order was never complied with; there never was a start such as he had prescribed; there never was a race such as he had contemplated and was implied in the order he gave. There was no start; there was no race. Then it was said that the referee decided that there was a start, and that there was a race, for this was implied in his award. But in the cases cited the arbitrator had given a decision upon the points which enabled him to make the award. Either this was proved in fact, or there was nothing to rebut it. Here the referee had power to award to whom the stakes were to be given, but that presupposes that there has been a race, and a race necessarily presupposes a start. Primâ facie, it would be implied when he awarded the stakes that there had been a start, and that there had been a race; but we have before us in evidence that there was no start, and that there was no race. These two things being absolutely necessary to give the referee jurisdiction to award the stakes, it seems to me that what would have been the foundation of his authority to award the stakes has failed. I think, therefore, that these cases do not apply, and we have here the case of stakes awarded without jurisdiction, without the conditions precedent upon which it would attach. There was no race or start which would have warranted the referee according to a just exercise of his authority in awarding the stakes, and we are not prevented from doing justice according to the merits of the case. The verdict will therefore stand as entered.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I must admit that I had considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon the case. I think that it was properly argued that we are not entitled to overrule the decision of the arbitrator upon any matter within his jurisdiction, and that, as to anything within his jurisdiction, his decision is final, and cannot be reviewed by a jury or by this Court. But the question here is, what has he decided? When we have ascertained what he decided, we must consider whether the decision is within his jurisdiction. Now, the terms of his decision, given immediately after the time for the race, were simply that Kelley was entitled to the stakes. This may be a decision involving all the steps necessary to vest in Kelley a good title to the stakes, or it may be merely an order by the referee, without any authority that the money should be paid over. It may be illustrated in this manner: Suppose there had been no race or pretence of a race, and the referee had said, "I award that Kelley is entitled to the stakes," he would not on that account have been entitled to them, because, in fact, it would not have been an award made with reference to such a race as the parties contemplated when they consented that the referee should have authority over them. Now in this particular case, the referee hearing a report that Sadler would not start, sent an order through his competitor Kelley that, if he did not start, he, Kelley, was to row the race without him. I will assume for the present purpose that the referee had power to make such an order. This seems to have been conceded (and I should think, from the nature of the case, that it was a sort of authority that it would be desirable to give to such a referee). It would then be in his power to say that the men should start at a particular time, if up to that time they had not been able to start themselves. I am accordingly inclined to think, and I assume for the purposes of this judgment, that if a question had subsequently been raised as to whether or not Sadler had refused to start, that it would have been within the jurisdiction of the referee to decide this question. But no such question arose. The referee, after sending the message to Sadler, that if he, Sadler, would not start, Kelley was to start without him, proceeded to look after the business of the race, and when Kelley came in, assumed that that which he had prescribed as the condition upon which the race was to depend had been done. It was precisely the same as if Kelley, instead of going back to where Sadler was, and saying, or appearing to say, something to him, had simply turned his boat round out of sight of the referee, and then turned ahead of the other boat and rowed in to the winning-post. If this had taken place, and we can suppose that the referee could have remained uninformed of it, he would, upon seeing Kelley come in, have assumed that what he had directed to be done had been done, though, in fact, nothing of the kind had happened, and no race would ever have taken place within the meaning of the parties. What I have illustrated by a strong instance is what has really taken place here. The referee sent Kelley back to give the order. Kelley, in fact, as found by the jury, communicated nothing whatever to Sadler; Sadler, therefore, never refused to start; the condition upon which the referee said that the race was to be run never took place; Kelley ought never to have started, and, not starting, did not in any way perform the race with reference to which the powers of the arbitrator had been given. Upon these grounds, I think that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. I ought to add, though it would have been better to have said so a few minutes earlier, that I do not think that the written award makes any difference in the case. The true award was made shortly after the race was run. This is manifest when you come to examine what the referee has said, because the operative passages in the written award, even if he had power to make a written award to alter the effect of that which he had done, do not alter it. He says—"My decision is, that Kelley is entitled to the stakes." I have already commented on the meaning which these words may bear. He goes on to say, "I did order him to row over." Later on he says, "I told him, if Sadler refused, to start without him, and this he did." But he does not anywhere say that Sadler had refused to start, or that the state of things had arisen upon which he had commanded Kelley to row over without him, and, in fact, we are informed that there was no discussion upon this subject afterwards, and no evidence offered respecting it; so that the facts remained just as they were immediately after this race, or semblance of a race.

HAYES, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that the case is the same as if, in a race between two race-horses, one horse was started without giving the other an opportunity of starting, and consequently contrary to the real directions which the steward had given upon the subject. It is said that in point of fact one of the parties has had all the race to himself, and that the arbitrator has decided that he is entitled to the stakes. But in point of fact the arbitrator is the judge of the race, and to judge of the race he must have an opportunity of seeing how the two men have actually run. If either of them has a fair opportunity of starting, and refuses or omits to take advantage of it, that is his fault. Neither of these circumstances has taken place here, and there has been in truth no race at all. I think, therefore, that the referee had no authority to give his decision, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover his stake.

Covenant—" Assigns "—Land taken by Railway Company under Compulsory Powers—Repeal of Covenant by Operation of Law.

COVENANT. E. LANDLORD AND TENANT. MAXIMS. STATUTE. F.—A landowner who has covenanted in the usual form that neither he nor his " assigns " shall build upon his land, is discharged from his covenant after selling the premises to a railway company under their compulsory powers, as the company became assignees of the land, not by the voluntary act of the former owner, but by compulsion of law.

In an action of covenant by lessee against lessor it was alleged and admitted on the record that the defendant had covenanted that neither he nor his " assigns " should or would, during the term, permit to be built any messuage, &c., on a paddock fronting the demised premises; that the paddock had been purchased by a railway company, and conveyed to them by the defendant under the compulsory powers of their special Act, and that they had erected buildings on the ground contrary to the covenant. It was also stated that the buildings, &c., were not such as it was necessary or compulsory for the company to erect on the land in question:—Held, that the defendant was not liable, as the railway company could not be taken to be assigns within the contemplation of the parties to the covenant, and it made no difference whether the company were required or empowered to take the land. The plaintiff was, therefore, one of a class of persons injured by the construction of the railway, for whom the legislature had provided no compensation.

Declaration, that the defendant, by deed, demised (amongst other hereditaments) to the plaintiff a certain piece or parcel of ground in the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell, in Surrey, and the messuage or tenement, together with other erections and buildings then recently erected and built thereon by the plaintiff, for eighty-nine years from March 25, 1840, at a rent thereby reserved. And the defendant thereby (amongst other things) covenanted with the plaintiff that neither he, the defendant, his heirs, or his assigns, should or would during the term permit to be built on the ground or paddock fronting the premises demised by the deed, as aforesaid, towards the north, any messuage or dwelling-house, coach-house or stable, or other erection, save and except summer or pleasure houses in private garden ground, and also a church or chapel at the eastern extremity of the ground or paddock; and which ground or paddock was delineated on the ground plot or plan drawn in the margin of the deed. Averment of conditions precedent.

Breach—That after making the demise, and during the term, the defendant permitted to be built on the said ground or paddock certain erections other than those by the deed excepted, to wit, a railway station, with the appurtenances thereof, including water-closets and urinals. And the plaintiff says that by reason of the premises he has been greatly annoyed and damnified in the enjoyment of the land, messuage and hereditaments, demised by the deed, and the value of the land and messuage, and of the term, has been much depreciated, and the amenity and comfort of the land and messuage as a residence have been deteriorated by the interference with the prospect therefrom by reason of the erections aforesaid, and by reason of the smoke proceeding from the chimneys of the railway station and premises, and by reason of the plaintiff's messuage being overlooked by the windows of the railway station and premises; and by reason of the premises the plaintiff has been prevented from having so beneficial a use and occupation of the lands as he otherwise would have had, and has been otherwise damnified. And the plaintiff further says, that after the making of the deed and demise, and during the term thereby granted, the defendant assigned the ground or paddock to the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, and that the company, after the assignment and during the term, and while they were possessed of the ground or paddock by virtue of the assignment from the defendant, erected and built the railway station, with the appurtenances, on the ground and paddock, contrary to the covenant, to the damage of the plaintiff as above mentioned.

Plea—That before the committing of the alleged breaches, and after the making of the deed, the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Co. required to take and purchase the ground or paddock under the powers given them by the London, Brighton and South Coast (New Lines) Act, 1862, and for the purposes for which they were by the Act empowered to purchase and take the ground or paddock. That the ground or paddock was land which the company were empowered by the Act to purchase and take compulsorily for the purposes of the undertaking authorized by the Act; and that after the making of the deed, and before the committing of the alleged breaches, the company did, under and according to the powers conferred upon them by the Act, and by virtue of the Act, compulsorily purchase and take the ground or paddock, and for the completion of the purchase the defendant, by deed, did convey the ground or paddock to the company and their successors, which is the assignment in the declaration mentioned, whereupon and whereby the company under and by virtue of the Act became seised in their demesne as of fee of the ground or paddock, and continued so seised until afterwards the company, being so seised, built on the ground or paddock the erections in the declaration mentioned, which were erections reasonably required by them for the purposes of their undertaking authorized by the Act, which building by the company is the building complained of in the breaches. And that, except as aforesaid, the defendant did not permit the erections to be built.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder in demurrer.

Replication—That although reasonable, still it was neither necessary nor compulsory for the railway company to build the station on the land in question.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer.

F. M. White, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad. It appears from the record that there was a paddock fronting the premises leased to the plaintiff, and that the defendant covenanted that neither he nor any one to whom he assigned this paddock should erect certain buildings upon it. It is not denied that these buildings have been erected on the paddock by a railway company, to whom it was assigned by the defendant, but the defendant says that there has been no breach of his covenant, since he was forced to assign the ground to the company in accordance with the powers conferred upon them by their special Act. But this is no sufficient excuse. It is necessary that the plea should go further and shew, not merely that the Act of Parliament enabled the company to take the land, but that it obliged them to erect the buildings upon it. A covenant is repealed by an Act of Parliament only where the Act makes it illegal for the covenantor to perform his covenant.

[LUSH, J.—The breach is, that the defendant permitted buildings to be erected on the paddock. You have to make out that he gave the company permission to build.]

In Brewster v. Kitchell (12 Mod. 167), where a memorandum was indorsed on the deed granting a rentcharge to the effect that the grantee was to be "paid the rentcharge without any deduction or abatement of taxes, charge or payment out of, for or concerning the rent," and the question was whether the grantor of the rent and his heirs should be obliged to pay the rent without deduction in respect of taxes imposed by Parliament in the future, and which it was provided the tenant might deduct from his rent, Holt, C.J. says, "This Act can by no means destroy this covenant because, though the tenant has a liberty to deduct, yet the Act does not hinder him from paying his rent without it, he does not break the law if he pays his rent without any deduction; and this is the difference when an Act of Parliament shall or shall not destroy a covenant. If a man covenant to do a thing which is lawful at the time of the making, and an Act come afterwards and make the thing covenanted to be done unlawful, such Act is a repeal of the covenant; but where a man obliges himself to do a thing which perhaps was not lawful before, and an Act makes it lawful, the Act does not repeal the covenant." So here, the company are at liberty to build upon the land; but, as it is admitted by the demurrer to the replication, there is no obligation upon them to do so. In Wynn v. the Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Co. (5 Ex. Rep. 420) the company were held to be discharged from their covenant to take a limited quantity of water from a stream by a subsequent Act of Parliament which extended their powers over this stream, but it was on the ground that the legislature had made it unlawful for them to perform their covenant; and that it was absurd to suppose an action would lie against them for doing what the legislature had said they should be obliged to do. Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S. 267) is another authority to shew that it is only where the performance of the covenant is rendered unlawful that the contract is dissolved; and possibly if the Act of Parliament had compelled the company to build the station the plaintiff would have had no remedy. If the plea is taken to mean that the covenant is repealed by the statute, the answer is that the operation of the statute is not compulsory, and the defendant, if he had pleased, might have bound the company by a covenant not to build on the ground which they took from him. If it is said that the company are not assigns within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, this objection is removed by the terms of the Lands Clauses Act, section 75, which require the seller of land to companies to make out a good title to it, and to execute a proper conveyance to the company. So that these companies are in the position of ordinary assignees of real property.

Raymond, in support of the plea.—The proposition of the defendant is simply this: In entering into a restrictive covenant on behalf of himself and his "assigns" he could only have meant persons to whom he should of his own free will assign his property, and not such assignees as the legislature might choose to thrust upon him. The covenant does not contemplate any interference with the land by the legislature.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The object of the legislature is to give the person interested in the land the real value of his interest. Might not the claimant say, "The real value is so much, for you are taking the land to build upon it, and there will be a breach of the covenant with which I am burdened?" The lessee pays a larger rent because of the covenant. If this covenant is taken into account between the lessor and the company, is it not fair that the difference in the value of the land should be handed over to the lessee?]

The defendant is not a voluntary assignor. His execution of the conveyance to the company is a mere matter of form, and he could not require the company to bind themselves by restrictive covenants.

[HANNEN, J.—The answer to that is that he would be entitled to all the more compensation.]

In Doe d. Mitchinson v. Carter (8 Term Rep. 57), where a lessee covenanted not to assign, with a power of re-entry on default, and executed a warrant of attorney under which the term was taken in execution, it was held that there was no breach of the covenant. It was argued that the sale of the lease by the sheriff was a hostile act done by operation of law. And Lord Kenyon says, "I adopt the distinction relied on by the defendant's counsel between those acts that the party does voluntarily and those that pass in invitum. Judgments in contemplation of law always pass in invitum, and I see no difference between a judgment that is obtained in consequence of an action resisted and a judgment that is signed under a warrant of attorney, since the latter is merely to shorten the process and to lessen the expense of the proceedings." And Grose, J. refers to Crusoe v. Bugby (2 W. Black. 766; 3 Wills. 234) as an authority that although becoming bankrupt, &c. may be a breach of the covenant not to put away the term, yet it does not amount to an assignment. Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (3 M. & S. 353) was an ejectment against a lessee for breach of his covenant not to part with his interest. It appeared that he had deposited the lease as a security for money borrowed, and then became bankrupt, and that the lease was sold by direction of the Chancellor to pay the debt. It was held that there was no forfeiture, Lord Ellenborough saying (page 358), "Here the question is upon the meaning of the term 'assigns,' whether by that term the proviso was meant to have effect against assigns in law as it would have against assigns of the party. Now the Courts have construed it to mean 'voluntary assigns' as contradistinguished from 'assigns' by operation of law." And Bayley, J. adds, "If 'assigns' mean voluntary assigns, what act is there to make them voluntary?" In the recent case of Slipper v. the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway Company (36 L. J. Ch. 841), where a railway company, after notice to treat, arranged by private contract the price of the interest of a tenant in lands, who had a covenant in his lease not to assign without the consent of the lessor, the Master of the Rolls held, on the authority of Wadham v. Marlowe (8 East, 314, n.), that the covenant not to assign was superseded by the Lands Clauses Act, as the lessor could not refuse or assent to the assignment.

[LUSH, J.—There the Act of Parliament bore directly on the covenant not to assign.]

In that case, as in the present, the material fact was that the company were assignees by operation of law.

F. M. White, in reply.—In the case last cited, the breach was necessarily involved in that which the company were empowered to do. If this had been a covenant to maintain a plantation on the land, it may be admitted that there would be an answer to the action. But the plea is bad for not shewing that it was necessary and inevitable that the company should build on the paddock. If the defendant had foregone his compensation, he might have induced the company to enter into a restrictive covenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was now (Jan. 20) delivered by—

certain premises, granted by the defendant to the plaintiff in 1840, for a term of eighty-nine years, whereby the defendant covenanted that "neither he nor his assigns should or would during the term permit to be built any messuage," &c., on a paddock fronting the demised premises. The breaches alleged are, 1, that the defendant during the term permitted a railway station to be built on the paddock; 2, that the defendants assigned the paddock to the London and Brighton Railway Company, who erected the railway station on the paddock. To this declaration the defendant pleaded that after the making of the deed, the railway company required to take the said paddock, under two powers given them by Act of Parliament (1862) for purposes for which they were by the said Act empowered to take the same; that the paddock was land which the company were empowered to take compulsorily for the purposes of the undertaking authorized by the Act, and that the company, under the powers so conferred, did compulsorily purchase and take the paddock, and that the assignment by the defendant to the company was the assignment in completion of such compulsory purchase; that the company afterwards built on the paddock the erections complained of, which were erections reasonably required for the purposes of the undertaking authorized by the Act, and that, except as aforesaid, the defendant did not permit the said erections to be built. The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and also replied that the erections, though reasonable, were not necessary or compulsory for the company to build. To this replication there was a demurrer. It must be taken on these pleadings that the assignment by the defendant to the railway company was altogether made under the requirements of the Act of Parliament, and without any stipulation introduced into the conveyance by the vendor or the purchaser which would alter its character as an act done by the defendant in obedience to the command of the legislature. The 75th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is imperative that the owner of lands shall, on the performance of the conditions imposed on the company, when required so to do, duly convey the lands to the promoters, or as they shall direct; and in default thereof, it shall be lawful for the promoters to execute a deed-poll, declaring the fact of such default having been made, and thereupon all the estate and interest in such land capable of being sold and conveyed (by such owner) shall vest absolutely in the promoters of the undertaking. We think that no such distinction can be drawn between the case of an owner of lands who does that which it is his duty to do, namely, convey to the company, and one who, by refusing to convey, obliges the company to obtain a title to the lands by the execution of a deed-poll. In the one case, as in the other, the transfer of the title is compelled by the legislature, and it cannot be supposed that it was intended that the landowner who acts solely in obedience to the law should be in a worse position than one who refuses compliance. In either case the railway company must be regarded as the assignee of the land, not by the voluntary act of the former owner, but by compulsion of law. The substantial question therefore raised is, whether the defendant is discharged from his covenant by the subsequent Act of Parliament, which put it out of his power to perform it. We are of opinion that he is so discharged, on the principle expressed in the maxim Lex non cogit ad impossibilia.

We have first to consider what is the covenant which the parties have entered into. There can be no doubt that a man may, by an absolute contract, bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damage for their non-performance, and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking, where the event which causes the impossibility was, or might have been, anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or where the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promissor. But where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens. It is on this principle that the act of

God is, in some cases, said to excuse the breach of a contract. That is, in fact, an inaccurate expression, because, where it is an answer to a complaint of an alleged breach of contract that the thing done or left undone was so by the act of God, what is meant is that it was not within the contract; for, as is observed by Maule, J., in Canham v. Barry (15 Com. B. Rep. 619; 24 L. J. C.P. 106), a man might by apt words bind himself that it shall rain to-morrow or that he will pay damages. This is the explanation of the case put by Lord Coke in 1 Rep. 98: " If a lessee covenants to leave a wood in as good plight as the wood was at the time of the lease, and afterwards the trees are blown down by tempest, he is discharged of his covenant," because it was thought that the covenant was intended to relate only to the tenant's own acts, and not to an event beyond his control, producing effects not in his power to remedy—see Sheppard's Touchstone, 8th edit. 133, 157.

It is on this principle that it has been held that an impossibility arising from an act of the legislature subsequent to the contract discharges the contractor from liability. Again, to quote an observation of Maule, J., in The Mayor of Berwick v. Oswald (3 El. & B. 665; 23 L. J. Q.B. (Ex. Ch.) 324), there is nothing " to prevent parties, if they choose by apt words to express an intention so to do, from binding themselves by a contract as to any future state of the law "; but " people in general must always be considered as contracting with reference to the law as existing at the time of the contract," and the words shewing a contrary intention ought to be pretty clear to rebut that presumption. To hold a man liable by words in a sense affixed to them by legislation subsequent to the contract, is to impose on him a contract he never made. This is the principle of that which was laid down in Brewster v. Kitchell (1 Salk. 198) that, " Where H. covenants not to do an act or thing which was lawful to do, and an Act of Parliament comes after and compels him to do it, the statute repeals the covenant. So, if H. covenants to do a thing which is lawful, and an Act of Parliament comes in and hinders him from doing it, the covenant is repealed." To apply the foregoing observations to the present case: The defendant has covenanted that his " assigns " shall not build. The word " assigns " is a term of well-known signification, comprehending all those who take either immediately or remotely from or under the assignor, whether by conveyance, devise, descent or act of law—Spencer's case (5 Co. Rep. 16; 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. 43). The defendant when he contracted used the general word " assigns," knowing that it had a definite meaning, and he was able to foresee and guard against the liabilities which might arise from his contract so interpreted. The legislature by compelling him to part with his land to the railway company, whom he could not bind by any stipulation, as he could an assignee chosen by himself, has created a new kind of assign such as was not in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was entered into. To hold the defendant responsible for the acts of such an assignee, is to make an entirely new contract for the parties. On the other hand, to confine the word " assigns " to those who take by the voluntary act of the assignor would not, as was suggested in argument, limit the operation of the covenant to his immediate grantee, because all those who take from the first assignee do so in consequence of the original voluntary act of the assignor, and it was his own fault that he assigned at all, or that he did not in the original conveyance guard against the acts of subsequent assignees. To exempt him from liability for such acts would be contrary to the intention of the parties to be collected from their words interpreted according to their known ordinary signification. It was indeed conceded on the argument by the plaintiff's counsel, that the defendant would not be liable for all acts of the railway company as he would have been for the acts of any other assign; but it was contended that the defendant was relieved from liability on his covenant as to those acts only which the company was required by the Act of Parliament to do, and not as to those which the company was merely empowered to do. We do not think that this distinction is well founded. The rule laid down in Brewster v. Kitchell (1 Salk. 198) rests upon the ground that it is not reasonable to suppose that the legislature, while altering the condition of things with reference to which the covenantor contracted, intended that he should remain liable on a covenant which the legislature itself prevented his fulfilling; but the covenantor in this case is equally disabled from preventing the railway company from doing those things which it is empowered to do as those which it is required to do. Why then should there be a difference in the liability of the covenantor with respect to the one and the other? But assuming that the imposing on the defendant by the legislature of assigns whom he could not control would, without more, free him from the engagements which he entered into with reference to assigns whom he could control, it remains necessary to deal with the argument that though the company was empowered to take the lands free from the restrictions upon building, this was only on condition of paying full compensation for what they got, and that it must be supposed that the defendant obtained from the company not only the value of the land as he held it, encumbered with a covenant not to build, but also what was deemed a fair consideration for the right to build. It appears to be assumed in this argument that the difference between the price of the land encumbered with the covenant not to build, and the price of it, freed from that covenant would be the amount of damages to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff in the present action. But that is not so. The plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all in this action, would be entitled to the damage he had sustained by the breach of the covenant, even if those damages should exceed the whole value of the land taken. The argument in favour of the plaintiff to be derived from the enactments relating to compensation is no doubt this: The legislature has, in express terms, or by necessary implication from its language, given to persons in the defendant's situation a remedy over against the railway company in respect of acts done by the company: this would here indicate that the legislature did not intend that the defendant should be freed from liability on his covenant, although he was disabled from performing it. But we cannot find in the Railway Acts any express or implied enactment to this effect. It has already been pointed out that there is no relation between the compensation which the defendant would be entitled to for his land and the damages for which he would be liable to the plaintiff. How would it be possible for the defendant to lay before the compensation jury evidence of the extent of his liability on such a covenant as that under consideration? How could he, in an inquiry to which the plaintiff was no party, offer evidence of the injury which the plaintiff might by any possibility sustain in the uncertain event of the company erecting a station or other building on the land taken? Further, if the covenant of the defendant is to be considered as broken by the act of the railway company, so as to entitle the plaintiff to damages, it must be deemed to carry with it the other consequences of a breach of contract. Thus, if the situation of the plaintiff and the defendant in this case had been reversed, and the covenant not to build on land adjoining the demised premises had been entered into by a lessee with the usual proviso for re-entry in the event of breach of any covenant, the lessee would have been liable to forfeiture of his whole interest by reason of an act over which he had no control; and the railway company would be liable, if the plaintiff's contention be correct, to pay by way of compensation for a piece of land taken, the whole value of the interest of the lessee in the adjoining estate.

The solution of the case appears to be this: the plaintiff is one of a numerous class of persons injured by the construction of a railway for whom the legislature has not provided compensation. This may be illustrated by reference to the special damage claimed in the declaration. It is there alleged that the amenity and comfort of the land demised have been diminished by reason of the prospect therefrom being interfered with, and by being overlooked by the windows of the station with the appurtenances, including water-closets and urinals. These are heads of damage which railway companies are not, in ordinary circumstances, bound to give compensation for, but for which the defendant would be liable in an action on his covenant. We do not think that it was the intention of the legislature to make a railway company liable for such damages in the exceptional case of a person in the position of the plaintiff having taken a covenant from the lessor in the terms of that under consideration; or that if such had been the intention of the legislature so peculiar a head of compensation as that now suggested, namely, for liability to damages for breach of collateral covenants resulting from the taking of lands, would have been left to be conjectured from the vague language of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. For these reasons we are of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Consignor and Consignee—Vesting of Property in Goods—Bill of Lading and Bill of Exchange forwarded together.

SALE OF GOODS. D.—The plaintiff, a cotton-merchant at Manchester, sent to P, N. & Co. an order to purchase for him 1,000 bales of cotton, at or under 8½*d. per pound, to include cost freight and insurance. P, N. & Co. were merchants at Pernambuco, and P. & Co. their correspondents at Liverpool. P, N. & Co. shipped two portions of the cotton on different vessels, and wrote to the plaintiff, inclosing the invoices, and saying "We have drawn upon you, as per note at foot, for the same, to which beg your protection." "The bills lading will be handed over to you by P. & Co." The invoices were headed "On account and risk of S. & Co." (the plaintiff). The bills of lading made the cotton deliverable to P. & Co.'s order or assigns, and were forwarded, together with bills of exchange for the price, to the plaintiff by P. & Co. The plaintiff returned the bills of exchange accepted, and complained that some of the cotton had not been bought according to his instructions. P, N. & Co. then shipped the residue of the cotton on another vessel, and wrote to the plaintiff saying, "Inclosed please find invoice and bill of lading of* 200 bales of cotton. We have drawn upon you draft in favour of P. & Co., to which beg your protection." The invoice, like the former ones, was headed "On account and risk of S. & Co. (the plaintiff). The bill of lading was, however, forwarded by P, N. & Co. to P. & Co., together with the bill of exchange. The bill of lading made the cotton deliverable "to order or his or their assigns." P. & Co. wrote to the plaintiff inclosing the bill of lading, duly indorsed, and the bill of exchange, for which they requested protection, but the plaintiff retained the bill of lading and returned the bill of exchange unaccepted, and on the refusal of the shipowners to give up the cotton brought trover against them:—Held, upon a case stating these particulars, with power for the Court to draw inferences of fact, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, as the acceptance of the bill of exchange by him was a condition precedent to his right to the possession of the cotton.

Per Cockburn, C.J.—Assuming that the property in the cotton had passed to the plaintiff, it was the intention of the parties that P, N. & Co. should have a lien upon it until their draft for the price had been accepted by the plaintiff.

Trover for the conversion of 200 bales of cotton.

Pleas—first, not guilty; secondly, that the goods were not the plaintiff's. Issue thereon.

The cause came on for trial, before Mellor, J., and a special jury, at the Manchester Spring Assizes, 1868, when a verdict was entered by consent for the plaintiff, for 1,251*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

The plaintiff is a cotton and general merchant, carrying on business at Manchester, under the style of John Shepherd & Co. The defendants are the owners of the screw steamer "Olinda" of Liverpool.

Paton, Nash & Co. are merchants at Pernambuco, in the Brazils, and George Paton & Co., who carry on business at Liverpool as merchants, are the Liverpool correspondents of Paton, Nash & Co.

Before April 23, 1866, several transactions had taken place between the plaintiff and Paton, Nash & Co. In all these (except on one occasion in 1865, when Paton, Nash & Co. purchased cotton for the plaintiff), Paton, Nash & Co. acted as agents for the sale of goods consigned to them by the plaintiff. The following letters relate to the purchase in 1865:—

Paton, Nash & Co. to plaintiff.

"Pernambuco, March 31, 1865.

"Cotton having given way a little, we have been able to buy for you 200 bags Pernams at your limit of 14*d*.; amongst them are a few Seconds at 1½*d*. less. We are shipping them per A 1 English brigantine 'Spray,' Milhurst master, to sail in about ten days. It is just possible we may complete your order, but at present there are no more offering. By the English steamer of 13th prox., we shall send bill of lading and value on you for cost."

Paton & Co. to plaintiff.

"20, Castle Street, Liverpool, May 3, 1865.

"Herewith we beg to hand you bill lading of 240 bags cotton per "Spray." We presume our Pernambuco friends have made a mistake in sending it under cover to us. We also inclose draft on your good selves for 2,072*l*. 9*s*. 6*d*., which we will thank you to return with the needful."

On April 23, 1866, the plaintiff sent to Paton, Nash & Co. a letter, inclosing the accompanying order:

(Inclosure.)

"1,000 bales or any less quantity of Pernams if at or under 11½*d*. per lb. for Firsts, free of all charges in Liverpool."

To this letter Paton, Nash & Co. replied as follows:

"We wrote you under date of 12th inst., and are since in receipt of your favour of the 23rd inst., ordering 1,000 bales of Pernam cottons at or under 11½*d*. per lb. for Firsts, free of all charges in Liverpool: this we understand to mean free on board including freight, insurance and commission. This shall have our careful attention. You do not mention how we are to reimburse ourselves, whether we are to discount sales or draw on you. Please to mention this in future orders. If you had Pernam cotton last year at 12*d*. or under, your agents must have sacrificed their commission, which we are not inclined to do. There is no change in the cotton market yet, but we fear that the price will not go low enough to enable us to operate for you."

The order of April 23, 1866, was not executed by Paton, Nash & Co., and on September 7, 1867, the plaintiff wrote to them as follows:

"In your last you do not make any reference to our cotton order. We therefore do not know whether you consider it in force. At our limits to you cotton is now landing in Liverpool, and we question whether it will give cost, as the price is daily lowering. Our order now will stand as on the other side, but if you prefer not to give it attention, you will let us know by first post. Order for 1,000 bales, or any less quantity, if new crop, Pernams Firsts cotton, at or under 8½*d*. per lb., to include cost, freight and insurance. . . . Should prices continue to go down we may lower our limit by next mail.

(Signed) "Jno. Shepherd & Co."

To this Paton, Nash & Co. replied as follows:

"Pernambuco, September 28, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sirs,—We had last this pleasure on the 12th inst., and are since in receipt of your esteemed favour of the 7th idem, giving us order to purchase on your account 1,000 bales First Pernams, including cost, freight and insurance, at 8½*d.* per lb. of the new crop. This order shall have our best attention; and we note that we may purchase also Seconds, which will be at a difference of 1½*d.* per lb. . . . You do not mention whether part of the order is to go against your funds lying here, but we suppose you intend it as a remittance.

(Signed) "Per pro. Paton, Nash & Co.,
"A. W. C. SOARES."

The case then set out some further correspondence between the plaintiff and Paton, Nash & Co., of which the following is part:

"Manchester, October 23, 1867.

"Paton, Nash & Co., Pernambuco.

"Dear Sirs,—Our last was on the 8th inst. We hope that before its receipt you had not made any purchase of cotton for us. Circumstances make it necessary for us still further to reduce our limit to 6*d.* for Firsts, and we hope you may be able to come in for us even under that, and we do not wish any purchase of Seconds or Mediums, as Mr. Nash informed us yesterday that there was no difficulty in buying Firsts by themselves. Refer to our letter of April 23, 1866. Pray don't make the mistake you did before about our funds in your hands; they never were intended to be applied to pay for cotton purchases, but to wait instructions.

(Signed) "JNO. SHEPHERD & Co."
"Pernambuco, October 25, 1867.

"Messrs. Jno. Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"We had last this pleasure on the 15th inst., and we have now to advise having purchased on your account about 750 bales cotton, including the 150 bales advised 15th inst. . . . We have shipped on board the Norwegian brig 'Capella' 339 bales, &c. . . . We are shipping per screw steamer 'La Plata' 208 bales; they will go on board to-day, and we expect she will be with you before this conveyance. There will be about 200 bales still to ship, and we expect the 'Capella' will take them. . . . On reading over your order again we are impressed that you wish us to draw for the amount of invoice, and not to deduct net proceeds in our hands, and we therefore shall value upon you on forwarding bills of lading. By the 'La Plata' to-morrow we shall have again this pleasure.

(Signed) "Per pro. Paton, Nash & Co.,
"A. W. C. SOARES."
"Pernambuco, October 25, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd, Manchester.

"We have already had this pleasure to-day, as per duplicate annexed, and beg now to inclose invoices of 339 bales per 'Capella,' costing 1,616*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*; 208 ditto 'La Plata' 883*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*

"We have drawn upon you as per note at foot for the same, to which beg your protection. We are afraid the 'Capella' will not be able to take the 200 bales; therefore it will be as well to insure per steamer or sailing vessel.

"Note of drafts: No. 926, favour of Messrs. George Paton & Co., 90*s.*, 1,616*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.* No. 927, ditto, 883*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* The bills lading will be handed over to you by Messrs. George Paton & Co.

(Signed) "Pro Paton, Nash & Co.,
"A. W. C. SOARES."

The first of the invoices inclosed was headed "Invoice of 339 bales of cotton shipped per Norwegian brig 'Capella' for Liverpool, on account and risk of Messrs. John Shepherd & Co."; and the second, "Invoice of 208 bales, &c., on account and risk of Messrs. John Shepherd & Co."

On October 25, 1867, 747 bales had, in fact, been purchased by Paton, Nash & Co., on account of the plaintiff, and of these 339 ex "Capella," and the 208 ex "La Plata" (547 in all), described in the invoice of October 25, 1867, were afterwards received by the plaintiff under bills of lading, forwarded from Pernambuco.

These bills of lading, together with the two bills of exchange, No. 926 and

Digitized by Google

No. 927, were forwarded by Paton, Nash & Co. to George Paton & Co. by the same mail by which the letters of October 25 were despatched, and on November 16, 1867, the bills of lading and bills of exchange were forwarded by George Paton & Co. to the plaintiff inclosed in the following letter:

"Liverpool, November 16, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Gentlemen,—We beg to hand you herewith bills of lading for 339 bales cotton per 'Capella' and 208 bales cotton per 'La Plata,' received this morning from our Pernambuco friends. We also inclose bills on your good selves for 1,616*l*. 8*s*. 8*d*. and 883*l*. 7*s*. 1*d*., to which please do the needful, and return to us in course. (Signed) "George Paton & Co.,

"Per Wm. Fletcher."

These two bills of exchange were accepted by the plaintiff, and were returned by him in the letter of November 18, 1867, to George Paton & Co., who replied by the letter under the same date. The bills were paid by the plaintiff at maturity.

"Manchester, November 18, 1867.

"Messrs. George Paton & Co.

"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of the 16th inst. is to hand, bringing two bills for acceptance, which, as desired, we now return as accepted, but with the reservation as to the Mediums and Seconds not being bought according to our instructions. In case, therefore, of any loss arising from the sale of these we must claim against you.

(Signed) "John Shepherd & Co."

"Liverpool, November 18, 1867.

"Messrs. Jno. Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of this date is received with bills accepted. We note your objections to our Pernambuco friends having sent you a portion of Mediums and Seconds cotton, and from the tenor of your letter inferred that these qualities had not been mentioned at all in your order of which you kindly sent us a copy on the 22nd ult. On reference to this we find that you allow 'one third or less of Seconds if at 1¾*d*. to 2*d*. under Firsts.' Our friends seem to have exceeded a very trifle your limits for Seconds, and as to 'Mediums,' they might easily have been classed as Firsts, in fact they frequently turn out so on this side. Moreover, the term 'Mediums' is an absurd one, which has crept into use only within the last few months; they are virtually Firsts. As to Seconds it is frequently impossible to avoid a few in order to facilitate execution of orders. Our friends, we find, have executed your order under your limits, and we hope on the whole you will consider they have consulted your interests. We therefore hope you bear us harmless as to results, for our position might have been altered by a different wording of our invoice.

(Signed) "George Paton & Co."

"Manchester, November 19, 1861.

"Messrs. Geo. Paton & Co.

"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of yesterday is to hand, and we note contents. With regard to the Seconds and Mediums referred to, we do not see that we could alter what we have said. We will be equally glad, if not more so than you will be, to find there will be no loss by them. In regard to the purchase of the Firsts we do not complain, but we do regret that the purchase has been so hastily made in so decidedly a falling market, and it would have given us pleasure had our dry goods been as keenly disposed of.

"Liverpool, November 20, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sir,—Your favour of yesterday is received. Our letter to you of the 18th inst. was based on the supposition that our Pernambuco friends had bought Seconds cotton for you on the deferential limit mentioned in your order of April 23, 1866. . . . As to the Mediums, we again repeat that they could fairly have been classed as Firsts. We think our friends hardly deserve the remark you make about a 'falling market,' considering that on a former occasion you blamed them for not buying.

(Signed) "GEO. PATON & Co."

"Liverpool, November 22, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of yesterday is received. We have no copy of your letter to Paton, Nash & Co. of September 7, but we quote from a copy of their letter to yourselves of September 28 last, 'We had last this pleasure on the 12th inst., and are since in receipt of your esteemed favour of the 7th idem, giving us orders to purchase on your account 1,000 bales First Pernams, including costs, freight and insurance, at 8½*d.* per lb. of the new crop. This order shall have our best attention, and we note that we may purchase also Seconds, which will be at a difference of 1½*d.* per lb.'

(Signed) "GEO. PATON & Co."

A long correspondence ensued between the plaintiff, on the one hand, and Paton, Nash & Co. and George Paton & Co. on the other hand, the plaintiff contending that the 547 bales did not, and the other parties that they did, comply with the plaintiff's orders to Paton, Nash & Co.

The remaining 200 bales purchased by Paton, Nash & Co. were shipped by them on the defendant's screw steamer "Olinda," and they thereupon addressed the following letter to the plaintiff:

"Pernambuco, Nov. 12, 1867.

"Messrs. John Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sirs,—We annex duplicate of our last respects of the 28th ult., and are since in receipt of your esteemed favour of the 23rd idem, reducing your limit for the remaining 250 bales Pernam, 6*d.* per lb., including foreign commission and insurance, and that you only want Firsts. Inclosed please find invoice and bill of lading of 200 bales cotton shipped per 'Olinda' S.S., costing 861*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, and which we hope may prove correct and satisfactory. We have advanced the captain of the brig 'Capella' 55*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, as per receipt inclosed, to be deducted from the freight on your cotton, and on which you have 5*l.* per cent. commission and insurance, 2*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*, to cover the advance. We have therefore drawn upon you for 916*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* Draft No. 935, favour of Messrs. George Paton & Co., to which beg your protection.

(Signed) "Per pro. Paton, Nash & Co.,

"A. W. C. SOARES."

The invoice referred to was headed

"Invoice of 200 bales of cotton, shipped per 'Olinda,' S.S., for Liverpool on account and risk of Messrs. John Shepherd & Co."

The sum of 916*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* was arrived at by adding to the price of the 200 bales the sum of 55*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, which had been advanced by Paton, Nash & Co. to the captain of the "Capella," at Pernambuco. The "Capella" arrived at Liverpool in due course, and delivered to the plaintiff the 339 bales of cotton mentioned in the 8th paragraph; the plaintiff at the same time paid the freight due upon the cotton, less the said sum of 55*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

This letter and invoices were forwarded by Paton, Nash & Co. to the plaintiff direct from Pernambuco. The bill of exchange and bill of lading therein mentioned were forwarded by them, not to the plaintiff, but to George Paton & Co., who sent them forward to the plaintiff. The case then set out a copy of the bill of lading. It provided that the cotton should be delivered "unto order, or his or their assigns, he or they paying freights, &c.," and was indorsed "Per pro. Paton, Nash & Co.: A. W. C. Soares—Geo. Paton & Co."

On December 5, the "Olinda" arrived at Liverpool, and George Paton & Co. wrote the following letter to the plaintiff, inclosing the bill of exchange and bill of lading:

"Liverpool, December 5, 1867.

"Messrs. Jno. Shepherd & Co., Manchester.

"Dear Sirs,—Our Pernambuco letters to 12th ult. are just to hand, and we beg to inclose bill of lading for 200 bales cotton shipped by Messrs. Paton, Nash & Co., per 'Olinda,' S.S. on your account. We hand also their draft on your good selves for cost of the cotton, to which we beg your protection. (916*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*)

(Signed) "GEO. PATON & Co."

To this the plaintiff replied as follows:

"Manchester, December 6, 1867.

"Messrs. George Paton & Co.

"Dear Sirs,—Your favour of yesterday is received with inclosures. On reference to invoices and bills of exchange which we have accepted, we find that they have been drawn in excess of price mentioned in order; there is also a quality styled 'Mediums' that we did not order at all. These, with the hostile position you have taken with regard to the 208 bales ex "La Plata," stand in the way of our accepting the bill of exchange now inclosed. We shall place the 200 bales ex 'Olinda' in another broker's hands, and soon as we learn we shall inform you of their opinion of them.

(Signed) "JNO. SHEPHERD & Co."

The plaintiff accordingly retained the bill of lading, and returned the bill of exchange unaccepted, and it was thereupon protested by G. Paton & Co.

The plaintiff forwarded the bill of lading for the 200 bales ex "Olinda" to his Liverpool brokers, Messrs. Eason, Barry & Co., with instructions to pay the freight and obtain the cotton.

On December 9, 1867, Messrs. Eason, Barry & Co. accordingly called upon the defendants with the bill of lading and with a delivery order for the 200 bales, signed by the defendants.

Messrs. Eason, Barry & Co. at the same interview paid the defendants the sum of 90*l.*, being the approximate freight for the 200 bales as then estimated by the defendants. At the time when the defendants signed the order they knew nothing of the circumstances under which the plaintiff held the bill of lading.

On December 10, 1867, Messrs. Eason, Barry & Co., on behalf of the plaintiff, applied to the defendants for the delivery of the 200 bales ex "Olinda," but the defendants, in consequence of a communication received from George Paton & Co., refused to deliver, and on the next day they wrote to Messrs. Eason, Barry & Co., the plaintiffs agents, as follows:

"18, Chapel Street, Liverpool,

"December 11, 1867.

"Gentlemen,—Messrs. G. Paton & Co. have notified to us that no consideration has been given for the bill of lading for 200 bales cotton, p. 'Olinda,' from Pernambuco, claimed by you, and have demanded delivery to themselves under a duplicate bill of lading, and agreeing to indemnify us from all consequences. We have, under the circumstances, decided to deliver the cotton into the custody of their brokers pending litigation, and are prepared to return to you the amount of freight paid by you to us on the 9th inst. We are, yours respectfully, THO. and JAS. HARRISON."

It is true, as stated in the above letter, that George Paton & Co. held a duplicate bill of lading, under which they demanded possession of the 200 bales, and also that they had indemnified the defendants.

From the time when the order for the 1,000 bales was given, up to and at the time of the commencement of this action, Paton, Nash & Co. have always had in their hands at Pernambuco money or goods of the plaintiff's to the value of 3,000*l.*, or thereabouts.

After a formal demand of the cotton by the plaintiff, and a refusal by the defendants, this action was commenced.

It is agreed that the Court shall have power to draw any inferences of fact which a jury might draw from the above statement.

The question for the opinion of the Court is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action or no.

Digitized by Google

If the opinion of the Court be in the affirmative, then the verdict entered for the plaintiff for 1,251*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* is to stand.

If the opinion of the Court be in the negative, then a verdict is to be entered for the defendants.

Quain (Jordan with him). for the plaintiff.—The acceptance of the bill of exchange drawn by Paton, Nash & Co. upon the plaintiff was not a condition precedent to the vesting of the property in the cotton in him. It is plain from the letters in the earlier part of the case, that the course of business between the consignors and the plaintiff was not to insist upon the draft being accepted before the bill of lading was handed over. It appears from one of the first of these letters that it was the practice to send the bill of lading directly to the consignee, without the intervention of any agent. It further appears from the letter of November 12, 1867, that they had intended to inclose the bill of lading to the plaintiff. The heading of the invoices and the fact that the consignors had all along acted as the plaintiff's agents is sufficient to prevent any inference that they intended to preserve any rights over the cotton. In the leading and familiar cases upon questions like the present, the shipper of goods was never allowed to withhold them from the consignee except where there was additional evidence, such as is wanting here, to support the right of detention. In Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. Rep. 543; 20 L. J. Ex. 393), the shippers had not only drawn the bill of lading so as to make the goods deliverable to their order or assigns, but had pledged it with a bank to the knowledge of the consignee. In Gurney v. Behrend (3 El. & B. 622; 23 L. J. Q.B. 265), a case somewhat similar to the present, though the facts are more complicated, it was said by Crompton, J., p. 630, with reference to the argument that the bill of lading was only to be handed over on acceptance of the draft, "The course of business which you describe was common enough a few years ago. . . . It was common enough to insist on retaining the bill of lading till the draft was not only accepted, but paid. But I always understood this to be an exceptional course, adopted only in times of peril and suspicion." The dispute between the plaintiff and the consignors as to the limits within which the cotton was purchased cannot be entered upon by the Court, as the sole question is, in whom was the property vested at the time of bringing the action? Wilmshurst v. Bowker (7 M. & G. 882; 12 L. J. Ex. 475) is an authority in favour of the plaintiff. There, as here, the invoice stated that the goods shipped were "on account and at the risk of the vendee." The goods were to be paid for by bankers' drafts; yet it was held that the transmission of these drafts was not a condition precedent to the vesting of the property in the plaintiff. In Gurney v. Behrend (3 El. & B. 622; 23 L. J. Q.B. 265, previously cited, Lord Campbell, in his judgment, says: "It is contended on the part of the defendants that Collmann and Stolterfoht had no authority to part with the bill of lading till they had accepted the bill of exchange drawn for the price of the wheat. If this be so, they certainly exceeded their authority; for their promise to accept, which was not treated by the agents of the defendants as an acceptance, would not have been a performance of the condition on which the right to part with the bill of lading depended. The defendants might easily have imposed such a condition, had they suspected the solvency of the parties with whom they were dealing." In Key v. Cotesworth (7 Ex. Rep. 595; 22 L. J. Ex. 4), Parke, B. says, that where it is the intention of vendors to preserve their right in the property until the bills drawn against it are accepted, they ought to transmit the bills of lading drawn in blank to an agent, to be delivered over only in case the acceptance takes place. The Court will attach due weight to the fact that there seems to have been not the slightest ground for suspecting the solvency of the plaintiff, and that the consignors had funds in their hands belonging to him.

Holker, for the defendants.—The acceptance of the bill of exchange by the plaintiff was a condition precedent to his right to the possession of the cotton. The whole question in the case turns upon the intention of the consignors in shipping the cotton, and this intention is to be gathered from the form of the bill of lading and from the correspondence. In the cases relied on by the plaintiff the bill of lading had been indorsed to the consignee, or indorsed in blank and forwarded to him or his agent. This was particularly the case in Key v. Cotesworth (7 Ex. Rep. 595; 22 L. J. Ex. 4), where the agent of the person ordering the goods was the consignee under one of the bills of lading and the indorsee of the other. In Maclachlan on Merchant Shipping, p. 343, the law is thus laid down: "It may be the intention, as it is in the power, of the consignor, to divest himself of all property or risk by delivery of the goods to the master on board; or to vest the general property in the consignee, subject to a special property in some third person, or subject to its being divested on the non-performance of a condition subsequent, or he may retain the property and possession in himself, and convey to the vendee a right to both, subject to a condition precedent. This disposition of the property and possession may be varied still further by the correspondence between the parties, the contents of the invoice, but above all by the bill of lading. . . . The onus of proof lies on the person who asserts against the shipper an adverse right to the property in the bill of lading." In Brandt v. Bowlby (2 B. & Ad. 932; 1 L. J. K.B. 14) the dealing with the bill of lading was very similar to that in the present instance. The plaintiff, a Russian merchant, shipped a cargo of wheat and wrote to B. inclosing an unindorsed bill of lading, and saying, "We have much pleasure in waiting upon you with invoice and bill of lading of 770 chests wheat, shipped for your account and risk per the 'Helena'," and stating that they had drawn for the amount. It was held that the property only vested in B. upon the condition of his accepting the bills of exchange. In Wait v. Baker (2 Ex. Rep. 1; 17 L. J. Ex. 307) the bill of lading made the goods deliverable to the shipper's orders or assigns. It was held that although these goods were shipped in pursuance of a previous contract of sale, the tenor of the bill of lading shewed that it was not the seller's intention that the property should pass on the shipment, and that all that could be implied was a contract on his part to assign the bill of lading. Jenkyns v. Brown (14 Q.B. Rep. 496; 19 L. J. Q.B. 286) is strongly in point. It was there held that the right of the plaintiff to the possession of corn sold to him did not attach until he had paid his acceptances for the price, though invoices and a letter of advice were forwarded to him stating that the corn was shipped on his account, and the Court expresses its opinion that the fact that the consignors took a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to their order was almost conclusive evidence that the property did not pass by the shipment. In the present case each of the three shipments making up the 1,000 bales of cotton was made out "to order or assigns," and not in favour of the plaintiff or his agents. The acts and intention of Paton, Nash & Co. are decisive in this case, whatever may have been the conduct of the Liverpool house. —He also cited Van Casteel v. Booker (2 Ex. Rep. 691; 18 L. J. Ex. 9); Ellershaw v. Magniac (6 Ex. Rep. 570, n.); and Sheridan v. the New Quay Company (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 618; 28 L. J. C.P. 58).

Quain, in reply.—In Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. Rep. 543; 20 L. J. Ex. 393), as well as in Jenkyns v. Brown (14 Q.B. Rep. 496; 19 L. J. Q.B. 286), there was the important fact that the consignor had pledged or otherwise disposed of the bill of lading, shewing that he never intended to pass the property in the goods consigned. Here the plaintiff has paid the freight on the consignment, so that the contract has been in part performed, and it is impossible to rescind it in toto. In Brandt v. Bowlby (2 B. & Ad. 932; 1 L. J. K.B. 14) the consignee had first refused to receive the goods, and had only an unindorsed bill of lading sent to him. In the present case the bill of lading was indorsed before the ship sailed from Pernambuco. No one of the consignor's letters goes to shew that the acceptance of the bill was regarded as a condition on which the right to the possession of the cotton depended.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be in favour of the defendants.—I agree that in one point of view this question is one of intention, that is, what was the intention of Paton, Nash & Co. in sending over the bill of lading and bill of exchange to their agents at Liverpool. This is a question which, as we have power to draw inferences of fact, we must decide; but I think we ought not to decide it independently of the authorities which have been cited during the argument. These authorities are, I think, conclusive as to the inference which we should draw, apart from our own opinion. Cases were pointed out by Mr. Quain for the purpose of inducing us to come to a different conclusion. These cases bear strongly on the matter before us, and are conclusive to shew that, where a consignor of goods sends them to this country, accompanied by bills of lading, and bills of exchange which are to be accepted as the consideration, and they are forwarded directly to the consignee, the only proper inference to be drawn is that the consignor intended the consignee to have at once the disposition of the property in the goods, leaving it to him as a matter of contract to return the bills of exchange accepted, not as a condition precedent to the vesting of the property, but simply a matter of personal obligation. But, on the other hand, to my mind, the cases equally shew that where the consignor sends the goods not to the consignee, but to an agent, with bills to be accepted by the consignee, this indicates a different intention, namely, that the handing over of the bills of lading and the acceptance of the bills of exchange should be concurrent acts and part of the same transaction. Brandt v. Bowlby (2 B. & Ad. 932; 1 L. J. K.B. 14) appears to me to be a decisive authority in favour of the defendants. In this case there were none of the additional circumstances pointed out in Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. Rep. 543; 20 L. J. Ex. 393), and other cases. There the bill of lading had not been pledged or sold, but the consignor of the goods sent to the consignee the invoices and an unindorsed bill of lading, an indorsed bill of lading being sent to the agents of the consignor, accompanied by bills of exchange, to be presented to the consignee for acceptance; and these circumstances were considered conclusive to shew that the consignor did not intend the property in the goods to vest at once in the consignee, but to vest only on the condition of the bills of exchange being accepted by him. It is true that in that case there was the circumstance of an unindorsed bill of lading being sent to the consignee, but that is not one which I consider material. Here we have no bill of lading sent to the consignee, but the indorsed bill of lading was sent to the agent of the consignors. I see no difference in principle between sending a bill of lading which is inoperative, and sending none at all. Then it was said that in the other cases cited by Mr. Holker there was the additional circumstance of the bill of lading being indorsed to a third party for a consideration; but I do not think that this makes any difference. The consignor makes over the right of holding the bill of lading until the bills of exchange have been accepted, to the third party; when they are accepted it is his duty not to retain the bill of lading; he is only put in the shoes of the consignor. As far as the merits of the case are concerned, it would be obviously unjust that while the bills of exchange have not been accepted the consignors should be prejudiced by having the bills of lading enforced against them. But the case might have arisen in another form. If it be that until the bill of exchange has been accepted, the property in the goods does not pass, and the goods perished at sea, it would be very questionable whether the consignor who bought them on his own credit by order of another would not have to stand the loss, and I should prefer to put the case on a different ground, which would equally secure the defendants from risk. It strikes me, that where an agent is ordered to buy goods, and, having bought them, ships them on account of and at the risk of the consignee, his principal, and calls on the principal to insure the goods, that it may well be contended that the property in the goods at once passes to the consignee; but inasmuch as the agent has paid the purchase-money of the goods for the principal, the case becomes analogous to that of buyer and seller, and the agent should have a lien on the goods, until he has been repaid the money which he has laid out in the purchase of them. On this ground, the agents in Pernambuco, having laid out their money in purchasing the cotton, are entitled to hold possession of it until this money is repaid, although the property in the cotton may have passed to the plaintiff. The case is the same where the parties have agreed to take bills of exchange instead of the price of the goods. In that point of view also I think the defendants would be entitled to say, "The property in the goods may have passed, but we who bought them have a right to hold them until we are recouped the money which we have laid out in their purchase." I think that, upon a consideration of the facts and the authorities, the defendants are entitled to judgment.

MELLOR, J.—I am also of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants. It seems that Paton, Nash & Co. having bought the cotton with their own money, the substance of the transaction was that they should receive from the plaintiff as the consideration for their advances bills of exchange for the amount. The case may be disposed of by a reference to some of the main facts, such as the form of the bills of lading and the mode in which they were indorsed and forwarded. The fact that the bills of lading were indorsed in blank and sent to the agents of the consignors, together with the bills of exchange, can be explained only by supposing that they meant to have the bills of exchange accepted at the same time as the bills of lading were handed over to the plaintiff. In Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. Rep. 543; 20 L. J. Ex. 393) it is true that there were some additional facts, consisting of acts of ownership by the consignor over the bill of lading, but I think that the absence of these facts does not affect the grounds of the judgment, and that it proceeded upon the intention of the consignor in making out the bill of lading and shipping the cotton. From the fact that in this case the Liverpool agents sent the bill of lading indorsed to the plaintiff accompanied by the drafts, and that in their letter to him they say, "We beg to inclose bill of lading for 200 bales cotton, &c. We hand also their draft on your good selves for costs of the cotton, to which we beg your protection"; it may be fairly inferred that the parties were on terms of great confidence, and that the agents sent the bill of lading relying that the drafts would be returned accepted. When the plaintiff refused to accept the drafts the agent was justified in preventing the cotton from getting into his hands.

Lex Loci—Action against Governor of Colony for Injury done there—Act of Indemnity by Colonial Legislature; Effect of on Proceedings in English Courts.

INTERNATIONAL LAW. K.—The right of action in this country for an injury done in a colony may, before the commencement of proceedings, be taken away by an Act of Indemnity passed by the colonial legislature.

In an action brought here against the governor of a colony for an injury done there, it was pleaded that by an Act of Indemnity passed by the legislature of the colony and assented to by the Crown, after reciting that a rebellion had broken out in the colony, and that the defendant, with the advice of a council of war, had proclaimed martial law, &c., and that it was expedient that all persons who in good faith and of loyal resolve had acted in crushing the rebellion should be indemnified and kept harmless for their acts of loyalty, it was enacted, that all personal actions and suits, indictments, informations, attachments, prosecutions and proceedings, present or future, against such authorities or officers, &c., for or by reason of any matter or thing commanded, ordered, directed or done since the proclamation of martial law should be discharged and made void; and every person by whom such act should have been advised, commanded, ordered or directed or done during the existence of martial law should be indemnified both against the Crown and all persons whomsoever. The Act went on to specially indemnify the governor and his officers from the consequences of acts done in order to put an end to the rebellion in districts in which martial law was proclaimed, and declared that such acts were thereby made lawful and confirmed. The plea concluded by stating that, by the laws and constitution of the island, the governor, legislative council and assembly had power and authority to pass the Act, subject to the assent of Her Majesty to it; that the Act duly received the assent of Her Majesty and became part of the law of the island of Jamaica; and that the defendant was governor, and the alleged grievances were measures used in the suppression of the rebellion:—Held, that the plea afforded a good defence to the action. That the Jamaica legislature appeared to have full legislative powers to pass an Act taking away the right of action before the local tribunals of the island, and an Act lawful by the law of a foreign country could not be made the ground of an action in an English Court. That the same principle applied where an Act admitted to have been unlawful when done was legalized and divested of its tortious character by ex post facto legislation:—Held, also, that the validity of the Act was not affected by the fact that the governor who joined in passing it was thereby enabled to indemnify himself from the consequences of illegal acts committed by him.

Declaration, that the defendant did, on October 24, 1865, assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff at the plaintiff's house, in the parish of Vere, in the county of Middlesex, in the island of Jamaica, within Her Majesty's dominions, and caused him to be then and there handcuffed and bound with rope, and forced him and compelled him to go, and caused him to be forcibly conveyed so handcuffed and bound, thence to a court-house in the parish of Vere, in Jamaica, and there caused him to be placed and held so handcuffed and bound in the custody of a guard of soldiers, and imprisoned for a long time. And that the defendant did, on October 25, 1865, and at the court-house in the parish of Vere, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff, and forced and compelled him to go, and caused him to be forcibly conveyed, handcuffed and bound with rope, thence along certain public streets and highways for a very long distance, to wit, 30 miles, to the defendant's house, at Spanish Town, in the parish of St. Catherine's, in Middlesex, in Jamaica, and there caused him to be held in custody and imprisoned for a long time. And that the defendant did, on October 25, 1865, at the defendant's house, in Spanish Town, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff, and forced and compelled him to go and caused him to be forcibly conveyed, handcuffed and bound with rope, in custody from the defendant's house in Spanish Town through and along certain public streets and highways for a long distance, to wit, 20 miles, to a certain other place, to wit, Uppark Camp, in the parish of St. Andrew, in the county of Surrey, in Jamaica, and there caused him to be held in custody and imprisoned and handcuffed and confined in a cell for a long time. And that the defendant did, on October 26, 1865, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff at Uppark Camp, and caused him to be placed in the custody of a guard of soldiers, and forced him and compelled him to go, and caused him to be forcibly conveyed, handcuffed and bound, from Uppark Camp through and along certain streets and highways for a long distance, to a certain place, to wit, the Ordnance Wharf, in the city and parish of Kingston, in Surrey, and there imprisoned him for a long time. And for that the defendant did, on the said October 25, 1865, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff at Ordnance Wharf, and thence caused him to be forcibly conveyed and put on board a certain ship, to wit, the "Wolverine," and there confined in shackles, and forcibly conveyed in the ship upon the high seas for a long distance, to wit, 40 miles, to a certain other place, to wit, Morant Bay, in the parish of St. Thomas, in Surrey, in Jamaica. And that the defendant did, on October 27, 1865, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff at Morant Bay, and did cause him to be forcibly landed and conveyed so shackled as aforesaid from the ship to a certain wharf at Morant Bay, and thence compelled him to go, and caused him to be forcibly conveyed through divers public streets and highways, to a certain building in Morant Bay, and there caused him to be further bound with cords, and forcibly placed and confined in a cell in the building, and to be therein held in custody and imprisoned for a long time. And that the defendant did, on November 4, 1865, at Morant Bay, further assault, beat and imprison the plaintiff, and caused him to be bound with ropes, and so bound to be cruelly beaten, flogged, wounded and tortured. By reason of all which assaults and beatings, flogging, wounding and imprisonment, the plaintiff suffered grievously in body and mind, and became and was sore, sick and disabled, and so remained for a long time, and was for a long time unable to attend to his affairs, and has been permanently injured in health, and was put to great expense for nursing and medical attendance in and about endeavouring to be cured of his wounds and the fever consequent thereon.

Second count, for seizing and taking the plaintiff's goods, that is to say, books, papers, writings, and articles of wearing apparel, and carrying away and disposing of them to the defendant's own use.

Second plea—That before and at the time of the committing of the alleged grievances in the declaration mentioned, the defendant was captain-general and governor-in-chief of the island of Jamaica and the territories depending thereon, the same then and still being a colony or dependency of the British Crown, by virtue of a commission from Her Majesty the now Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, under the great seal of the United Kingdom, and before the said time divers persons in the island of Jamaica had conspired by force to overthrow the constitution and government in the island by law established; and in pursuance of the conspiracy great numbers of the inhabitants of the island had broken out into open rebellion, and had committed many burglaries, robberies, arsons, murders and other felonies, and the civil powers of the island had been overpowered by the rebels; and the defendant, with the assistance and co-operation of the military and naval forces of the Queen and of Her Majesty's faithful subjects in the island had, by force of arms, arrested the progress of the rebellion, and afterwards, and after the rebellion had been so arrested, an Act of Parliament was made and passed by the governor, legislative council and house of assembly of the island of Jamaica, in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of the now Queen, for the purpose of indemnifying the defendant and all other officers and persons concerned in arresting rebellion in the island by such force of arms, which Act was and is in the words and figures following, that is to say: "Whereas, being seduced by the insidious counsel of wickedly designing persons, many of the Queen's subjects in this island conspired by force to overthrow the constitution and government here established by law, and in furtherance of such their purpose did, with force and in confederated multitude, commit, on October 11 in the present year of our Lord 1865, and on divers other days then following, in the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, burglaries, robberies, arsons, murders and other felonies, with treasonous purpose, in renunciation of their natural allegiance, and to the intent of the general massacre of all loyal and well-disposed subjects of the Queen here dwelling. And whereas, upon being informed of such the aforesaid atrocities, his Excellency Edward John Eyre, Esq., the governor of this island, with the advice of a council of war, and in order to prevent the extension of such rebellious outbreak, did proclaim that martial law should obtain and prevail throughout the county of Surrey, with the exception only of the city and parish of Kingston. And whereas under God's providence the military and naval forces of the Queen, with the loyal co-operation of others Her Majesty's faithful subjects in this island, have arrested the spread of this rebellion, and saved the lives of law-abiding citizens from imminent general sacrifice. And whereas military, naval or civil authorities necessarily employed in the prompt suppression of the atrocities aforesaid, may, according to the law of ordinary peace, be responsible in person or purse for acts done in good faith for the purpose of restoring public peace, and quelling the rebellion aforesaid. And whereas it is expedient that all persons whosoever, in good faith and of loyal resolve, have acted for the crushing of this rebellious outbreak, should be indemnified and kept harmless for such their acts of loyalty. Be it therefore, and it hereby is enacted, by the governor, legislative council and assembly of this island, first, that all personal actions and suits, indictments, informations, attachments, prosecutions and proceedings, present or future, whatsoever against such authorities or officers, civil, military or naval, or other person acting as last aforesaid, for or by reason of any matter or thing commanded, ordered, directed or done since the promulgation and publication of the proclamation of martial law aforesaid, whether done in any district in which martial law was proclaimed, or in any district in which martial law was not proclaimed, in furtherance of martial law, that is to say, on, from and after the 13th day of October last past, and during the continuance of such martial law in order to suppress the insurrection and rebellion, and for the preservation of the public peace throughout the island, shall be discharged and made void, and that every person by whom such act, matter or thing shall have been advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done for the purposes aforesaid, on, from and since the said 13th day of October, and during the existence of such martial law, shall be freed, acquitted, discharged and indemnified, as well against the Queen's most gracious Majesty, her heirs and successors, as against all and every persons and person whomsoever. Secondly, and it is hereby also enacted, that his Excellency Edward John Eyre, Esq., captain-general and governor-in-chief, and all officers and other persons who have acted under his authority, or have acted bonâ fide for the purposes and during the time aforesaid, whether such acts were done in any district in which martial law was proclaimed, or in any district in which martial law was not proclaimed, are hereby indemnified in respect of all acts, matters and things done in order to put an end to the said rebellion, and all such acts so done are hereby made and declared lawful, and are confirmed. Thirdly, in order to prevent any doubt which might arise whether any act alleged to be done under the authority of the governor, or to have been done bonâ fide in order to suppress and put an end to the said rebellion was so done, it shall be lawful for the governor for the time being to declare such acts to have been done under such authority, or bonâ fide for the purposes aforesaid, and such declaration by any writing under the hand of the governor for the time being shall in all cases be conclusive evidence that such acts were so done respectively."

Averment—That, by the laws and constitution of the island, the governor, legislative council and assembly of the island had power and authority to make and pass the Act, subject to the assent of her most gracious Majesty thereto, and that afterwards the Act duly received the assent of Her Majesty, and all conditions in that behalf to be performed having been performed, and all things necessary to be done having been done, and all times necessary to elapse having elapsed, the Act became and was and is part of the law of the island of Jamaica; and that the person in the Act called his Excellency Edward John Eyre, Esq., was and is the defendant, and that the alleged grievances in the declaration mentioned were committed in Jamaica after October 13, 1865, and during the continuance of the rebellion, and before the passing of the Act, and were measures used in the suppression of the rebellion, and were reasonably and in good faith considered by the defendant to be proper for the purpose of putting an end to the rebellion, and were matters and things bonâ fide done in order to put an end to the rebellion, and are included in the indemnity given by the Act.

Demurrer to the second plea, and joinder in demurrer.

New assignment to the second plea, that the plaintiff sued not only for the trespasses admitted, but also for that the defendant committed such trespasses as are complained of and not included in the Act on other occasions, for longer periods of time, and in other places than are attempted to be justified or excused, and in excess of the alleged right or excuse.

Replication to the second plea—so far as it related to divers of these trespasses committed on the high seas, and mentioned in the fifth count, that these trespasses were committed beyond the territorial limits within which the Jamaica legislature had at the times when, &c., or at the time when the Act was made and passed, jurisdiction or authority.

Further replication to the second plea—that the defendant, at the time of making and passing the Act in the plea set forth, was the governor of the island of Jamaica and the territories thereon depending, and was then present in the island, and was then acting in such capacity of governor of the island, and is the governor referred to in the Act in the words, " Be it therefore, and it is hereby enacted by the governor, legislative council and assembly of this island," and was by the law and constitution of Jamaica, himself a necessary party to the making and passing of the Act, and the Act, so far as it became the law of Jamaica, became the law of Jamaica by virtue of his consent as such governor, acting with the council and assembly, and could not have become the law of Jamaica without the consent of the defendant as such governor.

Rejoinder to the new assignment to the second plea, not guilty.

Demurrer to the last replication, and joinder in demurrer.

Quain (J. H. Payne with him), for the plaintiff.—The plea is bad. A personal action brought in this country cannot be defeated by the Act of a colonial legislature. Where an action is brought in this country for an injury done abroad, the Court will have regard to the law of the place where the cause of action arose. The defendant, however, admits that when the acts complained of were done they were illegal by the law of Jamaica, but proposes to shew that the legislature of the island have since passed an Act superseding this law. It cannot be doubted that this Act was passed by the governor and the legislature for the express purpose of defeating any proceedings like those commenced by the plaintiff: the question remains, how far is this ex post facto law binding on the English Courts? In the leading case of Mostyn v. Fabrigas (Cowp. 161; Smith's Leading Cases, last ed., vol. 1, 623) it seems to have been assumed, both by Lord Mansfield and the counsel who argued the case, that the governor of a colony during his government is not locally liable to any civil or criminal proceedings, and though this proposition is dissented from in the note to the case in 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 5th ed., p. 645, it is admitted that there must be some restrictions on the mode of bringing such an action against him. Lord Mansfield himself, in answer to an objection against an action in this country for injuries done abroad, says, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 5th ed., p. 621, " In answer to which I say that, for many reasons, if it did not lie against any other man, it shall most emphatically lie against the governor." The reason for bringing such actions in this country is, no doubt, the fact that a fair trial is not likely to be obtained in the colony. It was on this account that the Acts 11 & 12 Will. 3. c. 12. and 42 Geo. 3. c. 85. were passed, enabling offences committed by officials beyond the seas to be tried in this Court. And there can be no difference in principle between such offences and causes of action. The question is, therefore, whether a vested right of action in the Courts of this country can be taken away by the Act of a colonial legislature.—(He was then stopped.)

Mellish (Poland with him), for the defendant.—The Act of Indemnity is a bar to this action. It has been suggested that this Act would interfere with the operation of the 11 & 12 Will. 3. c. 12; and it is necessary to refer to the recent statute relating to colonial laws, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 63. This Act, after reciting that doubts have been entertained respecting the validity of laws enacted by certain of Her Majesty's colonies, provides, by section 2, that " any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the colony to which such laws may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order or regulation, and shall to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative." And by section 3, " No colonial law shall be or be deemed to have been void or inoperative on the ground of repugnancy to the law of England, unless the same shall be repugnant to the provisions of some such Act of Parliament, order or regulation as aforesaid." The Act of Indemnity is, therefore, quite valid so far as it affects civil proceedings against the defendant. The House of Assembly had full power to make laws within the limits of the island of Jamaica, and if the Crown does not pronounce its veto against these laws they become as binding and effective as an Act of the Imperial Legislature. The Assembly, in the exercise of this power, might enact that what is here unlawful should be there lawful, and this power would of course enable them to pass statutes retrospective in their operation. It is true, that if proceedings were taken in this country for a cause of action in Jamaica the lex fori must govern the procedure; but a cause of action according to the law in Jamaica is the basis of these proceedings, and this cause can always be taken away by a retrospective Act. Nothing is more common in this country than for causes of action to be destroyed by Act of Parliament. At the present moment an attempt is being made to shew that a criminal was unlawfully tried before a Commissioner of the Central Criminal Court. If it be decided that the trial was irregular, who can doubt that Parliament will pass an Act indemnifying the Commissioner? Several illustrations might be given to shew that, if an Act is made lawful in Jamaica, it cannot be a cause of action here. In Sommersett's Case (20 St. Tr. 1) a slave brought to this country was ordered to be discharged, but slavery was then lawful in our colonies, and trespass could not have been brought for depriving the man of his liberty in the West Indies.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—You have to shew that rights of action in the Imperial Courts are taken away by this Act of a colonial legislature.]

They cannot affect the course of procedure in this country, but they can take away the cause of action. It is impossible to say that they had not in this case the power of legislating finally. The indemnity is in the nature of the by-law of a corporate body, and such a by-law is binding everywhere if warranted by the charter under which it is passed.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If this Act had been passed earlier the cause of action would have been taken away. But had not a right of action in the superior Courts already vested in the plaintiff?]

In the case of a colonial bankruptcy such rights of action are taken away.

[LUSH, J.—The Imperial legislature has directed that British subjects should be tried here for murders committed abroad. Might a colonial legislature enact that if murder were committed in the colony it should only be tried there?]

That question only involves matter of procedure. In Mostyn v. Fabrigas (Cowp. 161; Smith's Leading Cases, last ed., vol. 1, 623) it was assumed that the legality of an act ought to depend upon the law of the country where it was committed. Acts of Indemnity have been frequent in this country. One of the earliest is 1 Edw. 3. c. 1, "None shall be impeached which took part with the king against his father." 5 Ric. 2. c. 5, and other Acts passed in the reigns of Henry the Fourth, Henry the Eighth and Elizabeth are similar instances. Acts of Indemnity were also passed by the Irish Parliament before the union of that country with England. Upon an appeal to the Privy Council the validity of the colonial Act would be recognized. Is the law to be different at Whitehall and at Westminster?

[HAYES, J.—With reference to your argument as to the foreign bankruptcy laws, I find that it is said in Story's Conflict of Laws, sect. 338, "When we speak of the discharge of a debt in the country where it is contracted being a discharge thereof everywhere, care must be taken to distinguish between cases where by the lex loci contractus there is a virtual or direct extinguishment of the debt itself, and where there is only a partial extinguishment of the remedy thereon. By the bankrupt laws of England, and by the corresponding insolvent laws of some of the United States, an absolute discharge from all rights and remedies of the creditors is provided for as part of the system; and therefore the whole obligation of the contract is deemed ipso facto extinguished."]

The necessity of obtaining the royal sanction for their acts is a sufficient check upon any arbitrary exercise of authority by the colonial legislature. The existence of this check makes the case even stronger than those where this country recognizes a foreign law. In several of the colonies ex post facto laws have been made so as to legalize marriages which were previously invalid. These marriages would be regarded as legal in this country in any question respecting the title to property. In Scott v. Seymour (1 Hurls. & C. 219; 32 L. J. Ex. 61) the ground of the decision was, that the difference between the law of Naples and that of this country related only to matter of procedure.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In actions by English subjects against English subjects for torts committed abroad, has it ever been necessary to do more than prove that the acts were tortious in this country?]

The answer to that question does not affect the argument as to the powers of the colonial legislature.

Quain, in reply.—The counsel for the defendant has not succeeded in shewing that the Colonial Act of Indemnity is consistent with 42 Geo. 3. c. 85. The chief object of the latter statute was to have offences committed by persons employed in the public service abroad tried in this country. But, if it is to be in the power of the governor of a colony to pass an Act protecting himself from the consequences of any such offences, the Imperial Act may as well be repealed at once.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—This Act only relates to criminal proceedings.]

The indemnity comprises all proceedings, civil as well as criminal.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—This will only make the colonial Act, pro tanto, repugnant to 42 Geo. 3. c. 85. The object of the English Act was simply to enable the prescribed offences to be tried in this country.]

It is submitted that the Act 28 & 29 Vict. c. 63, intended to do no more than provide for the validity of colonial laws within the limits of the colony itself. But, looking at the question in a more general point of view, it is very doubtful whether this Court is justified in taking any notice of the lex loci as to torts. In "The Halley" (37 L. J. Adm. 35) it was held by the Privy Council, reversing the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, that where the owner of a ship by which damage was caused was compelled by the Belgian law to employ a pilot, he could not be made liable in an English Court upon proof that, by the Belgian law, the employment of the pilot afforded no protection to the owner of the vessel which did the mischief. The ground taken was that, although the English Courts admit proof of a foreign law as part of the circumstances attending the execution of a contract, or as one of the facts upon which the existence of the tort or the right to damages may depend, they will not enforce a foreign municipal law and give a remedy in respect of an Act which, according to their own principles, imposes no liability on the person from whom the damages are claimed. This case may be said to be the converse of the present one. Scott v. Seymour (1 Hurls. & C. 219; 32 L. J. Ex. 61) was decided upon similar grounds. With regard to the foreign bankruptcy cases, there is no reason why a foreign bankrupt law should have an extra-territorial operation after a cause of action has once vested in England. It can make no difference whether the plaintiff has actually issued a writ in this country or not, as all the defendant would have to do would be to plead the indemnity as matter arising after action brought. In Westlake's Private International Law, p. 237, it is said: "The plaintiff cannot object that the exercise of discharging authority founds a plea which is ex post facto as regards his right, because the exercise of such authority must be considered as always reserved by a sovereign whose code includes a law of bankruptcy whenever he imposes an obligation on a contract. It has accordingly long been settled by the English cases that an obligation is extinguished by a discharge of this nature, under the laws of the country of the contract." And in Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 337, are these words: "And even in regard to common contracts of a different nature, the general rule as to the consequences of them must receive many qualifications and limitations resulting from the public policy or the domestic laws of other states where they are sought to be enforced, and the right and duty of self-protection against unjust foreign legislation. . . . Nor are the Courts of any state under any obligation to give effect to the discharge of a foreign debtor, where, under its own laws, the creditor had previously acquired a right to proceed against his property within its own territory." This limitation is further explained in Phillimore's International Law, vol. 4, p. 563. Nothing can be more strange than that an ex post facto law of foreigners should deprive an Englishman of his privileges in this country. Suppose the French government were to proclaim duelling lawful: might any two Englishmen be safe in this country after fighting a duel in France?

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Your illustration has no analogy to the case before us. Our government has done nothing to recognize the right of the French legislature to pass laws affecting the inhabitants of this country. LUSH, J.—If the power of making laws is delegated to a colonial legislature, has it not the same power with reference to bygone and future acts?]

Lastly, the Act of Indemnity is objectionable because the governor is a party to the enactment which exonerates him from liability, and it is therefore contrary to natural justice.

[LUSH, J.—The governor acts in two capacities, as a member of the House of Assembly and as a private citizen. Suppose a majority of the House of Assembly had been implicated in this arrest of the plaintiff, would this have made the Act they joined in passing invalid?]

The ordinary members are only a fluctuating body. But the governor is a permanent officer; and although he may very well give his sanction to an Act granting him a sum of money, it is quite a different thing that he should be allowed to make laws which take away the rights of others.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Cockburn, C.J., Lush, J., and Hayes, J.) was delivered, on January 29, by COCKBURN, C.J.—This is an action for assault and false imprisonment and other personal injuries of a very grievous character, committed by the defendant on the plaintiff in the island of Jamaica.

The plea on which the present question turns, admitting, as for the present purpose it must do, the fact of such acts having been done, and of their having been wrongful when done, sets forth an Act of Indemnity since passed by the legislature of Jamaica, and afterwards assented to by the Crown, of which the defendant claims the protection in bar of this action. The Act in question being set forth at length in the plea, it is only necessary for the present purpose to state the substance and effect of it. After reciting that a rebellion had broken out in the island, that the governor, with the advice of a council of war, had proclaimed martial law throughout the county of Surrey, with the exception only of the city and parish of Kingston; and that the military and naval forces, with others, had arrested the spread of the rebellion; and after further reciting that the military, naval and civil authorities necessarily employed may, according to the law of ordinary peace, be responsible in person or purse for acts done in good faith for the purpose of restoring public peace and quelling the rebellion, and that "it is expedient that all persons who in good faith and of loyal resolve have acted for the crushing of this rebellious outbreak should be indemnified and kept harmless for their acts of loyalty," the statute goes on, in substance, to enact—first, that all proceedings, civil or criminal, present or future, against such authorities or officers, civil, military or naval, or other persons, for anything commanded or done since the publication of martial law, that is, from October 13, 1865, and during its continuance, whether within any district in which martial law was proclaimed or without, in furtherance of martial law, in order to suppress the insurrection and rebellion, and for the preservation of the public peace throughout the island, shall be discharged and made void; and that every person by whom any such act, matter or thing shall have been advised, ordered, directed or done for the purposes aforesaid, during the existence of such martial law, shall be freed and indemnified both against the Crown and against all other persons.

The second provision of the Act has special reference to the present defendant. It is in these terms: "That his Excellency Edward John Eyre, Esq., captain-general and governor-in-chief, and all officers and other persons who have acted under his authority, or have acted bonâ fide for the purposes and during the time aforesaid, whether such acts were done in any district in which martial law was proclaimed, or in any district in which martial law was not proclaimed, are hereby indemnified in respect of all acts, matters and things done in order to put an end to the said rebellion, and all such acts so done are hereby made and declared to be lawful, and are confirmed." To this enactment is appended the following remarkable provision: "In order to prevent any doubt which might arise whether any act alleged to have been done under the authority of the governor, or to have been bonâ fide in order to suppress and put an end to the said rebellion was so done, it shall be lawful for the governor for the time being to declare such acts to have been done under such authority, or bonâ fide for the purposes aforesaid; and such declaration, by any writing under the hand of the governor for the time being, shall, in all cases, be conclusive evidence that such acts were so done respectively." After thus setting forth the Indemnity Act, and averring that such act had duly received the royal assent, and had become part of the law of Jamaica, the plea concludes by averring "that the alleged grievances in the declaration mentioned were committed in the said island of Jamaica after the said October 13, 1865, and during the continuance of the rebellion and before the passing of the Act, and were measures used in the suppression of the said rebellion, and were reasonably and in good faith considered by the defendant to be proper for the purpose of putting an end to the said rebellion, and are included in the indemnity given by the said Act." To this plea there was a demurrer. There was also a new assignment and a further replication: first, that the trespasses complained of were committed beyond the territories within which the Jamaica legislature had jurisdiction and authority; secondly, that at the time of the passing of the Act of Indemnity the defendant was governor of Jamaica, that his assent to the Act was necessary, that his assent had been given, and that by virtue of it the Act had become the law of Jamaica. To the latter replication the defendant demurred. We have first to consider the validity of the defendant's plea.

The plea admits, as it necessarily must do, that the acts complained of were done, and when done were wrongful. On the other hand, it cannot be disputed that the Jamaica legislature, having full legislative authority within the limits of the colony, subject only to the assent of the Crown, had full power to pass the Act in question so far as to take away the right of action before the local tribunals of the island. But it is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that a right of action being given before the Courts here in respect of personal wrongs committed in a colony, this right cannot be taken away by an Act having no legislative effect beyond the limits of the local authority. The argument for the plaintiff may be thus put. Upon every wrongful act inflicting a personal injury, a right of action immediately accrues to the party wronged, and becomes a vested right. In the case of a wrong suffered in a colony a twofold, or at all events an alternative right of action arises, namely, a right not only to sue for redress in the Courts of the colony, if redress can be there obtained, but also to sue in the Courts of this country, if the wrongdoer can be found within the jurisdiction of the latter. And though the local legislature may take away the right of action within the limits of its authority, it cannot take away the right of action here, inasmuch as no authority, save that of the imperial legislature, can take away the jurisdiction of the Queen's Courts here, or deprive the subject of his right to redress afforded, not by virtue of the local law, but by virtue of the law of England, which gives a right of action in respect of personal injuries suffered in other countries. We were much struck with this view of the case, and the question being one of great importance, we took time to consider our judgment; but on the fullest consideration we can give to the case, we have come to the conclusion that the foregoing reasoning is unsound, and that on this demurrer the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

It may be useful to consider what would have been the effect if, instead of legislating ex post facto, the legislature of Jamaica, in anticipation of future events, had passed a statute authorizing the acts which have given rise to this action. We cannot doubt that in such a case no right of action would arise here. It appears to us clear that where by the law of another country an act complained of is lawful, such act, though it would have been wrongful by our law, if committed here, cannot be made the ground of an action in an English Court The rule which obtains in respect of property and civil contracts, namely, that an act, unless intended to take effect elsewhere, shall, as regards its effect and incidents if a conflict of law arises between the lex loci and the lex fori, be governed by the former, appears to us to be applicable to the case of an act occasioning personal injury. To hold the contrary would be attended with the most inconvenient and startling consequences, and would be altogether contrary to the comity of nations in matters of law to which effect should, if possible, be given. An Act might not only be lawful, but might even be enjoined by the law of another country which would be wrongful and give a right of action by our law; and it certainly would be in the highest degree unjust that an individual who has intended to obey the law binding upon him should be held liable in damages in another country where a different law may prevail. Thus, an arrest and imprisonment might be perfectly justifiable by the law of a foreign country under circumstances in which it would be actionable here. It would be impossible to hold that in such a case an action could be maintained in an English Court. The same reasoning will apply where an act, though not enjoined, is yet authorized and rendered lawful by the law of the country where it is done. There will have been no intention to inflict a wrong in such a case, nor, according to the law of the particular country, will any right have been infringed.

It may be that where an act which, though not authorized by the lex loci, yet gives no right of action—as where that act is punishable by criminal proceedings, but gives no right to damages; but such act, by the law of this country, would give a right to damages—as in such a case no conflict of laws would arise, an action might be maintained in an English Court. The latter question arose in the case of Scott v. Lord Seymour (1 Hurls. & C. 219; 32 L. J. Ex. 61), but was not decided. Wightman, J., indeed, when the case was before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, expressed an opinion that though no damages might be recoverable in the foreign country where the cause of action arose, damages might be recovered in an English Court. But the other Judges declined to rest their decision in favour of the plaintiff on this view, but proceeded on the narrow ground that the plea failed to shew that by the law of Naples damages might not be recoverable as incidental to the criminal proceedings alleged by the plea to be then pending in the Neapolitan Court. The case of Scott v. Lord Seymour (1 Hurls. & C. 219; 32 L. J. Ex. 61) therefore renders it doubtful whether damages can be recovered in an action here when damages would not be recoverable by the lex loci. It would be going much further to hold that an action would lie here in respect of an act warranted by the lex loci. The case of The Queen v. Lesley (Bell's C.C. 220; 29 L. J. M.C. 97) is more directly to the purpose. In that case the defendant was convicted on a charge of assault and false imprisonment, the facts being that the defendant, the master of an English vessel lying at Valparaiso, had engaged with the Chilian government to bring to this country certain prisoners condemned to be banished to England, and in the course of carrying out this employment had committed the assault and imprisonment complained of. On a case reserved, the Court of Criminal Appeal held that while the conviction might be supported as to so much of the alleged matters of complaint as had occurred when the ship had left the Chilian waters, and might therefore be considered as English territory and subject to English law, yet it could not be upheld in respect of what had been done within those waters, inasmuch as the defendant was there acting under the authority of the Chilian government, and it must be presumed that the latter had exercised its authority according to law, and that what took place within the limits of the Chilian territory was consequently lawful. In delivering judgment Chief Justice Erle says: "Can the conviction be sustained for that which was done within Chilian waters? We answer no. We assume that in Chili the act of the government towards its subjects was lawful, and although an English ship in some respects carries with her the laws of her country in the territorial waters of a foreign state, yet in other respects she is subject to the laws of that state as to acts done to the subjects hereof. We assume that the government could justify all that it did within its own territory, and we think that it follows that the defendant can justify all that he did there as an agent for the government and under its authority. In Dobree v. Napier (2 Bing. N.C. 781; 5 L. J. C.P. 273) the defendant, on behalf of the Queen of Portugal, seized the plaintiff's vessel for violating a blockade of a Portuguese port in time of war. The plaintiff brought trespass, and judgment was for the defendant, because the Queen of Portugal, in her own territory, had a right to seize the vessel, and to employ whom she would to make the seizure; and therefore the defendant, though an Englishman, seizing an English vessel, could justify the act under the employment of the Queen. We think that the act of the defendant in Chili became lawful on the same principle, and therefore that there is no ground for the conviction." This case, as well as that of Dobree v. Napier (2 Bing. N.C. 781; 5 L. J. C.P. 273), referred to in the judgment, is an authority to shew that an act authorized by the law of the country in which it takes place cannot be the subject of a legal proceeding here. In this view, upon principle as well as upon these authorities, we entirely concur.

It remains to be seen how far this principle will apply where an act admitted to have been unlawful where done, is legalized and divested of its tortious character, and immunity is afforded to the wrongdoer in respect of it by ex post facto legislation. And this, no doubt, is a question of greater difficulty than the one with which we have just been dealing. We are, however, of opinion that the same principle which we have stated to be applicable to an act made lawful by prior legislation is equally applicable to an act originally wrongful, but legalized by an ex post facto law. Local legislatures having been established in our colonies, with plenary power of legislation, the same comity which obtains between nations should be extended to them by the tribunals of this country when their law conflicts with ours in respect of acts done within the ambit of their jurisdiction. The same inconvenience as that which we have before adverted to might otherwise arise in every instance of an Indemnity Act. An unseemly conflict of jurisdiction would occur, and the legislative authority of the local legislature in a matter undoubtedly within their competence would be practically defeated, and the extraordinary anomaly would arise, that an inhabitant of a colony, or it might be of a foreign country owing allegiance to its law, and whose rights arise from and are determined by such law, would be able to enforce rights which, by the law of the country to which he more immediately belonged, had been taken away from him by a law binding upon him. It is unnecessary in the present instance to decide whether to found an action before an English Court an act must be tortious according to the law of the particular country as well as of this; or whether the act, if unlawful by the lex loci, must give a claim to damages by the latter as well as by our law in order to give a right to damages here. It is enough for the present purpose to say that we are of opinion that the true rule in such a case as the present is, that where the right of action in respect of an act otherwise wrongful is taken away, before an action has been brought in this country, by a law binding where such wrongful act was done, no action can be maintained here. We were much pressed on the argument with the objections which readily present themselves, and the force of which it is impossible not to feel, against legislation of this nature. There can be no doubt that every so-called Indemnity Act involves a manifest violation of justice, inasmuch as it deprives those who have suffered wrongs of their vested right to the redress which the law would otherwise afford them, and gives immunity to those who have inflicted those wrongs, not at the expense of the community for whose alleged advantage the illegal acts were done, but at the expense of individuals who, innocent, possibly, of all offence, have been subjected to injury and outrage often of the most aggravated character. It is equally true, as was forcibly urged on us, that such legislation may be used to cover acts of the most tyrannical, arbitrary and merciless character—acts not capable of being justified or palliated, even by the plea of necessity, but prompted by local passions, prejudices or fears—acts not done with the temper and judgment which those in authority are bound to bring to the exercise of so fearful a power, but characterized by reckless indifference to human suffering and an utter disregard of the dictates of common humanity. On the other hand, however, it must not be forgotten that, against any abuse of the local legislative authority in such a case, protection is provided by the necessity of the assent of of the sovereign, acting upon the advice of ministers, themselves responsible to parliament. We may rest assured that no such enactment would receive the royal assent unless it were confined to acts honestly done in the suppression of existing rebellion and under the pressure of the most urgent necessity. The present indemnity is confined to acts done in order to suppress the insurrection and rebellion; and the plea contains consequently the necessary averment, that the grievances complained of were committed during the continuance of the rebellion, and were used for its suppression, and were reasonably and in good faith considered by the defendant to be necessary for the purpose; and it will therefore be incumbent on the defendant to make good these averments in order to support his plea. As was observed by Mr. Mellish in his most able argument, Indemnity Acts have on several occasions been passed by colonial legislatures, after insurrections or disturbances of natives or slaves, and have received the assent of the Crown by the advice of its ministers. In ancient periods of our history more than one such Act has been passed by the English parliament; and at the close of the last century Indemnity Acts were repeatedly passed by the parliament of Ireland during the continuance of the rebellion. Lastly, the Acts of the 43 Geo. 3. c. 117, and 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 4, both having reference to the state of Ireland, while authorizing martial law under given conditions, gave indemnity by anticipation for acts done in the exercise of it. After this frequent resort to Acts of Indemnity, and the sanction thus given to them, it is obvious that although the objections referred to may afford cogent reasons why this species of legislation should not be unduly resorted to or encouraged, they cannot have any influence on our judgment as to how far effect should be given to the Indemnity Act now in question. As we have already said, plenary power to make laws having been conferred on the local legislature, subject to the assent of the sovereign, it cannot be disputed that it was within its competence to pass the law referred to in the plea; and the only question is, whether the effect of it is to deprive the plaintiff of the right which he would otherwise have had of maintaining an action in this country. For the reasons we have given, we are of opinion that such is its effect, and consequently that on this demurrer to the plea our judgment must be for the defendant.

It remains only to dispose of the demurrer to the plaintiff's last replication. We have no hesitation in holding such replication to be bad. There is no ground whatever for saying that a governor of a colony cannot give his official consent to a legislative measure in which he may be individually interested. It might as well be asserted that the sovereign of these realms could not give assent to a bill in parliament in which the sovereign was personally concerned. On both demurrers, therefore, our judgment must be for the defendant.

IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH. Feb. 1, 1869.

THE QUEEN v. OLDHAM.

38 L. J. Q.B. 125; 10 B. & S. 193; L. R. 4 Q.B. 290.

Quo Warranto—Town Councillor—Disqualification—Dissenting Minister—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 28.

ELECTION LAW. B.—By the 28th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. it is provided "that no person being in holy orders, or being the regular minister of any dissenting congregation, shall be qualified to be elected a councillor," &c.

The defendant was elected a town councillor on November 2, 1868. He was a minister of a Baptist congregation in the borough, and had been, in September, 1867, invited to become the minister of a Pædo-Baptist congregation at the neighbouring village of P. He agreed to go over to P. and preach on Sundays, and he did so, going in the morning and returning in the evening. He agreed also to conduct the service for the year 1869, but the congregation were unable by the terms of the trust deed of this chapel to appoint him their regular permanent minister, and they requested him to conduct their public services till they could meet with a suitable permanent minister:—Held, upon a motion for information in the nature of a quo warranto, that he was not a "regular minister" of a dissenting congregation so as to be disqualified under the above 28th section.

Rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, should not be filed against him to shew by what title he claimed to hold the office of a town councillor of the borough of Wallingford.

It appeared from the affidavit upon which the rule was granted that upon November 2, 1868, when the election of town councillors for the borough took place and the defendant was elected, he was the regular minister of a dissenting congregation at the chapel of Independents at Pangbourne, in the county of Berks, and was not engaged in any other occupation, trade or profession.

In the affidavits used in shewing cause against the rule it was sworn that the defendant had resided and carried on business in the borough for several years; that he had for three or four years been a town councillor; that he was a member and deacon of the Baptist church in the borough, and that he had for some years been in the habit of preaching on Sundays at Pangbourne and other villages in the neighbourhood.

That in September, 1867, the members of the church at Pangbourne, hearing that he was about to give up his business, invited him to become their minister; that he refused to do so, though he subsequently agreed to preach for them every Sunday from March 25 to June 24, 1868, and, at the end of that time, he agreed to continue to preach until the end of the year 1868.

That on December 29, 1868, the church passed the following resolution: "That Mr. Oldham be requested to conduct the services for the coming year 1869," to which he agreed. After passing this resolution the members of the chapel referred to their trust deed, and found that as it was an Independent or Pædo-Baptist congregation it was necessary that the minister should be of that denomination, and accordingly the above-mentioned resolution was rescinded; and it was, on January 7, 1869, resolved, "That our attention having been called to the wording of the chapel deed, we find we cannot invite Mr. Oldham to become our regular permanent minister; we do therefore respectfully request him to conduct the public services at Pangbourne Chapel until we can meet with a suitable permanent minister."

That the defendant gave up his business on September 1, 1868, and while he preached at Pangbourne went over there on the Sunday mornings and returned in the evenings.

Thesiger shewed cause against the rule.—It is submitted that the defendant was not a "regular minister" of a congregation so as to be disqualified from holding the office of town councillor. The 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 28, being a disqualifying statute, must be considered strictly, not like the Five Mile Act (17 Car. 2. c. 2.) or the 52 Geo. 3. c. 155. s. 9, which are exempting statutes.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The 52 Geo. 3. c. 155. s. 9. is pointed at a man who preaches and has no other business or calling. He is to be exempt from liability to serve in certain offices and services, like a person in orders; but the present statute points at the minister being disqualified like a beneficed clergyman.]

It is clear that the defendant was not a regularly appointed minister at the time of the election, for the congregation were about to appoint him at the end of 1868, and would have done so if they had not discovered that the minister must be a Pædo-Baptist.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The question is simply this, whether at the time of the election the mere fact of his supplying the pulpit was enough to shew that he was a "regular minister." I do not think that upon such facts we should allow the information to be filed.]

Francis, in support of the rule.—The meaning of the word "regular" is opposed to "occasional." No doubt if a tradesman was to preach occasionally in a dissenting chapel it could not be said that he was the regular minister, even although there was, for the time, no other minister; but here there is quite enough to satisfy the words of the 28th section. The defendant had given up his business and performed the duties of the chapel regularly on Sundays.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The words of the section point to a person who is not merely a clergyman of the dissenting body, but to one who is de facto the minister of the congregation, in a position analogous to that of a beneficed clergyman. The affidavits upon which the rule was granted state generally that the defendants was the regular minister. That was enough to justify the rule being granted; but then the answer which is now made is that he was merely asked to supply the pulpit, and that he agreed to do so. I do not attach any importance to the statements as to the trust deed. If there had been any salary attached to the office, or if there had been anything amounting to a contract so that he would have been entitled to something if the congregation had turned him out, that would have gone far to shew that he was the regular minister; but upon the affidavits I do not think that any case is made out upon which we ought to allow an information to be filed on the ground that he was disqualified from being elected. I think, therefore, that the rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object which the legislature had in view is shewn by their using the word "regular." They mean to attach importance to that word; and I take the words "regular minister" to mean a minister who is regularly invited by the congregation to accept the office of their minister, and who accepts that office,—something quite different from a man who merely temporarily holds the office. I place some reliance upon what the affidavits disclose as to the terms of the deed. When the congregation were about to make a regular appointment they would refer to that deed to see whether the opinions of the person were such as would enable him to hold the appointment. There is nothing upon the affidavits to shew that any salary was actually paid; and I do not think that the defendant can be looked upon as anything more than a person nominated to supply the pulpit temporarily, though I happen to know that it is the practice that persons in that position do receive a present from the congregation.

HAYES, J.—I quite agree. At the time of the election the congregation at Pangbourne had no regular minister. I think that in making this enactment the legislature intended that the appointment should be one of a permanent character, incompatible with the performance of the duties of the office of town councillor.

Rule discharged, but without costs.

The defendant pleaded to the action, and upon a reference to an arbitrator contested the plaintiff's right to recover. The arbitrator having made his award in favour of the plaintiff, a ca. sa. was issued to the sheriff. This Court refused to stay the proceedings upon the ca. sa., on the ground that the deed was insufficiently executed under the Bankruptcy Act*, 1861, and that the defect was not cured by the above-mentioned provision of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104. s. 3.

Semble—That the Court would also have refused to stay proceedings on the ground that the application was simply made quia timet, the plaintiff not having actually attempted to oppose the execution.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum issued in this cause should not be set aside, and all proceedings to execute the same be stayed, unless the plaintiff obtained leave to execute the same from the Court of Bankruptcy, upon the ground that the defendant was protected from execution by virtue of the certificate of registration of a deed, dated September 30, 1864.

It appeared from the affidavits that the cause of action accrued before the execution of the deed, which was registered on October 13, 1864. The plaintiff was not mentioned as a creditor. A certificate of registration was given in due course. The action was commenced on July 4, 1867, and was referred by Judge's order, under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. The defendant pleaded, and appeared before the arbitrator, who made his award in favour of the plaintiff for 674*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* On May 11, 1868, the plaintiff signed judgment for the debt and for the costs, which were taxed at 112*l.* 19*s.* A writ of ca. sa. was issued to the sheriff of the town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull, and a summons was taken out before Pigott, B. at chambers to set the writ aside, but the learned Judge refused to do so, on the ground that the Court has no power to make such an order on the application of a person quia timet.

It appeared that the deed was not signed or assented to in writing by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts amounted respectively to 10*l.* and upwards, as provided by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

It further appeared that if the amount due to each of the creditors had

Quain and R. G. Williams shewed cause against the rule.—The defendant has not only pleaded to the action, but has contested the plaintiff's right to recover before the arbitrator, and has forced the plaintiff to incur a large amount of costs in obtaining the award in his favour. It would be most strange if he could now defeat the claim of the plaintiff by setting up a deed which he admits could not be pleaded. Rossi v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 204) shews that when a deed can be pleaded, and is not pleaded, the defendant is estopped from setting it up afterwards as a protection from the execution. That case shews that you may go behind the certificate, and look into the deed; and it would be very strange to say that although the validity of the deed might be looked into if it had been pleaded, the Court is prevented from looking into it upon this rule. Here the deed is one which could not be pleaded. The affidavits in answer to the rule shew that it was not signed by the requisite majority. It is therefore void—see Baker v. Painter (L. R. 2 C.P. 492). It is true that since the passing of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104. the majority of creditors executing the deed would have been sufficient, because that Act, by section 3, enacts that, "In the computation of the requisite value of such creditors, and for all other purposes of the deed, the amount due to each creditor, after deducing the value of the securities held by him on the debtor's property, shall alone be reckoned"; but that enactment has no effect upon this deed, which was made in the year 1864. If, therefore, the deed had been pleaded the necessary averments could not have been proved. In fact, the defendant does not rely upon the deed, but upon the certificate of registration under the 98th section above referred to. Ex parte Banfield (35 L. J. Bk. 12; L. R. 1 Ch. Ap. 154) shews that where a deed is not executed by the requisite majority the legal rights of the creditors are saved. The certificate of registration cannot, therefore, be any protection. The effect of the certificate was much considered in Lloyd v. Harrison (35 L. J. Q.B. 153), where the action was against the sheriff for letting the execution debtor go at large—see also Ilderton v. Jewell (32 L. J. C.P. 256) and Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 L. J. C.P. 172). As to the costs, they referred to Williams v. Rose (37 L. J. Ex. 12; L. R. 3 Ex. 5); Dignam v. Bailey (37 L. R. Q.B. 71); and to Simpson v. Maravita (38 L. J. Q.B. 76).

W. H. Harrison, in support of the rule.—It must be admitted that the affidavits shew that as the law stood before the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104. s. 3. passed, the deed would have been invalid in consequence of not being executed by the required majority of the creditors. But it is also clear that if the value of the securities held by the creditors had been deducted the majority would have been sufficient. It is submitted that the effect of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104. is to make the deed valid, for that Act has a retrospective effect. It is true that by section 15. it is "to commence and take effect on October 11, 1858," but by the same section it is to be read as one Act with so much of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, the Bankruptcy Act, 1854, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, as is in force. Section 4. must apply to past deeds, not to those which are made after October 11. The present proceeding is by way of appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court to stay the proceedings of the plaintiff. The part of the rule which referred to setting the writ aside may be abandoned—Ex parte Thatcher (36 L. J. Bk. 14).

[MELLOR, J.—Is there any instance of this Court interfering quia timet? The 198th section simply states that no process against the person of the debtor shall be available. There is nothing in this case to shew that the defendant needs protection.]

The section goes further than that, and provides that the certificate shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy.

[Quain stated that he was willing to waive the point that this was an application quia timet, it being desirable that a decision upon the merits should be obtained.]

MELLOR, J.—For the purposes of this rule, the question seems to be whether or not the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104. s. 3. has a retrospective effect, and can be construed as making good this deed, which would have been bad under the provisions of the old Acts. I am of opinion that the rule must be discharged. If the point which has occurred to us, that it might be that the plaintiff would never proceed with the execution against the defendant, had been taken by Mr. Quain, I think that we should have refrained from making the rule absolute so as to interfere with the execution; but he waives that point, and the question now is that which I have stated already. Our decision upon that ground must not be considered as establishing a precedent that we should interfere where the defendant simply fears that the plaintiff will proceed upon the execution against him[1]. The question is of considerable importance, as it involves the necessity of giving our opinion upon the construction of section 3. of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 104, but we must not avoid giving our opinion upon it. I am of opinion that it has not any retrospective effect. It is true that the 11th section may have such an effect, for it refers to affidavits, declarations and affirmations required to be sworn or made under the Act now in question, as well as under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. But the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th and 7th sections admit of no other construction besides this, that they are not intended to have a retrospective effect. I cannot find in the words used anything to shew that it was the intention of the legislature that they should have any such effect.—[His Lordship went through those sections, and then continued:]—When we look to the 15th section we find that the Act is to commence and take effect on October 11, 1868, and if the contention of Mr. Harrison were correct it would be impossible to understand why that provision is inserted. I think, therefore, that the 3rd section cannot apply to any deeds except such as are executed after October 11, 1868, when the Act first takes effect.

HANNEN, J.—It is a well-settled maxim that new legislation is to be construed as relating to future matters, and not to such as are past, unless there be very clear language to shew that the latter was the intention of the legislature. It has been contended that some of the provisions of the Act are prospective; but that others are retrospective; and that even as to deeds which were executed before the Act took effect, the amount to be reckoned in the computation of the requisite value of the creditors is to be so reckoned after deducting the value of the securities held by him on the debtor's property. But this would be so great a change that if it had been intended by the legislature they would not have left it to be inferred merely from vague legislation. The effect of such a construction would be not only to make some deeds valid which were invalid before October 11, 1868, but also to make some invalid which previously had been valid, and it would be very strange if that could be done except by clear language. I think it is not made out that this was the intention of the legislature, and therefore I think that the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Libel—Joint-Stock Company—Privileged Communication—Publication of Auditors' Report—Evidence of Malice.

LIBEL AND SLANDER. E.—The plaintiff was the agent of the defendant, a trading company, and it was part of his duty to furnish them with an account of his transactions, to enable them to prepare the balance-sheet for the inspection of the shareholders. This balance-sheet was prepared and duly referred to the auditors, who reported that there was a deficiency for which the plaintiff was responsible, and that his accounts had been badly kept. There was evidence that an explanation had been offered to the auditors, which they had disregarded; but no evidence that the directors had any knowledge of this explanation. The directors, after laying the accounts before a general meeting of the shareholders, caused a letter containing the part of the report which affected the character of the plaintiff to be printed and forwarded to the absent shareholders:—Held, first, that this letter was published on a privileged occasion, as it was the duty of the defendants to communicate to all the shareholders any part of the report of the auditors which materially affected the accounts of the company; secondly, that there was no intrinsic or extrinsic evidence of malice to be left to the jury, as the report of the auditors was published without comment, and the explanations offered to the auditors did not come before the defendants; and that causing the letter to be printed was a reasonable and necessary mode of publishing it to the absent shareholders.

Declaration—that, before and at the time of the committing of the grievances by the defendants hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff had been and was manager of the company, at wages or salary payable to him in that behalf, and the occupation and business of a manager of companies used, exercised and carried on thereby, and derived great gains and profits, yet the defendants falsely and maliciously printed and published of the plaintiff, and of him as such manager of the company, in a printed report of the trade finances and affairs of the company, the words following (that is to say): "The shareholders will observe that there is a charge of 1,306*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* for deficiency of stock which the manager (meaning the plaintiff) is responsible for. His accounts (meaning the plaintiff's accounts as such manager in the company) have been badly kept and have been rendered to us very irregularly," the defendants meaning thereby that the plaintiff, whilst he was so employed as such manager of the company, had been guilty of improper conduct as such manager in the company, and that by reason thereof the defendants had incurred and sustained loss to the amount of 1,306*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.*; and further, that the plaintiff had, in breach of and contrary to his duties as such manager in the company, kept and rendered his accounts in a careless, irregular, inaccurate and improper manner. The declaration concluded by alleging special damage to the plaintiff in his occupation and business as manager.

Plea—not guilty, on which issue was joined.

At the trial, before Kelly, C.B., at the Lancashire Summer Assizes, 1868, it appeared that the defendants were a company established for the purpose of growing cotton in Egypt and shipping it to this country for sale. The plaintiff was the manager of their factory in Egypt; and it was part of his duty to send to the company an account of his transactions, so as to enable the directors to furnish the shareholders with an account of the profits of the undertaking. The libel complained of was an extract from the auditors' report to the company, annexed to the balance-sheet, ending March 31, 1867. This extract appeared in a letter addressed to the shareholders by the directors, calling their attention to the report of the directors at their annual meeting, the balance-sheet, and the report of the auditors. It was in the terms set out in the declaration: "We certify that the accounts as above stated are correct. The shareholders will observe that there is a charge of 1,306*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* for deficiency of stock, which the manager is responsible for. His accounts have been badly kept and have been rendered to us very irregularily." This letter was printed by the authority of the board of directors and sent to each shareholder, together with the invitation to the annual meeting. It appeared that there was no ground whatever for the charges against the plaintiff; and a Mr. Bell, who had been the assistant of the auditor of the company, stated that he had explained to the auditors that the alleged deficiency arose from a depreciation in the value of the company's stock in Egypt; but found it impossible to obtain a hearing. It also appeared that a meeting of the directors had resolved that the auditors' report and the balance-sheet should be printed and distributed among the shareholders.

It was objected by the counsel for the defendants, first, that there was no evidence of a publication of the libel, as the company appeared to have merely printed the letter and sent it to their shareholders. Secondly, that the letter was a privileged communication, as it was the duty of the company to inform the shareholders of any matter affecting the accounts of the undertaking. The Chief Baron expressed his opinion that there was sufficient evidence of the publication of a libel, but reserved the points, giving the defendants leave to move, and the jury found for the plaintiff.

Pope having obtained, in Trinity Term, 1868, a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a nonsuit or verdict for the defendants entered instead, upon the ground, first, that there was no evidence of publication; secondly, that the communication was privileged,— Holker and Gorst shewed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action against the defendants. Admitting that the report affecting the plaintiff might have been published on a privileged occasion, there was evidence of malice for the jury, if the publication was made with a wanton and reckless disregard of the good name and reputation of the plaintiff—Addison on Torts, 2nd edit. 691. It makes no difference that the defendants are a corporation—Whitfield v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (El. B. & El. 115; 27 L. J. Q.B. 229).

[MELLOR, J.—Did you submit to the Chief Baron that there was evidence of express malice?]

It would not have been proper to do so after his Lordship had ruled in the plaintiff's favour. There is, however, ample evidence of malice in the fact that the report was printed, which was an unnecessary mode of publication. And this evidence ought to have been left to the jury. The report ought merely to have been read at a meeting of the shareholders according to the law and practice of joint-stock companies. In the first schedule to The Companies' Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, containing regulations for the management of limited liability companies, it is provided (section 83), that once at least in every year the accounts of the company shall be examined, and the correctness of the balance-sheet ascertained by one or more auditors; and (section 94.) that the auditors shall make a report to the members upon the balance-sheet and accounts; and in every such report they shall state whether the balance-sheet is, in their opinion, a full and fair balance-sheet, &c.; and such report shall be read together with the report of the directors at the ordinary meeting. There is, therefore, a particular mode of presenting the report prescribed by the legislature, and if the company choose to depart from it they must abide by the consequences, just as in Cooke v. Wildes (5 E. & B. 328; 24 L. J. Q.B. 367), where the defendant, who was deputy-clerk of the peace for the county of Kent, had written a letter to the finance committee of the county, giving reasons why he had taken away from the plaintiff the business of printing the register of voters for the county, instead of merely stating the facts; and it was held that the occasion of writing the letter rebutted the presumption of malice and rendered it a privileged communication; but that the concluding part imputing improper motives to the plaintiff ought to have been left to the jury as affording evidence of express malice. The same rule is laid down in Toogood v. Spyring (1 Cr. M. & R. 181; 3 L. J. Ex. 347); Blagg v. Sturt (10 Q.B. 899; 16 L. J. Q.B. 39); and Jackson v. Hopperton (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 826).

Manisty (R. C. Fisher with him), in support of the rule.—There was no evidence of malice which the Chief Baron could have submitted to the jury. Affirmative evidence of malice must be given, and where the inference of malice from the publication of defamatory matter is rebutted the occasion is privileged. The report presented by the defendants was a communication made bonâ fide upon a subject-matter, in which the party communicating had an interest, or in reference to which he had a duty, and it was made to persons having a corresponding interest or duty. It was therefore privileged—Somerville v. Hawkins (10 Com. B. Rep. 583; 20 L. J. C.P. 131), the case of a memorial addressed to a Secretary of State.

There was no such evidence. The report was one which the auditors were bound by Act of Parliament to make, and printing the report is not a publication to those who print it. In Taylor v. Hawkins (16 Q.B. 308; 20 L. J. Q.B. 313), where a master, who was about to dismiss his servant for dishonesty, called in a friend to hear what passed, it was held that the presence of the third person did not render the occasion unprivileged. In the present case there was every reason for presuming an absence of malice.

Holker was again heard.—The recklessness of the defendants in printing and publishing the report, after an explanation of the deficiency had been received, was evidence of express malice. In Manley Smith on the Law of Master and Servant, 2nd ed. p. 266, there is a note to two American cases—Gassett v. Gilbert (6 Gray's Rep. 94), where the publication by the directors of an incorporated society for promoting female medical education, in their annual report of a "caution to the public" against trusting a person who had formerly been employed to obtain and collect subscriptions in their behalf, but had since been dismissed, was held to be justified so far only as it was made in good faith, and required to protect the corporation and the public against false representations of that person; and that it was for the jury to say whether the directors had acted in good faith, and had not exceeded their privilege; and The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Corporation v. Quigley (21 How. Rep. 202), where a railroad corporation was held liable, in its corporate capacity, for a libel published by its agents in the course of its business and of their employment; and it was held to be within the course of its business and the employment of the president and directors for them to investigate the conduct of their officers and agents, and report the result to the stockholders. It was also held, that in the absence of malice or bad faith, a report to the shareholders was privileged, but that such privilege did not extend to the preservation of the report and evidence in a book for distribution amongst the persons belonging to the corporation; and the corporation was held liable in damages for publishing it in that form.

MELLOR, J.—I think that the rule must be made absolute to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendants. If I could see that substantial injustice was done by the omission to leave those questions to the jury which I think it would have been better to have put to them, I should be willing to have the case sent down for a new trial, on terms. But I think that there is nothing in the questions which it is said that the Chief Baron ought to have left to the jury. It appears that the defendants are a company established for the purpose of growing cotton in Egypt, and that the plaintiff was their manager in that country. It was the duty of the plaintiff to furnish the defendants with an account of his transactions to enable them to supply their auditors with a balance-sheet and the accounts relating to it. The auditors were of opinion and reported that a depreciation in the stock of the company was owing to the mismanagement of the plaintiff. It appears that they came to this opinion after hearing explanations which were offered to them by one Mr. Bell, but these explanations were offered to them only, and not to the directors. A general meeting of the shareholders was then summoned, and at this meeting the directors laid before the company a statement of the accounts, and in this statement repeated what had been reported to them by the auditors. There is nothing whatever to shew that they had any reason to doubt the truth of this report, nor is there in what happened at the meeting any extrinsic evidence of malice on their part. I think, therefore, that the Chief Baron was right in not leaving the question of malice to the jury. I think that no such evidence is to be found in the report itself. It was a report which the directors had a right to believe correct, and there is nothing to shew that they had any other object than a bonâ fide communication of the report of the auditors to the company. Now, it was ingeniously argued by Mr. Gorst that there is a rule prescribing the mode in which reports like the present one are to be made, because the company are directed to lay their statement before the company in general meeting. It is true that for certain purposes those persons who are absent from a meeting are bound by the acts of those who are present, and a mode is therefore prescribed in which the report is to be made and acted upon. But all the shareholders are interested in the prosperity or adversity of the company. They are interested in any report touching the conduct of the officers of the company as upon their conduct the success of the company must depend. And I think that the printing of this report was a reasonable and proper mode of having it circulated among the members of the company, as there is no evidence of the number of the shareholders. The Chief Baron says that it was a report of the directors to a numerous meeting of shareholders, and that he was of opinion that it was not a privileged communication, independently of any evidence of malice which might appear in the document itself. But it appears to me that the case is not within the rule laid down in Cooke v. Wildes (5 El. & B. 328; 24 L. J. Q.B. 367), though I was at first inclined to think that it was, because, in Cooke v. Wildes (5 El. & B. 328; 24 L. J. Q.B. 367), what induced the Court to say that it was a question for the jury was that the letter contained defamatory expressions which were unnecessary for the purposes of the communication. It was quite proper and right in that case that the Justices of the Finance Committee and the Quarter Sessions should be judges of the facts, but the defendant was not content with stating them, or anything which he had heard, but made observations of his own, and put a gloss on the conduct of the plaintiff which was libellous and calumnious. This being so, there was in that case intrinsic evidence of malice, and that the communication was not made bonâ fide, and this evidence was proper to be left to the jury. But I think that the authorities cited by Mr. Manisty, the two judgments of Lord Campbell, in Somerville v. Hawkins (10 Com. B. Rep. 583; 20 L. J. C.P. 131) and Taylor v. Hawkins (16 Q.B. 308; 20 L. J. Q.B. 313), shew that the case ought not to be left to the jury unless there be intrinsic evidence of malice in the document itself. If there by any such evidence it is for the jury to say whether the defendant was acting maliciously or not, but if the words are consistent with an absence of malice the Judge ought not to leave the case to the jury, unless there is in the document itself intrinsic evidence of malice, or unless there is some extrinsic evidence of malice. In this case I see nothing which is inconsistent with an absence of malice; and when you come to consider the circumstances, they negative malice on the part of the directors. So that, in the absence of intrinsic evidence, I am satisfied that there was nothing to go to the jury. Assuming as we may from the terms of the reservation and the fact that there was no application to have questions left to the jury that the communication was bonâ fide, so far as the directors were concerned, I think that the printing of the report was a reasonably necessary mode of making a communication which, as it appears to me, they were bound to make to their shareholders. I think that we should be going against the progress of the age,

if we were to hold that the necessary publication of the manuscript to the printer, from the fact that the directors in making this communication to the great body of the shareholders adopted printing instead of employing confidential clerks to write a letter to each shareholder, rendered the communication unprivileged. I am, therefore satisfied that there was no evidence of malice in the mode in which this communication was made. The only remaining question is, had the shareholders an interest in receiving this report? I think that there was a duty on the part of the directors to communicate it to them. I do not think that the report should be confined to the shareholders present at the meeting. Each shareholder has his interest in receiving the news, and the directors are justified in making it known to him. I am rather glad that Mr. Holker has drawn our attention to the American authorities on this subject, because, in one of those cases, it was held to be within the course of the business and employment of the president and directors, to investigate the conduct of their officers and agents, and report the result to the shareholders. It was also held that in the absence of malice and bad faith the report to the shareholders was privileged. So far therefore as it is necessary to go in this case, we appear to have a direct authority. But, independently of this authority, I should have been prepared to hold that in the case of a company with a large number of shareholders all interested in the conduct of their officers and servants, it is justifiable to make a communication like the one in question to all the shareholders, present or absent. Thinking, therefore, that the communication was primâ facie privileged, and that there was no evidence of malice in the report or in the circumstances of which evidence was given, I am of opinion that the rule must be made absolute. I express this opinion with diffidence, as it is in conflict with that of the Chief Baron. But even if this opinion had been not merely a decision at Nisi Prius, but one delivered after a better opportunity of consideration, I do not think that I could have concurred with it.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I feel strongly that I ought to express my opinion with diffidence, as it is opposed to that of the Chief Baron, for whom I entertain a profound respect; but I think that the occasion was privileged, and that the malice which might be primâ facie supposed to exist cannot be inferred. I cannot understand how it can be thought that the directors of a company who have been obliged by Act of Parliament to employ auditors to investigate their accounts, and to receive from those auditors a report expressing their opinion upon the state of those accounts, can be held to be acting beyond the scope of their duties in communicating simpliciter to the shareholders this report, without one word of comment of their own. I confess that I go so far as to say that it was the duty of the directors to do so. It must be present to the minds of many who hear me that the failure of directors to report to the shareholders a statement made by auditors as to the accounts, may lead the directors themselves into a position of very great difficulty. It seems to me, therefore, that the mere fact of communicating the report to the shareholders was itself privileged. Now, it is perfectly clear that express malice was not relied upon at the trial, or it would have been the duty of the plaintiff's counsel, when it was urged that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited, to have said that he had a case behind, which might render the consideration of the question, whether the communication were privileged or not, unnecessary. Instead of this he acquiesced in the reservation of the point, whether there should be a nonsuit or not, upon the question whether the Chief Baron was wrong in holding the communication privileged. It was evident that he did not think that a case of express malice could be established, and I think that his judgment was a sound one, as, according to what I have said, there appeared to be no intrinsic evidence of malice. As for the extrinsic evidence two points are relied upon, first, that the communication was made by means of a printer. This point does not appear to have been made at the trial, and I think that there is nothing in it, as it is obvious that the company itself cannot communicate by writing, but must depute to some person the duty of making the communication, and if Mr. Holker's argument were pushed to its logical limits, it would amount to this, that a company must employ one of the shareholders to write, or if he were a printer to print the reports, which they make to the rest of the shareholders. I think that the mode of communication might under some circumstances be evidence for the jury of express malice; but it was not suggested at the trial that the directors had departed from the usual course, having regard to the exigencies of business, and the means of making known to the shareholders that which they thought necessary to be known. As to the observations made by Mr. Bell, which it was said ought to have put the company on inquiry, it is to be observed that they had already been made to the auditors, who still thought it their duty to make their report to the directors. How then could the directors assume that what Mr. Bell had spoken in vain to the auditors, was the true story? The proper course for them to adopt was to let the shareholders know what the auditors had said, and then it would become a proper subject of investigation by all parties interested.

I need not add anything with reference to the authorities. I concur with my Brother Mellor in thinking that the American case relied on is directly adverse to the plaintiff. It could only apply to a case which does not exist here, that is, if the report, after it had served its purpose by making known to the shareholders that which it was their interest to know, had been put on record in the books of the company, to stand for ever as proof that an accusation had been made against the plaintiff. This would have been independent evidence of malice, but, in the absence of it, it simply remains that the defendants have done what the American Court thought a privileged act. For these reasons, I think that the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Costs, Plaintiff's Right to—County Court Acts—Cases of Concurrent Jurisdiction—Statute of Gloucester.

COSTS. I.—An action, in a case where there would have been concurrent jurisdiction under the County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128, having been commenced before the passing of the County Courts Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, was tried by order, after the passing of the Act, before a County Court Judge, and a verdict obtained for 5l. only:—Held, following Mount v. Taylor, 37 L. J. C.P. 325, and explaining Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company, 37 L. J. Ex. 89, and Butcher v. Henderson, 37 L. J. Q.B. 133, that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs, as the right to judgment did not accrue until after the passing of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, and the repeal of the former County Court Acts, and that as the former County Court Acts did not substantially affect the right to costs in cases of exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, this right given by the Statute of Gloucester must be considered as still in force.

This was a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be allowed his costs, to be taxed by one of the Masters.

The facts of the case are stated in the introductory part of the judgment.

Patchett shewed cause, and contended that the case could not be distinguished from Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133), which was a decision binding on the Court.

Pinder, in support of the rule, cited Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325), and contended that the judgment of the Court in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133) proceeded upon a misunderstanding of the effect of Lord Brougham's Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21.—He also referred to the Bishop's case

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Lush, J., Hannen, J. and Hayes, J.) was read, on Feb. 15, by—

MELLOR, J.—This case was an action for goods sold, commenced before the passing of the last County Courts Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), and it continued pending for some time after that Act came into operation. In July, 1868, it was ordered to be tried before a County Court Judge, and a verdict was obtained for 5*l.* only, but it was a case of concurrent jurisdiction under section 128. of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and therefore if the provisions of the former County Courts Acts had remained in force, the plaintiff would have been entitled as of right to obtain a rule or order for his costs. Under these circumstances, the Master having declined to tax the costs, a rule was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff for this purpose; and it was contended for him that, as all the restrictive enactments as to costs in the former County Courts Acts were repealed before the trial, and as the case stood unaffected by the new restrictions introduced by the last Act, the plaintiff was entitled to his costs under the Statute of Gloucester. The cases of Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89) and the late case of Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325) were relied on as authorities in his favour. On the defendant's part it was contended that the repeal of the former restrictions of the County Courts Acts as to costs did not revive the Statute of Gloucester, and Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133) was cited as an authority on his behalf. It is true that in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133) this Court declined to follow the decision of Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89), but it was expressly pointed out in the judgment of the former case that there the plaintiffs had become entitled to sign judgment, and that the transaction was therefore complete before the last Act came into operation, while in Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89) the plaintiff was not entitled to sign judgment, and the transaction remained incomplete until after that period; and though this point was not relied on by the Court of Exchequer, it certainly formed a main ground of the judgment of this Court in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133). The case of Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325) was a case of exclusive jurisdiction in the superior Court, which the Court there considered to stand on the same footing as a case of concurrent jurisdiction like the present; and there, as here, the transaction remained incomplete until after January 1, 1868. The Court of Common Pleas in that case held that, in cases of exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, where the right to costs was substantially preserved by the former County Courts Act, the Statute of Gloucester could not be considered as repealed with regard to such cases; and on this ground, and because the transaction was incomplete before the repeal of the former County Courts Acts took effect, they held the plaintiff entitled to costs, as the Court of Exchequer had done in Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89), though on a different ground. Looking to these authorities, and having regard to the desirableness of uniformity of decision in cases of this nature, we are not disposed to dissent from the view taken in the case of Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325), and we therefore are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to his costs in this case, and that the rule should be made absolute.

CARRIERS. E.—To a declaration alleging a contract by the defendants, a railway company, to carry from Rotterdam to Harwich and London, goods of the plaintiff delivered to them for that purpose, and also alleging the loss of such goods, the defendants pleaded, in substance, that the goods were articles and property of the description mentioned in the 1st section of the Carriers' Act, and were delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, then being common carriers by land for hire between Harwich and London, to be by them, as such carriers by land, carried from Harwich to London; that the goods were in one parcel and exceeded in value 10l.; that the value and nature of the goods were not declared to the defendants at the time of delivery to them; that the goods were lost while in the course of being carried from Harwich to London, and whilst the same were in the possession of the defendants as such carriers, &c.:—Held, that the plea was a good answer to the declaration.

The defendants were owners of a railway from Harwich to London, and also of a ship, the "Avalon," lying at Rotterdam. They carried on the business of carriers between Rotterdam and London, via Harwich. A case of pictures was delivered to their agents at Rotterdam and a bill of lading was signed by them, the goods "to be delivered at the port of London, via Harwich (the act of God . . . . . as also railway accidents, being excepted), and the owners being in no way liable for any consequences of the causes above excepted." The case was placed on board the ship, unshipped at Harwich, and was sent off by the defendants' railway to London, but was lost in the course of transit from Harwich to London. No declaration of the value of the pictures was ever made, but they were found at the trial to have been of above the value of 10l.:—Held, that the bill of lading contemplated a conveyance of the case partly by land, and that the fact of there being such a bill of lading was no ground for saying that the fifth plea referred to above was not proved. Held, also, that although the bill of lading constituted a special contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, it was not such a special contract as would, under section 6. of the Carriers' Act, deprive the defendants of the protection afforded to them by the neglect to declare the value of the case at the time of delivery. Held, also, that the proviso in section 7. of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, that no special contract shall be binding upon or affect any party unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering, &c., only applies where the company are seeking to exempt themselves from liability by reason of there being a special contract.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendants were carriers of goods for hire, from a place beyond the seas called Rotterdam, by steam vessels across the sea to Harwich in this kingdom, and from Harwich to London, and the defendants received as such carriers certain goods of the plaintiffs, to wit, a case containing pictures and paintings, to be by the defendants taken care of, and safely and securely carried from the place aforesaid by a steam vessel across the sea to Harwich aforesaid, certain dangers and casualties excepted, and from Harwich aforesaid to London as aforesaid, and there delivered to the plaintiffs for reward to the defendants, and a reasonable time for carrying and delivering the same as aforesaid elapsed, yet the defendants, although not prevented by any of the perils, dangers or casualties aforesaid, did not safely and securely deliver the said goods to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, whereby the same were lost to the plaintiffs.

The second count stated that the defendants were carriers of goods for hire from Harwich to London, and the defendants received as such carriers certain goods of the plaintiffs, to wit, a case containing pictures and paintings, to be by the defendants taken care of and safely and securely carried from Harwich to London aforesaid, and there delivered to the plaintiffs for reward to the defendants, and a reasonable time for carrying and delivering the same as aforesaid elapsed, yet the defendants did not take care of the said goods and safely and securely deliver the same to the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and so negligently conducted themselves with respect thereto that by and through the negligence, carelessness and default of the defendants in that behalf the said goods were wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

The third count stated that at and after the delivery to the defendants aforesaid of the goods as hereinafter mentioned, the defendants were the owners of a certain ship or vessel called the "Avalon," then lying at anchor at Rotterdam and bound for Harwich, and the plaintiffs caused to be shipped and delivered to the defendants, and the defendants received on board the said ship certain goods, to wit, pictures and paintings, on the terms, amongst others, agreed on between the plaintiffs and the defendants, that the defendants should carry the same on board the said ship or vessel from Rotterdam to Harwich, with liberty to tranship the said goods on board any other craft, steamer or railway and deliver the same unto the plaintiffs at the port of London, via Harwich, aforesaid, certain perils, dangers and casualties excepted, for certain freight and other moneys in that behalf to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and although a reasonable time for the carriage and delivery of the said goods as aforesaid has elapsed, and although the plaintiffs have done all things and all things have happened and exist and times have elapsed to entitle the plaintinffs to have the said goods delivered as aforesaid, and although the defendants have not been prevented from carrying and delivering the said goods as aforesaid by any of the perils, dangers or casualties aforesaid, yet they have not delivered the same as aforesaid or otherwise to the plaintiffs, and thereby the same were wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

Fifth plea—As to the said first, second and third counts, that the said goods in the said second count mentioned were articles and property of the description mentioned in the 1st section of the Act, passed in the first year of the reign of King William the Fourth, commonly called the Carriers' Act, and were delivered or caused to be delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, then being common carriers by land for hire between Harwich and London, to be by them, as such carriers by land, carried from Harwich to London, and delivered to the plaintiffs in London, and that the said goods were contained in one package or parcel, and exceeded in value 10*l*. And the defendants say, that the said delivery was made to the servants of the defendants, and that at the time of such delivery the value and nature of the said goods were not declared by the plaintiffs, or the person or persons sending or delivering the same; and that the non-delivery of the said goods to the plaintiffs, in the said counts complained of, was, by reason of the same being lost by the defendants out of their possession, while the same were in course of being carried by the defendants from Harwich to London, and delivered to the plaintiffs in London as aforesaid, and while the same were in their possession and under their care as such carriers by land as aforesaid.

Upon demurrer, this plea was held good by the Court of Queen's Bench, and error was brought upon that judgment.

Issue was also joined upon the plea.

The action was tried and the verdict entered for the plaintiffs for 84*l*., leave being reserved to set that verdict aside and enter one for the defendants instead thereof. The Court of Queen's Bench made a rule absolute to that effect, and the following CASE was stated upon appeal to this Court.

1. The cause was tried, before Shee, J., on February 14, 1867, when the following facts were admitted or proved.

2. The plaintiffs are members of the firm of Pickford & Co., and carry on the business of carriers at Wood Street, London. The defendants were on October 16, 1865, owners of a railway from Harwich to London, and also of a steam-ship called the "Avalon," then lying at Rotterdam. The defendants also carried on the business of carriers between Rotterdam and London, via Harwich, the sea portion of the journey being performed by their steam-ships, and the land portion, viz., between Harwich and London, by the said railway.

3. On October 16, 1865, one Joseph Marcus Parser, through Messrs. G. P. Ittman & Son, caused to be delivered to the agents of the defendants at their office at Rotterdam, the case of pictures which is the subject of the action, for carriage to London, and the defendants, by their agents there, signed a bill of lading, of which the following is a copy, in respect of the carriage of the pictures:

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by G. P. Ittman & Son, in and upon the good steam-ship called the "Avalon," whereof is master for this present voyage, Fontaine, and now lying in this port, and bound for Harwich, with leave to sail with or without pilots, or to tow or assist vessels in all situations without being deemed a deviation.

The case containing the pictures was placed on board at Rotterdam, and unshipped at Harwich, and was about October 18 loaded upon a train of the defendants and despatched by them to London. It never was delivered by the defendants to Messrs. Pickford & Co., having been lost in course of transit between Harwich and London. No declaration of the value of the case was ever made. There was no notice affixed in the defendants' office at Rotterdam requiring a higher rate to be paid in the case of articles of value. Evidence was given at the trial of the value of the pictures, and in the end the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 84*l.*; leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them upon the fifth plea.

A rule nisi having been subsequently obtained by the defendants for this purpose on the ground that the fifth plea was proved, the Court of Queen's Bench on April 21, 1868, made the rule absolute.

It was contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that on the goods having been carried under a bill of lading, the fifth plea, which, in substance, avers that they were carried by the defendants, as common carriers, is disproved.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether or not the rule should have been made absolute.

It was arranged that the demurrer and the case on appeal should be argued together.

Murphy (Edwyn Jones with him), for the plaintiffs.—First, as to the demurrer. The judgment of the Court below was wrong. The plea is pleaded to all the three counts, and cannot be any answer if it sufficiently appears on one or other of those counts that the goods were to be carried on a special contract. It is submitted that this does sufficiently appear upon all the counts, but at any rate it appears on the third count. It alleges that "certain perils, dangers and casualties" are "excepted," which shews that there must have been a special contract. That being so, the plea alleges that the goods were articles and property of the description mentioned in the 1st section of the Carriers' Act, 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 68, and were delivered to the defendants, then being common carriers by land, to be by them, as such common carriers by land, carried, &c. But the plea does not deny the special contract as alleged in the third count to carry from Rotterdam to Harwich and to deliver at London, and therefore the defendants cannot avail themselves of the protection afforded by the Carriers' Act. By the 6th section of that Act it is provided, "that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to annul, or in anywise affect any special contract between such mail contractor, stage-coach proprietor or common carrier, or any other parties for the conveyance of goods and merchandises." If a common carrier chooses to make a special contract, he loses the protection conferred upon him by the Carriers' Act; the defendants free themselves from certain perils in respect of which they would have been liable as common carriers, but having done so, they can no longer insist that the goods were within the 1st section of the Carriers' Act, and therefore that, in the absence of a declaration of the value, they are not liable. In Walker v. the York and North Midland Railway Company (2 El. & B. 750; 23 L. J. Q.B. 73) the defendants had served the plaintiff with a notice that they would not carry fish except upon terms that they were to be relieved of all liability; the plaintiff sent fish to be carried by the defendants, and it was held that the jury might infer that they were carried on such terms, and not by the defendants as common carriers. Next, as to the appeal. It is submitted that the fifth plea was not proved, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. A similar plea was pleaded in Pianciani v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. 226), but there the declaration charged the defendants as common carriers simply, while here the declaration shews that there was a special contract. That case was followed by Le Couteur v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 40; L. R. 1 Q.B. 54). At the trial, the plaintiffs produced the bill of lading, a marine contract, which disproved the allegation that the goods were delivered to the defendants to be carried by them as common carriers by land. The freight was to be paid by the plaintiffs in London, and the defendants have narrowed their liability almost to a minimum.

C. Wood, for the defendants.—First, as to the demurrer. The statement in the fifth plea, that the goods were delivered to be carried by the defendants as common carriers by land, is admitted by the demurrer. The Court below was, therefore, right in holding that the plea was good. Le Couteur v. the

London and South-Western Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 40; L. R. 1 Q.B. 54) shews that it is a good plea. The contract was divisible, the special contract related to the passage by sea, but the carriage by land was by the defendants as common carriers, and they are entitled to the protection afforded by the Act. In Le Couteur v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (35 L. J. Q.B. 40; L. R. 1 Q.B. 54) Lush, J. said, "It was contended that because the contract is entire, partly by land and partly by water, it is out of the protection of the Act—that is, because the company is obliged to make a special contract for that part of the journey which is by sea, it is therefore obliged to make another for the residue of it, which is by land. That is reasoning in which I cannot bring myself to concur."

[KELLY, C.B.—The plea seems to be good.]

Next, as to the appeal. The plea was proved. The bill of lading contains the words "as also railway accidents being excepted. It is said that the bill of lading being produced disproved the plea, as shewing that the goods were carried by special contract; but the bill of lading was not such a special contract as is intended by the 6th section of the Carriers' Act. It is not signed by the sender of the goods, as was done with regard to the railway ticket, which, in The Great Northern Railway Company v. Morville (21 L. J. Q.B. 319), was held to constitute a special contract between the company and the respondent who had sent a horse by the railway. Further, such signature is necessary, since the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. (the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854) came into operation. By the proviso in section 7. of that Act it is enacted, that "no special contract between such company and any other parties respecting the receiving, forwarding or delivering of any animals, articles, goods or things as aforesaid, shall be binding upon or affect any such party, unless the same shall be signed by him, or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods or things respectively, for carriage."

[CHANNELL, B.—Does not that mean that it is not to be binding upon the sender unless signed by him, though it may be binding upon the company?]

No; the words are, "affect any such party"; there is nothing, therefore, by means of which the plaintiffs can avail themselves of the provision in section 6. of the Carriers' Act so as to deprive the defendants of the protection afforded by that Act. The defendants knew that they were protected by that Act; and they then make a special contract, by which they further seek to protect themselves from liability in respect of other matters.

[KELLY, C.B.—The only point which presses against the defendants is, that they have made a special contract by means of the bill of lading by which they protect themselves from liability in respect of railway accidents.]

The second paragraph of the case shews that they were carriers, and the contract is divisible, to carry by sea and by land; as to the latter, the defendants are protected by the Carriers' Act, because the plaintiffs have not declared the value of the goods.

Murphy, in reply.—The plain meaning is, that the defendants, by making a special contract in order to protect themselves from liability in respect of railway accidents, deprive themselves of the protection given by the Carriers' Act. Further, even if the Railway and Canal Traffice Act, 1854, required that the sender should sign the contract before he can be allowed to insist upon there being a special contract, which, it is submitted, is not the proper construction, it appears from the third paragraph of the case that the defendants, by their agents, did sign the bill of lading. The point is quite novel, and would have been taken in De Rothschild v. the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (7 Ex. Rep. 734; 21 L. J. Ex. 273) if there had been anything in it.

KELLY, C.B.—We are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. The question before us is raised in two ways—first upon the demurrer, and secondly upon the special case. Upon the demurrer the question is, whether the fifth plea is a good plea and an answer to the whole declaration. The declaration in the first and third counts alleges a contract, which contract is twofold. It is a contract to convey from Rotterdam to Harwich, and to convey from Harwich to London. The second count alleges a contract to convey from Harwich to London only. The plea, in effect, says that, according to the contract stated in these three counts, the goods were delivered to the defendants in their capacity of common carriers as far as relates to that part of the contract which was for the conveyance of the goods from Harwich to London, and that the goods being of the value of more than 10*l.*, they were entitled under the statute, as common carriers, to a notice, and that no notice having been given, they are not liable for the loss of the goods. The plaintiffs object that that is no answer to the action founded on the contract stated in the first and third counts. It is quite enough to say, without reference at all to that part of the contract which relates to the conveyance from Rotterdam to Harwich, that the contract in each of the three counts expressly states that the goods were to be conveyed by the railway company, via Harwich, to London; therefore we may assume it means by railway or by land from Harwich to London; and the answer set up by the defendants is, that the goods were to be conveyed under that contract; but that the contract was, that they were to be conveyed by them, in their character of common carriers, from Harwich to London, and then the exemption or non-liability arises under the statute. We think, therefore, the fifth plea is a good answer to the whole declaration.

Then a more serious question arises, whether the fifth plea was proved. Now, looking at the whole of it, the only important point upon which any question can be raised is, whether the allegation that these goods were delivered to the defendants as common carriers by land, to be conveyed by them, in their capacity of common carriers, from Harwich to London, is proved upon the evidence that appears upon the special case. It has been insisted, upon several grounds, that the plea is not proved. The first ground is, that the contract under which these goods were delivered to the defendants, and were to be conveyed by them in effect from Rotterdam to London, is a contract by means of a bill of lading, and that that bill of lading, which is a marine contract, imports that they were to be conveyed by the defendants in their capacity of carriers by water. Now, it is quite enough to say that, upon looking at the bill of lading itself, it is perfectly clear that it contemplated, not only the conveyance by water from Rotterdam to Harwich, but the conveyance by railway from Harwich to London. It is true that, upon the terms of the bill of lading, it would have been competent to the defendants to tranship these goods at Harwich from the "Avalon" into another vessel, and to convey them by sea and by river from Harwich to London; but it is equally clear, upon looking at the bill of lading, and the words which are the foundation of the chief argument in the case, viz., "as also railway accidents being excepted," that the bill of lading contemplated also the possibility at least, in the performance of the contract, of a conveyance by railway for some portion of the transit, and it must have been by railway from Harwich to London. The contract, therefore, contemplates a conveyance partly by land; and the contract being divisible, the first objection falls to the ground.

The next objection is, that the bill of lading constitutes a special contract within section 6. of the Carriers Act. To this objection, one answer which was given on behalf of the defendants was, that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31.) applied, and the plaintiffs have not made out that there was any special contract within section 7, by reason of the bill of lading, which constitutes the special contract, not having been signed by the consignors of the goods; but when we look at the clause, we find it applies only to cases in which the railway company are seeking to exempt themselves from liability by reason of there being a special contract, and in such a case the statute says the other party shall not be bound by any contract which they or the person delivering the goods have not signed; therefore the statute has no application to the present case. And that being so, there is a special contract; and the question is, whether that is a special contract within section 6. of the Carriers Act. Now, the Carriers Act, which by the 1st section exempts carriers from liability by reason of the loss of goods of greater value than 10*l.* where they have not had notice of the nature and value, provides in the 6th section that nothing in the Act shall extend, or be construed to annul, or in anywise affect, any special contract under which goods are carried: and it is said that this is a special contract within the meaning of section 6. But it is clear that the 6th section applies only to contracts the provisions of which are inconsistent with the exemption claimed by the carriers under the 1st section. Any contract which would render the carriers liable for the loss of goods beyond the value of 10*l.*, whether they shall have had notice of the value or not, is a special contract which is not to be affected at all, but shall have full force and effect, notwithstanding the exemption conferred upon them as common carriers by the 1st section.

It is further said, that when we look at this contract by the bill of lading, it is clear that it is not a contract at all with the defendants in their capacity of common carriers; that the terms of the contract are such as to obliterate and destroy their character of common carriers, and to shew that it is upon the particular contract contained in the bill of lading alone that the goods are carried, in which their capacity of common carriers could form no part, and in which that character could be no element in the consideration and construction of the contract. Looking at the bill of lading, it is found to contain these words,—after excepting a great variety of sources or causes of loss or mischief which are entirely of a marine nature, and which apply only to so much of the transit as was between Rotterdam and Harwich, the bill of lading proceeds: "Also railway accidents being excepted, and the owners being in no way liable for any consequences of the causes above excepted." Therefore the plaintiffs say, that inasmuch as the defendants, as common carriers, are undoubtedly liable for loss by railway accidents, whereas by this contract they are exempted from any such loss, the very contract itself shews that the goods were not delivered to them in their capacity of common carriers. It is an answer to that objection to say the contract amounted to this: "We (the plaintiffs) deliver these goods to you (the defendants) to be conveyed from Harwich to London in your capacity of common carriers; but whereas you would, as such carriers, be liable to loss arising from railway accidents, we will specially exempt you from that liability." It is merely a particular exception engrafted on the contract, which, as to all else, is a contract with the defendants in their character or capacity of common carriers. But the bill of lading goes further, and says the defendants are also exempted from liability in case of breakage. To that the same observation applies. Still further on we find that they are also not to be liable for the wrong delivery of goods caused by error or by insufficiency in marks or numbers. To read these words according to their strict grammatical construction, would be to say that the defendants were to be exempt from any liability by reason of a wrong delivery caused by any error, which would be any error of their own. That would be something very extravagant indeed, and might, for aught I know, do away altogether with their character of common carriers. But when we look at the whole sentence, it seems clear that the meaning is, they are not to be liable for a wrong delivery of goods caused by error,—and although the word "by" is inserted again, we must read it as if the words were "caused by error or insufficiency in marks or numbers." If there be any error or insufficiency in marks or numbers by reason of which the defendants are misled, and so a wrong delivery takes place, they are not to be liable in such case. All these exceptions are introduced by the special provisions of the contract, and the further exception of goods beyond the value of 10*l.*, not declared, is superadded by the statute.

Under these circumstances it appears to us all, that the true effect of this contract by means of the bill of lading is, that these goods were delivered, as far as relates to the conveyance of them from Harwich to London, to the defendants in their character of common carriers; and they were to have all the liabilities of common carriers, except only those which are excepted in the bill of lading; and they are also entitled, as common carriers, to the protection from liability which was conferred upon them by the Act of Parliament.

Marine Insurance—British Ship sold to Foreigner—Wreck—Salvage—Judgment of Foreign Court.

MARINE INSURANCE. F. J.—The plaintiff, on behalf of the Finance Minister of the Sultan of Turkey, on November 26, 1858, effected an insurance with the defendant, in London, upon a quantity of gold in a ship called the "Dutchman," belonging to Waterford, and in the port of London. The next day she was sold by her owners to a Russian company, her name being changed to the "Dnieper;" and an entry of the sale was made in the registry at Waterford, but neither the plaintiff nor the defendant knew of the sale, or of her name being changed until the termination of her voyage. The gold was put on board on December 4, and while the ship was on her way to her destination at Constantinople she grounded on a shoal within the jurisdiction of that port. The gold was sent on shore before any expense was incurred in respect of saving the cargo, and the ship became a total wreck. The gold was deposited with the Russian Consul, and the owner was forced, in order to get possession of it, to give security for the payment of any claim which might be made upon it according to the law which prevailed at Constantinople. The ship being Russian was subject to Russian law, which authorizes the determination of maritime causes at Constantinople by reference to the French Code de Commerce. A Court was duly appointed by the Consul-General, and it was adjudged that the case was one which required a settlement of salvage, and ordered that the gold should contribute the sum of 7,149l. 6s. 1d. towards the expense of saving the cargo. Under English law the owner of the gold could not have been called upon to pay a great part of that amount, nor would he have had to pay it if the ship had been under an English flag; but the assured was forced to pay it:—Held, in an action to recover from the defendant the amount of his proportion of the sum so paid, first, that this Court could not consider whether the decision of the Court at Constantinople was correct or not. Secondly, that there being no statement in the policy that the ship was an English ship, or that she would remain so, the defendant was not discharged from liability upon the policy by reason of the change in the nationality of the ship. Thirdly, that the loss was incurred by the wreck of the ship, by a peril of the sea insured against; that the owners, having been obliged to pay, were able to recover from the defendant his proportion of the amount paid.

SPECIAL CASE stated by consent for the opinion of this Court[1].

The plaintiff acting on behalf of Teffik Pasha, the Finance Minister of the Sultan of Turkey, in November, 1858, made arrangements with the owners of the British ship the "Dutchman," then in the port of London, and about to sail to Constantinople, for the conveyance on board the ship of five cases of bar gold to the said Teffik Pasha, at Constantinople. The plaintiff thereupon effected with the defendant's company, on behalf of the Pasha, a policy of insurance upon the said gold for the said ship the "Dutchman," dated November 26, 1858. The ship had been entered out, on the 22nd, as a British ship, by the name of the "Dutchman" for the ports of Malta, Smyrna, Constantinople and Odessa. The action was brought upon this policy to recover the sum of 1,108*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, the proportion payable by the Marine Insurance Company, the defendant's company. He paid into Court the sum of 384*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, and the plaintiff replied that that sum was not sufficient.

On November 27, the owners of the "Dutchman" executed a bill of sale purporting to transfer her to a Russian company, the principal office of which was at Odessa. There exist no means in England of registering as a Russian ship, a ship bought in England by a Russian subject, and in such case, according to Russian law, a certificate is given to the purchaser by the Russian Consul-General in England, entitling such ship to all the privileges of the Russian flag. Such a certificate was given between November 29, and the sailing of the ship, whose name was declared in the certificate to be the "Dnieper." On December 1, an entry of this certificate was made in the Registry Book at Waterford, to which place the ship belonged. On December 4 the gold was put on board. Neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant knew, until after the termination of the voyage, that the ship had ceased to be a British vessel; she was cleared outwards under her old name. She sailed on December 8, and on January 4, 1859, whilst proceeding on her voyage, was stranded on the Dohan Aslan Shoal, about 110 miles from Constantinople, and 2½ miles from Gallipoli. The fore compartment immediately commenced filling; whereupon the captain, within two hours after she struck, sent off the chief officer, with two female passengers and the gold, to Gallipoli, in order to seek assistance from the Russian Consul. The gold was deposited on the same day with the Consul, and remained in his charge for twelve days, the fees demanded upon delivering it up being 2½ per cent. on its value. The captain also sent a letter to a Mr. Lamb, who had been agent at Constantinople for the former owners of the ship, and to the Russian Consul. At the time the gold was deposited with the Vice-Consul no expenses had been incurred in saving the ship, or any part of her cargo. A tug was sent to the assistance of the ship, and on January 8, Mr. Lamb, the Russian harbour-master at Constantinople, and Lloyd's agent at the same place, arrived. On the 11th a survey was held, and an agreement was entered into between the captain, Mr. Lamb and the commander of the tug, for the latter to save the cargo. On the 14th Mr. Lamb wrote to the Russian Consul-General at Constantinople, stating that he had landed a quantity of goods, including the gold, that he had deposited the same with the Vice-Consul at Gallipoli, and requesting that the Vice-Consul might be authorized and enjoined to hold the goods and the gold at the disposal of him, Mr. Lamb, or of the captain. In point of fact, the gold had been landed and deposited at Gallipoli without any intervention on the part of Mr. Lamb. The gold was soon afterwards deposited with the Russian Consul-General, and Mr. Lamb was appointed curator of the ship and cargo. In order to obtain possession of the gold, the Ottoman Minister of Finance gave instructions to the Ottoman Bank, to whom Mr. Lamb delivered the gold, which was valued at 50,500*l.*, on the terms that the bank should hold at his disposal 10,000*l.*, being 20*l.* per cent. on the amount, as provisional contribution on the value of the gold, "such contribution to be ascertained and settled on the adjustment of the general average." The whole of the expenses incurred in relation to the gold, from the time of its being set ashore in the ship's boat to the time of its being so duly delivered to the bank, amounted to 1,183*l.* 11*s.*

On March 4, the Russian Consul-General appointed three experts to "classify and determine the averages" of the ship and cargo,—that being the practice at Constantinople in case of a wreck of any ship not being an English ship. The first information relative to the ship arrived in England in February, 1859, and the plaintiffs immediately communicated the information to the underwriters, when notice was given that the claim of 20*l.* per cent. would be resisted, and that no adjustment would be recognized unless made out according to English law and practice. On February 22, 1861, the experts who had been appointed as above stated made a statement by which they found that the value of the cargo saved, other than the gold, amounted to 12,154*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*, and that the total expenses of saving the cargo, in which they included the expenses relating to the gold before set out, and a commission of 1*l.* per cent. to Mr. Lamb, on the value of both the gold and the other cargo, amounted to the sum of 5,381*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, and to this sum they added, under the head of legal expenses, 1,767*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, making a total of 7,149*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* The experts further decided that the gold should form a contributory interest in the same manner as the rest of the cargo, and they assessed the sum of 5,762*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.* as the rateable proportion of the said sum of 7,149*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* payable by the gold. This decision was afterwards ratified by the embassy at Constantinople.

It was admitted, for the argument of the case, that had the ship remained under the English flag the adjustment of any general average or salvage charges would have been made out according to English law and practice, and one of the percentage commissions charged under the head of legal expenses would have been incurred. These percentage commissions were charged upon the value of such interests as the experts found to be contributory interests.

The ship was stranded within the jurisdiction of the port of Constantinople. A petition was presented to Her Britannic Majesty's Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, against Mr. Lamb, by the Russian Consul-General, and it was ordered by the Court, on November 16, 1863, that the verdict be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 5,700 piastres (to be calculated in metallic at the rate of the exchange on December 27, 1859) and 2,711*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* sterling.

The balance of 10,000*l.* remaining in the hands of Mr. Lamb was paid over by him to the Minister of Finance, the said Teffik Pasha. The Court was to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact that a jury might have drawn. The proportion, in respect of the sum insured by the defendant's company, of the money charged upon the gold and paid by Henry Lamb, is 1,108*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* which, after deducting the sum of 384*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* paid into Court, leaves a balance of 723*l.* 11*s.* still claimed by the plaintiffs, and unpaid, together with interest.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the defendant's company are liable under the said policy for the said sum of 723*l.* 11*s.*

If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for the said sum of 723*l.* 11*s.*, with such interest, if any, as the Court might direct, and costs[2].

(2) The judgment of the experts contained the following passage: "Whereas, the disaster which befell the steamer "Dnieper," alias "Dutchman," at Dohan Aslan, near Gallipoli, so far from constituting a case for an arrangement of averages, is one requiring a settlement of salvage, inasmuch as the vessel being entirely lost, all the steps and trouble taken, and all the expenses incurred could have no other object in view than that of recovering the cargo and the remains of the vessel, after the attempts to set it afloat again; that consequently the general amount of the salvage expenses should be divided into three heads, one comprising the expenses proper of the salvage of the effects and remains of the vessel, the other those exclusively incurred for the salvage of the cargo, and the third, the expenses in common, that is to say, those incurred at the moment of the mishap, with the view of saving the ship and the cargo, the expenses referred to under the third head to be divided in due proportion, and to be added partly to the expenses of the first head, namely, to the charge of the remains of the vessel; and partly to those of the second head, namely, to the charge of the goods recovered."

The material part of the policy was as follows: "This policy of insurance witnesseth, that in consideration of the premises, and of the said sum of 50*l.*, we do for ourselves and each of us promise and agree with the said Dent, Palmer & Co., executors, administrators and assigns, that the capital, stock and funds of the said company shall, according to the provisions of the deed of settlement of the said company, be subject and be liable to pay and make good, and shall be applied to pay and make good all such losses and damages hereinafter expressed as

The following interrogatories and answers will shew the practice and law at Constantinople with regard to such cases as the present.

Interrogatories for plaintiff.

1. What is your business, profession or occupation, and how long have you been engaged in the same, and where?

16. Is there any public law or usage in force in the district in which the said ship was wrecked and the said cargo saved regulating or relating to the mode of statement and adjustment of average losses and salvage amongst the parties interested therein; and if so, is it the Turkish law or usage, or what other law or usage, and where and in what tribunals is the same administered?

17. Is there according to the said law or usage an established and authorized mode of proceeding to have the said average statements adjusted according to the law applicable to the particular case? And if so, state what that mode of proceeding is, how and where commenced and terminated, and what is the force and effect of the judgment, statement or decision arrived at.

23. Assuming the said ship to have been Russian owned at the time of the said wreck, and that the port of destination of the said bullion was Constantinople, according to the rules of what law is the average statement made and the liabilities of the various parties interested regulated at such port of Constantinople?

25. Direct your attention to the judgment and statement of average put in evidence under this commission, and state whether in your opinion the law as stated therein is correct, and add thereto any further explanations as to that law applicable to the case of the said ship "Dnieper" or "Dutchman."

Interrogatories for defendant.

6. In what book or books is any such law as that which you have stated in your evidence in chief to be found? And state whether such law is uniform and applicable alike to all ships.

7. In what country or countries does the law of which you have spoken prevail?

A number of witnesses were examined upon these interrogatories, and, amongst others, John Antoine Sivori, whose evidence was set out in the special case.

John Antoine Sivori, of Galata, Constantinople, aged fifty years and upwards, being produced, sworn and examined on behalf of the plaintiffs, deposeth as follows:

To the first interrogatory the deponent saith: I am an avocat, and have practised as such for the last three years in Constantinople. I have practised as the ship or vessel called the 'Dutchman,' whereof J. Kavanagh is at present master, or whoever shall go for master in the said ship or vessel, lost or not lost, at and from London to Constantinople, with leave to call at Havre and intermediate ports, including all risks, from the Bank of England until safely delivered to the consignees at Constantinople. And we do promise and agree that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the said ship at and from , and shall continue until she hath moored at anchor in good safety at , her place of destination, and for such period afterwards, not exceeding twenty-four hours from such mooring, and upon the freight and goods or merchandise on board thereof, from the loading of the said goods or merchandise on board the said ship or vessel at London, and until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and safely landed at Constantinople, and that it shall be lawful for the said ship or vessel to proceed to, sail to, and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever, in the course of her said voyage for all necessary purposes, without prejudice to this insurance, and touching the adventures and perils which the capital, stock and funds of the said company are made liable unto, or are intended to be made liable unto, by this insurance, they are of the seas," &c. "And in case of loss or misfortune it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for or in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance, the charges whereof the capital, stock and funds of the said company shall bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured."

such elsewhere since 1838. I have been partner with the late Mr. Tacchella, who drew the "Jugement de Sauvetage" of the "Dnieper," and who died on Saturday, November 25.

To the 16th interrogatory the deponent saith: Gallipoli is a dependency of Constantinople; and at Constaninople, the subjects and vessels of each nation are by the Capitulations with Turkey subject to the jurisdiction and procedure of the consulate to which each belongs. By the terms of the Capitulations it is established that every power exercises general jurisdiction over its own subjects and vessels. Civil and commercial questions between Turks and Franks are judged in the Turkish Court before a mixed commission of Turks and Franks. In maritime cases, such as salvages and averages, since the representation of the Europeans in Turkey, the Turks have submitted themselves, except in their own vessels, to the decisions of the European tribunal of the Consulate of the flag of which the ship belongs. In questions between Franks and Franks disputes are settled in the Consular Court of the defendant.

To the 17th interrogatory the deponent saith: Each Consulate has its own jurisdiction and procedure; the Turks and all the Consulates, with the exception of the English, adopt the Code de Commerce Maritime de France as the basis of their judgments. The general mode of procedure, and that adopted in the Russian Court, is, first, a protest and an extended protest, then survey or surveys, after which a curator is appointed, who pays expenses and does what is best to save ship and cargo or realize the same. The documents and accounts are then placed in the hands of three adjusters (or régulateurs) appointed by the Consul of the flag to regulate the average or salvage, which statement is charged pro rata upon the ship and cargo. The judgment is then deposited in the Consulate, homologated by the authority, and sent for execution with all the authority of a judicial sentence. Upon being served upon the parties interested or their representatives they have, in a Russian case, eight days within which to give notice of appeal should they feel themselves aggrieved, and then six months within which they must file a petition at St. Petersburg. In case of no appeal, the sentence or judgment is definitive and binding upon all parties.

To the 23rd interrogatory the deponent saith: Assuming the ship to have been Russian owned, it is the custom of the Russians in all such cases happening at Constantinople to adopt the French law, with the mode of procedure used in the Russian Consulate. The French and Russian Codes are nearly one and the same thing.

To the 25th interrogatory the deponent saith: I have seen the règlement or judgment of "The Dnieper," and so far as the law is concerned it is correct, in my opinion, and they applied the correct law. The articles which govern the case are 350, 369, and 381 in the Code de Commerce Maritime de France, as well as the 385th, mentioned in the judgment. These articles have been applied because, in my opinion, it is a case of salvage and not of average. The agent of the insurers having interfered for the salvage of the goods, the underwriters have virtually accepted the abandonment and have accepted the consequences of the salvage. For further explanation of my meaning I refer to the law as stated in the judgment.

Cross-Interrogatories.

To the 6th cross-interrogatory the deponent saith: in the Code Napoléon, "On Maritime Law," except in English vessels, it is the customary law applied to all ships at Constantinople and the Levant.

To the 7th cross-interrogatory the deponent saith: In France it prevails as their own law, and here by usage and custom specially for maritime cases, and this for want of any local law with the exception of English vessels.

Viva Voce Cross-Examination.

Question. Referring to your answer to the 16th interrogatory, by what law and authority is your statement as to the settlement of maritime cases in Turkey founded?

Answer. There was no Turkish law or authority applicable to Turkish vessels. By general usage and custom, and to facilitate business, the French law is generally adopted in the settlement of all maritime cases except English.

Q. Why do Russians adopt the French law in regulating average and salvage? and give instances of such being applied in similar cases to the "Dnieper."

A. Because there is a very slight difference between French and Russian maritime law, and there is a tacit convention in Constantinople to apply French law. I cannot quote any special case similar to the "Dnieper," being here only since 1862; but I know it from general information. I had to regulate the average by an Austrian vessel last month, when French law was adopted.

Q. Referring to your answer to interrogatory No. 25, what are the consequences referred to, and especially as to the goods saved, and whose expenses are known and separate from all others?

A. These goods must contribute to the salvage expenses as well as all others, because, according to jurisprudence in cases of wreck, a natural partnership is formed between the goods, and all have to contribute, one with the other.

Q. In what books of law and authority is such doctrine of jurisprudence contained?

A. Generally in all writers on French law, and especially in Pardessus: Boulay-Paty.

Q. Had the "Dnieper" been under the English flag, by what law would the average or salvage have been regulated?

A. It would be by English, and in the English Court; but, in my opinion, the French law being adopted as the local maritime law, it ought to be regulated by it.

Q. To what country do you belong, and of the laws of what country have you any and what experience?

A. I am an Italian, and am acquainted with the Italian, French and Austrian law, and generally of the concordance of the laws based on French jurisprudence.

Q. What is the law of Turkey as to salvage?

A. I do not know.

Q. What is the law of Turkey as to general average?

A. Generally the Turkish, as now published, is an extract from the French Code.

Q. What is the Russian law as to general average and salvage?

A. It is nearly the same as the French law.

Q. Is an Englishman, Frenchman, Turk or Italian bound to submit to the jurisdiction of the Russian Consul at Constantinople? and give the law by which he is so bound.

A. Yes, if it is a Russian ship, by the Capitulations and by the Roman principle, actor sequitur forum rei.

Q. What is the difference between general average and salvage? Describe the law applicable according to each and every country of which you are acquainted.

A. General average is when the goods remain the property of the shippers, whereas in salvage, by the abandonment, they become the property of the underwriters. This is according to the spirit of the arts. 369. and 401 of the Code de Commerce Maritime de France, and all laws based on the Roman law.

Q. Had a box of bullion ex "Dnieper" been lost whilst saving it from the ship, would the rest of the cargo be considered to have to make good the same?

A. Certainly it would.

A. G. A. Sivori.

It was also stated by another witness that "in case of wreck occasioning a case of salvage, the Russian Chancellerie appoints a curator, whose duty is to superintend the salvage operations, and to pay all the expenses incurred; to sell the goods; if necessary, to deliver to the consignees their goods, if the consignees will accept them, on their undertaking to pay the contribution to the expenses which shall be fixed by the règlement against the merchandise."

Watkin Williams (English Harrison with him).—It will be contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the change of nationality which took place when the ship was sold, subsequent to the date of the policy, so materially altered the burden borne by the underwriters as to vacate the policy. It is submitted that that is not so. The ship was advertised to go to certain places, and it is a fallacy to say that if the owners altered their intention and sent her to some other place different from those which had been named, that fact taken alone would vacate the policy. The way to look at the question is to consider whether the deviation is allowed by the policy; if it is, the policy is not vacated. No doubt, if a ship was insured as a neutral ship, and then she was sold to a belligerent power, the policy might be vacated, because such a deviation would not be within the policy. But here there is nothing to shew that the ship at the date of the policy was not a Russian, or that, being an English ship, she might not become a Russian. Clapham v. Cologan (3 Campb. 382) shews that the fact of insuring a ship as an English ship does not amount to a warranty that she is so. And here there is no warranty that she was of any particular nationality.

[LUSH, J.—There is no express warranty that she should not change hands.]

None at all. The question whether a policy was vacated by reason of a neutral ship having been captured, hostilities having commenced after the insurance was effected, was raised in Eden v. Parkinson (2 Dougl. 732, a), and it was held that there was no warranty that she should continue a neutral through the whole voyage.

[Sir G. Honyman, contra, pointed out that in the note to Arnould on Marine Insurance, edited by Maclachlan, p. 572, the learned editor remarks that Eden v. Parkinson (2 Dougl. 732, a) is no longer law.]

The next question is, what law is to govern the interpretation of this policy? The Court must bear in mind that there is a distinction between the law which is to govern the policy and the law which is to govern the ascertaining of the extent of the loss. It must be admitted that the interpretation of the contract which is entered into in England must be by the English law; but the extent of the loss must be ascertained by the law of the land where the loss insured against takes place.

[LUSH, J.—The gold was actually in the possession of the Russian authorities, and the plaintiff could not get it again without paying the money which, by the judgment, he was condemned to pay. Suppose, after the ship was wrecked, wreckers had come and had seized the gold, and the plaintiff had been forced to pay this money by way of ransom, could he not have recovered it? If so, why should he not be able to do so now? The gold has been taken possession of, though under legal forms.]

Just so; it is a loss within this policy. There is no occasion to dispute the law laid down in Don v. Lippmann (5 Cl. & F. 1) or in The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand (3 Moo. P.C. N.S. 272),—see also Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 280. In the present case, the contingency which has happened must have been in the contemplation of the parties. The policy covers losses till the gold was delivered at Constantinople. Upon this point he also referred to 9 Pothier, 282; The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Saunders (1 Best & S. 41; 30 L. J. Q.B. 218); Booth v. Gair (33 L. J. C.P. 99). The case of Mumford v. the Commercial Insurance Company (5 Johns. 262), decided in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, is in favour of the plaintiff. There goods insured were captured during the voyage and were detained, and afterwards restored to the owner on payment of the full freight. The vessel had been released, and the owner of the goods was obliged to hire another to carry the goods to their place of destination; and it was held that the insurer was liable to pay this additional freight, it being an expense necessarily incurred in consequence of the capture. Next, it is submitted that this loss is covered by the policy. The maritime law compels all the owners of goods, by reason of the community of danger, to contribute towards the expense of saving the cargo; and the plaintiff was bound to make his contribution according to the maritime law which prevailed at Constantinople. The underwriters have no more right to complain that the law which prevails there is different from English law than they would have to complain that the weather was different from English weather. It is very difficult to understand the judgment which was delivered by the experts at Constantinople, owing to the extreme intricacy of the accounts; but the Court appears to have been lawfully formed, and the judgment given in accordance with the French law; which, by the regulations of the Russians, is to prevail in the case of an inquiry about a Russian ship. In Walpole v. Ewer (Park on Insurance, 629) the plaintiff, as holder of a respondentia bond, was allowed to recover for an average loss sustained upon goods in a Danish ship insured in England. Under the English law, a lender upon respondentia is not liable to average losses, as stated by Lord Kenyon, C.J.; but he is so by the law of Denmark, and the plaintiff was held entitled to recover. In Newman v. Cazalet (Park on Insurance, 630) there was evidence that it was the custom in London to pay according to the calculation of the sentence of the Court at Pisa, although the underwriters would thus become liable for more than they would be under the English law. In Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) the goods insured were on board a ship, and were insured, on account of a Portuguese subject, at and from London to Lisbon; the ship was obliged to put into Cowes, and incurred great expense there. When she arrived at Lisbon, the master instituted proceedings in a Court of justice against the proprietors of the cargo and the owners and underwriters of the ship for a contribution by way of general average, to make good the damages and extraordinary expenses incurred on the voyage. The Court gave judgment in favour of the master's claim, and the owner of the goods was obliged to pay 6*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* per cent. on the value of the goods insured. The action in this Court was brought to recover that sum, and the Court ordered a nonsuit to be entered, refusing to give effect to the judgment. It is very difficult to understand how this decision can be right; but whether it be so or not, it is not conclusive upon the present case, which contains a mass of evidence, to shew that the Court which decided the matter had full power to do so.

[LUSH, J.—And further, in Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) there was no sacrifice of anything for the general benefit.]

Loring v. the Neptune Insurance Company (20 Pickering's Rep. 411), decided in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, is an authority in favour of the plaintiff, deciding that where a general average loss is adjusted at the port of destination conformably to the law and usage of such port, and the assured pays his contributory portion thereof, he is entitled to recover the same from the insurers, although the contributory interests have been estimated upon principles differing from those which prevail at the place where the policy was underwritten. Strong v. the New York Firemen Insurance Company (11 Johns. 323) is to the same effect.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not see that the articles in the French Code de Commerce, referred to by the persons who have answered the interrogatories, bear out their conclusions; but the strength of the position of the plaintiiff is, no doubt, that he could not get the gold without paying the money which the Court decided he was bound to contribute.]

Yes; and upon that point Strong v. the New York Firemen Insurance Company (11 Johns. 323) is a very clear authority. The cases and the whole subject may be found summed up in Phillips's edition of Benecke and Stevens, 271.

Sir G. Honyman (Lodge with him), for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable in this action. The gold was sent on shore before any expense was incurred. The claim is made out by adopting the Russian scale of charges, and enforcing that scale by French law against the defendant, who had insured the gold to be carried in an English ship. According to English law there would be no liability. Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805) shews what the principle is. Lord Tenterden said, "The principle of general average, namely, that all whose property have been saved by the sacrifice of the property of another shall contribute to make good his loss, is of very ancient date, and of universal reception among commercial nations." So, in Arnould on Marine Insurance, by

Maclachlan, 799, it is stated, " Goods landed or sold for the necessities of the ship before a jettison, do therefore not contribute, because they were not exposed at the time of the jettison to a community of risk, and were not saved thereby."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—This cannot be said to be a case of jettison. The ship was wrecked and went to pieces. Both the Russian and the French Codes agree that, in a case of jettison, the captain of the ship has a discretion to determine which part of the cargo shall be thrown overboard first; but here it was the duty of the captain to send on shore that part of the cargo which was most valuable and most easy to be saved. That being so, it seems reasonable that the person whose goods are not saved, should participate in the advantage received by him whose goods are so saved.]

Emerigon, c. 12. ss. 41, 42, confirms the principles already referred to.

[LUSH, J.—To make a case of average, there must be a sacrifice for the purpose of averting danger, and also the danger must be averted thereby; here the ship was lost, and therefore the danger was not averted.]

An underwriter insuring a ship in England cannot be liable to the assured in respect of something which, in England, would not be average, merely because a foreign Court has declared it to be so. The contribution is only towards expenses from which the owner of the goods gets some benefit. It is a common thing to insert in policies that payment of average is to be made " as per foreign statement"; and then the liability would be the same as in Newman v. Cazalet (Park on Insurance, 630). This seems to shew that, unless such a clause is inserted, the underwriter would not be liable. Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141) decides that it is not enough to shew that there is the judgment of the foreign Court, but the plaintiff must go on to shew that the person who makes the payment was legally compellable to do so. In Benecke and Stevens, by Phillips, which was referred to by the other side, the following passage occurs: " On the other hand, it cannot be denied that in many places statements of general average are made, not only by individuals, but even by persons authorized for that purpose, and by tribunals of commerce, which are in direct opposition not only to the general principles, but even to the very laws of the country where they are made; and the parties too easily acquiesce in such adjustments when the loss arising from them falls not upon themselves but upon the underwriters." The plaintiff must shew that he was rightly compelled to pay. It is said on the other side that it is difficult to understand Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), but that decision was recognized in Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805), although Lord Tenterden said it would not govern that case.—[He also referred to Phillips on Marine Insurance, s. 1415, and to 2 Parsons' Marine Insurance, 360.]—Further, it is not clearly shewn that the defendant is liable according to the Russian law. In Arnould on Marine Insurance, already referred to, p. 821, it is stated, " With regard to the second question, namely, whether the underwriter in this country is bound by a foreign adjustment, there is not the same unanimity; but still, upon general reasoning, and from the tenor of the few judicial claims upon it in this country, the true rule appears to be this: 1. That the underwriter is in all cases bound by a foreign adjustment of general average, when it is rightly settled according to the laws and usages of the foreign port. 2. But that unless it is clearly proved to have been settled in strict conformity with such laws and usages, he is not bound thereby in any case in which he would not be bound in this country." Therefore the onus is on the plaintiff to shew it, and it is submitted that he does not.—[He went through some of the evidence.]—This Court must look into the law to see whether the plaintiff was rightly compelled to pay.—Trimbey v. Vignier (1 Bing. N.C. 151).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I have been informed that the Russian code is amended and supplemented from time to time; it is impossible for us to say whether the decision of the Court sitting in Constantinople is correct or not; we are not sitting as a Court of appeal. Even if a mistake was made the assured could not get the gold without paying the money.]

The assured might have appealed against the judgment. Next, what is the effect of the change of nationality? The policy perhaps may not become void by reason of such change, but there is an implied contract by the assured that the underwriters shall not be called upon to pay upon a greater liability than was incurred by them at the time the policy was made. The change was made without communicating with the underwriters. The only contract was to insure goods carried on a British ship. "Any unnecessary or unsanctioned change of the ship produces an alteration of the risk underwritten"—see 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 331; see also Clapham v. Cologan (3 Campb. 382). If the owner had not sold the ship, the gold could have been obtained without paying this heavy charge. Next, the Court was only appointed to settle the average, but they have treated it as a case of salvage. There can be no liability to pay to the owners of other goods—see De Vaux v. Salvador (4 Ad. & E. 420; 5 L. J. K.B. 134).

[LUSH, J.—In that case the plaintiff could not recover because the damage was too remote. Here, by reason of the wreck, the gold got into the hands of the Russian authorities, and the owner could not get it without paying the money.]

W. Williams replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion in this case that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. The case has been extremely well argued on both sides, and all that could be said has been said. I do not think that we should gain anything by taking time to consider the matter; the principles on which we ought to decide are, to my mind, quite clear, and the facts are now sufficiently ascertained. The plaintiff, on behalf of the assured, insured a quantity of gold, to be conveyed to Constantinople by the ship called the "Dutchman," and he has, in consequence of that ship having been wrecked, and the gold having thus got into the hands of the Russian authorities, been compelled to pay a large percentage in order to get the gold which was the subject-matter of the insurance. The argument in favour of the defendant divides itself into two main grounds. It is said, in the first place, that the insurance upon this gold was affected at a time when this vessel was an English ship, and that after the insurance was effected her nationality was changed: she was sold to Russian owners and became a Russian ship; the consequence of which was, that when she was wrecked within the Turkish jurisdiction, she and her cargo came under the jurisdiction of the Russian Consulate at Constantinople, by virtue of the existing treaties between Russia and Turkey.

Now, upon turning to the policy of insurance, we find that it is an insurance generally upon the gold to be conveyed to Constantinople by this particular ship; but there is no assertion that the vessel is an English vessel, or any stipulation that she shall be such or continue to be such.

Now, there being no such express condition, it seems to me that we are not called upon to imply one. The change of the nationalty of the vessel was not a matter within the control of the plaintiff, neither was it his act. It was a thing which might take place without any intention on the part of either the assured or the insurer. It must be taken to be one of those things that, unless there is an express stipulation with respect to it, is a thing possible and incidental in the case of such a policy; and we are not called upon, therefore, to imply such a condition, it not being stated.

Then we come to the second branch, and here I agree with the learned counsel for the defendant, that we must construe this policy according to the law of England; but then, by the policy, as interpreted by the law of England, the insurer is liable to pay in respect of any loss occasioned by any of the perils insured against, and we come to the question, which is the question in this case, whether the loss upon this gold by reason of the percentage which the owners of the gold had to pay, is a loss by any of the perils insured against.

The facts are simply these, and they lie in a very small compass: The ship having become a Russian ship is wrecked in Turkish waters. The gold, the subject-matter of this insurance, is saved by being immediately sent on shore, the captain taking advantage of having to send his boat, and thinking it best to save this portion of the cargo, which of course, relatively to its value, was by far the most valuable part and the part most easily saved. He deposited it, or caused it to be placed in the hands of the Russian Consul. It is unnecessary to follow these proceedings in any detail through their course; but afterwards a claim is made in respect of the expenses which were incurred in endeavours to save the ship and the rest of the cargo on the gold in the consul's hands; and in the end, the matter having been investigated by persons appointed by the Russian Consul, judgment is given as to the amount which shall be contributed by the owners of the gold to satisfy this claim for contribution in respect of the expenses. That judgment is ratified, as it was necessary that it should be, by the embassy at Constantinople, and being ratified by the embassy at Constantinople, the judgment not being appealed against within a certain time, it became a binding judgment upon the parties concerned. That being so, the owners of the gold being shewn to have no alternative to get the gold but to submit to the payment of this percentage, in the meanwhile they, or some one, had given security, and in the end they were obliged to provide it themselves.

Now, it has been contended on the part of the defendant, that the proceedings of the tribunal by whom this judgment was given were wrongful in many respects. In the first place, that having to apply the Russian commercial code, they applied the French. I think the answer to that is quite sufficient. It appears that in matters relating to maritime law in which the jurisdiction of the consulate has to be exercised, inasmuch as they are for the most part between natives, and they have not at Constantinople the presence and assistance of Russian advocates to explain the law, whereas there are French advocates resident there, the laws of the two countries being with reference to these matters almost the same, they have recourse to the French law, and applied it in this instance. Whether that is right or wrong I do not take upon myself to pronounce, for I think it is a matter with which we have nothing to do; but if, in this case, they applied the French law as a substitute for the Russian, I think we must take it that they did it with proper authority.

Then it is said that they applied the law erroneously. Again I think we have not to deal with that. We are not to sit here as a Court of appeal against any judgment pronounced by a Court which must be taken to be one of competent jurisdiction in the administration of Russian laws. Whatever was substituted for it became for the time a Russian law in respect of matters of maritime law. The proper tribunal to appeal to, if there was any ground for an appeal, was to the Court at St. Petersburg. There is no appeal here, and the only question, as it seems to me, that we have to consider is, whether the assured, in order to get the subject-matter of the insurance, the gold, could do otherwise than that which they have done. When it is said they ought to have appealed to St. Petersburg, I agree that when we are considering the question of whether there has been a loss of the subject-matter of the insurance, so as to call upon the underwriters to make it good, if there is anything to prevent the subject-matter of the insurance being totally lost, which the assured, if uninsured, would as reasonable men have felt themselves called upon to do, it might very well be said that the subject-matter of the insurance has not been lost so long as that which a reasonable man ought to have done has not been done; but as I can see no reason for supposing that the tribunal at Constantinople administered any other law than that which they were entitled to administer, and as I cannot see that, under the circumstances, a sufficient case has been made out to shew that they did erroneously apply the law either in respect of the law or the facts, I cannot come to the conclusion, at least not necessarily, that the assured ought reasonably, instead of submitting to the loss in the first instance, to have run the risk of losing that which would have been undoubtedly a considerable addition to the expenses already incurred, by appealing to St. Petersburg, where very possibly the judgment of the Court would have been upheld.

Then we come to this, that it all centres upon this question, that as it was impossible for the owners to get the gold except by submitting to the judgment, unless they succeeded in reversing it, which I do not think, as reasonable people, they were called upon to do, is that a loss by one of the perils insured against? By reason of the wreck the gold is shifted from the ship and transferred, not to Constantinople, the place of its destination, where it was to be delivered to the consignor, but it gets into the hands of the Russian authorities; the authorities refuse to part with it; it becomes the subject-matter of litigation in which there is a judgment, and by virtue of that judgment the owners cannot get possession of it unless they pay certain expenses. The owners cannot get it but by that payment. The necessity for that payment arises out of the fact that the gold has got into hands there from which it could not be recovered, except by conforming with the judgment of the tribunal in their favour. It seems to me, therefore, that the loss was an immediate, necessary, and by no means too remote a consequence of the wreck, and therefore the consequence of one of the perils insured against; and therefore the underwriter is bound to indemnify the owners for it. It seems to me that the whole case lies in the narrow compass I have referred to—that there has been a loss, an undoubted loss, a loss which the assured could not by reasonable means prevent, and that that loss flowed immediately from the wreck, the wreck being occasioned by the perils of the seas, which were insured against by the underwriters.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the first point to which my Lord has referred, which was raised by Sir George Honyman, that by a change of ownership and change of nationality there was an increase of risk which therefore rendered the policy invalid, it is necessary that he should contend that though there is no express stipulation, there are expressions which amount to an express stipulation, or that there is an implied stipulation, that no change of ownership should occur so as to affect the nature of the risk, as he contends it would be affected by such change of ownership.

Now, I think, as a general rule, one ought never to imply a contract in a case where the party against whom the contract is to be implied had no power over the subject-matter, and could not by possibility, by any express power of his own, affect or perform any such contract implied against him. Therefore, it is always necessary, in judging of implied contracts, to keep in mind what is the power of the parties before you imply a contract. But what is the change and increase of risk, which, it is contended, took place? The ship is the same, the voyage is the same, and as far as I can see, the captain and the crew are the same; and the only difficulty which may arise is, that the underwriters in one case would come under the jurisdiction of the English Consular Court, which was established by virtue of the capitulations, instead of coming under the Russian Consular Court. Every one knows that when a ship meets with an accident by perils of the seas, and she belongs to any particular nationality, you must see what the nationality is, in order to ascertain the jurisdiction to determine the question of the liability of the underwriters, or the extent of it.

But it seems to me that no such thing entered into the contemplation of either party: neither of them ever contemplated that matter, and, in truth, it was one of those things which either they did not attach importance to, or it did not enter into their minds to attach importance to. For the future, if they do, it will be quite necessary and proper to introduce into these policies stipulations which will limit the insurance to places in which the nationality of the ship shall be the same throughout. By the accident of the shipwreck happening within the Turkish waters, the ship comes under the jurisdiction of the Russian tribunal, having changed its nationality and become a Russian ship. Then, as far as I can see, so far as the proceedings are concerned, I do not find there is any fault in them; but then it is said that the Russian Court at Constantinople did not in a regular and proper way administer the law so as to render the parties liable to its jurisdiction; in fact, that it was an erroneous judgment, that the facts were misapplied, or the law was misapplied, or was not the law which according to the Consular Court ought to have been applied.

Now, if there was any such ground of objection, it was matter of appeal, and with reference to that point I would only say, that I suppose it must be determined by this consideration, would a party uninsured have brought such appeal to the Court of St. Petersburg? It appears now, upon the facts as stated, that in the course of the litigation the underwriters had the fullest knowledge of what was going on, that they were fully aware of the course of the proceedings from first to last, and fully aware of the result of the proceedings, and, as I understand, there was no suggestion ever made by the underwriters or the persons representing them, that it would be a prudent or proper course to appeal to the Court of St. Petersburg. I think that is the strongest possible evidence to shew that an uninsured owner would not have instituted such an appeal, because he would have thought it useless. I think, if there were anything in that, the suggestion would have come from those who represented the underwriters. It did not, and therefore, I think, the appeal must be put out of the question. That being so, I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that, as it was the judgment of a competent Court, having jurisdiction over the matter in dispute, and was not appealed against, the plaintiffs could not get this gold without paying. I have no doubt it does appear a very extraordinary and very large exaction indeed, but without paying it they could not possibly get the gold. Then, what were they to do in the interest of all parties? Surely, if it was not a prudent thing to appeal, there was no other mode of getting the gold. Therefore, I think the judgment of this Court should be for the plaintiff for the amount stated.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the first question, I am not aware that it has ever been raised before, and as far as I know nothing is said in the books on the subject. I think that affords a very strong argument against the validity of that point as a ground of defence to this action. The point is, that the vessel being an English one at the time the policy was made, was passed over after that time into the hands of Russian subjects, and so became a Russian vessel. Being bound to Constantinople, I think it is clear, looking at the peculiar jurisdiction which prevailed there, that by reason of her having changed her nationality, the insurers, the underwriters, although their risk was not increased by that circumstance, did come under a heavier liability, in the events that happened, than they would have done if the nationality had remained as it was, at the time the policy was effected. But that cannot effect the assured, unless there is a warranty, express or implied, in his policy that that event should not take place.

Nothing is expressed in the policy itself about the nationality of the vessel. There is no stipulation that the vessel shall not change hands or change her national character. The shipper has no control over the vessel, and no power to prevent the owner from selling her. It would be absurd therefore for us to hold that a shipper of goods enters into an implied contract that the owner of the ship shall not, during the voyage, change the nationality of the ship. I think it would be against common reasoning for us to hold that any such understanding could be in the minds of either the assured or the underwriters, and as there is an entire absence of authority to support any such contention, I think that ground of defence must fail.

Then comes the next question, whether the amount claimed can be properly said to be a loss occasioned by one of the perils insured against, namely, by the perils of the seas.

It has been argued that this is analogous to a loss under general average, and cases have been cited on that subject which at first sight appear to give countenance to the argument raised on them; but I cannot help observing at the outset that this is not a case of average contribution at all. No goods were put overboard here to save the vessel; no part of the vessel was voluntarily sacrificed in order to save the cargo; but before any of the events out of which the litigation arises happened the vessel had become a perfect wreck. This is really a case of salvage, not of average loss; but a case has been cited by Mr. Williams first, and afterwards by Sir George Honyman, Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), and I think it necessary to make a few observations upon it, in order to distinguish this case from anything to be found in that. That was a case where the underwriters were sued for the contribution which the shipper was bound to pay pursuant to a decree of the Court of Lisbon in a suit instituted by the master. The vessel was on a voyage from London to Lisbon, and got into difficulties on its way, and put into Cowes, and there incurred considerable expense, being chiefly the wages of the crew during her stay there, and the cost of provisions consumed during the time. Those are items which would not be allowed by any average-stater in this country, and when the master got to Lisbon he libelled the shippers for contribution towards what he alleged to be the general loss, and the Court of Lisbon decreed against the plaintiff as owner of the cargo for his contribution. The question was whether that was a loss by the perils of the seas. It is perfectly clear, according to the English law, that those charges could not be the subject-matter of general average here, and there was no proof that those items were allowed under general average by the law of Portugal. There was nothing more than the judgment, and the case was disposed of on that ground. It was not average according to the principles of the law of England, and there was no proof of its being average by the law of that country, and that being so, it was not a loss within the policy at all. The Court there was not in the position which the parties were in here, viz., in possession of the goods as salvors; but the claim arose out of the judgment of the Court of Portugal against the owner of the goods to enforce an average contribution.

I cannot distinguish this case in principle from that of Bondrett v. Hentigg (Holt's N.P. 149). The facts here are that the vessel having got within the dominions of the Turkish empire, and being according to the evidence a Russian vessel, the Russian authorities at Constantinople had immediate jurisdiction over the whole wreck, both the vessel and the cargo. The statement of one of the witnesses, which we must take I think for the purpose to be a correct statement of the law prevailing there, is, that " in case of wreck occasioning a case of salvage the Russian Chancellerie appoints a curator, whose duty it is to superintend the salvage operations and to pay all the expenses incurred, to sell the goods, if necessary, or to deliver to the consignees their goods, if the consignees will accept them, on their undertaking to pay the contribution to the expenses which shall be fixed by the règlement against the merchandise "— so that, as soon as the vessel became a wreck there, the Russian authorities acquired jurisdiction over the matter. They had the power to take possession of the goods there, and hold them until an undertaking was given for payment of the salvage expenses which should be afterwards decreed against the owners. In Bondrett v. Hentigg (Holt's N.P. 149) the vessel had become wrecked near the Isle of France, and some of the cargo was saved and got on shore, and then the inhabitants of the island came down and overpowered the crew and took possession of part of the goods which had been so saved from the wreck, and that was held to be a loss; and Gibbs, C.J., says, " The cause of the loss was the perils of the seas, and the portion of the goods which was saved from the wreck, though got on shore, never came again into the hands of the owners. It is, therefore, a total loss to them from the perils stated in the declaration." That case was observed on and approved by my Brother Willes, in the case of Ionides v. the Universal Marine Insurance Company (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 259; 32 L. J. C.P. 170), in which he gives several illustrations of what would constitute a total loss; and he says, " Where there is a wreck of a vessel without hope of recovery, the cargo may be treated as also lost, if the circumstances are such that no part of it can be recovered for the benefit of the party insured."

Now here, the vessel having become a total wreck, the Russian authorities, having acquired jurisdiction, took possession of that wreck, and demanded salvage charges for having done what they did. They get possession of this gold and they appoint a curator. It is true they did not get possession of it by actually taking it out of the wreck, because the master, in order to save the most precious part of the cargo, when he saw it was hopeless to rescue the vessel, sent it on shore for safe custody, and put it into the hands of the Russian Consul there, but in this way it got into the very hands which afterwards would have taken it out if it had been left on board the ship, and they had as much control over it as if the Russian curator had taken it himself out of the vessel. The curator was appointed, and so much of the cargo as could be saved was got out of the vessel, and the whole of it was in the hands of the Russian authorities, and they had physical power at all events to withhold that from the owners until the owners chose to pay what they considered right to charge for salvage, and, rightly or wrongly, the statement was made out, the aid of the Consulate Court was invoked, and that Court determined that the owner should contribute his proportionate part of the salvage, though, according to the English law, he would not be bound to do so. They had the entire power in their hands to withhold it, and to exact any terms they thought proper, and it was therefore under that influence and vis major that the money was paid by the owner of the goods. He paid, therefore, under compulsion, in order to get possession of the goods which were primâ facie lost, or would have been if he had not those means of getting them back again. Therefore, I think that this was a loss by the perils of the seas, and a salvage loss within the terms of the policy.

Then comes the question, whether the assured ought, as a reasonable person, to have applied to the superior Court to endeavour to reverse the decision of the Consular Court? because if he ought, and had a reasonable ground for supposing that he could reverse it, then he may be said to have paid the money in his own wrong. But, looking at the facts, I do not think that, acting as a reasonable and prudent man, he would have taken upon himself that expense. There is nothing in this case to shew that the law administered by that Court was not the law prevailing there or the usage of the place, nor that there was any hope of getting that decision reversed by appealing to the Court of St. Petersburg. And the argument is the stronger against the underwriters, because, although they were represented by a person there, they never suggested that the assured should endeavour to reverse the judgment. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that this money was necessarily paid by the owner of the goods insured, for rescuing property from what otherwise would have been a total loss, and therefore he is entitled to recover it against the underwriters.

HAYES, J.—The only authority that has been relied on with regard to the particular question in this case has been that of Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141). I agree with what has been said by Mr. Williams, that it is not so easy, I will not say to understand, but to distinguish that case from this—that is, with regard to the ground of the decision, which is, that there shall not only be the decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction where the fact of the loss and the amount are ascertained, but that the law shall be shewn to be in accordance with that which has been pronounced by a competent authority to be the law of the country. That seems to be rather an infringement of general principles, because one would think that the decision of a Court is about the best evidence you can have of the law of a country, the decision of a Court from which you can appeal there; and one can understand that that would account for a good deal that is said to have taken place on the subject. Where you are to take an average statement which is made in a foreign country, by a foreign average-stater, not a lawyer, it should be accompanied by evidence of what the law really is; that seems perfectly reasonable, I think, and is shewn by many of the extracts from the American books. However, there is a distinction here, for if it were necessary to shew what the law of the country is, there is abundant evidence in the depositions, first of all, to shew that the law set forth in the case, and which was administered by the Russian Consul, was the French Code. We have it stated in express terms, and there is also the evidence given by Sivori, who seems to be the only competent witness to know, and has practised for a considerable period of time, that the judgment of this Consular Court is in truth in accordance with the law to be administered by the Russian Consul. Therefore, putting those two together, it entirely supplies the want which was said to exist in the case of Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), namely, that there was no evidence of what the law was. Here, I think, that is a clear distinction, which, at all events, does withdraw the case from Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), and on the express ground mentioned by the learned Judge who tried that case.

Metropolis Local Management Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. ss. 69, 73; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 106.—Notice of Action.

PRACTICE. A.—A person who has received notice from a Local Board of Health to drain his house, and in course of doing so commits a trespass by laying the drain-pipe in the land of another person, who thereupon brings an action against him, is not entitled to notice of action under s. 106. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102.

The declaration was in trespass for breaking and entering land of the plaintiff, in the High Street, Deptford.

The defendant pleaded, not guilty, by statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. ss. 69, 73; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 106.

Issue was joined on this plea.

At the trial, which took place at the Maidstone Spring Assizes, 1868, before Cockburn, C.J., it appeared that the defendant had laid a drain-pipe in and through some premises of the plaintiff, which lay at the back of his house. It was alleged by him that he had received notice from the local board of works to drain his house by making a drain into the common sewer, and that he had laid the drain-pipe in obedience to such notice. It was contended at the trial that he was entitled to notice of action under s. 106. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, on the ground that he was a person acting under the direction of the board. No such notice had been given, and the Lord Chief Justice held that none was necessary.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages one farthing, and a rule was subsequently obtained, pursuant to leave reserved, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why that verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that the defendant was entitled to notice of action under the statutes referred to in the margin of the plea.

Wharton shewed cause against the rule.—The defendant was not entitled to notice of action. The work which he had received notice to do he was bound to have done, and he cannot say that he was acting under the direction of the board in committing this trespass. He must say so in order to be entitled to notice of action. The question arises under the 69th and 73rd sections of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and under section 106. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. Under the former Act the board had power to order the defendant to make the drain, and by the 106th section of the latter Act it is enacted that "no writ or process shall be sued out against or served upon, and no proceeding shall be instituted against the Metropolitan Board of Works, or any vestry or district board, or their clerk, or any clerk, surveyor, contractor, officer or person whomsoever, acting under their or any of their directions, for anything done or intended to be done under the powers of such board or vestry under the said Acts or this Act, until the expiration of one calendar month next after notice in writing shall have been served," &c. The words "any person whomsoever" are intended to apply to persons ejusdem generis with those named—clerks, surveyors, &c.: see Williams v. Golding (35 L. J. C.P. 1; L. R. 1 C.P. 69). Further, the defendant was not acting under the direction of the board in committing the trespass upon the land of the plaintiff.

E. Thomas, in support of the rule, referred to Poulsum v. Thirst (36 L. J. C.P. 225; L. R. C.P. 449). The defendant was acting not only bonâ fide, but also he believed that he was acting under the direction of the board. He is, therefore, entitled to notice of action.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not see that the belief which he entertained has anything to do with the matter. He was not acting under the orders or direction of the board, but was performing a duty which is thrown upon him by the statute of draining his house efficiently. Notice was given to him to make the drain, but not to commit a trespass in doing so.

LUSH, J.—If he had refused to do the work, and the board had ordered one of their people to do it, and that person had, while acting under their directions, committed the trespass, he would, under the 106th section, have been entitled to notice of action; but the present defendant is not entitled to receive any such notice.

Joint-Stock Company—Winding-up—Transfer of Business to New Company —Dissentient Shareholder—Purchase of Interest—Arbitration—Power to appoint Umpire—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854—Action—Companies' Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. ss. 161, 162.

COMPANY. M.—The plaintiff, a shareholder in a joint-stock company, incorporated under the Companies' Act, 1862, expressed his dissent from a resolution duly passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company and the transfer of the business to another company, and required the liquidators either to abstain from carrying the resolution into effect, or to purchase his interest at a price to be determined as in the statute provided. By the 196*th clause of the articles of association of the company, differences arising between the company and the shareholders were to be referred to the arbitration of two persons. By the* 197*th clause, one of the arbitrators was to be appointed by each party. By the* 200*th clause, the arbitrators were to appoint an umpire. By the* 201*st clause, if the arbitrators did not within fourteen days after their appointment appoint an umpire, then, on the application of the parties in difference, or either of them, an umpire might be appointed by the governor of the Bank of England, or by a Judge under the Common Law Procedure Act*, 1854. And by the 203*rd clause, the award was to be binding. Arbitrators were appointed by both parties respectively, but they did not, within the time required, appoint an umpire, and upon the application of the plaintiff, an umpire was appointed by a Judge. The umpire made his award that the price to be paid for the purchase of the plaintiff's interest was* 2,100*l.*, which sum, with costs, he directed the company to pay to the plaintiff:—Held, on demurrer to a declaration setting out the above facts and articles, that the umpire was properly appointed under such articles, and that under the 161*st and* 162*nd sections of the Companies' Act*, 1862, an action would lie against the company to recover the amount awarded.

The defendants pleaded, on equitable grounds, that, before the resolution was passed, the plaintiff was indebted for calls upon his shares, whereby an action accrued to the defendants, and the shares were liable to be forfeited; that he and the defendants agreed that, in consideration that the defendants would give him time and would abstain from forfeiting the shares, he would consent to the proposal of the directors, and would not dissent from the resolution; that they did give him time, and did abstain from forfeiting his shares, &c.:—Held, that the plea disclosed no defence to the action, and that it was bad.

The declaration stated, that the defendants were a banking company, formed and incorporated under the Companies' Act, 1862, and that a special resolution was passed at a meeting of the said banking company, on September 26, 1866, and confirmed at a meeting of the said banking company on October 24, 1866, for the voluntary winding-up of the said company, the appointment of liquidators, and the transfer of the business of the said banking company to another company; and that the plaintiff at the respective times of the making and confirmation of the said resolution was a member of, and a shareholder in the said first-mentioned company, who did not vote in favour of the said resolution at either of the said meetings, and who duly, and within seven days after the date of the meeting at which such resolution was passed, expressed his dissent therefrom, in writing addressed to the liquidators of the said banking company, and left at the registered office of the said banking company, pursuant to the provisions of the 161st section of the said statute, and thereby required the said liquidators to abstain from carrying the said resolution into effect, or to purchase the interest held by the plaintiff in the said banking company, at a price to be determined as in the said statute provided. That it was and is provided in and by the articles of association of the said banking company as follows: that is to say, by the first of the articles, that in the interpretation of the said articles, the words and expression " the statutes " shall, unless excluded by the subject-matter or contract, mean and include the Companies' Act, 1862, and any and every other Act from time to time in force concerning joint-stock companies and necessarily affecting the company; and by the 196th of the said articles, " That whenever any differences shall arise between the said banking company on the one hand, and any of the shareholders, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns on the other hand, touching the true intent, or construction, or the incidents or consequences of these presents, or of the statutes, or touching anything then or to be thereafter done, executed, omitted or suffered in pursuance of these presents, or of the statutes, or touching any breach, or alleged breach of these presents, or any claim on account of any such breach, or alleged breach, or otherwise relating to the premises, or to these presents, or to the statutes, or to any of the affairs of the said company, every such difference shall be referred to the arbitration of two persons." And by the 197th of the said articles, " That one of the said arbitrators shall be named by each of the parties to the difference, and as regards any such party, whether consisting of one person or more persons than one." And by the 200th of the said articles, " that the arbitrators before entering on the business of the reference shall, by writing under their hands, appoint an impartial and qualified person to be their umpire." And by the 201st of the said articles, " That if the arbitrators do not, within fourteen days after their appointment, appoint an umpire, then, on the application of the parties in difference, or either of them, an umpire may be appointed by the Governor of the Bank of England or by a Judge, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854." And by the 202nd of the said articles, " That if the arbitrators do not, within thirty days next after the matter in difference is referred to them, agree on their award thereon, then it shall be referred to the umpire." And by the 203rd of the said articles, " That the award of the arbitrators or of the umpire, if made by writing under their or his hands or hand, and ready to be delivered to the parties in difference, or such of them as desire it, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, within thirty days next after the matter in difference is referred to the arbitrators, or, as the case may be, to the umpire, shall be binding and conclusive on all parties interested, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and all such things shall be forthwith thereafter done, omitted and suffered, as the award requires." And by the 208th of the said articles, " That the umpire shall have full power from time to time, by writing under his hand, to extend the time within which his award is to be made, and if it be made and ready to be delivered as aforesaid within the extended time, it shall be as valid and effectual as if made within the thirty days." And by the 209th of the said articles, "That the costs of and incident to the arbitration and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrators and umpires respectively." And the plaintiff says that the said requisition of the plaintiff not to carry the said resolution into effect not having been complied with, the plaintiff duly gave notice to the said liquidators that he had appointed, and he did appoint, one Cyrus Martin Fisher an arbitrator on his behalf, by whom the disputes and differences existing between him and the said liquidators respecting the purchase of his said shares, and the amount to be paid to him for them, should be determined, and required the said liquidators to appoint an arbitrator on their behalf. That the said liquidators afterwards appointed one John Francis Holcombe Read an arbitrator on their behalf, by whom the disputes and differences aforesaid should be determined. That the said arbitrators did not within fourteen days after their appointment, appoint an umpire; and thereupon, on the application of the plaintiff, by an order duly made under the provisions of the statute in that behalf, by the Hon. Mr. Justice Lush, dated February 5, 1867, Henry Macnamara, of No. 5, Paper Buildings, Temple, in the city of London, barrister-at-law, was appointed as umpire to decide the said matters in difference between the said parties. That the said arbitrators did not, within thirty days next after the said matters in difference were referred to them, agree on their award thereon; and that the said umpire duly enlarged the said time for making his said award from time to time until January 2, 1868; and that the said umpire, on December 6, 1867, duly made his award, and did thereby adjudge and award that the price to be paid for the purchase of the interest of the plaintiff in the said banking company was 2,100*l.*, at which sum he assessed the said price, and which sum he directed the said defendants to pay to the plaintiff. That the said umpire did further award and direct that the defendants should pay to the plaintiff his costs of and incident to the said reference and the costs of the said award, and should bear and pay their own costs of the said reference. That the plaintiff's costs of and incident to the said reference, and the costs of the said award were duly taxed and allowed to the plaintiff at 70*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* And that all conditions were performed and fulfilled, and all things happened and were done, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the said sums of 2,100*l.* and 70*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, yet the defendants have not paid the same, or any part thereof to the plaintiff.

The defendants pleaded, ninthly, on equitable grounds, that before the meeting of the said banking company, at which the said resolution in the said declaration mentioned was passed, to wit, before September 26, 1866, and before the accruing of any of the alleged causes of action in the said declaration mentioned, the plaintiff was the holder of 120 shares in the said banking company, and was, as such shareholder, indebted to the said company in 600*l.*, in respect of a call of 5*l.* upon each of the said shares, whereby an action accrued to the said banking company, and the plaintiff's said shares became and were liable to forfeiture. That the defendants were then proposing to reconstitute the said bank, and to pass the said special resolution in the first count mentioned; and it was then mutually agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendants, that in consideration that the defendants would forbear from pressing for payment of the said money then due and owing to them by the plaintiff, and would give the plaintiff time for the payment of the same, and would abstain from forfeiting his said shares, the plaintiff promised to consent to the proposal of the directors, if duly authorized by a resolution of a general meeting, or with such modifications as such general meeting should approve of; and that he would assent to and vote in favour of such special resolution, when the same was passed, and would not dissent therefrom; and that he would exchange his said shares which he then held for a proportionate number of shares in the reconstituted bank. And the defendants says that they did forbear from pressing for payment of the said money then due and owing to them by the plaintiff, and did give the plaintiff time for the payment of the same, and did abstain from forfeiting his said shares. And that the proposal of the defendants was duly authorized by a resolution of a general meeting of the said banking company, with such modifications as they thought fit, and the said special resolution was passed as aforesaid as in the said first count alleged.

There were demurrers to the declaration and the plea, and joinders therein.

Holl, for the plaintiff.—The important sections of the Companies' Act, 1862, as bearing upon the present question, are the 161st and the 162nd[1]. The former of these sections provides for the proceedings to be taken where a company is to be wound up voluntarily, and its business to be transferred to another company. A shareholder may dissent from the resolution to be passed, and may call upon the liquidators to abstain from carrying the resolution into effect, or to purchase his interest at a price to be determined. Then, section 162. provides that the price may be determined by agreement, but if the parties dispute about the same, such dispute shall be settled by arbitration, and for the purposes of such arbitration the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the settlement of disputes by arbitration, shall be incorporated with that Act. The declaration sets out all that has taken place, and the real question to be determined upon the demurrer to the declaration is whether the umpire was properly appointed. It is to be observed that the 162nd section does not provide that the provisions of the Companies' Clauses Act, 1845, must be carried out, but only that they shall be incorporated with the Companies' Act, 1862, which is the special Act, and the general rule applies that when there are provisions in a general Act, and also in a special Act, or in the articles of association of the company, the mode of proceeding in the special Act or in the articles may be adopted, and indeed that it overrides the mode of proceeding in the general Act. Sections 14. and 16. provide for the articles being binding, and the effect is that they are incorporated with the special Act. The declaration sets out the articles which are material, and it is clear that the dispute which

(1) Section 161. "Where any company is proposed to be or is in the course of being wound up altogether voluntarily, and the whole or a portion of its business or property is proposed to be transferred or sold to another company, the liquidators of the first-mentioned company may, with the sanction of a special resolution of the company by whom they were appointed, conferring either a general authority on the liquidators, or an authority in respect of any particular arrangement, receive in compensation or part compensation for such transfer or sale, shares, policies, or other like interests in such other company, for the purpose of distribution amongst the members of the company being wound up, or may enter into any other arrangement whereby the members of the company being wound up may, in lieu of receiving cash, shares, policies, or other like interests, or in addition thereto, participate in the profits of or receive any other benefit from the purchasing company; and any sale made or arrangement entered into by the liquidators in pursuance of this section shall be binding on the members of the company being wound up; subject to this proviso, that if any member of the company being wound up who has not voted in favour of the special resolution passed by the company of which he is a member at either of the meetings held for passing the same expresses his dissent from any such special resolution in writing addressed to the liquidators or one of them, and left at the registered office of the company not later than seven days after the date of the meeting at which such special resolution was passed, such dissentient member may require the liquidators to do one of the following things as the liquidators may prefer; that is to say, either to abstain from carrying such resolution into effect, or to purchase the interest held by such dissentient member at a price to be determined in manner hereinafter mentioned, such purchase-money to be paid before the company is dissolved, and to be raised by the liquidators in such manner as may be determined by special resolution: No special resolution shall be deemed invalid for the purposes of this section by reason that it is passed antecedently to or concurrently with any resolution for winding up the company, or for appointing liquidators; but if an order be made within a year for winding up the company by or subject to the supervision of the Court, such resolution shall not be of any validity unless it is sanctioned by the Court."

Section 162. "The price to be paid for the purchase of the interest of any dissentient member may be determined by agreement, but if the parties dispute about the same, such dispute shall be settled by arbitration, and for the purposes of such arbitration the provisions of 'The Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,' with respect to the settlement of disputes by arbitration, shall be incorporated with this Act; and in the construction of such provisions this Act shall de deemed to be the special Act, and 'the company' shall mean the company that is being wound up, and any appointment by the said incorporated provisions directed to be made under the hand of the secretary, or any two of the directors, may be made under the hand of the liquidator, if only one, or any two or more of the liquidators if more than one."

has arisen between the plaintiff and the defendants falls within article 196. That being so, the Judge had power to appoint the umpire under the 101st article. Further, the appointment may be supported under section 12. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1864, as was suggested by Blackburn, J., upon the authority of In re Lord (1 Kay & J. 90; 24 L. J. Ch. 145), in this same case when it was before the Court upon a rule to set aside the appointment of the umpire (L. R. 2 Q.B. 452). It is therefore submitted that the declaration is good, and the action is maintainable. Next, the plea is bad. The facts stated in it amount to no more than that the defendants may have a cross action against the plaintiff.—(He was then stopped.)

Matthews (H. James with him), for the defendants.—Even if the award is good, no action will lie upon it against the defendants. The proceeding enacted by section 161. was given for the purpose of enabling companies to amalgamate without an Act of Parliament authorizing them to do so. Otherwise, in the absence of a special Act of Parliament, any single dissentient shareholder might prevent such an amalgamation. Under the powers conferred by the 161st section, the liquidators and a dissentient shareholder, if there be one, are to settle the price of the interest of the latter; but there is nothing which can be construed as giving the latter a right of action against the company. The remedy which he has is by stopping the dissolution of the company until the amount be raised in the manner determined on by special resolution, and paid. If the old company remain he is still a shareholder; but until such special resolution is passed, he has no right to the money, nor can he sue the company. This declaration contains no statement of such a special resolution, or of the money having been raised: the company may be insolvent.

No dissolution can take place until the affairs of the company have been completely wound up, and until the Court has made an order that it be dissolved —see section 111. The plaintiff's practical remedy is, that he cannot be deprived of his position of a shareholder until he has been paid off. He will also have a remedy under section 138, as a contributory, by application to the Court of Chancery, but he cannot bring an action against his own company as if he was a creditor. The remedy which a creditor has in the case of a voluntary winding-up is under section 145, by enforcing a winding-up by the Court, if his rights are likely to be prejudiced by the voluntary winding-up provided for by section 133, under which the property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu. But if this action is maintainable, the plaintiff may sweep off everything. It is submitted that he has no common law remedy at all. He is clearly a contributory, and cannot also be a creditor who is to come in pari passu. Next, the appointment of the umpire is bad. The 161st section is in terms imperative, and the arbitration ought to have been under the Companies' Clauses Act, 1845.

[LUSH, J.—The machinery provided by the articles of association is ample, and I see no reason why the company should not agree that an umpire should be appointed in any manner they thought proper.]

This Court has already decided, as stated on the other side, that the appointment was under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. But the declaration does not shew that the requirements of section 12. have been complied with, and this is more like a valuation than an arbitration under that section—Collins v. Collins (26 Beav. 306; 28 L. J. Ch. 184), Bos v. Helsham (36 L. J. Ex. 20; L. R. 2 Ex. 72). Next, the award is bad on the ground of its being ultra vires. The umpire had no power to do more than determine the price to be paid; he could not direct it to be paid by the defendants, nor could he direct them to pay the costs.

[LUSH, J.—But if the statute implies an obligation to pay, he might order it to be paid; if it does not, his making the order would not affect the rights of the parties.]

Next, the plea is good. It sets up a contract, made by the plaintiff for a good consideration, by which he binds himself to waive and release the right of dissent which the statute gives him. He has sold to the defendants his right of dissent to the winding-up of the old company, and the transfer of the business to the new one. At any rate it is a good equitable plea.—See Nash v. Armstrong (10 Com. B. Rep. 259; 30 L. J. C.P. 286) and De Pothonier v. De Mattos E. B. & E. 461; 27 L. J. Q.B. 260).

Holl, in reply, was desired to confine his argument to the declaration.—The question for the umpire to determine was as to the price to be paid to the plaintiff, which, by section 162, might have been determined by agreement; the direction that it should be paid does not carry it any further, and the defendants are in no way damnified by it. It may be rejected as surplusage. So as to the costs.

[LUSH, J.—We need not trouble you upon that point.]

Next, it is immaterial whether the declaration shews that the requirements of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, have been complied with, if the appointment of the umpire is good under the articles, as it is submitted it clearly is. The requirements of section 162. have been complied with, and there is nothing to shew that it was intended that all the requirements of section 12. should be followed; but in truth the declaration does state that the appointment was duly made. Further, any objection on that ground ought to have been made at chambers. It may be that all was correctly done, or that the performance of those matters has been waived. Next, the action will lie against the company (sections 161. and 195), and that although no special resolution has been passed, for the defendants cannot take advantage of their own wrong in not raising the money, when they had agreed that the dispute between the plaintiff and themselves should be referred to arbitration; they are represented by the liquidators, and that part of the 161st section simply points out what the liquidators are to do. Section 138. was never intended to take away the right of action, or to compel the dissentient shareholder, who has had the price of his interest determined, to go to the Court of Chancery.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. The first objection is, that the award was not made by a proper authority; that there is no power under the statute to appoint an umpire in the manner in which the umpire was appointed in this case, and therefore that the award of the umpire is of no binding force against the defendants. That depends on the construction to be put on the Companies' Act, 1862, the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and perhaps upon the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. The Companies' Act, by section 162, prescribing the mode for ascertaining the price to be paid under the circumstances detailed in section 161, says, that if the price to be paid for the purchase of the interest of a dissentient member cannot be determined by agreement between the parties, the dispute shall be settled by arbitration, and for the purposes of such arbitration the provision of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the settlement of disputes by arbitration. shall be incorporated. Now, there are various sections in the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, referring to arbitrations. There are sections which also contemplate the appointment of an umpire in the event of the arbitrators disagreeing, but there is no section there which gives power to any person to appoint an umpire for the settling of this particular dispute, in cases where the arbitrators differ about it, or neglect to make their appointment. The only clause providing the means of appointing an umpire where the arbitrators disagree is one that confines it to an umpirage between a claimant and a railway company, and in that case the umpire is to be appointed by the Board of Trade; therefore if the case rested on those sections of the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, undoubtedly there is nothing that warrants the appointment of the umpire by a Judge; but if it stood there, the case of In re Lord (1 Kay & J. 90; 24 L. J. Ch. 145), before the present Lord Chancellor, then Vice-Chancellor Wood, might have been referred to, sanctioned as it is by the decision of this Court in this very case, on motion, as an authority that in that event the Common Law Procedure

Act would step in, and the 12th section of that Act would enable a Judge to make that appointment. If I had to put a construction, for the first time, on that clause, I should hesitate in coming to the conclusion that the 12th section was meant only to apply to a case of this kind. On the other hand, as the point has been already decided by the Court of Chancery, and by this Court, I should give judgment in conformity with those decisions if the case rested on these sections alone; but it is not necessary to base our judgment on the clauses in the Common Law Procedure Act, because there is here a set of clauses forming part of the code of the company, namely, the articles of association, by which they provide for the event that has happened. It is argued that that set of clauses cannot apply, because the 162nd section of the Companies' Joint-Stock Act says, that the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act shall apply. I think that cannot mean that whether there is any provision or not, whether there is any necessity for resorting to those sections or not, those sections shall be resorted to, where they are ineffective to carry out the purpose. I think that section only means that where it is needful, and the parties cannot agree, they may resort to those sections, and treat them as incorporated into the particular code; but where the code itself, whether it be a special Act or articles of association under the Companies' Act, 1862, provides for the means of appointing an umpire, then, I think, the parties are not driven to resort to the Companies' Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or to that Act as supplemented by the Common Law Procedure Act. I think, therefore, by virtue of the articles of association of this company, the umpirage may well stand, and the appointment of the umpire by the Judge was well made, and that therefore the umpire had authority to make the award between the parties.

Then comes the important question, whether the action may be brought upon the award. Upon this question I have entertained considerable doubt in the course of the argument, and I cannot say that that doubt is entirely removed; but the strong inclination of my opinion is, that the action may be brought on the award. No doubt, the section is worded ambiguously as to this particular matter; but still, I think that there is nothing in the Act suggesting that the ordinary right of the party who has been made to sell an interest which he had at a price fixed, to recover that money by action, is taken away. I must hold, therefore, that the ordinary consequences must follow, and that the company, the purchasers of that right, are liable to an action for the price.—[His Lordship then read the 161st section.]—This section, therefore, in the event which has happened here, namely, that of the plaintiff dissenting from the resolution and requiring the liquidators to elect, gives them power to make a contract to purchase the interest of a dissentient member, and if they and such member cannot agree about the price, to have the price determined by arbitration. The liquidators here did elect to purchase, and not being able to agree with the plaintiff about the price, did appoint an arbitrator, in order to have the price settled by arbitration. That I regard as a contract which they were specially authorized to make. It was a contract by the liquidators on behalf of the company on the one hand, and the shareholders on the other, by which the company purchased the interest of the plaintiff in that company. Then it would follow, unless there are some words restraining the ordinary right, that if the purchase-money is not paid, the seller would have a right to enforce the payment by action. Is there anything in this clause which takes away that primâ facie right? I was for a considerable time puzzled by the words which follow, which did appear to me, at one time, to have the effect of making the payment, as it were, optional as far as a Court of law is concerned, on the part of the liquidators or the company, and of driving the party into a Court of equity to have compensation paid through the agency of that Court. After saying that they are to purchase the interest held by the dissentient member at a price to be determined in manner hereinafter mentioned, the words are "such purchase-money to be paid before the company is dissolved, and to be raised by the liquidators in such manner as may be determined by special resolution." On looking at these words again, I do not think that there is anything inconsistent with the idea that the plaintiff has a right to sue the company through the liquidators, who are acting on behalf of the company, for the purchase-money unpaid. It is to be paid before the company is dissolved. That is equivalent to saying that the company shall not be dissolved until they have paid, and if they could be so dissolved, there could be no remedy by action against them as a company; therefore, those words may have been put in for the purpose of preserving their liability until the money was paid. Then, again, "The money is to be raised by the liquidators in such a manner as may be determined by special resolution." There is nothing there to indicate that that resolution must be made before the party is entitled to his money. It may be made afterwards. The liquidators may pay it out of the money in their hands, and call on the meeting to say how they are to be reimbursed. At all events, there are no means here by which the plaintiff is enabled to compel them to pass any such resolution for payment. I cannot hold these words to have the effect of postponing his right to the payment of the money awarded to him. And I, therefore, come to the conclusion, inasmuch as there has been a purchase of his interest at a price, and that price is to be paid at some time or other, that the right to bring an action naturally follows from that, and that if the money is not paid there is a right of action against the company for the purchase-money.

The remaining question is, whether the equitable plea that has been set up affords any answer to this action? I am clearly of opinion that it does not. The plea says, in effect, "You ought not to have the money awarded to you as the price of your interest, because at an antecedent period, when you were in arrear for calls, you asked for time to pay them, and we gave you time on your agreement that when the meeting should be held you would vote in favour of it; but when the meeting came you broke that agreement." If he did, how could that disentitle him to the right to the price of his interest in the company? It may subject him, for aught I know, to an action for a breach of contract, but that does not appear to me to create any ground on which a Court of equity could say, "you shall not recover the price of your interest because you broke your contract with the company." Upon all these grounds, I think our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it necessary to add anything to what has fallen from my Brother Lush on any other point than that as to the construction to be put on the 161st and 162nd sections of the Companies' Act, 1862. I take the meaning of the 161st section to be that the liquidators, acting for the company, are to have the power of buying off the opposition of a particular dissentient shareholder to a proposed change or dissolution of the company. That is to be effected in this way: that upon his expressing his dissent, it becomes the duty of the liquidators to elect which of two courses they will pursue; they must either elect to abstain from carrying out their resolution, or if they do not elect to abstain, there is but one other thing for them to do, namely, to purchase the interest held by such dissentient member. Now reserving, for the moment, the question of how the price is to be arrived at, if they have in any way, either by absolute agreement or by going to arbitration, manifested their election not to abstain from carrying out the resolution, but to purchase the interest, then, as it appears to me, it is not open to them afterwards to withdraw from it. There must be some time or other at which a valid agreement is entered into, for the purchase and for the sale of the interest of the dissentient shareholder. Then it appears to me to be immaterial whether that be carried out by agreement as to the price, or by that which is substituted for the agreement as to the price, namely, by arbitration. When once they have either entered into the agreement, which would, of course, involve an agreement as to the price to be paid, or when they have proceeded to arbitration, and the arbitration has reached an end, they have then no longer any option whatever, and the thing in concluded. The effect of that is, that there has been a bargain by the shareholder to divest himself altogether of his interest in the company, and that there has arisen a duty on the part of the company, to pay him either the agreed or awarded purchase-money. Then, if that be so, I can see nothing here to alter that which is the ordinary and natural result of an agreement of purchase and sale at a price fixed, namely, that the purchaser should pay the price so agreed or fixed. The words there pointed to seem to me to have a better interpretation, or a more reasonable interpretation than that assigned to them by Mr. Matthews by assuming that they mean only this: when the price has been agreed upon or fixed by arbitration, then the company shall not have power to dissolve; and so, as it were, to escape or evade payment in that way, and be no longer capable of being dealt with at all, and that they shall have no power of dissolving until they shall have paid the purchase-money; and, further, that as between the liquidators and the company whom they represent, the company shall pass a special resolution directing in what particular manner the liquidators are to raise the money. But the duty to pay seems to me to remain as it was before, and, unless there be some language in the statute directly depriving a person who has had an award made in his favour, or who has an agreement with the company to pay money,—unless there be something expressly depriving him of the right to sue, which I cannot find in this Act, his remedy by action remains, and if there be, by possibility, any reason why the money so agreed or awarded should not be paid, it will be open to the company to set out those reasons, either by way of answer to the action, or by taking proceedings themselves in equity to shew why they should not do that which, it appears to me, they are primâ facie bound to do, namely, to pay the money. I abstain from touching on the other points, which seem to me to have been exhausted by my Brother Lush. I think, for the reasons he has given, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

HAYES, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is unnecessary for me to add anything to what has been already said by my Brothers Lush and Hannen. I think the subject is exhausted. I was perplexed at one time about there being a partnership existing and the plaintiff continuing still to be a partner, but the case seems to be that the plaintiff has withdrawn, and there is an enabling power given by the statute, that those who remain in may buy the interest of the others. Now if an ordinary partner had retired, and had entered into an agreement with the continuing partners for purchase of his interest, he would have a right of action, and the ordinary consequences would follow, and, so it seems to me, the liquidators acting for the company are empowered to enter into a contract to purchase these shares. What is the meaning of the word "purchase"? The shareholder is to transfer his shares to them, and they are to pay the purchase-money to him, and unless the ordinary remedy were taken away, which it is not, by the Act of Parliament, he would, as it seems to me, have the ordinary remedy. Therefore, whatever doubts existed in my mind for some time, I now agree with the rest of the Court in thinking that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Carriers by Railway—Contract with Passengers—Negligence—Latent Defect in Carriage—Warranty and Insurance—"Due Care."

CARRIERS. B.—The plaintiff, a passenger for hire on the defendants' railway, suffered an injury in consequence of the carriage in which he was travelling getting off the line and upsetting. The accident was caused by the breaking of the tire of one of the wheels of the carriage, owing to a latent defect in the tire, which was not attributable to any fault on the part of the manufacturer, and could not be detected previously to the breaking:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the company were not liable in respect of such injury, there being no contract of warranty and insurance in the case of passengers that the carriage should be in all respects perfect for its purpose, that is to say, free from all defects likely to cause peril.

Observations on the obligation in such case of common carriers to take due care.

The following case was stated on appeal, the Court of Queen's Bench (Blackburn, J., dissentiente) having given judgment in favour of the defendants.

The decision of the Court below is reported in 36 L. J. Q.B. 181.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants for injuries sustained by him whilst travelling as a passenger by railway from Nottingham to South Shields, in consequence of negligence alleged to have been committed by the defendants. The plaintiff took a second-class ticket, and the carriage in which he was travelling got off the line and was upset, and the plaintiff received injuries therefrom. The cause of the carriage getting off the line and upsetting was the breaking of the tire of one of the wheels, and such breaking arose from a latent defect in the tire, which was not attributable to any fault on the part of the manufacturer, and could not be detected previously to the breaking of the tire.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the action.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgment of the Court[1] was, on May 10, delivered by—

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—In this case the plaintiff, a passenger for hire on the defendants' railway, suffered an injury in consequence of the carriage in which he was travelling getting off the line and upsetting; the accident was caused by the breaking of the tire of one of the wheels of the carriage, owing to "a latent defect in the tire, which was not attributable to any fault on the part of the manufacturer, and could not be detected previously to the breaking." Does an action lie against the company under these circumstances? This question involves the consideration of the true nature of the contract made between a passenger and a general carrier of passengers for hire. It is obvious that for the plaintiff, on this state of facts, to succeed in this action, he must establish either that there is a warranty by way of insurance, on the part of the carrier to convey the passenger safely to his journey's end, or, as his learned counsel mainly insisted, a warranty that the carriage in which he travels should be in all respects perfect for its purpose, that is to say, free from all defects likely to cause peril, although those defects were such that no skill, care or foresight could have detected their existence.

We are of opinion, after consideration of the authorities, that there is no such contract either of general or limited warranty and insurance entered into by the carrier of passengers, and that the contract of such a carrier and the obligation undertaken by him are to take due care (including in that term the use of skill and foresight) to carry the passenger safely. It of course follows that the absence of such care, in other words, negligence, would alone be a breach of this contract, and as the facts of this case do not disclose such a breach, and, on the contrary, negative any want of skill, care or foresight, we think the plaintiff has failed to sustain his action, and that the judgment of the Court below in favour of the defendants ought to be affirmed.

The law of England has from the earliest times established a broad distinction between the liabilities of common carriers of goods and of passengers. Indeed, the responsibility of the carrier to re-deliver the goods in a sound state can attach only in the case of goods. This responsibility (like the analogous one of innkeepers) has been so long fixed and is so universally known that carriers of goods undertake to carry on contracts well understood to comprehend this implied liability. If it had not been the custom of the realm, or the common law declared long ago, that carriers of goods should be so liable, it would not have been competent for the Judges in the present day to have imported such a liability into such contracts on reasons of supposed convenience. But this is, as it seems to us, what we are asked by the plaintiff to do in the case of carriers of passengers. The liability of the common carrier of goods attached upon the particular bailment of the goods to him in his capacity of common carrier, and the rules which govern the rights of bailors and bailees of things are, of course, applicable only to things capable of bailment. The law and the reasons for it in the case of bailments to carriers are found in the great judgment of Holt, C.J. in Coggs v. Bernard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 189), and are thus stated: "As to the fifth sort of bailment, viz., a delivery to carry or otherwise manage for a reward to be paid to the bailee, those cases are of two sorts, either a delivery to one that exercises a public employment, or a delivery to a private person. First, if it be to a person of the first sort, and he is to have a reward, he is bound to answer for the goods at all events, and this is the case of the common carrier, common hoyman, master of a ship, &c., which case of a master of a ship was first adjudged 26 Car. 2, in the case of Mors v. Slue (Raym. 220; 1 Vent. 190, 238). The law charges this person thus intrusted to carry goods against all events but acts of God and of the enemies of the King. For though the force be never so great, as if an irresistible multitude of people should rob him, nevertheless he is chargeable. And this is a politic establishment, contrived by the policy of the law for the safety of all persons the necessity of whose affairs oblige them to trust these sorts of persons, that they may be safe in their ways of dealing, for else these carriers might have an opportunity of undoing all persons that had any dealings with them by combining with thieves, &c., and yet doing it in such a clandestine manner as would not be possible to be discovered. And this is the reason the law is founded upon in that point." The same law is found in numerous text-books (some of which are referred to in the judgments of my Brothers Mellor and Lush in their judgments below), and has been acted on for centuries in the case of carriers of goods.

The Court is now asked to declare the same law to be applicable to contracts to carry passengers. The learned counsel for the plaintiff felt the difficulty of the attempt to apply the entire liability of the carrier of goods to the carrier of passengers, but he contended for and mainly relied on the proposition that there was at least a warranty that the carriage in which the passenger travelled was roadworthy, and that the liability of the carriers of goods in this respect ought to be imported into the contract with the passenger. But first, it is extremely doubtful whether such warranty can be predicated to exist in the contract of the common carrier of goods. His obligation is to carry and re-deliver the goods in safety, whatever happens; in the words of Lord Holt, "he is bound to answer for the goods, at all events." Again, "The law charges this person thus intrusted to carry goods against all events but acts of God and of the enemies of the King": and this broad obligation renders it unnecessary to import into the contract a special warranty of the roadworthiness of the vehicle, for if the goods are safely carried and re-delivered, it would be immaterial whether the carriage was roadworthy or not, and if the goods are lost or damaged the carrier is liable on his broad obligation to be answerable "at all events"; and it is unnecessary to inquire how that loss or damage arose. But however that may be, it is difficult to see upon what principle the contract of the carrier of goods, which on the hypothesis does not apply in its entirety to carriers of passengers, is to be dissected, and a particular part of it severed and attached to what on the hypothesis is another and different contract. It was contended that the reason which made it the policy of the law to impose the wider obligation on the carriers of goods, applied with equal force to impose the limited warranty of the soundness of the carriage in favour of the passenger. The reason suggested was, as we understood it, that a passenger when placed in a carriage was as helpless as a bale of goods, and therefore entitled to have for his personal safety a warranty that the carriage was sound: but this is not the reason, or anything like the reason, given by Lord Holt for the liability of the carrier of goods. The argument founded on this reason however would obviously carry the liability of the carrier far beyond the limited warranty of the roadworthiness of the carriage in which the passenger happened to travel. His safety is, no doubt, dependent on the soundness of the carriage in which he travels, but in the case of a passenger on a railway it is no less dependent on the roadworthiness of the other carriages in the same train and of the engine drawing them, on the soundness of the rails, of the points, of the signals, of the masonry, in fact of all the different parts of the system employed and used in his transport, and he is equally helpless as regards them all. If then there is force in the above reason, why stop short at the carriage in which the passenger happens to travel? It surely has equal force as to all these things, and, if so, it must follow as a consequence of the argument that there is a warranty that all these things shall be and remain absolutely sound and free from defects. This, which appears to be the necessary consequence of the argument, although Mr. Manisty disclaimed the desire to press it so far, tries the value of it. But surely if the law really be as it is now contended to be, it would have been so declared long ago. No actions have been more frequent of late years than those against railway companies in respect of injuries sustained by passengers. Some of these injuries have been caused by accidents arising from defects or unsoundness in the rolling stock, others from defects in the permanent works. Long inquiries have taken place as to the cause of these defects, and whether they were due to want of care and skill, and these inquiries would have been altogether immaterial, if warranties of the kind now contended for formed part of the contract. An obligation to use all due and proper care is founded on reasons obvious to all, but to impose on the carrier the burden of a warranty that everything he necessarily uses is absolutely free from defects likely to cause peril, when, from the nature of things, defects must exist which no skill can detect and the effects of which no care or foresight can avert, would be to compel a man, by implication of law and not by his own will, to promise the performance of an impossible thing, and would be directly opposed to two maxims of law, Lex non cogit ad impossibilia; Nemo tenetur ad impossibilia. If the principle of implying a warranty is to prevail in the present case, there seems to be no good reason why it should not be equally applied to a variety of other cases, as for instance to the managers of theatres and other places of public resort who provide seats or other accommodation for the public. Why are they not to be equally held to insure by implied warranty the soundness of the structures to which they invite the public? But we apprehend it to be clear that such persons do no more than undertake to use due care that their buildings shall be in a fit state. Thus a staircase in the Polytechnic Institution fell, and injured several persons attending a public exhibition there. Two actions were brought by separate plaintiffs who had paid money for the use of their staircase. The first was tried before Wightman, J., the second before Erle, C.J. No one seems to have supposed that there was any warranty of the soundness of the staircase: yet the persons using it were as helpless to detect or prevent the accident as the traveller. Both learned Judges put the liability entirely on the question whether there was the want of due care in maintaining the staircase, and Erle, C.J. told the jury that the defendants would not be liable for latent defects—Brazier v. the Polytechnic Institution (1 Fost. & F. 507), Pike v. Same (1 Fost. & F. 712). So in stating the liability of a canal company, who made the canal for profit, and allowed the public to use the canal on payment of tolls, Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, says, "The common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors not perhaps to repair the canal or absolutely to free it from obstructions, but to take reasonable care, so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may navigate without danger to their lives or property"—The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 223). The liability in that case was not put in any degree upon a warranty that the canal shall be free from perilous defects, but upon the rational obligation to use due care that it shall be so. The common law with regard to carriers of goods and innkeepers, stands, as we have said, on its own special grounds. But it has been found so stringent, not to say unjust, in the liabilities it imposed on persons carrying on those trades, that the legislature has found it necessary in both cases to modify its stringency. It will now be necessary to examine the leading authorities cited during the argument.

The counsel for the plaintiff in the first place referred to some of the cases in which it has been held that in contracts for the supply of goods for a particular purpose, there is an implied warranty that the goods supplied shall be reasonably fit for that purpose. Biggs v. Parkinson (7 Hem. & M. 955) is a case of that class. But the agreement to sell and supply goods for a price which may be assumed to represent their value is a contract of a different nature from a contract to carry, and has essentially different incidents attaching to it. Indeed, the learned counsel did not cite these cases as directly governing the present. Even in the cases of contracts to supply goods, it may be a question, on which it is not now necessary to express an opinion, how far and to what extent the vendor would be liable to the vendee, in the case of a latent defect of the kind existing in the present case, which no skill or care could prevent or detect, that is to say, where an article is supplied which has been manufactured and tested in the best and most careful manner, so as to be turned out as perfect as in the nature of things it could be. It is clear that if the manufacturer is liable for such an inevitable and undiscoverable defect, he can never sell what he makes without the risk of an action attaching to every contract he enters into—without in fact becoming an insurer, unless he expressly limits his liability. In cases of express warranties, the compact of the parties is to be gathered from the words they use in making them. When warranties are expressly made, the parties themselves may guard against excessive liability, by any exceptions they please, and in those implied by law the law itself must take care to keep them within the boundaries of reason and justice, so as not to impose impracticable obligations.

It is now proposed to consider the authorities relied upon as having a direct bearing on the question before us. The case which the plaintiff's counsel relied on as the strongest in his favour is Sharp v. Grey (9 Bing. 457; 2 Mo. & S. 620; 2 L. J. C.P. 45). But that case, when examined, furnishes no sufficient authority for the extensive liability which the plaintiff seeks to impose on the defendants. There the plaintiff was injured by an accident caused by the breaking of the axle-tree of a stage coach. The defect might have been discovered if a certain examination had taken place, and it was made a question of fact at the trial whether it would have been prudent or not to make that examination. Tindal, C.J., who tried the cause, is reported to have directed the jury to consider "whether there had been on the part of the defendant, that degree of vigilance which was required by his engagement to carry the plaintiff safely." Now, if the learned Chief Justice had supposed there was an absolute warranty of roadworthiness, this direction could not have been given, as it would then have been immaterial whether the defendant had used vigilance or not, and the degree of vigilance would have been an utterly immaterial consideration. The jury having found on this direction for the plaintiff, a motion was made in the absence of Tindal, C.J., for a new trial. Two of the learned Judges, in refusing the rule, Gaselee, J., and Bosanquet, J., are certainly reported to have used expressions which seem to indicate that they thought the defendant bound to supply a roadworthy vehicle. Park, J., uses language which, as reported, is ambiguous. But the judgment of Alderson, J., is distinctly opposed to the notion of a warranty against latent and undiscoverable defects. He says, "A coach proprietor is liable for all defects in his vehicle which can be seen at the time of construction, as well as for such as may exist afterwards and be discovered by investigation." We have referred somewhat fully to this case, because it was put forward as the strongest authority in support of the plaintiff's claim which can be found in the English Courts, and because it was relied on by the Judges of the Court of Appeal in New York, in a decision which will be afterwards referred to. But the case when examined furnishes no sufficient authority for the unlimited warranty now contended for. The facts do not raise the point for decision, and the authority of Tindal, C.J., and Alderson, J., is against the plaintiff. The dictum of Best, C.J., in Bremner v. Williams (1 Car. & P. 416) was not necessary to the decision of the cause. The ruling of Lord Ellenborough in Israel v. Clark (4 Esp. 259) was also relied on. Of these last two authorities Blackburn, J., in his judgment below, said, "These are, it is true, only Nisi Prius decisions, and neither reporter has such a character for intelligence and accuracy as to make it at all certain that the facts are correctly stated, or that the opinion of the Judge was rightly understood." We find also that Best, C.J., makes observations in the opposite sense in the case of Crofts v. Waterhouse (3 Bing. 319; 4 L. J. C.P. 75). These cases are really the only English authorities which afford any support at all to the plaintiff's view, for the interpretation reported to have been given by Cresswell, J., in Benett v. the Peninsular and Oriental Steamboat Company (6 Com. B. Rep. 782; 18 L. J. C.P. 85) of the case of Sharp v. Grey (9 Bing. 457; 2 Mo. & S. 620; 2 L. J. C.P. 45) was only an observation made during an argument, when it was cited as incidentally bearing on the question then before the Court, and cannot be relied on as authority.

On the other hand, there is not only the plain distinction between the liabilities of the carriers of goods, and of passengers, constantly referred to by text-writers and Judges as well-known and settled law, but numerous cases have been decided on grounds entirely at variance with the supposition that there existed contemporaneously with them the liability by way of warranty. In Aston v. Heaven (2 Esp. 543), which was the case of injury to a passenger, Eyre, C.J., after carefully pointing out the law as to the liability of carriers of goods to make good all losses except those happening from the act of God or the King's enemies, and the reasons for it, says "I am of opinion that the cases of losses of goods by carriers and the present are totally unlike." Again, "There is no such rule in the case of the carriage of persons; this action stands on the ground of negligence alone." In Christie v. Griggs (2 Campb. 79) Sir James Mansfield says, "There was a difference between a contract to carry goods and a contract to carry passengers. For the goods the carrier was liable at all events, but he did not warrant the safety of the passengers. His undertaking as to them went no further than this, that as far as human care and foresight could go, he would provide for their safe conveyance." In Crofts v. Waterhouse (3 Bing. 319; 4 L. J. C.P. 75) the observations attributed to Best, C.J., clearly shew that he did not think there was any warranty on the part of carriers of passengers; and Park, J., in the same case, says, "A carrier of goods is liable at all events; a carrier of passengers is only liable for negligence." But, besides the observations of individual Judges to shew what has hitherto been understood to be the law, there is the long series of important cases involving costly and protracted trials, in which, by common consent, the liability of carriers of passengers has been based upon the duty to take due care, and not upon a warranty. In Grote v. the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company (2 Ex. Rep. 255), where the accident arose from the breaking down of one of the bridges of the railway, the case turned on what would or would not be negligence for which the company were answerable. Parke, B., says, "It seems to me the company would still be liable for the accident unless he (the engineer) also used due and reasonable care and employed proper materials in the work." There is no trace in the report that it ever occurred to the Court to suppose there was any warranty of the safety of the bridge.

In a case tried before Erle, C.J., Ford v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (2 Fost. & F. 730), the plaintiff was injured by the tender of the train being thrown off the line, and one of the causes was alleged to be the defective tire of one of the wheels of the tender; Erle, C.J., in his direction told the jury, "The action is grounded on negligence. Negligence is not to be defined, because it involves some inquiry as to the degree of care required, and that is the degree which the jury think is reasonably to be required from the parties, considering all the circumstances. The railway company is bound to take reasonable care to use the best precautions in known practical use, for securing the safety of their passengers." There the defect was in the tire of a wheel of the tender of the train by which the plaintiff travelled. And no suggestion that a warranty of its soundness existed was made throughout the case. But a case still more directly bearing upon the present point was tried before Cockburn, C.J. There the accident happened in consequence of the breaking of the tire of the near wheel of the engine. The tire broke from a latent flaw in the welding. The trial lasted six days, and the questions mainly were, whether the flaw was not visible, and whether by the exercise of care it might not have been detected. The Lord Chief Justice commences a full direction to the jury by saying, "The question is, whether the breaking of the tire resulted from any negligence in the defendants or their servants, for which they are responsible." The latent defect in the tire was admitted to be the cause of the accident; but the jury having found, in answer to specific questions, that there was no evidence that the tire was negligently welded, and that the defect had not become visible, and having in other respects negatived negligence, the verdict was entered for the defendants. The facts of that case appear to be exactly like the present, except that in this case the defective tire was in the wheel of the carriage, and there in the wheel of the engine. But for the reasons already given, it can never be that a warranty can exist as to the carriage but not as to the engine drawing it. Thus, then, it is plain that a trial of six days took place on issues which were utterly immaterial if a warranty ought to have been implied; and there the learned Chief Justice and the parties themselves seem to have been utterly unconscious of the contract which was really existing, if the plaintiff in this case is right, for the warranty, as an obligation implied by law, must have existed at the time of these trials if it exists now; and surely it is strong to shew that no such rule does form part of the common law that it was not then recognized and declared. The learned counsel for the plaintiff insisted that a carrier by sea is bound to have his ship seaworthy. Undoubtedly the carrier of goods by sea, like the carrier of goods by land, is bound to carry safely, and is responsible for all losses, however caused, whether by the unseaworthiness of the ship or otherwise, and it does not appear to be material to inquire, when he is subject to this large obligation, whether he is also subject to a less one. In the case of Lyon v. Mills (5 East, 428) it was, no doubt, stated by the Court, that the carrier of goods is bound to have a seaworthy ship, but this only as part of his general liability. It is well to observe that Holroyd, who argued for the plaintiff, and Gaselee, for the defendant, both state the liability of the carrier in all its breadth, viz., a liability for all losses however happening, except by the act of God or the King's enemies. This case therefore falls within the class of decisions relating to the liability of the carriers of goods. No case has been found where an absolute warranty of the seaworthiness of the ship in the case of passengers has arisen, and it affords a strong ground for presuming that no such liability exists, that in this maritime nation no passenger has ever founded an action upon it. The case of Burns v. the Cork and Bandon Railway Company (13 Irish Com. Law. Rep. 546), in the Irish Court of Common Pleas, certainly does not support the plaintiff's view of the law. The Court there says the averments in the defendants' plea are all consistent with gross and culpable negligence, and on that ground gives judgment for the plaintiff. The judgment plainly shews that the Court does not mean to declare that there is an absolute undertaking that the vehicle shall be free from defects. The language is, "free from defects as far as human care and foresight can provide, and perfectly roadworthy." The Court refers with approbation to the language of Sir James Mansfield and Alderson, J., which helps to explain that it was disposed to adopt the views of those learned Judges, and to place the liability, not on a warranty, but on the obligation to exercise care and foresight.

It now remains to consider the American decisions on the subject. They have not been uniform. The judgment of Mr. Justice Hubbard in Ingalls v. Bills (9 Metc. Rep. 15), cited at length by my Brother Mellor in his judgment below, is opposed to the notion of a warranty. Decisions, however, were cited before us by Mr. Manisty from the Courts of the State of New York, having a contrary tendency, to shew us that, in that State, the law had been declared in favour of annexing a warranty to the contract. The most important of these decisions is Alden v. the New York Central Railway Company (12 Smith, 102) in the Court of Appeals of the State of New York. That was the case of an accident caused by a defect in an axle-tree; the reasons given by Gould, J., for the decision are not satisfactory to our minds. The learned Judge seems to assume that there was no negligence shewn on the part of the company. He cites the case of Sharp v. Grey (9 Bing. 457; 2 Mo. & S. 620; 2 L. J. C.P. 45) in the Court of Common Pleas here, and he interprets that case to determine that the carrier warrants the roadworthiness of his coach. But if the view of the case of Sharp v. Grey (9 Bing. 457; 2 Mo. & S. 620; 2 L. J. C.P. 45) taken in the early part of this judgment is correct, the learned Judge gave too great weight to it. He then, after having given the rule as he supposed it to be laid down in Sharp v. Grey (9 Bing. 457; 2 Mo. & S. 620; 2 L. J. C.P. 45), observes, "And though this may seem a hard rule it is probably the best that can be laid down, since it is plain and easy of application, and, when once established, is distinct notice to all parties of their duties and liabilities." With deference to the learned Judge, these reasons founded on the convenience of the arrangement are scarcely sufficient to warrant the introduction of onerous obligations into the contracts of parties; and the terms in which the judgment is given rather lead to the conclusion that the learned Judge was conscious that he was annexing to the contract of the carrier of passengers what had not hitherto been understood to form part of it. The English Courts are desirous to treat the American decisions with great respect, but as their authority here must mainly depend on the reasons on which they are founded, we have felt bound to examine the reasons on which this decision was based, with the result which has been already stated. Warranties implied by law are for the most part founded on the presumed intention of the parties, and ought certainly to be founded on reason, and with a just regard to the interests of the party who is supposed to give the warranty, as well as of the party to whom it is supposed to be given. We have already gone fully into the reasons for holding that in our opinion the warranty contended for, in this case, is not so founded.

On the other hand, it seems to be perfectly reasonable and just to hold that the obligation well known to the law, and which, because of its reasonableness and accordance with what men perceive to be fair and right, has been found applicable to an infinite variety of cases in the business of life, viz., the obligation to take due care, should be attached to this contract. We do not attempt to define, nor is it necessary to do so, all the liabilities which the obligation to take due care imposes on the carriers of passengers. Nor is it necessary, inasmuch as the case negatives any fault on the part of the manufacturers, to determine to what extent and under what circumstances they may be liable for the want of care on the part of those they employ to construct works, or to make or furnish the carriages and other things they use—see on this point Grote v. the Chester and Holyhead Railway Company (2 Ex. Rep. 255). "Due care," however, undoubtedly means, having reference to the nature of the contract to carry, a high degree of care, and casts on carriers the duty of exercising all vigilance to see that whatever is required for the safe conveyance of their passengers is in fit and proper order. But the duty to take due care, however widely construed or however rigorously enforced, will not, as the present action seeks to do, subject the defendants to the plain injustice of being compelled by the law to make reparation for a disaster arising from a latent defect in the machinery they are obliged to use, which no human skill or care could either have prevented or detected. In the result we come to the conclusion that the case of the plaintiff, so far as it relies on authority, fails in precedent; and, so far as it rests on principle, fails in reason. Consequently, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the defendants will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Consignor and Consignee—Acceptance of Bill of Exchange sent with Bill of Lading—Condition Precedent—Vesting of Property.

SALE OF GOODS. D.—The plaintiff, a merchant, at Manchester, sent an order to P, N. & Co., at Pernambuco, to purchase on his account cotton, upon certain terms. P, N. & Co. accordingly purchased and shipped cotton in the defendant's vessel, and wrote to the plaintiff, saying, "Inclosed please find invoice and bill of lading of 200 bales of cotton. We have drawn upon you in favour of our agents, to which we beg your protection." The invoice, which was headed "on account and risk of S. & Co." (the plaintiff), was sent to the plaintiff, as stated in the letter; the bill of lading, however, which made the cotton deliverable to order or assigns, was not inclosed therewith, but was sent to the agents of P, N. & Co., together with a bill of exchange drawn for the price of the cotton. The agents thereupon wrote to the plaintiff inclosing the bill of lading and the bill of exchange, for which they requested protection. The plaintiff retained the bill of lading, but returned the bill of exchange unaccepted, on the grounds of non-compliance with the terms of the order. On presentment of the bill of lading to the defendants they refused to deliver the cotton, having been advised of the circumstances under which the plaintiff became possessed thereof, and the plaintiff thereupon sued them in trover:—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench upon a case embodying the above particulars and empowering the Court to draw inferences of fact), that the acceptance of the bill of exchange was a condition precedent to the passing of the property, and that this having been refused the defendants were justified in withholding the cotton.

The SPECIAL CASE is set out in the report of the case in the Court below (38 L. J. Q.B. 105), and the following short statement will be sufficient to make the arguments and judgment intelligible:

Paton, Nash & Co. are merchants, at Pernambuco, and George Paton & Co. are their Liverpool correspondents and agents.

The plaintiff is a cotton and general merchant, at Manchester, and the defendants are the owners of the screw steamer "Olinda."

Before April, 1866, several transactions in cotton had taken place between the plaintiff and Paton, Nash & Co. In all these, except on one occasion, in 1865, when Paton, Nash & Co. purchased cotton for the plaintiff, Paton, Nash & Co. acted as agents for the sale of goods consigned to them by the plaintiff. On that occasion Paton, Nash & Co., by letter of March 31, announced to the plaintiff the purchase, on his account, intimating "by the English steamer of 13th prox. we shall send bill of lading, and value on you for cost." And on May 3, 1865, George Paton & Co. wrote to the plaintiff, inclosing the bill of lading, and adding, " We presume our Pernambuco friends have made a mistake in sending it under cover to us. We inclose draft on your good selves for 2,072*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, which we will thank you to return with the needful."

On April 23, 1866, the plaintiff ordered of Paton, Nash & Co., by letter, 1,000 bales of cotton, or any less quantity, at a certain price, but this order was not executed. On September 7, 1867, the plaintiff gave another order for the same quantity of cotton, but at a reduced price. In acknowledging this order Paton, Nash & Co., in their letter of September 28, 1867, added, " You do not mention whether part of the order is to go against your funds lying here, but we suppose you intend it as a remittance." In the course of a letter of October 23, 1867, in answer, the plaintiff replied, " Pray don't make the mistake you did about our funds in your hands; they were never intended to be applied to pay for cotton purchases, but to wait instructions."

On October 25, 1867, 747 bales had been purchased by Paton, Nash & Co. on account of the plaintiff, and on that day they wrote to the plaintiff inclosing invoices of 339 bales, and 208 ditto, per " Capella " and " La Plata," and adding, " We have drawn upon you as per note at foot for the sum to which we beg your protection. We are afraid the " Capella " will not be able to take the other 200 bales, therefore it will be well to insure per steamer or sailing vessel. Note of drafts, No. 926, in favour of Messrs. G. Paton & Co., 1,616*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* No. 927, ditto, 883*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* The bills of lading will be handed to you by Messrs. G. Paton & Co."

The invoices of both the above quantities of goods described them as shipped " on account and risk " of the plaintiff. The bills of lading together with the bills of exchange were forwarded by G. Paton & Co. to the plaintiff, by whom the bills were accepted, but with a reservation in a letter of November 18, 1867, as to some portion of the cotton which was alleged by the plaintiff to be not according to order, concerning which he wrote, " In case of any loss arising from the sale of these we must claim against you." Thereupon followed a correspondence between the plaintiff and G. Paton & Co. upon the question whether the plaintiff's orders had been duly executed; but the bills were paid by the plaintiff at maturity.

The remaining 200 bales purchased by Paton, Nash & Co. were shipped by them on the defendant's screw steamer " Olinda," and on November 12, 1867, Paton, Nash & Co. wrote to the plaintiff, " Inclosed please find invoice and bill of lading of 200 bales of cotton, shipped per " Olinda," &c. We have therefore drawn on you for 916*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*, draft No. 935, in favour of Messrs. G. Paton & Co., to which beg your protection." The invoice was headed, " Invoice of 200 bales of cotton, shipped per " Olinda," for Liverpool, on account and risk of Messrs. John Shepherd & Co."

This letter, with the invoice inclosed, were forwarded by Paton, Nash & Co. to the plaintiff direct from Pernambuco; but the bill of lading and the bill of exchange therein mentioned were forwarded, not to the plaintiff, but to G. Paton & Co., who sent them to the plaintiff on December 5 (on which day the " Olinda " arrived at Liverpool) in a letter stating, " We beg to inclose bill of lading for 200 bales cotton, shipped by Messrs. Paton, Nash & Co., per " Olinda," on your account. We hand also their draft on your good selves for the cost of the cotton, to which we beg your protection (916*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*)."

The case then set out a copy of the bill of lading which made the cotton deliverable " unto order or to his or their assigns, he paying freight," &c., and was indorsed, " Per pro. Paton, Nash & Co., A. M. C. Soares—Geo. Paton & Co."

The plaintiff replied to the letter of G. Paton & Co. of December 5, 1867, on the next day, as follows: " On reference to invoices and bills of exchange which we have accepted, we find that they have been drawn in excess of price mentioned in order; there is also a quality styled ' mediums,' which we did not order at all. These, with the hostile position you have taken with regard to the 208 bales ex " La Plata," stand in the way of our accepting the bill of exchange now inclosed. We shall place the 200 bales ex "Olinda" in another broker's hands, and as soon as we learn we shall inform you their opinion of them."

The plaintiff accordingly retained the bill of lading and returned the bill of exchange unaccepted to G. Paton & Co., by whom it was protested. The plaintiff also forwarded the bill of lading for the 200 bales to his brokers, at Liverpool, with instructions to pay freight and obtain the cotton. A demand of the cotton having been in the meantime made by G. Paton & Co. upon the defendants, under a duplicate bill of lading, and an explanation given of the circumstances under which the bill of lading had come to the hands of the plaintiff, the defendants upon being indemnified refused, on December 10, to deliver the goods to the plaintiff's brokers.

From the time when the order for the 1,000 bales was given up to the time of the commencement of the action, Paton, Nash & Co. had always in their hands, at Pernambuco, money or goods to the value of 3,000*l.* or thereabouts.

After a formal demand of the cotton, and refusal by the defendants to deliver it, an action of trover was commenced, in which a verdict was entered by consent for the plaintiff, subject to the above CASE for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, who gave judgment for the defendants.

Jordan (Quain with him), for the plaintiff.—The acceptance of the bill of exchange by the plaintiff for the price of the cotton was not a condition precedent to the vesting of the property in him. In Gurney v. Behrend (3 El. & B. 622; 23 L. J. Q.B. 265), the facts of which case were more complicated than those of the present, although in effect similar, Lord Campbell, C.J. said, "It is contended on the part of the defendants that Collman and Stolterfoht had no authority to part with the bill of lading till they had accepted the bill of exchange drawn for the price of the wheat. If this be so, they certainly exceeded their authority; for their promise to accept, which was not treated by the agents of the defendants as an acceptance, would not have been the performance of the condition on which the right to part with the bill of lading depended. The defendants might easily have imposed such a condition had they suspected the solvency of the parties with whom they were dealing. But, looking to the correspondence and the circumstances of the transaction, we are of opinion that no such condition was imposed. There is nothing in the bill of lading itself to indicate that it is not to be transferred till the bill of exchange has been accepted." And Crompton, J. (p. 630), alluding to the course of business usual a few years previously, and particularly between America and Liverpool, says, it was the practice to insist upon retaining the bill of lading until the draft was not only accepted but paid, or security given; but adds, that he always understood this to be an exceptional course, adopted only in times of peril or suspicion. In Key v. Cotesworth (7 Ex. Rep. 595; 22 L. J. Ex. 4) the facts were nearly on all-fours with the present case. There the bill of lading and invoice were inclosed in a letter to the defendants; in the present case it was the intention of Paton, Nash & Co., as appears by their letter of November 12, 1867, to have inclosed the bill of lading together with the invoice to the plaintiff, although, by some mistake or omission, this unquestionably was not done. The observations of Parke, B. in delivering judgment, "If it had been the intent of the vendors to preserve their right in that property until the bill drawn against it was accepted, he ought to have transmitted the bills of lading indorsed in blank to an agent, to be delivered over only in case the acceptance took place," are therefore strongly in favour of the present plaintiff, the question in this case being entirely one of intention. In Wilmshurst v. Bowker (7 Mac. & G. 882; 12 L. J. Ex. 475), as here, the invoice stated that the goods were shipped "on account and risk of the vendee," to be paid for by a banker's draft, and the Court held, that by the transmission of the bill of lading with the invoice, the consignor parted with the property in the goods, so as not to be entitled to stop them in transitu, although the consignee never remitted the draft in payment; Lord Abinger, C.B. saying, that "the default on the part of the plaintiffs amounted to nothing more than this, that they omitted to perform one part of the contract." In Cox v. Harden (4 East, 211) the consignor shipped goods "on account and risk" of the consignee, to whom he transmitted by letter the invoice and an unindorsed bill of lading, with an intimation that he had drawn upon the consignee for the value; he also sent an indorsed bill of lading to his own agent; and the Court held, that the property passed to the consignee, however wrongfully parted with by the captain of the ship.—He also cited Walley v. Montgomery (3 East, 585); Joyce v. Swan (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 84); and distinguished Brandt v. Bowlby (2 B. & Ad. 932; 1 L. J. K.B. 14); Van Casteel v. Booker (2 Ex. Rep. 691; 18 L. J. Ex. 9); Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. Rep. 543; 20 L. J. Ex. 393); and Ellershaw v. Magniac (6 Ex. Rep. 570, n.). Secondly, in the Court below, Cockburn, C.J. partly based his judgment upon the ground that Paton, Nash & Co. had the same lien as unpaid vendors, and had therefore a right to the goods until payment by acceptance of the bill or otherwise, supposing the property in the cotton to have passed to the plaintiff. This position is not tenable; the case being similar to that of the delivery of goods to a common carrier for conveyance to the buyer, and on his account and risk, in which case the vendor must be taken to have parted with his lien—Benjamin on the Law of Sale of Personal Property, p. 602, and cases there cited. And, thirdly, the plaintiff was not bound to accept bills drawn in excess of the sum due.

Holker (Gully with him), for the defendants, was not heard.

KELLY, C.B.—The case has been very ably argued by Mr. Jordan, who, at one time, succeeded in raising some doubt in my mind in favour of the plaintiff. Upon reference to the authorities which have been cited, it appears to me that the question is one of fact rather than of law; every case of this kind has its own peculiar and distinguishing circumstances, and here the facts are very simple. —[His Lordship stated them.]—The first question, therefore, with which we have to deal is this: was the plaintiff entitled to refuse acceptance of the bill of exchange, and, notwithstanding such refusal, to retain the bill of lading, and by virtue of that document to demand and obtain possession of the goods then in the hands of the shipowner? Now, the letter of the consignor of November 12, 1867, which relates to that portion of the cotton forming the subject of the present litigation, contains an intimation to the plaintiff that the invoice and bill of lading were both inclosed therein; but this was not, in fact, the case. The letter contained the invoice only, which stated that the goods had been shipped "on account and risk" of the plaintiff; but the bill of lading, together with a bill of exchange for the price of the cotton, were forwarded by the consignors to their own agents in Liverpool, with what particular instructions does not appear. We must, therefore, deal with the facts as found by the case, and we are invited, upon the authority of Cox v. Harden (4 East, 211), to hold that, by the mere fact of shipment of the cotton on account and risk of the plaintiff, the property in it vested in them; and this position might, perhaps, to a certain extent, be borne out by the opening observations of Grose, J. in his judgment. But those observations must be considered with reference to the other facts of that particular case, a material one being that, not only was the statement there on account and risk of the consignee, but a bill of lading, unindorsed it is true, was also transmitted by the consignor to the consignee, by virtue of which the latter obtained possession of the goods; and the Court held that, under the circumstances, the property vested in the consignee, although an indorsed bill of lading in respect of the goods had been forwarded by the consignors to a third person, by whom a counter claim was set up. Now, one of the peculiar circumstances of the case before us is, that a letter was sent by the consignors to the plaintiff, containing, amongst other things, an intimation that the bill of lading was inclosed with the invoice, whereas, in fact, the bill of lading was transmitted to the consignor's own agents in this country, together with a bill of exchange for the price of the goods. And the question is, what inference ought the Court to draw under the circumstances? It is urged upon us that the non-inclosure of the bill of lading with the invoice was the result of a simple act of omission on the part of the consignors; but it appears that the letter was written by their clerk, who might very possibly have misunderstood or exceeded his instructions, upon discovery of which the consignors would naturally rectify the mistake by taking out the bill of lading and forwarding it, as they originally proposed, to their agents instead of to the consignee; and the absence of any explanation upon the point may be due to the hurry of business and the consequent want of time and opportunity of making it. We are unable, therefore, to draw any inference in favour of the plaintiff from this circumstance; and still less can we do so when we come to consider the letter of the consignors' agents of December 5, 1867, to the plaintiff, which seems to me conclusive that the intention of the consignors (and the whole question is one of intention) was, that the acceptance of the bill of exchange by the plaintiff, and the delivery of the bill of lading to him were to be concurrent acts, and that his refusal to accept the one disentitled him to the possession of the other. And this view is further supported by the letter of the consignors of October 25, 1867, which, in reference to a former delivery of goods forming part of the same transaction as the 200 bales now in question, after calling attention to drafts to be accepted in payment, expressly notifies to the plaintiff that the bills of lading will be handed over to him by their agents.

It is clear, therefore, that throughout the transactions the course has been for the consignors to ship the goods at the risk and on account of the plaintiff, but to transmit the bills of lading and the bills of exchange to their (the consignors') agents, and that their object and intention in doing so was to prevent the passing of the property until the acceptance of the bills of exchange.

It was also insisted on behalf of the plaintiff that, whatever may have been the course of dealing between the parties, or the intention of the consignors, the plaintiff was entitled, on the delivery of the bill of lading together with a bill of exchange drawn for a larger amount than the just price of the goods, to retain the bill of lading without honouring the draft. But we gather nothing from the correspondence expressly limiting the consignors to the lower price, nor do we find that they have exceeded their authority. We are therefore of opinion, upon both points, that the retaining of the bill of lading by the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, a violation of the contract between the plaintiff and the consignors, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench must be affirmed.

The other learned Judges concurred[1].

Judgment affirmed.

The action, which was for goods sold, was commenced on July 15, 1867, before the passing of the County Court Act, 1867. By order of a Judge, it was tried in the County Court of Marylebone, in April, 1868, after the Act had come into operation, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 13*l*. The master declined to tax the costs upon the authority of Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335); and this rule was then obtained.

Holl, in shewing cause against the rule (on November 16, 1868), referred to Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335); Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645); Morgan v. Thorn (7 Mee. & W. 400; 10 L. J. Ex. 125); Kay v. Goodwin (6 Bing. 576; 8 L. J. C.P. 212); and Kimbray v. Draper (37 L. J. Q.B. 80), and contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to his costs. Under the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1.) he would have been entitled to them; but that right is taken away by the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11. and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, and he could not get them at all unless a certificate or order for costs had been granted. Those statutes are repealed by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 33, and it will be contended that therefore the Statute of Gloucester is revived as to such actions. But it is submitted that that cannot be so, and that Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335) and Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645) are authorities to shew that the rule ought to be discharged. Further, under Lord Brougham's Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. s. 5, it is clear that the Statute of Gloucester is not revived. It provides "that where any Act repealing in whole or in part any former Act is itself repealed, such last repeal shall not revive the Act or provisions before repealed, unless words be added reviving such Act or provisions." The Statute of Gloucester has certainly been repealed in whole or in part, and there are no words by which it is revived.

Kemplay, in support of the rule, referred to the above cases and statutes, and to Restall v. the South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89); Wright v. Hale (6 Hurls. & N. 227; 30 L. J. Ex. 40); Charrington v. Meatheringham (2 Mee. & W. 228; 6 L. J. Ex. 86); The Queen v. Mawgan (8 Ad. & E. 496; 7 L. J. M.C. 98); Roadknight v. Green (9 Mee. & W. 652; 11 L. J. Ex. 295); and Oldrieve v. Puckeridge (37 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 3 Ex. 143, n.), and contended that the Statute of Gloucester had not been repealed either in whole or in part; there was no more than a modification of it, and it was still in existence. As for Lord Brougham's Act, he contended that it did not apply to such a case as the present, but only to such cases as in words repealed a former statute. The rule ought, therefore, to be made absolute.

Cur. adv. vult.

The learned Judges differing in opinion, the following judgments were delivered (on May 12)—

HAYES, J.[1]—In this case, which was argued in last Michaelmas Term, a rule had been obtained calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff's costs should not be taxed by the master; and the question related to the operation of the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), on the costs of actions in the superior Courts. The action, which was for goods sold, had been commenced before the passing of that Act. It was, by order of a Judge, tried before the County Court of Marylebone, and came on for trial after the Act had come into full operation, when the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 13*l*. It was not a case of either exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction in the superior Courts, nor was it suggested that any ground had existed for obtaining the certificate of a Judge, under the repealed County Courts Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 14, that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in the superior Court. It was, therefore, a case in which the plaintiff would have been wholly deprived of his costs if the restricted enactments on this subject in the previous County Courts Acts, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 129, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. ss. 11. and 12,

(1) Cockburn, C.J., was present when this case was argued, but, by an oversight, these judgments were delivered in his absence. The reporter is informed that his Lordship has intimated he should probably have agreed with the judgment delivered by Hannen, J.

15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, had remained in force. But it was contended for the plaintiff, that, as these enactments had all been repealed while the action was still pending, upon the County Courts Act, 1867, coming into operation, and as the new provision contained in section 5. of the last Act did not apply to actions commenced before the passing of that Act, the effect was to revive the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. 1. c. 1.) as to actions like the present, and to entitle the plaintiff to his costs under that statute.

This point was raised, but not decided, in the Court of Exchequer, in Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89; L. R. 3 Ex. 141) and Oldreive v. Puckeridge (37 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 3 Ex. 143, n). The first of these cases was one of concurrent jurisdiction in the superior Court; and the second resembled the present case; but, in both of them, the event on which the costs depended had occurred before the late Act came into operation, and upon this ground the Court held, that the right was concluded by the former Acts, which were then unrepealed, and which entitled the plaintiff to his costs in the first case, and deprived him of them in the second. The point was again raised in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335), which was a case of exclusive jurisdiction in the superior Court; but here also the case was determined, on the ground that the transaction having been complete before the new Act came into operation, it was governed by the enactments of the former County Courts Acts. The Court, however, in delivering judgment on the above ground, referred to actions like the present, where the transaction remained incomplete when the repeal came into operation, and expressed an opinion against the right of the plaintiff to costs under a supposed revival of the Statute of Gloucester in trivial cases where no order ever would have been made to give him costs before.

In Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645) this question was again raised, and very fully discussed in a case where the event determining the costs did not occur until after the late County Courts Act had come into full operation, and therefore the transaction remained incomplete when the repeal of the provisions of the former Acts took effect. That case, therefore, resembled the present, except that there the cause of action involved questions of title which gave the plaintiff a right to costs under the former Acts. And the Court there decided that the Statute of Gloucester had not been repealed as to the classes of cases in which, under the former County Courts Acts, the plaintiff would be entitled to costs on obtaining a Judge's order or certificate, either on the ground of exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, or where the circumstances of the case shewed a sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court. But with regard to cases like the present, where there was neither exclusive nor concurrent jurisdiction, nor any ground for obtaining a Judge's order or certificate, a clear opinion was expressed by Willes, J., and not dissented from by the rest of the Court, that, as to such cases, the Statute of Gloucester had been repealed by the former County Court Acts, which prevented the plaintiff from obtaining his costs in any way; and that, under the provisions of the Act commonly called Lord Brougham's Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. s. 5, the Statute of Gloucester was not revived by the Act of 1867, but continued repealed as to such cases.

In this opinion, which is substantially the same as that which was expressed by Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of this Court in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335), my Brother Lush and I concur, and we think that the present rule should be discharged.

HANNEN, J.—I regret that I cannot concur in the judgment of my learned Brothers. The cases are so few in which the point here to be determined can arise, that I should not have thought it necessary to make any observation, but for the bearing which the decision of my Brothers may have on the question, when a statute can be considered to be repealed by implication, and the effect in such a case of a repeal of the repealing statute. In this case the action was commenced in July, 1867, before the passing of the recent County Courts Act. It was tried in April, 1868, after that Act came into operation. If no change had been made in the law relating to costs between the commencement of the action and the trial, the plaintiff would have been entitled to apply to a Judge at chambers, under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, to direct that the plaintiff should recover his costs if he could make it appear to such Judge, that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Court in which it was brought. But by the late County Courts Act the section above referred to (15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4.) was repealed, and it therefore became impossible for the plaintiff to obtain the order of a Judge under it. It was, indeed, decided by the Court of Exchequer, in Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89; L. R. 3 Ex. 141), where the verdict was obtained before the recent County Courts Act came into operation, that the power of a Judge to make an order under that section still continued, notwithstanding its repeal, but it was held by this Court, in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335), that after the repeal of the enactment, the power to make an order under it was absolutely put an end to, even though it would have been made ex debito justitiæ, if the law had remained unaltered. But the legislature, at the same time that it repealed the power of a Judge to order that the plaintiff should recover his costs, also repealed the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11, by which the necessity for such an order was created. The language of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11. is as follows: "If in any action commenced after the passing of this Act in any of Her Majesty's superior Courts of record in covenant, debt, detinue or assumpsit, not being an action for breach of promise of marriage, the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding 20*l*. . . . the plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs, except in the cases hereinafter provided" —one of those excepted cases being where, as it happened here, no part of the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the Court where the defendant dwelt or carried on his business at the time of the commencement of the action. And in those excepted cases he was, by the 4th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, upon obtaining a Judge's order, to have the same judgment to recover his costs that he would have had, if the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 54. had not passed. I think that the effect of this repealing with one breath, the enactment which empowered a Judge or the Court to order that the plaintiff should recover his costs, and that which imposed this as a condition on the obtaining his costs, is to leave the plaintiff in the position in which he would have been before the existence of the repealed statutes, that is, entitled to recover his costs under the Statute of Gloucester.

It was contended for the defendant that the decision in Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; L. R. 3 Q.B. 335) was opposed to this view, but I think that it is not so. In that case the plaintiff in an action of trespass recovered a verdict for less than 5*l*., before the late County Courts Act was in force; he was therefore entitled to a judgment for the amount of the verdict and no costs, unless he obtained an order of a Judge under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, which he had an opportunity of doing, but did not do, before that enactment was repealed. This Court, applying the maxim "Nova constitutio futuris formam imponere debet, non præteritis," held that the transaction was complete when the plaintiff recovered his verdict, and that as at that time he was entitled to recover judgment for less than 5*l*. and no costs, unless he got an order, which he failed to do, the repeal of the statute could not operate to give him a right to a different judgment. This Court expressly rested its judgment on the fact that the event on which the plaintiff's right to costs depended, namely, recovery by verdict, occurred before 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. came into operation; and this has been pointed out to be the ratio decidendi of the case by Montague Smith, J. in Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645). But in the present case, when the plaintiff recovered his verdict, there was no statute in existence which deprived him of costs, unless he obtained the order of a Judge. He is therefore entitled to have his costs under the general enactment of the Statute of Gloucester, that the plaintiff, in all actions in which he recovers damages, shall also recover against the defendant his costs of suit. It was, however, contended for the defendant that the Statute of Gloucester was repealed by the County Courts Acts as to all actions of debt in which the plaintiff recovers less than 20*l*., and that the subsequent repeal of those statutes did not revive the Statute of Gloucester by reason of the 5th section of Lord Brougham's Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. This point was under the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas in Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645), and, for the reasons which are so fully given in the judgments in that case, I think that the Statute of Gloucester was not repealed by the County Courts Acts, but that conditions only were imposed on its operation, such as the obtaining the Judge's order, and that when the conditions were fulfilled the right to costs was derived from the Statute of Gloucester. Willes, J., says, "If the records of the Court be searched from the passing of the County Courts Acts to the present day, it will be found that the costs have always been taxed upon the Statute of Gloucester, and not upon the order of the Judge, that order being created only as evidence of the right. The records, therefore, lead to the inevitable conclusion that the Statute of Gloucester was in force as to all cases in which a Judge's order could be obtained under the County Courts Acts, and that it was the Statute of Gloucester in such cases which gave the plaintiff his costs, while the County Courts Acts rendered the obtaining a Judge's order a necessary condition, and it is the statute imposing this condition only which has been repealed by the Act of last year." It is true that in Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325; L. R. 2 C.P. 645) the action could not have been brought in the County Court; but the reasoning of the learned Judges is equally applicable to a case like the present, where the County Court had jurisdiction. I would refer particularly to the judgment of Montague Smith, J., which appears to me conclusively to establish that the Statute of Gloucester cannot properly be said to be repealed as to those cases in which a Judge had power to certify that the plaintiff recovered his costs. To impose a condition on a class of plaintiffs before they shall be entitled to the benefit of a statute, is not a repeal of it as to them, and it is only by a figure of speech that it has been so described. It merely intercepts in the specified cases the operation of the statute, which remains in existence and unrepealed notwithstanding. The 5th section of Lord Brougham's Act has for its object to prevent a revival of a statute contrary to the intention of the legislature, but it cannot be supposed that it is contrary to the intention of the legislature to restore to a statute its original force without condition, when all that it has done has been to repeal the condition; and it can make no difference that other qualifications are introduced which are not applicable to all the cases to which the repealed condition attached. It appears to me that the few cases in which the circumstances can be similar to the present were not in the contemplation of the legislature, when it enacted the recent County Courts Act; and I think it better to say so than to put a construction on the statute which may create an embarrassing precedent on other occasions. I think, therefore, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

Rule discharged.

Marine Insurance—Policy—Concealment—Deviation—"Port of Loading."

MARINE INSURANCE. G.—The plaintiffs, the owners of the ship M, on January 11, 1862, effected an insurance, by which they insured, lost or not lost, the cargo on board the ship "at and from Buenos Ayres, and port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres, to port or ports of call and/or discharge in the United Kingdom," &c. The policy was underwritten by the defendant. On November 7, 1861, the ship was at Buenos Ayres, and the agents of the owners entered into a contract for a cargo of bones and bone-ash to be shipped at

Digitized by Google

L. On November 13, the captain, who was one of the plaintiffs, wrote to the other plaintiffs at Glasgow giving an account of L. A letter of the same date was also written by the agents to the plaintiffs at Glasgow, containing statements about L. and as to the cargo to be loaded there. L. is a place situate on the coast and in the province of Buenos Ayres. It has no artificial port or mole, but merely a "salader" or slaughter-house and a wooden jetty or pier. Vessels calling there anchor about a quarter of a mile from the shore in the roadstead, which is protected by natural headlands on either side, which form a kind of bay. In 1861, L. was a place unknown to underwriters. The plaintiffs in Glasgow endeavoured to effect a policy with E. & Co., from Buenos Ayres to L, but, owing to the high premiums demanded by E. & Co., the negotiation fell through. The premium charged by the underwriters was at the rate usually charged at that time for the same kind of cargo from Buenos Ayres direct to the United Kingdom; and if information had been given that the ship had been going to load at L, underwriters would have required a higher premium than that charged for this insurance. By the local laws, ships loading at L. are obliged to return to Buenos Ayres to clear for the United Kingdom. The underwriters were not aware of this regulation. The ship loaded part of her cargo at Buenos Ayres and then sailed for L, where she remained for twenty-six days, during which time she only loaded sixteen tons of cargo. The contract for the whole cargo was not completed, and she was obliged to start for Buenos Ayres to complete her cargo there for England. On her way to Buenos Ayres she was wrecked:—Held, in an action upon the policy, first, that L. was a "port" within the meaning of the policy. Secondly, that the policy was not avoided by reason of the concealment from the underwriters of the facts contained in the letters of November 13 as to the ship being to load at L, and as to the nature of the place. Thirdly, that there was no such deviation as would avoid the policy by reason of the ship going from Buenos Ayres to L, staying there and then sailing for Buenos Ayres.

This was an action to recover the sum of 18*l.*, part of a sum of 40*l.*, on a policy of insurance, subscribed by the defendant, on bones and bone-ash, per "Matanzas," lost by perils of the sea.

The declaration stated, amongst other things, that the plaintiffs, by Alexander Kay & Co., their agents, caused to be made a policy of insurance, by which they insured, lost or not lost, at and from Buenos Ayres and port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres, to port or ports of call and/or of discharge in the United Kingdom, bones and bone-ash, valued at 2,000*l.*, in the ship "Matanzas," beginning the adventure on the said goods from the loading thereof on board the said ship as above, including all risks of craft and lighters, and so to continue until arrived as above, and the said goods should be discharged and safely landed; and it was declared to be lawful for the said ship, on the said voyage, to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever without prejudice to the said insurance; and touching the adventures and perils which the assurers took upon themselves in that voyage, there were, amongst others, barratry by master and mariners, and all other perils, losses and misfortunes which had or should come to the detriment or damage of the said goods; and that the defendant subscribed a policy for the insurance of 40*l.* on the said goods in the said ship on the said voyage. That the goods were shipped and the plaintiffs interested therein, and the ship sailed on the said voyage with the goods on board, and whilst proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods were by the perils insured against wholly lost, and the defendant became liable to pay the 40*l.*, but had not paid it.

The declaration also contained a count for money received by the defendant for use of the plaintiffs, and for money found to be due on accounts stated.

Pleas—First, as to the first count, that the defendant did not subscribe the policy or become insurer; secondly, that the goods were not loaded at Buenos Ayres nor any port of ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres; thirdly, that the ship did not sail with the goods on board on the insured voyage from Buenos Ayres or any port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres; fourthly, that after commencement of the risk and before the loss, the ship, without sufficient cause, deviated from the voyage; fifthly, that the goods were not lost by the perils insured against; sixthly, that certain material facts, which the plaintiffs and their agents knew, but of which the defendant was ignorant, were wrongfully concealed; seventhly, to the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

Issues thereon.

Particulars of the fourth and sixth pleas.—The following particulars of the deviation and concealment relied upon by the defendant were delivered pursuant to the order of Lush, J.

The deviation, on which the defendant will rely in support of his plea of deviation herein, is the deviation arising from the vessel insured going from Buenos Ayres to Laguna de los Padres, staying at the latter place, and returning to Buenos Ayres, the original port of departure, and staying there. The concealment on which the defendant will rely in support of the plea of concealment herein is the concealment of the fact of two letters having been received by the plaintiffs, or some of them or their agents, from Captain Harrower, the master of the said vessel, and from Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co., the agents of the said ship, which said two letters are dated on or about November 13, 1861, and the concealment of the several facts and statements contained and communicated in the said two letters.

A SPECIAL CASE was stated, which was substantially as follows:

1. The plaintiffs were, in 1861, the owners of the British ship "Matanzas," of 325 tons registered measurement; the plaintiff Harrower was the master of the vessel.

2. The plaintiffs, other than Harrower, were in partnership in Glasgow, under the style or firm of Gray & Buchanan.

3. In November, 1861, the "Matanzas," under the command of the plaintiff Harrower, was at Buenos Ayres on the look out for a cargo for her homeward journey to England; Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co., of Buenos Ayres, were the agents for the ship and for the plaintiffs.

4. The "Matanzas" took in at Buenos Ayres 245 tons of bone and bone-ash; and on November 7, 1861, Messrs. Barbour & Co. entered into a contract for the sale to the plaintiffs, of a cargo of bones and bone-ash with Messrs. O'Shea & Co., the agents in Buenos Ayres of the salader (or slaughterhouse) of Laguna de los Padres.

5. On November 13, the plaintiff Harrower wrote to the other plaintiffs, Gray & Buchanan, the following letters:—

"Barque 'Matanzas,'

"Buenos Ayres, November 13, 1861.

"Messrs. Gray & Buchanan, 7 Princes Square, Glasgow.

"Dear Sirs,—Since I last wrote you, we have got clear of all our outward cargo, with the exception of just as much as will stiffen her, of coals and iron, until we receive on board bones enough, as we have now commenced to load on ship's account, and trust it may turn out well. I will receive as much as will ballast me here, and then proceed down to a place called Laguna de los Padres, which lays about latitude 38° south, near Cape Corrientes. It is rather open to the east and north-east; but these winds are not dreaded at this season, and having ground tackle for a ship of 600 tons, I apprehend no danger from all inquiries I have made. I merely mention this in case they should claim a heavy premium for insurance. If they should, I would not hesitate to take a small part of the risk myself; but this I will leave to your judgment. I mean the time we are anchored there, and Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co. could keep you informed of our sailing; the passage can be done at a cheap rate. You will please to have orders lodged for me at Cork, or rather Queenstown, and, I think, Scilly and Falmouth, in case the winds might not enable me to reach Cork. I am not aware if there is any telegraph communication between Scilly and the mainland or not. I expect our cargo will be about 500 tons or thereabouts, 300 to 350 tons ash, and the rest bones, which will be very suitable for the Clyde, as far as I can learn. I shall write you from that place, I hope, when I complete my loading. We have to give them thirty running days to load, and the bone-ash will cost alongside about 2*l.* 5*s.* per ton. I hope by the next mail to be in a more forward state. I am, dear Sirs, your most obedient servant, David Harrower."

On the same day Messrs. Barbour & Co. wrote to the plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan the following letter:

"Buenos Ayres, November 13, 1861.
"Per 'Diligente.'

"Messrs. Gray & Buchanan, Glasgow.

"Dear Sirs,—We have this pleasure on 26th ult., since which we are without any of your valued favours. Captain Harrower will advise you by this steamer that he has decided to load bones and bone-ash on owners' account here and at the 'Laguna de los Padres.' Our last would inform you this was one of the courses open to him. He would have preferred to load for Liverpool or London, but the quantity of exportable produce at present on sale is so small, and the season so late, that he was afraid to risk the delay and detention that seemed unavoidable. He was also unwilling to venture on account of his being rather late for the Mantrues. A Liverpool vessel now in port went there last year about this time, losing about half the mules, and getting only about 10*l.* each for the remainder. This inclined him to prefer loading bones and ash here, and the cargo at the 'Laguna de los Padres' being the only one on sale, we secured it for him. The letters limit themselves to ship 350 to 380 tons bones and bone-ash, and we propose ballasting him by putting 200 to 250 tons bones and ash on board here. She has now commenced to load, and we hope to send her off in a few days. If the sellers of the ash can procure salt afloat, they propose giving from 100 to 150 tons to take down, for which they will pay him a small freight. For your guidance in arranging the insurance we may mention that the 'Laguna de los Padres' is in latitude 38 deg. south; the place is open to the north-east, but in summer the winds from that quarter are usually moderate. The anchorage is very good, and there are two vessels, from 250 to 300 tons, trading regularly between it and this place. We are informed that they anchor usually in 3½ fathoms, which seems to indicate that the swell is not so very heavy. The port may be new to your underwriters, and on this account they may be disposed to ask a rather high premium. If it should be so you might find it suitable only to cover part of the vessel and cargo during her stay there, effecting insurance on the remainder as soon as she sailed; it would be fully cheaper than from this. In case you should think of this we will be careful to advise when she sails. You will observe, from the copy of contract we inclose, that the ash is to be delivered alongside, so that the risk between the shore and the vessel belongs properly to the sellers. We will do all we can to ensure proper weight, &c., and if possible the writer will go down to see the loading properly commenced. Without further to add, we are, dear Sirs, yours faithfully, (Signed) "Barbour, Barclay & Co.

"Incloses—Duplicate of our last. Copy contract."

7. The aforesaid letters respectively arrived in Glasgow, and were received by the plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan on December 21, 1861.

8. The plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan applied to Messrs. North, Ewing & Co., brokers in Liverpool, to effect a policy on the cargo and freight of the "Matanzas," but owing to the premium required by them the negotiations fell through. The correspondence between the plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan and North, Ewing & Co. is marked "B. Nos. 1, 2, 3." in the appendix (see page 190).

9. The plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan having been informed by Messrs. James Finlay & Co., of Glasgow and Liverpool, merchants, that they could get the insurance effected, requested them to do so, and Messrs. J. Finlay & Co. placed the matter in the hands of Messrs. Alexander Kay & Co., of Glasgow, their brokers, for that purpose.

Digitized by Google

Messrs. Alexander Kay & Co. entered into negotiations with Messrs. Campbell, Cross & Co., of Liverpool, brokers. The correspondence between Alexander Kay & Co. and Campbell & Co., which is contained in the appendix to this case (see page 190), and marked " B. Nos. 4 to 13 inclusive," and which is to form part of this case, shews what passed between the parties.

11. Eventually, Alexander Kay & Co., as agents of the plaintiffs, effected, on January 3, 1862, through Messrs. Campbell, Cross & Co., a policy on the cargo, which was the policy sued on in this action. They also effected a policy on the freight. This policy was subscribed by the defendant on the day of the date thereof, for the sum of 40*l.*, and the interest of the plaintiffs in the cargo shipped is admitted by the defendant.

12. The letters of November 13, 1861, respectively were not, nor was the fact that the vessel was to load at " Laguna de los Padres," or that it was known to the plaintiffs at what port the vessel was going to load, communicated to Messrs. Campbell & Co. nor to the defendant. And the said Messrs. Campbell & Co. and the defendant were, until some time after the effecting of the policy, ignorant of the aforesaid letters having been written and also of the other facts referred to in this paragraph of the case.

13. At the time the policy was effected, the premium charged by the underwriters on the policy in question was at the rate usually charged by them at that time for insurances on bones and bone-ash from Buenos Ayres direct to the United Kingdom.

14. Laguna de los Padres was, in 1861, unknown to underwriters as a place of loading, and if underwriters on a policy like the policy sued on had been informed that the vessel was going to load there, they would have required a higher premium than that charged for the insurance in question.

15. In the beginning of December, 1861, the " Matanzas " being ready to sail to Laguna de los Padres, the plaintiff Harrower applied to the Argentine Customs, the proper officials, for permission to clear and pay the dues at Buenos Ayres for his cargo on board and to be shipped at Laguna, that the vessel might sail straight to England from Laguna de los Padres. This was refused as being contrary to the Customs laws of the country, as vessels sailing outwards from Laguna de los Padres are by the local laws compelled to return to Buenos Ayres to clear.

16. Numerous and influential applications were made by Messrs. Barbour & Co., and at their request to the Argentine government officials for this permission, but the only concession that could be obtained was that the vessel might sail to Laguna de los Padres, without clearing, upon sureties giving bond to government for her return from that place to Buenos Ayres to clear and pay dues, and also that no other than the specified cargo should be taken on board. The underwriters were not acquainted with the laws and regulations of the Customs at Buenos Ayres, nor were they aware, when the policy was effected, of the difficulties in which the ship was placed in respect to her clearance.

17. On December 13, 1861, a bond was accordingly given in that behalf by Messrs. Lamez Brothers, on behalf of the said owners and the plaintiffs.

19. These formalities having been duly completed, the " Matanzas " sailed from Buenos Ayres to Laguna de los Padres, intending to return from thence to Buenos Ayres and to proceed to England, and she arrived at Laguna de los Padres on or about December 18.

20. Laguna de los Padres is situate on the coast and in the province of Buenos Ayres, in about latitude 38° south, near to Cape Corrientes. There is no artificial port or mole, but merely a " salader " (or slaughter-house) and a wooden jetty or pier. There is a small village occupied by the people at work at the salader " and others. The place is rather open to the east and north-east. The roadstead is protected by natural headlands on either side, which form a kind of bay. Vessels calling there have to anchor about a quarter of a mile from the shore in the roadstead, and load and unload by means of lighters and small craft belonging to the saladers and others in the place, which ply between the vessels and the jetty. There is a resident government magistrate at Laguna. The chief exports of the place are hides and bones and bone-ashes. There is a regular trade between Buenos Ayres and Laguna de los Padres, but not between the latter place and Europe.

21. The "Matanzas" lay in Laguna de los Padres for twenty-six days, during which time she took in eighty bags or sixteen tons of bone-ash only. A difference having arisen between the proprietors of the salader, and the plaintiff Harrower, as to the cargo and contract, a sum of 160*l.* was paid by the former to the latter in lieu of the contract being completed.

22. On January 15, 1862, the "Matanzas" sailed from Laguna de los Padres for Buenos Ayres in pursuance of the aforesaid bond and legal obligation imposed by the Argentine Customs laws, and to complete her cargo for England.

23. On January 16, 1862, the "Matanzas" was wrecked off Cape San Antonio in the open seas, on her way to Buenos Ayres as aforesaid, and the cargo on board, viz., 261 tons 15 cwt., was totally lost.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover against the defendant on the policy sued on.

If the Court was of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 18*l.* If the Court should be of the contrary opinion, then judgment was to be entered for the defendant.

"At what rates could you insure the hull, cargo and freight of our barque 'Matanzas,' at and from Buenos Ayres to Laguna de los Padres, near Cape Corrientes, and thence to a port of call, and for discharge in the United Kingdom. Captain Harrower, who is a thoroughly experienced man, has, with our consent, purchased a cargo of bones and bone-ash upon ship's account. She is to load sufficient to ballast at Buenos Ayres, and proceed to Laguna de los Padres to finish her loading. We are informed there are vessels of 250 to 300 tons trading regularly between that port and Buenos Ayres, so that there is little, if any, danger more than the direct passage. The captain, who is part-owner, writes us that having tackling for a ship of 600 tons, he is willing to run the risk of the port as there is no danger."

"Dear Sirs,—We are in receipt of your favour of the 1st inst. As the shipping documents, per 'Matanzas,' are not yet come to hand, the assured is unable to state the respective proportions of bone and bone-ash. But, generally speaking, vessels of similar class are loaded with half bones and the remaining one-half bone-ash. We regret our inability to give warranty or representation in the policy against the west coast. Without representing the probabilities of either east or west coast of United Kingdom we may state that the present impression on the mind of the assured is that either Clyde or Liverpool will be the discharging port. As the 'Matanzas' belongs to the former every effort will be made by owners to induce the consignees to send the vessel to Clyde. On analyzing the 3,000*l.* we find the assured have valued on wrong principles, having included in the bone and bone-ash the value of freight, which, per contract, is payable here on delivery of the cargo. The policy for 3,000*l.*, therefore, divide as follows:

Bone and bone-ash, valued at	£2,000

"Messrs. Gray & Buchanan, 7, Princes Square, Glasgow.

"Gentlemen,—You will, no doubt, be anxious to hear of our whereabouts, and what we are doing. Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co. would inform of our troubles and difficulties with the Custom House before we left Buenos Ayres, and where we were detained a fortnight; everything at first was held out to me in such favourable light that I had no doubt of its being a good thing. I left Buenos Ayres on December 14, and arrived here on the 19th, after a passage of four days, and had some bad weather coming down. We anchored here with about 50 fathoms, and on the third day after our arrival our chain parted and lost the anchor, with 45 fathoms of cable. I very fortunately happened to be on deck at the time, and let go the other anchor just in time to save her, and rode out some very heavy weather in shoal water, and we were about eight days trying and watching any opportunity to get further out, and also to grapple for our lost anchor, in which I am happy to say we at last succeeded, and are now moored in safety. It is a most abominable place, for we carried away the stock of our spare anchor, which we had to use also, after we lost the one upon a foul bottom. And I regret very much to say we have not taken in a pound of cargo since we have been here, yet, in fact, there has only been one working day with the shore since I arrived, and that was fully occupied by the other vessel that was here, and now she is finished loading, and unless the weather gets more favourable, it is hard to say when we will get away from this place. It has been a bad undertaking, to say the least of it, and very ill-advised. I have only been on shore three times since I have been here, for she very often gets swamped in the surf. No doubt Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co. would inform you of the quantity of bones and ash we had on board when we left Buenos Ayres, which was 90 tons of ash and 155 tons of bones, making in all 245 tons. I must close in haste, as this goes by the vessel bound to Buenos Ayres.—I am, gentlemen, yours truly,

"DAVID HARROWER."

"Ingleses, January 19, /62.

"Messrs. Gray & Buchanan.

"Gentlemen,—I am sorry to inform you of the loss of the 'Matanzas' on the night of the 16th inst., in lat. 36° 36' south; the current had been running at a fearful rate. I fully expected I was twenty miles a-head of where I unfortunately found myself. The lead was kept regularly going, and every attention paid to the course. I tried to get her on the tack, but she refused stays, and the anchor was immediately ordered to be let go, but some precious time was lost by the fore tack getting foul of it, and after it was let go, she drove and struck most fearfully, and would very soon have gone to pieces had she not gone farther on shore. I was on my passage up to Buenos Ayres to fill up, as I had been there for twenty-six days, and had not the smallest chance of getting loaded. I came to an agreement with the gentlemen to pay me 160*l.* and close the bargain. I wrote you from Laguna de los Padres stating the quantity we had on board, and which I trust you had covered, and also the vessel; for in the desert spot, in which the vessel is wrecked, it will be a difficult matter to get anything at all for her; however, we are watching our chance to get everything saved we possibly can. This goes by the same messenger I am despatching to Buenos Ayres to report the loss to Messrs. Barbour, Barclay & Co. I have shelter at present at Mr. Gibson's Estancia los Ingleses, about three or four leagues back from the coast where the wreck is.—I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

"DAVID HARROWER."

In another letter written by the captain to Messrs. Gray & Buchanan, dated February 13, 1862, the following passage occurred:

"I had two charts of the coast on board, one of Capt. FitzRoy's, date 1840, and the other the River Plate Survey by order of the Spanish Government, with additions up to 1852, and found a difference of six miles of longitude. I could not determine which was correct, but adopted the middle, half way between the two, &c.—I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

"DAVID HARROWER."

Milward (Baylis with him), for the plaintiffs.—The short point to be determined in this case is, whether Laguna de los Padres is a "port" or not. It is submitted that it is. The 20th paragraph of the special case gives a description of it, and although there is no artificial port, there is a jetty or pier, a roadstead protected by natural headlands, a resident government magistrate, and it is stated that vessels load and unload there. It follows, then, that it is a "port" within the meaning of the policy. The letter of November 13, written by the captain, shews that he apprehended no danger from going there to load a cargo. The letter of the same date, written to the plaintiffs Gray & Buchanan, also gave information as to the whereabouts of Laguna de los Padres. The captain had a right to go there to load, but as it turned out he could only get 16 tons, and he then sailed for Buenos Ayres, and the vessel was wrecked on the passage, the cargo being totally lost. The attention of the underwriters was called to the necessity of wording the policy "at and from Buenos Ayres, and port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres, to port or ports of call and/or discharge in the United Kingdom." The captain had therefore a right to go from port to port. The place is called a "port" officially—see the document dated December 13, 1861. It is as much a port as Buenos Ayres is—see Cockey v. Atkinson (2 B. & Ald. 460); Brown v. Tierney (1 Taunt. 517); Jarman v. Coape (2 Campb. 615); The Sea Insurance Company of Scotland v. Gavin (2 Dow. & Cl. 129). Further, it is submitted that as the underwriter has taken the risk, he cannot now say that, although geographically it is a port, it is not so within the meaning of the policy. There was no intentional concealment, nor was there any fraud.

Cohen, for the defendant.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. First, there was a concealment, which invalidates the policy. The assured ought to have informed the underwriter of the place to which the ship was bound, and also to have told him what sort of a place it was. The letter of the captain, written on November 13, speaks of it as a "place" called Laguna de los Padres, and the letter of Barbour & Co. of the same date says, that "it may be new to your underwriters." It is clear that, if the information had been given, the insurance could not have been effected at so low a rate. Par. 8. shews that an insurance at such a rate could not be effected with North, Ewing & Co., to whom the information was given. They demanded double the premium which the plaintiffs were to pay to the defendant. The two letters of November 13 ought to have been communicated, as Laguna de los Padres was unknown to underwriters in 1861—see par. 14. How can it be contended that such a concealment is not material? In Arnould on Marine Insurance (edit. by Maclachlan), 520, it is said, "Concealment in the law of insurance is the suppression of a material fact within the knowledge of the assured, which the underwriter has not the means of knowing, or is not presumed to know. A material fact in this connection is one which, if communicated to the underwriter, would induce him either to refuse the risk altogether, or not to accept it but at a higher premium"—see also 2 Duer on Marine Insurance, 382. It is not necessary that there should have been any fraud—Proudfoot v. Montefiori (36 L. J. Q.B. 225; L. R. 2 Q.B. 511), in which case the authorities on this subject are referred to.

[LUSH, J.—Suppose the name of the place is communicated, but the assured does not disclose the fact, which he knows, though the underwriter does not, that it was a very dangerous place, would that avoid the policy?]

Perhaps not. The maxim Caveat emptor might be held to apply. But if a ship is allowed by the policy to go to a number of ports, and the assured knows that she is intended to go to one particular port, and that that port is particularly dangerous, he ought to communicate it, and, if he does not, the policy will be avoided, for the underwriter, in calculating the premium, which the assured must pay, takes the average risk of all the places mentioned, one safe, another dangerous, and so on, but the premium would be higher if the ship was intended to go to the one particular port which was dangerous. Indeed, all material facts known to the assured ought to be communicated—see Bates v. Hewitt (36 L. J. Q.B. 282; L. R. 2 Q.B. 595). It is impossible to measure the dangers of an unknown port. This place was new and without means of loading the ship.

[HANNEN, J., referred to Middlewood v. Blakes (7 Term Rep. 162).]

That case is in favour of the defendants, as shewing that the underwriter has a right to expect that the captain would be allowed to exercise his discretion as to which of the three courses he would pursue. Lynch v. Hamilton (3 Taunt. 37) shews that the assured is bound to disclose to the underwriter any information which he has, which might affect his choice whether he would insure at all, or as to what premium he would demand, and even if the information was not true. But, further, it may be well contended that the assured is guilty of a gross fraud, if there are a number of places to which the ship may go, and he does not inform the underwriter that the ship is intended to go to one particular place, and which place is a very dangerous one. To the mind of an underwriter any port which is new to him is a dangerous port.

[HANNEN, J.—But ought not the words used in the policy to have brought home to his mind that the ship might go to some port which was unknown to him? LUSH, J.—Do not the words "port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres" include any port within the province, although it may be unknown to the underwriter?]

No; he could not have intended to insure the ship for a voyage to a port which he did not know. This was a concealment within Bates v. Hewitt (36 L. J. Q.B. 282; L. R. 2 Q.B. 595).

[LUSH, J.—You must read the judgment in that case as being given under the very peculiar facts proved.]

He also referred on this point to Furtado v. Rogers (3 Bos. & P. 191) and to Russell v. Thornton (4 Hurls. & N. 788; 29 L. J. Ex. 9: in error, 6 Hurls. & N. 140; 30 L. J. Ex. 69). The letter of January 5, 1862, shews what a dangerous place Laguna de los Padres is. The ship could not load her cargo, and she was lost on her passage to Buenos Ayres to fill up there—see letter of January 19, 1862. The letter of February 13, 1862, shews that the voyage was of a most dangerous character; and it is submitted that the following passage in Duer on Marine Insurance, 403, clearly applies: "The information possessed by the assured may not be material in itself, separately considered, yet may be of such a character that it would probably lead to further inquiries on the part of the underwriter, and if the result of the inquiry would shew the information to be material, it must be communicated. Its concealment, whether fraudulent or innocent, will vitiate the insurance. So the communication of a fact, otherwise unimportant, may be rendered material and necessary, by its connexion with other facts or intelligence already known or presumed to be known to the underwriter. See also Bridges v. Hunter (1 Moore & Sc. 15) and Arnould on Marine Insurance, 523.

[HANNEN, J.—Suppose a cargo is intended to be insured, and it is of new character, unknown to underwriters, must the character be communicated?]

Yes, if it was of such a character as to produce greater danger than usual. Two questions arise in all such cases: first, does the policy cover the risk? secondly, has there been the concealment of a fact which is material?

Next, even if this place was geographically a "port" within the province of Buenos Ayres, it is submitted that it was not a port within the meaning of the policy. The ship has deviated from the terms of the policy; she was not entitled to go to Laguna de los Padres, a place from which she was not able to take her departure for home. The port intended was a port from which she could clear. But she could not clear from Laguna de los Padres. Next, the policy does not cover a voyage to an unknown port.

[HANNEN, J.—Surely the underwriter must be supposed to know that there might be some ports there which he did not know of.]

Baylis, in reply, referred to Foley v. Tabor (2 Fost. & F. 663) and Ashby v. Pratt (16 Mee. & W. 471; 17 L. J. Ex. 135: in error, 1 Ex. Rep. 257).

LUSH, J.—In this case I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The policy is effected on goods at and from Buenos Ayres and port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres to port or ports of call and/or of discharge in the United Kingdom. The first question is, whether the place, Laguna de los Padres, to which the vessel went for the purpose of taking in her cargo, and where she took in part of her cargo, was a "port of loading" within the meaning of the policy? If it was not, of course the going there was a deviation, and the underwriters are absolved from all liability. Now, on looking at the words, I think "ports" must be read in a liberal sense, not merely as meaning those places which are technically and properly called "ports," but all places to which ships are accustomed to resort for the purpose of taking in cargo. Mr. Cohen's contention is, that inasmuch as the policy contemplates that the vessel would be going direct from the port of loading to a port of discharge, and inasmuch as by the regulations of the province, a vessel taking in a full cargo at this place, would not have been permitted to go direct from there across the ocean, but must have gone to Buenos Ayres in order to get a clearance—that, on that account, this place cannot be a "port of loading" within the meaning of the policy. I do not think that argument is well founded. The question whether it is a port of loading is entirely irrespective of whether by the regulations of the country, a vessel can clear there for this country. That must depend, I think, on other considerations. The definition that has been given of a port is that it is a place at which ships arrive for the purpose of loading their cargoes. Is this a place of that description? It is described in the 20th paragraph as being a place "situate on the coast and in the province of Buenos Ayres, in about 38° south, near to Cape Corrientes. There is no artificial port or mole, but merely a 'salader' (or slaughter-house) and a wooden jetty or pier. There is a small village occupied by the people, at work at the salader, and others. The place is rather open to the east and north-east. The roadstead is protected by natural headlands on either side, which form a kind of bay. Vessels calling there have to anchor about a quarter of a mile from the shore, in the roadstead, and load and unload by means of lighters and small craft belonging to the saladers and others in the place, which ply between the vessels and the jetty. There is a resident government magistrate. The chief exports of the place are hides and bones and bone-ashes. There is a regular trade between Buenos Ayres and Laguna de los Padres, but not between the latter place and Europe." And, in the letter of November 13, which is set out in the case, we read that "the anchorage is very good, and there are two vessels, from 250 to 300 tons, trading regularly between it and this place." It thus appears to have been a place where merchandise of the description mentioned here was regularly exported, and to which vessels of the tonnage of this ship regularly go for trade; and therefore it must be taken to be a place within the contemplation of the parties—a port of loading to which the vessel was at liberty to go under this policy.

Then, the vessel having at Buenos Ayres taken in a sufficient portion of her cargo to act as ballast, she went to Laguna de los Padres with the intention, on the part of the owners, of there completing the loading of the entire cargo. They had entered into a contract by which the proprietor agreed to load the cargo. However, when they get there, they find they cannot get a complete cargo; they only get a portion of it. Having received compensation for the breach of contract, the vessel proceeds to return to Buenos Ayres for the purpose of completing her loading, and in the course of her return voyage she is lost. It is contended that that is a deviation—that the vessel deviated from her course when going back again to this same place, Buenos Ayres, to complete her loading. I cannot accede to that argument. I think the liberty to go to a port or ports of loading gave the captain permission to go to any port or ports—whether to the same place or not is immaterial—until he had completed his cargo. If he had once started on the homeward voyage, no doubt any returning back would have been a deviation. Not having done so, I think that the vessel was on the insured voyage at the time when the loss happened.

The next material contention is, that the plaintiffs have been guilty of the concealment of a material fact, in not having informed the underwriter that the vessel was destined to go to this place to take in her cargo. It is alleged and found as a fact that this particular place, Laguna de los Padres, was at the time, 1861, unknown to the underwriters as a place of loading; and that if the underwriters had been informed that the vessel was going to load there they would have required a higher premium. It is said that there was a material fact not communicated to the underwriter, and that the policy is void on account of that concealment. I would dismiss the argument as to the materiality of it, by at once saying that any matter is material which would induce the underwriter to charge a higher rate. But, is it a matter which the assured is bound to disclose, or is it one which the underwriter is bound to find out for himself? A concealment is the suppression of a material fact within the knowledge of the assured which the underwriter is not bound to know. Lord Mansfield, in Carter v. Boehm (3 Burr. 1905), says, that the assured need not mention what the underwriter ought to know,—what he takes upon himself the knowledge of. Now, taking on himself this risk, I think that he is bound to know the nature of the voyage which he has undertaken to insure, the geographical character and formation of the loading-places where he licenses the vessel to go, and all the perils arising from the ordinary state of things which appertain to that navigation. I, therefore, think that the underwriter cannot excuse himself on the ground that he was not aware that this was one of the loading-places within the province, or on the ground that he was not aware of the peculiar perils attending the navigation from Buenos Ayres to this place. That is a matter which the underwriter took on himself to know, and which the assured were not under any obligation to disclose to him. There being no such obligation, and no question asked by the underwriter of the assured, no information desired, no false answer given, I think that there was no concealment of any fact which it was the duty of the assured to disclose to the underwriter.

Mr. Cohen, in his very able argument, contended that, supposing the underwriter bound to know that this was one of the loading-places, and to know of its perils, still he was entitled to know that the assured intended, at the time the policy was effected, to go to this particular place. Because believing that the assured would determine, according to the exigencies of the case, whether he would go to this place or that, and thinking the chances would be that he would not go there, he chose to accept the risk at a smaller premium than he would have done if he had known that the assured had made up his mind to go to this particular place. For that the learned counsel cited Middlewood v. Blakes (7 Term Rep. 162), which, at first sight, appeared to give a sanction to that doctrine. In that case a ship was insured from London to Jamaica, and there were three tracks which a ship bound on such a voyage might take; it depended on the discretion of the master which of those three courses he would take; but in that particular voyage the asured had already given directions to the master to touch at St. Domingo, so that the discretion which the underwriter supposed he would exercise was entirely taken away; he was bound to go to that particular place. He had gone beyond the deviating point at the time the accident happened, and the Court decided, on grounds which are intelligible enough, that that was a deviation; that, whereas the voyage contemplated was a voyage which, after it had reached a given point, should branch off to the right or to the left, according as the exigencies of the navigation required, this was a voyage to St. Domingo, and the master had been deprived of that discretion which the underwriters supposed that he would exercise for their benefit. That case has no application whatever to the present; there is no deviation here.

Assuming that I am right on the first ground, viz., that this was one of the places the underwriter authorized the assured to go to, whether he determined to go there before or after the making of the policy is immaterial. It is not found, as a fact in the case, that if the underwriter had known of this place and that the assured had made up his mind to go there, that would have induced him to charge a higher rate of premium. The case speaks of what he would have done if he had known there was such a place at all; but it is nowhere stated that, supposing he had known there was such a place, he would have charged anything more for the certainty of the assured going, there, instead of for the mere chance of his going there or somewhere else. For these reasons I am of opinion that the defence entirely fails, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not wish to add anything substantial to the reasons given by my Brother Lush, but merely to indicate what I take to be the governing point in the case. I think, in reference to the rule which my Brother Lush has commented upon, that it is not necessary to communicate to the underwriter those things which he must be presumed to know, and which must have reference to the particular insurance. I think that when an underwriter undertakes to insure at and from a port or ports of loading in the province of Buenos Ayres, in words as large as these, he must be presumed to know that along the coast of a whole province there may be ports of which he has no knowledge and as to which there may be particular risks. That being so, if he does not intend to limit the places by the words he uses, it is his duty to make inquiry. Undertaking by such words as these, the person with whom he contracts has a right to presume that he knows the character of the coast, and the possibility of there being some ports on it of which he has no special or even general knowledge. That being so, it follows that it was not necessary that the plaintiffs should communicate to the underwriters anything more than they did. I merely mention that as the governing point in the case. I agree with my Brother Lush, that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

HAYES, J.—I have had considerable doubt during the argument as to what the parties really had in their minds, when they made this insurance. At first it struck me very much that, when the name of this place was given as a new port, a place not known to underwriters, the omission to communicate that, was a matter of some moment, and not to be altogether lost sight of; but I am not at all prepared to differ from the opinion of my learned Brothers, that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The underwriter has taken on himself the risk that the assured should go to this place. I cannot help thinking that gentlemen in the position of underwriters must be taken to know something of the character of the places that are mentioned to them; and I think we should be introducing a new sort of peril into cases of this kind, if we were to sanction the notion that an underwriter is to be called upon by the assured to state what he may or may not know of the places mentioned in the policy. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the more reasonable conclusion is the one propounded by my Brother Lush, and that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 35.—Mandamus to take up Award and furnish Copy—Return that Premises "not injuriously affected within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act."

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—Mandamus, stating that the prosecutor gave notice that a ferry of which he was owner had been injuriously affected by the works of the defendants, a railway company; that both parties appointed arbitrators; that the umpire proceeded to determine the claim according to the Lands Clauses Act, and made his award. The mandamus commanded the defendants at their own expense to take up the award, and furnish a copy to the prosecutor. Return, that the ferry, and the interest of the prosecutor in it, had not been injuriously affected by the company's works, within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act:—Held, on demurrer, that the return was good, as it shewed that the award would be a mere nullity, and that the company were therefore not bound to incur useless expense in taking it up.

Mandamus, reciting that the defendants, by different Acts of Parliament, were empowered to make a certain railway, and that Griffith Owen, of Barmouth, ferryman, claimed to be the owner of, and entitled to a certain ferry, called Barmouth Ferry, being an exclusive right of ferry over a certain portion of the river or estuary at and near Barmouth, and to land passengers, goods and chattels at Penrhyn on the south side, and at two places on the north side, of the river or estuary, and that the defendants had built and completed a railway bridge, and also a bridge for foot passengers over the river, near and adjacent to the ferry. And that the prosecutor, on May 3, 1867, caused to be sent to the defendants a notice, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, of his interest in the ferry, and that the same had been injuriously affected by the works, and claiming from the defendants the sum of 1,700*l.* as compensation. And that Griffith Owen, on May 31, 1867, duly appointed his arbitrator in the matter in pursuance of the provisions of the Act. And the defendants, on June 14, 1867, appointed their arbitrator, but without prejudice to their right to dispute the claim; and on July 3, 1867, the arbitrators duly appointed William Fowler, the elder, of Birmingham, their umpire in the matter; and upon the arbitrators failing to agree, it was agreed by and between the defendants and Owen that the umpire should proceed to hear and determine the said claim according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; and the umpire took upon himself the umpirage, and the defendants, on October 4, 1867, by attorney in that behalf, attended before the umpire, and Owen also attended by his counsel and attorney, and evidence was given in support of the claim, and it was then mutually agreed between the defendants and Owen that the umpire should make his award touching the premises on or before December 13, 1867; and that the umpire duly made his award ready to be delivered to the defendants as the promoters of the undertaking, according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that the defendants had wholly neglected and refused, and still neglected and refused, to take up the award of the umpire, or to deliver a copy thereof to Owen. The mandamus commanded the defendants at their own expense to take up the award or umpirage, and furnish a copy thereof to Owen.

Return, that the exclusive ferry and the interest therein of Owen had not, nor had either of them, been injuriously affected by the works, within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as alleged in the writ, and that Owen was not, and is not, under the provisions of the Act, entitled to claim or recover compensation from the defendants, as in the writ mentioned.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

Morgan Lloyd, in support of the demurrer.—The return is bad. Ever since the case of The Queen v. the South Devon Railway Company (15 Q.B. Rep. 1043; 20 L. J. Q.B. 145) it has been held that the only proper way by which a claimant is to obtain access to an award, under section 35.[1] of the Lands Clauses Act, is to apply for a mandamus directing the company to take up the award, and furnish him with a copy. It may be that in an action on the award the company may have a good defence, as the arbitration is only a valuation of the amount of injury sustained, and is not conclusive as to whether the injury affords any title to compensation. But the company are bound in the first instance to take up the award.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Do you say that where it is conceded that the claimant has no title to compensation, so that any award in his favour would be coram non judice and a perfect nullity, that the company are bound to incur a useless expense by taking up the award?]

The company have chosen to go before the umpire, treating the claim of the prosecutor as a substantial one; so that they are bound to finish what they have begun by taking up the award.

LUSH, J.—It cannot be assumed that the company elected to proceed to arbitration; for if they had neglected to appoint an arbitrator, the claimant's arbitrator might have proceeded to dispose of the matter.]

It has always been customary to try the question in an action on the award.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Your client may, if he pleases, himself take up the award, though if, as it would appear by the demurrer, he is not entitled to compensation, it is not probable that he will care to do so.]

To decide the question in its present stage is unfair to the claimant.

M'Intyre, contra, was not called on.

Per Curiam[2].—We give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18), section 68.—Compensation—Premises Injuriously Affected—Injury to Free Dock and to Public Right of taking Water.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The claimants were lessees of premises about seventy yards from the river Thames. At these premises they carried on the business of potters, and required in the course of their business a regular supply of water and sand. It appeared that the public had enjoyed from time immemorial a right of way to a part of the bank of the river nearly opposite these premises for the purpose of dipping and taking water from the river. It also appeared that lower down the river there was a free public draw-dock, where the public had been in the habit of taking carts for the purpose of loading and unloading barges. This dock had a direct communication with the claimants' premises by streets. The Metropolitan Board of Works, in the exercise of their statutory powers, constructed works in front of the spot where the public had the right of taking water, and thereby temporarily obstructed this right. The Board also interfered with the hard or landing-place at the dock, so that it was not possible to unload so many barges there as before. No part of the claimants' premises was touched or taken by the Board. A jury, summoned under the Lands Clauses Act, having assessed compensation to the claimants for injury to their premises first, for the obstruction to the right of taking water; secondly, for the difficulty in unloading sand at the dock:—Held, on the authority of Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205), that neither injury was a subject for compensation, as it was not an injury to land or any interest therein, but a personal injury to the claimants in the way of their trade.

This was a rule to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up an inquisition, verdict and judgment, which awarded compensation to Messrs. Batstone, of Ferry Street, Lambeth, in respect of two heads of claim, in order that it might be quashed, on the ground that no part of the claimants' premises were taken, and no private right or easement injuriously affected by the defendants' works.

It appeared from the affidavits that the claimants were lessees for a term of years expiring in March, 1871, of certain premises, situate in Ferry Street, St. Mary, Lambeth. These premises, in which the claimants carried on the business of potters and manufactured pottery-ware, were about seventy yards from the river Thames, and on the banks of the river, nearly opposite these premises, at a spot called Ferry Dock, there was a common and public right for all persons to dip and take water from the river without payment of any kind, and there was a right of way to the river for this purpose. It also appeared that lower down the river there was a free public draw-dock, called Broad Street Dock, communicating by streets with the claimants' premises, and that the public had a right to resort to and use this dock, and to take carts there backwards and forwards, and to load and unload barges, and that barges had a right to lie and be there; and it was proved that the defendants, who were embanking the river under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 75, had caused the embankment to be erected in front of the spot where the public had exercised the right of taking water, and that since the works were commenced the access to the river for this purpose had been practically cut off, and it was suggested that this obstruction would continue until the works of the embankment were completed. It was also proved that the hard or landing-place at Broad Street Dock had been so far interfered with by the defendants' works that only one or two barges could now be got up to load or unload in lieu of four or five formerly, and that the access to the dock by barges was attended with difficulty and danger. The claimants had been in the habit of fetching water from Ferry Street Dock to be used in the course of their business as potters, and the sand used in their business was brought by barges to the Broad Street Dock. But since the commencement of the embankment they had been prevented by the works from obtaining access to the river at Ferry Street Dock, or from obtaining water there, and they had also been unable to have their sand brought to Broad Street Dock as before.

No part of the claimants' premises had been touched or taken by the Board.

It was objected that the claimants had made out no title to compensation, as the use of rights common to all the public was not a subject for compensation within the statutes.

The assessor, however, allowed the jury to assess the compensation subject to this objection, and they assessed the compensation for cutting off the right to take water in Ferry Street at 50*l.* and for the injury to Broad Street Dock at 40*l.*

A rule having been obtained as above mentioned,

Montagu Chambers and Bridgman shewed cause.—The claimants were entitled to compensation for the injury to their manufactory in cutting off the supply of water and in hindering the unloading of barges at the dock. In Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205), which will probably be relied on by the Board, it was held that the occupier of a public-house could not recover compensation for loss to his business caused by a temporary obstruction of the footway in front of the house. But the judgment of the House of Lords proceeded upon the ground that, at common law, no action could have been maintained for the injury. Now, in the first place, the authorities will shew that, but for the statute, an action could have been maintained in the present case; and secondly, it must not be forgotten that so distinguished an authority as Lord Westbury dissented from the decision in the House of Lords.

[MELLOR, J.—As I understand Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205), Lord Chelmsford and Lord Cranworth thought that no compensation could be recovered because the injury was not an actionable one; but Lord Westbury refused to accept this limitation, as being too narrow a one. HANNEN, J.—Does not the decision in the House of Lords compel us to assume that it is a condition precedent to the right to compensation that the damage would originally have been actionable?]

There are several old cases to shew that the injury to the claimants might have been actionable. The first of these is Chichester v. Lethbridge (Willes, 71), where Hart v. Bassett (T. Jones, 156) is cited with approbation. In that case it was resolved that the owner of tithes might maintain an action for obstructing the highway so as to prevent him from carrying the tithes to his barn. In Rose v. Miles (4 M. & S. 101) the Court held that it was an actionable injury to moor barges across a public navigable creek and keep them so moored, so as to prevent the plaintiff from navigating his barges.

In The Queen v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (2 Q.B. Rep. 347; 11 L. J. Q.B. 66) a mandamus was awarded to assess compensation where the injury was by lowering a road on which the land abutted. It must be evident, when the character of the property abutting on the river is considered, that the premises had lost a great part of their commercial value, and the case is therefore very similar to Chamberlain's case (2 Best & S. 605; 32 L. J. Q.B. 173). They also referred to Brand v. the Hammersmith and City Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 139) and Beckett v. the Midland Railway Company (37 L. J. C.P. 11).

Parry, Serjeant, and Philbrick, in support of the rule.—Rickett's case (36 L. J. Q.B. 205) is a conclusive authority against the claimants. It is necessary for them to shew that some interest in land, or some right vested in them by reason of the occupation of land, has been injuriously affected; and this they have failed to do. It is not enough that the particular mode of occupying the premises should be injured. This distinction was taken in The King v. the Bristol Dock Company (12 East, 429), where the Court held that compensation could not be obtained for fouling the water of a public river from which a brewery was supplied. That case is stronger than the present one, for there there was a physical connexion between the brewery and the river by means of underground pipes. The proposition that what was once an actionable wrong is after the passing of the Act a subject for compensation, must be adopted, with the limitation that the injury must be to the property in the soil, and not to the occupier. In Beckett v. the Midland Railway Company (37 L. J. C.P. 11) the general value of the house had been reduced by one-third. The claimants have sustained the same damage as the rest of the public, though perhaps to a larger extent. They cited Chamberlain's case (2 Best & S. 605; 32 L. J. Q.B. 173) and The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macqueen, 229).

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. Mr. Chambers has certainly urged arguments and cited cases which, were we at liberty to open an inquiry, might have induced us to hesitate in our decision. But I think that we are concluded by the case of Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205). No doubt the decision in that case turned upon facts which shewed that the obstruction, although considerable and lasting for some time, was not intended to be permanent, but lasted only so long as seriously to increase or to cause the injury complained of. But although the decision of the House of Lords turned upon a particular state of facts, I think that we must look at what was the substance of the decision, and what was really the result of the reasoning which all the noble and learned Lords applied to that case. And notwithstanding all that Mr. Chambers has urged, I think that their judgment is conclusive as regards the case before us. If it had not been the ultimate Court of appeal, the dissent of Lord Westbury and the reasons stated by him would have diminished the weight of its authority. But the reasoning of Lord Westbury was not adopted by the supreme tribunal of which he was a member, and until that tribunal shall lay down some new rule as applicable to a different state of facts, we must act in conformity with the latest decision. Now, was the decision of this tribunal that, unless there is an injury to land as distinct from a personal injury, the claim for compensation cannot be maintained? The words of the statute are, "land or any interest in land injuriously affected." A man may live, as I have already observed, in a particular house, and he may suffer a considerable injury, but unless the injury is to the house, such as a right of way, or those other rights which are referred to in the judgment of Lord Cranworth, it is clear that, according to the opinion of that noble and learned Lord, there can be no compensation, because there could have been before the statute no action in respect of injury to the land or to the house in question. I believe that many of the cases cited by Mr. Chambers are strong to shew that where a man suffers a personal injury distinct from that which all the subjects of the realm suffer, he may have an action; but this is a personal action. It is not because he happens to live in a particular house that therefore the injury is to the house. The injury is to him personally, as it appears to me, and not to the house; and we should be confounding all the distinctions which have hitherto prevailed with reference to rights in property such as a house, and simple rights which are enjoyed in common with the rest of the public. But undoubtedly Lord Westbury does go as far as Mr. Chambers's argument, for he says, "When, therefore, the general Railway Acts use the term 'injuriously affected,' the word 'injuriously' does not mean 'wrongfully' or 'unlawfully,' nor does it imply that compensation is limited to cases where the act done is such as but for the powers given would be a tort at common law. The words mean 'damnously affected' only, and the consequential right to compensation is the creature of the statutes, to be ascertained and measured by the positive language of the enactments, and not by analogy to actions of tort or trespass. There is nothing in the statutes to warrant the position that there shall be no compensation where at common law there would have been a right of action." I quote this passage to shew on what Lord Westbury's mind was turning. He did not proceed upon the special circumstances of the case before him, with regard to its being some injury of a temporary nature, but upon the general construction of the statute. The two other noble and learned Lords entirely differed from this opinion. Lord Chelmsford at the beginning of his judgment says, "I think that the criterion of a party's right to damages under the clauses of the Railway and Companies' Acts, upon which this case depends, is correctly stated by Lord Campbell in In re Penny and The South-Eastern Railway Company (7 E. & B. 660; 26 L. J. Q.B. 225), and that in his words, 'Unless the particular injury would have been actionable before the company had acquired their statutory powers it is not an injury for which compensation can be claimed. At the same time the observation of my noble and learned friend Lord Cranworth, in the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macqueen, 229) must not be lost sight of,—that it does not follow that a party would have a right to compensation in some cases in which if the Act of Parliament had not passed there might have been not only an indictment, but a right of action." This clearly shews that when we use the words 'actionable right,' it must be an actionable right in respect of some injury to land. And Lord Cranworth says, "Both principle and authority seem to me to shew that no case comes within the purview of the statute, unless where some damage has been occasioned to the land itself in respect of which, but for the statute, the complaining party might have maintained an action. The injury must be actual injury to the land itself, as by loosening the foundations of buildings on it, obstructing its light or its drains, making it inaccessible by lowering the ground immediately in front of it, or by some such physical deterioration. Any other construction of the clause would open the door to claims of so wide and indefinite a character as could not have been in the contemplation of the legislature." Therefore each of these noble and learned Lords bases his judgment not upon the mere question of the distinction between a temporary and a permanent obstruction, but upon the construction of the statute, and it appears to me that this being the substantive ground on which they all proceeded, it is a decision which most thoroughly and conclusively binds any inferior Court which may have matters of this sort brought before it afterwards. This renders it unnecessary for us to go through the arguments, or refer to the cases which have been cited by Mr. Chambers. It appears to me that in this case no interest in the land has been affected. The injury is of a personal nature, and one for which no claim for compensation can be maintained under a clause which gives it only in respect of land, or some interest in land, which may have been injuriously affected.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is our duty to endeavour to extract from the case of Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205) the principle upon which the decision is based. It seems to me that it has laid down the principle that no case comes within the purview of section 68. of the Lands Clauses Act, or section 6. of the Railways Clauses Act, unless in respect of damage to the land itself, which damage would have been the subject of an action at law before those statutes. So that these two things must concur, not only that the injury would have been the subject of an action before the statute, but an action in respect of damage to the land itself, or some interest therein. Now, in this case, it appears to me to be plain that there is no injury to the land or any interest therein, unless we are to adopt the powerful reasoning of Lord Westbury in Rickett's case (36 L. J. Q.B. 205). But this reasoning was not adopted by the House of Lords, and must be disregarded. The stronger this reasoning may appear to be the clearer it becomes that the other noble and learned Lords whose judgment has now become the law of the land were opposed to it. They have laid down a principle, and it would be unbecoming in us to express any disapprobation of it, and it appears to me to dispose of the case.

HAYES, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. The case does not seem open to argument after the decision in Rickett v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205). The case seems also to be governed by two other decisions, which illustrate extremely well the difference between private and public rights. In one of these, Glover v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 912; 20 L. J. Q.B. 376), it was held that a level crossing over a private road belonging to the owner of a house was an interruption appurtenant to the interest in the house, and therefore an injury to land within the meaning of section 68. In the other case, The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macqueen, 229), the injury was as serious, but the nature of the right varied. It was an action for damage by a level crossing close to the lodge of a gentleman's house, and although every time his horses were driven out they were liable to be frightened by passing trains, yet it was held, reversing the decision of the Court of Session, that there was a distinction between the two cases; that in one case the right was a public one, and in the other it was a private one, affecting the property of an individual. In this case both the rights in respect of which compensation is claimed are public rights. All the Queen's subjects have the same right of going and taking water as the claimant, but it so happens that because he lives nearer the river that he exercises this right more frequently than others. And as to the right of using the dock, it is just as in the Bristol Dock case (12 East, 429). The dock is like a public highway; everybody has a right to go to it; but the plaintiff, because of his trade, uses it oftener. It is clear therefore that, independently of Rickett's case (36 L. J. Q.B. 205), we are concluded by decisions in the superior Courts. If it had been necessary to reconcile the old cases to which Mr. Chambers has referred, and which present a remarkable diversity of opinion, it is not easy to say what our judgment might have been. But this is a matter which we need not consider. The rule will be made absolute that the inquisition be granted.

Rule absolute.

Quo warranto to try the validity of the election of Edward Pellew Plenty as councillor of the borough of Newbury.

Plea—that Edward Pellew Plenty was duly elected a councillor of the borough; and joinder of issue.

By consent of the parties, the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court:

The corporation of the borough of Newbury, which is a borough mentioned in the Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, Schedule A, consists of a mayor, four aldermen and twelve councillors, to be elected in the manner in that Act specified.

On November 1, 1867, an election of four councillors was duly held before the mayor and assessors, according to the provisions of that Act, and of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1859.

Henry Dolton, Thomas Fidler, Jonathan Burford Pratt, Edward Pellew Plenty and William Penford, being duly qualified, were duly nominated for the office of councillors in the place of the retiring councillors, and their christian names and surnames respectively, with a statement of their respective places of abode and description, and of the parties nominating them, were duly published according to the provisions of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1859.

No person bearing the surname of Plenty or Penford was nominated for the office of councillor at the election other than Edward Pellew Plenty and William Penford, and at the time of the election Edward Pellew Plenty and William Penford were the only persons bearing the surnames of Plenty and Penford respectively who were duly enrolled burgesses of the borough, or qualified under the provisions of the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. to be chosen councillors of the borough at the election. The result of the election was duly declared by the mayor and assessors. It is admitted in this case that Dolton, Fidler and Pratt were duly elected, and that Penford had a majority of one over Plenty, subject to the question as to the form of voting papers, hereinafter mentioned. At this election thirty-five of the burgesses who were entitled to vote and voted delivered to the mayor and assessors voting papers containing the full surname, but only the initial letter of the christian name of William Penford, for whom the thirty-five burgesses voted, and delivered no other voting papers, and at the election eighteen of the burgesses who were entitled to vote and who voted delivered to the mayor and assessors voting papers containing the full surname, but only the initials of the christian name, of Edward Pellew Plenty, for whom the eighteen burgesses voted.

The following is a specimen of such voting paper:

"Municipal Corporations Reform Act.

their being only so initialed, but are to be counted as good votes, William Penford had a majority of votes at the election over Edward Pellew Plenty, and William Penford was entitled to be elected a councillor of the borough instead of Plenty.

If, on the other hand, the voting papers are invalid, and are not to be counted as good votes, then Edward Pellew Plenty had a majority of votes at the election, and was duly elected councillor at the election, and entitled to act as such. The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the voting papers are or are not invalid by reason of these initials: if not, the judgment of the Court is to be entered for the Crown by confession; but if the Court be of a contrary opinion, then judgment is to be entered for the defendant.

A. Rogers shewed cause.—To write the initials instead of the full christian name of the candidate in voting papers is only an inaccurate description, which is cured by section 142[1]. In The Queen v. the Borough of Hartlepool (2 L. M. & P. 666; 21 L. J. Q.B. 71) one Anthony Wilson Dobing gave notice, under section 17. of the Municipal Corporation Act, of his claim to be on the burgess roll of the borough. Upon the revision of the lists this claim was objected to, on the ground that the notice was signed "A. W. Dobing," without giving the christian name in full. But it was held by Erle, J., that the intention of the legislature was to provide that a person having a real qualification should be placed on the burgess roll, notwithstanding any defect of form, and that as it appeared that A. W. Dobing was well understood in Hartlepool to mean "Anthony Wilson Dobing," and that he was the only person of that name there, and as there was before the mayor sufficient information to this effect, the name of the applicant might properly be placed on the roll.

[LUSH, J.—There the section only required the notice to be given according to the scheduled form, or to the like effect.]

The decision was founded upon the principle that so long as there was no mistake as to the identity of the person described, a mere inaccuracy in this description was immaterial.

Gray, in support of the rule.—Section 142. cannot apply to a case like the present, where the statute has distinctly prescribed the form of notice. In The Queen v. Avery (18 Q.B. Rep. 576; 21 L. J. Q.B. 428) it was held to be enough if the voting paper was signed with the usual signature of the burgess voting, and that it was no valid objection that the christian name was denoted only by an initial. But the Court distinguishes the case from one where the statute requires that both the christian name and surname should form part of the description, and this distinction is further explained in The Queen v. Bradley (3 El. & El. 634; 30 L. J. Q.B. 180), where it was decided that the conditions of this statute were satisfied if the voting paper contained a contraction of a christian name which was well known in ordinary use as representing that name, and that "Wm." and "Willm." might be used as equivalent to William; Wightman, J. saying, p. 639, "Now, admitting that a mere initial could not be regarded as a christian name, I think that the contractions of a christian name, which, like those in the present case, are perfectly well known and in ordinary use, are sufficient to satisfy the statute"; and Hill, J., p. 640, "Now, I think that although an initial cannot be regarded as a christian name, a well-known contraction of a name which cannot be misunderstood may be so regarded."

(1) By the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76), s. 32, it is enacted, "That every burgess entitled to vote in the election of councillors may vote for any number of persons not exceeding the number of councillors then to be chosen, by delivering to the mayor and assessors, or other presiding officer as hereinafter mentioned, a voting paper containing the christian names and surnames of the persons for whom he votes, with their respective places of abode and description, such paper being previously signed with the name of the burgess voting, and with the name of the street, lane, or other place in which the property for which he appears to be rated on the burgess roll is situated."

By the interpretation clause, section 142, "No misnomer or inaccurate description of any person, body corporate, or place named in any schedule to this Act annexed, or in any roll, list, notice, or voting paper required by this Act, shall hinder the full operation of this Act with respect to such person, body corporate or place, provided that the description of such person, body corporate, or place be such as to be commonly understood."

[LUSH, J.—If the description is correct it cannot matter whether it is such as would be commonly understood or not. The interpretation clause only applies to a case where the description is inaccurate.]

The interpretation clause was never intended to apply to a notice where there is a total want of that which the statute requires. It cannot be said that since the candidate is described in the nomination paper under 22 Vict. c. 35. there is less difficulty as to his identity, for the present Act is not to be construed by reference to a later one. In The Queen v. Coward (16 Q.B. Rep. 819; 20 L. J. Q.B. 359), where the defendant's place of abode was stated to be G. P. instead of N. R, it was held to be no answer to shew that the description of the defendant in the voting paper was such as would be commonly understood throughout the borough.

[HAYES, J.—Under the old practice the use of the initial only would have been a misnomer, would it not?]

A misnomer properly so called supposes that a person has been misdescribed by some mistake. But here there was no mistake of fact. The voter intentionally wrote the initials only, supposing that they were sufficient. It was a mistake of law, not a mistake of fact.—He cited Melbourne v. Greenfield (7 Com. B. Rep. 1; 29 L. J. C.P. 81), and Eidsforth v. Farrer (4 Com. B. Rep. 9; 16 L. J. C.P. 132).

A. Rogers, in reply.—It is said that this is not a case of misnomer. If so, it must be something less inaccurate, and there is therefore more ground for arguing that it is within the statute.

Cur. adv. vult.

On May 10, the judgment of the Court[2] was delivered by HANNEN, J.—The question in this case is, whether William Penford was, in November, 1867, duly elected a councillor for the borough of Newbury. It appears from the case that he was so elected if he was entitled to count as valid certain voting papers in which he was designated by the initial of his christian name (thus, W. Penford) instead of by his christian name and surname in full. By the 32nd section of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.) it is enacted that, "Every burgess entitled to vote . . . may vote . . . by delivering . . . . a voting paper containing the christian names and surnames of the persons for whom he votes, with their respective places of abode and description." The interpretation clause (section 142.) enacts, that no "misnomer or inaccurate description of any person, body corporate or place . . . . in any voting paper required by this Act shall hinder the full operation of this Act . . . . Provided that the description of such person, body corporate or place be such as to be commonly understood."

We are of opinion that the voting papers in question were valid, on the ground that the designation of the person voted for by the initial of his christian name is "a misnomer," and is, therefore, cured by the interpretation clause. It was contended for the defendant that where the initial only is used, there is a total omission of the name, which is not cured by the interpretation clause; and in support of this contention the case of The Queen v. Bradley (3 El. & El. 634; 30 L. J. Q.B. 180) was referred to, where Hill, J. says that an initial cannot be regarded as a christian name. The question for consideration there was, whether the abbreviation "Willm." for William, vitiated the vote; and the Court held that it did not. The dictum referred to was, therefore, not necessary for the decision of the case. The initial W. is certainly intended as an abbreviation of some name or other; its defect is that it may be taken to be an abbreviation of any one of the other names beginning with it—such as Walter—instead of the right one, William; but if any one, or even all of the wrong names which it might be mistaken for were written in full, this would certainly be cured. That being so, it is impossible to suppose that the legislature did not intend to include under the term "misnomer" an abbreviation which could be, and in this case undoubtedly was, understood to indicate the correct name. We are of opinion that the word "misnomer," which means a naming amiss, is wide enough to cover the faulty indication of a christian name by means of the initial (see Bac. Abr. tit. 'Misnomer'). This construction has already been put upon the word "misnomer" in another statute. By the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 11. it is enacted that no plea in abatement for a misnomer shall be allowed in a personal action, but that in all cases in which a misnomer would but for the Act have been by law pleadable in abatement, the defendant shall be at liberty to cause the declaration to be amended upon summons. In Rust v. Kennedy (4 Mee. & W. 587; 8 L. J. Ex. 85) it was sought to set aside the writ and declaration for irregularity on the ground that the defendant was described by his initial only, the action not being on a bill of exchange or other written instrument. It was there contended, as here, that it was not a mere case of misnomer, because the initials were no name at all. But Parke, B. pointed out that before the statute of Will. 4. this was an objection that was pleadable in abatement as a misnomer, and that since that Act the only remedy was by summons, and that this case was within the statute. Our judgment will, therefore, be for the relator.

Carriers by Railway—Passengers' Luggage—Special Contract—Foreign Line—Through Ticket—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7.

CARRIERS. B.—The plaintiff was booked through from London to Paris by the defendants, who were carriers, by their railway from London to Dover. He travelled on their railway to Dover, from thence to Calais by steamboat, and from Calais to Paris by a French line of railway. He registered his luggage at the London station of the defendants, who thereupon took possession of such luggage. Upon the through ticket, which he received from the defendants, was the following: "The English railway companies are not responsible for loss, or detention of, or injury to luggage of the passenger travelling by this through ticket, except while the passenger is travelling by their trains or boats, and in this latter case only when the passenger complies with the by-laws and regulations of the companies; and in no case for luggage of greater value than 5l. Each company incurs no responsibility of any kind beyond what arises in connexion with its own trains and boats, in consequence of passengers being 'booked' to travel over the railways of other companies, such through booking being only for the convenience of the passengers. Nor will the companies be responsible for the trains or boats being delayed, or not meeting the trains in correspondence, nor for any consequences that may result to a passenger thereby." The ticket was not signed by the plaintiff. The luggage was lost upon the French railway:—Held, in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages in respect of such loss, that the defendants were protected from responsibility by this special contract, and that they did not lose such protection by reason of its not being signed by the plaintiff, the provision to that effect in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, only applying to the receiving, forwarding or delivering of goods upon the line belonging to, or worked by the company making the special contract.

The first count of the declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiff would deliver to the defendants, as and being carriers of goods for hire, certain goods of the plaintiff to be by the defendants safely carried from London to Paris, and there delivered to the plaintiff, for reward to the defendants in that behalf, the defendants promised the plaintiff that they would safely convey the said goods from London to Paris aforesaid, and deliver the same to the plaintiff as aforesaid, and the plaintiff delivered the said goods to the defendants, and the defendants received the same for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and all conditions were performed, &c., to entitle the plaintiff to have the said goods safely carried from London to Paris aforesaid, and there delivered to him as aforesaid, yet the defendants did not safely carry the said goods from London to Paris aforesaid, and there deliver the same to the plaintiff as aforesaid, whereby, &c.

The second count was for not delivering the goods to the plaintiff, whereby he was prevented from proceeding to Brussels, and there transacting business from which he would have derived profit, &c.

The defendants pleaded, first, that they did not promise as alleged; secondly, that the plaintiff did not deliver the goods to them, nor did they receive them as alleged; fifthly, that the said promises respectively were made, and the said goods respectively were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, and were received by them to be carried as aforesaid, under special contracts between the plaintiff and the defendants, and subject to certain just and reasonable conditions contained in the said contract respectively, and set out in the through tickets respectively taken by the plaintiff from the defendants, one of which conditions in each case was that the defendants would not be responsible for loss or detention of, or injury to the luggage of the plaintiff travelling by the said through tickets, except when the plaintiff should be travelling by the defendants' trains or boats, and in that latter case only when the plaintiff should comply with the by-laws and regulations of the defendants, and in no case for luggage of greater value than 5*l*. And that the losses and breach in the declaration alleged were respectively losses which did not, nor did any of them, occur while the plaintiff was travelling by the defendants' trains or boats within the meaning of the said conditions.

Issues were joined on these pleas.

At the trial, which took place at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, 1868, it appeared that on September 14, 1867, the plaintiff left the Charing Cross Station, by the defendants' line, as a passenger to Paris. He had with him a portmanteau, containing wearing apparel, and a hat-box. He paid for and received a through ticket, and he also registered his luggage, paying 3*s*., which was charged for excess. When the train arrived at Paris, the portmanteau was missing, having been lost in the course of the journey upon the Great Northern Railway of France, between Calais and Paris. Upon the through ticket, which the plaintiff received from the defendants at their Charing Cross Station, was the following:—

"The English railway companies are not responsible for loss or detention of, or injury to luggage of the passenger travelling by this through ticket, except while the passenger is travelling by their trains or boats, and in this latter case only when the passenger complies with the by-laws and regulations of the companies; and in no case for luggage of greater value than 5*l*."

"Each company incurs no responsibility of any kind beyond what arises in connexion with its own trains and boats in consequence of passengers being 'booked' to travel over the railways of other companies, such through booking being only for the convenience of the passenger. Nor will the companies be responsible for the trains or boats being delayed, or not meeting the trains in correspondence, nor for any consequences that may result to a passenger thereby."

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for 93*l*. 14*s*. 6*d*., the value of the portmanteau and its contents, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them.

Digitized by Google

Subsequently a rule nisi was obtained by Field, on the ground that the defendants were not responsible for any loss which occurred in France.

H. James, Baker Greene and Macrae Moir shewed cause against the rule.—It may be taken that the plaintiff was obliged to pay the sum of 3*s*. in respect of the excess fare to be charged upon his luggage. It may also be assumed that the ticket amounts to a special contract by which the defendants seek to limit their liability. But if there is no such special contract of which they can avail themselves, they must be liable in this action; and it is submitted that they cannot get any benefit from this special contract because it is not "signed," as required by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, which, by the 4th proviso to section 7, enacts that "No special contract between such company and any other parties respecting the receiving, forwarding or delivering of any animals, articles, goods or things as aforesaid, shall be binding upon or affect any such party unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering such animals," &c. It may be said that this Act does not apply to passengers' luggage at all, and Stewart v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (3 Hurls. & C. 135; 33 L. J. Ex. 199) would seem at first sight to support that view, but there Pollock, C.B. said, "If the question was whether this was a matter within the carriers' liability by the common law, I should think it was not. Richards v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (7 Com. B. Rep. 839; 18 L. J. C.P. 251) is certainly an authority (which I was not aware of) that the luggage of a passenger is in the same condition as goods sent by a carrier, but I am not convinced by it, or disposed to defer to it, and notwithstanding the authority of Mr. Justice Story to the same effect, I am still of opinion that a carrier undertakes no responsibility in respect of the goods of a passenger beyond that which he undertakes with respect to the passenger himself." By the interpretation clause, section 2, the word "traffic" includes, not only passengers and their luggage, goods, &c., but also carriages, waggons, &c. There seems no intention that the Act should not extend to passengers' luggage.

[MELLOR, J.—This would seem to have been a "forwarding" of the luggage by the defendants.]

Yes, they contract to deliver it in Paris, and they forward it by the French company.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But I think that the special contract which, under section 7, must be signed, is one by which the company seeks to limit its liability for losses which occur on its own line. Must not section 7. be read by the light of section 2? If so, it only applies to the railway belonging to or worked by the defendants.]

Such a construction has never yet been suggested; section 2. only applies to giving facilities for traffic, which can only be upon the companies' own lines; section 7. applies rather to carrying goods over the line than to the working of it. The point was not raised in Aldridge v. the Great Western Railway Company (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 582; 33 L. J. C.P. 161), as might have been expected if it was considered to be tenable. It was there held that the defendants were discharged from liability in respect of damage and detention beyond the limits of their own railway, under a condition very similar to the present. The defendants make the contract to carry to Paris, and Muschamp v. the Lancaster and Preston Junction Railway Company (8 Mee. & W. 421) shews that they may be liable under such a contract, although the luggage is lost upon a line over which they have no control. Their common law liability remains, unless they limit it by a reasonable written contract. If in the performance of their contract to carry the passenger and his luggage, they have to pass over another line, they must give the passenger the same facilities as upon their own line—The Great Western Railway Company v. Blake (7 Hurls. & N. 987; 31 L. J. Ex. 346). There, Cockburn, C.J. said, "It has been settled that where a railway company enters into a contract for the conveyance of goods to a distance extending not merely over their own line, but over the whole or some portion of any other line of railway with which it is connected, the company so contracting is liable, not only for the loss of the goods on their own line, but also in respect of the loss of the goods upon the line not their own. I think that position obtains in the case of passengers. If a railway company chooses to contract to carry passengers, not only over their own line but also over the line of another company, either in whole or in part, the company so contracting incurs all the liability which would attach to them if they had contracted solely to carry over their own line."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In that case there was no limitation of the liability.]

Field and F. M. White, in support of the rule.—It was not necessary that the special contract should be signed by the plaintiff. The contract to carry entered into by the defendants with the plaintiff, was only to carry him and his luggage to Dover, and then the defendants contract further that they have authority to say that the other company will carry them on. When the luggage was off their line, they had no control over it. It was not delivered to the defendants to be carried—see Van Toll v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (7 Hurls. & N. 75; 31 L. J. C.P. 241). See also Aldridge v. the Great Western Railway Company (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 582; 33 L. J. C.P. 161) and Branley v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 63; 31 L. J. C.P. 286).

COCKBURN, C.J.—The real question is, whether the defendants can avail themselves of the condition limiting their liability.]

There is no doubt that they can do so. This is a special contract, to which the Railway and Canal Traffic Act has no application. That Act does not apply to passengers at all, but simply to goods and things. The ticket bears a strong implication upon the face of it that the foreign company will be liable, and they would clearly be so if the defendants make this contract as their agents.—[They also referred to Baxendale v. the Great Eastern Railway Company (4 Q.B. Rep. 244; 38 L. J. Q.B. 137) and to The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company v. Collins (7 H.L. C. 194).]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I consider that it is quite unnecessary to decide whether there was a contract binding upon the defendants to carry the plaintiff and his luggage the whole distance from London to Paris, although I am strongly disposed to think that there was such a contract. I think that the defendants contracted that the plaintiff should be conveyed from London to Dover, from Dover to Calais and from Calais to Paris. But the special contract is set out on the face of the ticket; and however hard it may seem to hold that a passenger is bound by words printed upon a ticket in small letters, and which in the hurry of the last moment at a railway station he has no opportunity of making himself acquainted with, there is no doubt that it has been settled by decided authorities that he must be presumed to know the contents of the ticket, and to be bound by such contents. The defendants have placed upon the ticket a clear and distinct restriction, by which they stipulate that they will not be responsible for loss of the passenger's luggage, except while the passenger is travelling by their own train or boat. Now, unless there is something in the law which will operate to prevent them from making such a restriction of their liability, the plaintiff is out of Court, because it is clear that the loss occurred while the luggage was in the possession of the servants of the French company.

The only ground for saying that there is no right in the defendants so to restrain their liability by imposing such a condition is, that, under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act such a special contract must be signed by the passenger, as provided by the fourth proviso in the 7th section, whereas this special contract is not so signed.—[His Lordship read the section.]—The simple question to be determined is, does this enactment apply to the present case? I am clearly of opinion that it does not. The whole scope and intention of this piece of legislation is indicated by the 2nd section.—[His Lordship read from that section.] —In both sections there are the same words, "receiving," "forwarding" and "delivering." By the 2nd section the company is to afford all reasonable facilities upon the line worked by them; and by the 7th section it may make such conditions as shall be adjudged by the Court or a Judge to be just and reasonable. The 7th section must be read by the light of the 2nd section, and then I think that there is nothing which prevents the company from making contracts with such conditions. If it is unreasonable that they should have such power, the legislature may interfere and prevent it.

MELLOR, J.—I also think that it is unnecessary to determine whether one contract was entered into by the defendants to carry the luggage the whole way to Paris, for it seems to me to be clear that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act cannot have any effect upon this contract, so as to prevent the defendants from availing themselves of the protection afforded by it as to losses which occur upon the sea or upon the French railway. If they profess to carry from London to Paris they are at liberty to stipulate that they will not be responsible for losses which occur beyond Dover or after the luggage has been landed from their own boats. I think that is reasonable. Then I think that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act means to say this to the company, "You have powers conferred upon you, and care must be taken to insure your making a proper use of those powers and that you afford proper advantages to the public consistently with the performance of your duties." It is fit to enforce such duties upon them as far as the working of their own line is concerned, but not as to other lines. I think that the Act does not apply to this case, and that the defendants are protected by their special contract.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming that this is a special contract, it contains a condition that the defendants will not be responsible except when the loss occurs while the passenger is travelling upon their own line of railway. Now, unless there is something which renders such a condition invalid, they are exempt from liability to the plaintiff for the loss of his luggage. It is said that the provision in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, that the contract must be signed by the party, renders the present contract invalid. But is the contract governed by that Act? I am clearly of opinion that this contract is not governed by that Act at all. The 7th section is supplemental to section 2, and it is clear that the requirement that the contract shall be signed applies to the obligation imposed by section 2. The defendants were at liberty to impose such conditions as they pleased as to the luggage which was being carried off their own line.

Rule absolute.

Carriers by Railway—"Personal Luggage"—Child's Rocking-Horse.

CARRIERS. B.—A child's toy called a spring-horse, standing upon a flat surface, about 44 inches in length, and weighing 78 lb., is not "personal luggage" within the meaning of regulations allowing passengers by railway to carry 112 lb. of personal luggage free of charge, as the words "personal luggage" apply only to such articles as it is customary for a passenger to take with him on a journey.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the County Court of Derbyshire, holden at Derby.

The appellant in the case sought to recover 2*s.* 6*d.*, being the amount paid by him to the respondents, under protest, at King's Cross Railway Station, for carriage charged by them from London to Beeston, near Nottingham, of a toy called a "spring-horse," weighing 78 lb., and 2*l.* 2*s.* for damages, for detention in London from 3 o'clock to 5.35 p.m., expenses and loss of business in being prevented from attending to letters at Nottingham.

On the hearing of the case on April 13, 1868, at Derby, before George Russell, Esq., the County Court Judge, it was proved that the appellant, on March 10, 1868, took a first-class return ticket from Beeston, near Nottingham, to King's Cross; that he took no luggage with him, but while in London bought a child's toy called a "spring-horse" (an improvement on the old rocking-horse, but standing on a flat surface and about 44 inches in length), which was sent to the King's Cross Station in time for him to take with him on his return to Beeston by the train which left at 3 o'clock in the afternoon; that the toy reached the station in time, but when the appellant arrived there the respondents refused to allow the spring-horse to be taken as luggage, it being an article for the carriage of which they had a regular and fixed charge of 2*s.* 6*d.*; that the appellant objected to the charge, alleging that as a first-class passenger he was entitled by their rules and regulations, after mentioned, to carry 112 lb. weight of personal luggage free; that the toy in question weighed only 78 lb., and that the same was for use in his family, and that it was not merchandise in his hands; that the respondents, notwithstanding, persisted in the charge, which the appellant refusing to pay, the train was despatched without him; that the appellant ultimately paid the 2*s.* 6*d.* under protest, and thereupon both he and the spring-horse were forwarded by the 5.35 train, which was the next train leaving King's Cross for Beeston; that on the railway ticket so issued and delivered to the appellant there was the following printed condition: "This ticket is issued subject to the regulations and conditions stated in the company's time-tables and bills."

The following are the regulations referred to in the foregoing condition, so far as concerns the matter in question: "Luggage. First-class passengers are allowed 112 lb.; second class, 100 lb.; and government passengers, 56 lb. of personal luggage only (not being merchandise or other articles carried for hire or profit), free of charge; all excess of luggage above the weight allowed will be charged for according to distance."

After hearing the appellant and the counsel for the respondents, the case was adjourned to May 11, 1868, when judgment was given for the respondents, but the Judge granted the appellant leave to appeal.

The appellant contends that, according to the terms of the respondents' contract with him as set forth in the railway ticket above referred to, and in the time-tables and bills published by the respondents, he was entitled, as a first-class passenger, to take the spring-horse in question with him, and have the same carried, as his personal luggage, free of charge, it being under the allowed weight, and not within the restriction in the respondents' bills, of "merchandise or other articles carried for hire or profit." The respondents have a fixed tariff for excepted articles, but that tariff does not appear in their Acts or public time-tables.

The respondents contend that the spring-horse did not come within the meaning of the words "personal luggage," inasmuch as it was not for the appellant's personal use and convenience as a traveller, but was an article for the carriage of which they were entitled to charge according to their usual custom and that of other railway companies.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, under the circumstances as above stated, the appellant was entitled to take with him the spring-horse in question free of charge, or whether the respondents were entitled to charge for the carriage of the same.

Macnamara, for the appellant.—The question is, whether this toy, which is a kind of rocking-horse, comes within the meaning of the term "personal luggage." Any ambiguity in a regulation drawn up by the company ought to be construed favourably for the passenger. The company have not used words of exclusion, but have simply adopted the statutory words. Now by the words "personal luggage" are meant such articles as a cricketer's bat, an angler's fishing-tackle, the books of a barrister going circuit. Sailors about to join their vessels often carry their bedding with them, and it could not be denied that such a parcel was personal luggage.

[LUSH, J.—In Johnson's Dictionary, Bohn's Edit. (1866), luggage is defined as "anything cumbrous and unwieldy that is to be carried away, anything of more weight than value." I think that the railway companies cannot have drawn up their regulations with reference to this definition.]

Cahill v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 818; 31 L. J. C.P. 271) and Keys v. the Belfast and Ballymena Railway Company (9 H.L. C. 556) only shew that merchandise is not within the meaning of regulations as to personal luggage. In Phelps v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 321; 34 L. J. C.P. 261) where it was held, that deeds and documents carried by an attorney did not come within the meaning of the term "ordinary luggage," Erle, C.J., said, "It is impossible to draw a definite line. Luggage which one person might carry for his personal use might be a distress and annoyance to another. But still the habits of mankind must be considered to be within the cognizance of the railway company, so that anything carried according to usage for personal use would be a matter for which the company would be responsible as luggage of a traveller upon a journey." The true definition of the word "luggage" has undergone much discussion in America. In Angell on Carriers, section 115, it is said, "The implied undertaking of the proprietors of stage-coaches, railroads, and steamboats, to carry in safety the baggage of passengers is not unlimited, and cannot be extended beyond ordinary baggage, or such baggage as a traveller usually carries with him for his personal convenience. . . . All articles which it is usual for persons travelling to carry with them, whether from necessity or for convenience or amusement (such as a gun or fishing-tackle), fall within the term 'baggage.' So likewise does money not exceeding a reasonable amount; and a watch has been held to be part of a traveller's baggage, and his trunk a proper place to carry it." And in Story on Bailments, s. 499, it is said, "By luggage we are to understand such articles of necessity or personal convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use, and not merchandise." This is an article which a man and his family going upon an excursion for a day or two might reasonably take with them.

A. Wills (Huish and J. C. Carter with him), for the respondents.—The "spring-horse" is substantially an article of furniture, which it could not reasonably be supposed that a passenger would take with him wherever he went.

[LUSH, J.—Could a passenger by the parliamentary train bring with him a child's cradle or a go-cart of any weight under 56 lb.?]

It is not a thing which a passenger generally takes with him backwards and forwards; if such articles were ordinarily carried the company would have to provide special receptacles for them. The reasoning upon which the American Courts have proceeded in these cases is in favour of the respondents, as appears from a number of cases collected in a note to Story on Bailments, last edit. s. 449. The liability of the respondents is the same under these regulations, and under their special Act, 7 Vict. c. xviii. s. 204. (passed before the Railways Clauses Act), for this Act allows passengers to carry a certain weight of "ordinary luggage," and this limitation is as strongly against the plaintiff as that created by the words "personal luggage." The fact that the habits of society are changing, and that so many persons are travelling backwards and forwards daily makes it important that a strict rule should be observed. If not, arm-chairs and other such articles will be brought into railway carriages, and country houses will be furnished from London at the expense of the company.

Macnamara, in reply.—The word "personal" means things required by the passenger and his family. The Court will not restrain the meaning of the word to the disadvantage of travellers. The bulk of the article is not a satisfactory test, for if it had been paid for, the company would have been bound to carry it, however difficult it might be to find a receptacle for it; so that in this respect a great part of the respondents' argument falls to the ground. The present question is not whether the company are or are not bound to carry an inconvenient article, but whether they are to receive payment for carrying it.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the respondents. The company in this regulation intend to express the same thing as is expressed in their special Act, although they make use of a different phraseology. The regulation is as follows: first-class passengers are allowed 112 lb., second-class, 100 lb., and government passengers, 56 lb. of personal luggage only (not being merchandise or other articles carried for hire or profit). Now it is not difficult to define what is excluded by this rule. The privilege does not extend to merchandise, that is, things intended for sale, nor to articles carried for profit, that is, where the person who carries them makes a profit out of them, although the article itself might under other circumstances come under the definition "personal luggage." It is extremely difficult to frame a definition of what is "personal luggage," which embraces everything which can come within the meaning of the words, or which is not excluded by them. I cannot say that I am satisfied with any of the definitions which are given in the books which have been referred to. These definitions were quite good enough for the occasions upon which they were given, but none of them seem to me to be perfect. It would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to frame a definition which would be suitable in any possible exigency, but I think that the interpretation put upon the rule by the company is not wide enough, for they contend that "personal luggage" applies only to luggage which is carried by the passenger for his own use, and is personal to himself. But I do certainly think that any one using the words "personal luggage" would mean more than is included by this description. It is also to be observed that the statute uses the words "ordinary luggage," meaning a class of articles which are ordinarily carried by passengers as luggage; so that we may construe the rule by the aid of this description, for the company would take it into account when they were considering what was the description of goods for the carriage of which the passenger had paid when he had taken his ticket, and they would have regard to the usual habits of passengers. Now the article in question, although called a child's toy, cannot to my mind come within this description. It cannot be considered as a mere toy, which suggests something which may be carried in the hand, different from a sort of rocking-horse weighing 78lb. and 44 inches in length. We can only say that the article must be one which is ordinarily carried by passengers as luggage, and that this article does not come within this description.

HANNEN, J., concurred.

HAYES, J.—I am of the same opinion, although I agree that nothing can be more difficult than to frame a satisfactory definition of the term "personal luggage." The counsel on both sides have relied on the decisions in the American Courts; but I think that we ought not to attach too much weight to these decisions, because it is very possible that certain districts in America may be thinly populated, and ill supplied with comforts and conveniences for travellers so as to require them to carry an extraordinary number of articles. It would be just as unreasonable to frame a definition at the present day by reference to the customs and habits of Englishmen fifty years ago, when it was often necessary to carry fire-arms for protection against robbers. The leading idea suggested by the words "personal luggage" is something which may be carried in the hand; and anything which is entirely opposed to this idea is probably not included within the meaning of the words.

Judgment for the respondent.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. D. E.—By the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. ss. 69, 144, compensation is payable for damage caused to the owners or occupiers of premises by works which the local board, upon the default of such owners or occupiers, are empowered to execute.

This was a rule calling on the Wallasey Local Board of Health to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them to make compensation to Evan Thomas out of the general district rates, under the Public Health Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63.[1], for damage sustained by him by the exercise of the powers vested in the board.

It appeared that Thomas was owner of a house abutting upon a road in the district of the local board of health (not being a highway), and that in December, 1865, a notice was served upon him requiring him within a specified time to sewer, level, pave, &c. part of the street. The notice not being complied with, the board proceeded to execute the works themselves, and in so doing raised the level of the road opposite Thomas's house, so as to block up a portion of the doorway and obstruct the access from the street to the house. The rule, as above stated, having been obtained, Milward and R. J. Williams shewed cause.—The local board may by notice (see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61. s. 17, Schedule) require the owner himself to do the work. If he had done the work he would have had no claim. The additional power does not affect the question of liability. If the board have acted in excess of their powers the compensation clause does not apply, but the claimant has his remedy by action. But if they were justified in what they did, it is very hard if the occupier is to have a claim for making default in fulfilling his duty.

Bruce, in support of the rule.—Local boards are bound to put their compulsory powers into execution in such a manner as not to injure the ratepayers.

[LUSH, J.—Do you say that if the claimant, while doing the work himself, had sustained damage, that he could have recovered compensation?]

If the claimant had done this work under the compulsion of the board, he would have been their agent in doing it; and it could make no difference who was the immediate actor. The question turns entirely on the meaning of the compensation clause, section 144, which is in general terms, and ought to be construed so as to protect the interests of the public.

Both parties having consented to be bound by the decision of the Court without taking further proceedings, the Court took time to consider its judgment.

(1) 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 69:—"In case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the Local Board of Health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, &c., require them to sewer, level, &c., within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, ... in proportion to the frontage of their respective premises," &c.

Section 144. "Full compensation shall be made, out of the general or special district rates to be levied under this Act, to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act," &c.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61. s. 17, a form of notice may be used for any of the purposes of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 69, which is set out in Schedule A. to the Act.

Digitized by Google

The judgment of the Court [2] was delivered (on May 11) by HANNEN, J.—In this case a rule was obtained for a mandamus to the Wallasey Local Board of Health to cause compensation to be made to Evan Thomas for damage by him sustained, by the exercise by the local board of the powers of the Public Health Acts.

The local board, acting under section 69. of the Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), required Evan Thomas and other owners of premises in a certain street in New Brighton, to sewer, level, pave and channel the same; and the said Evan Thomas having made default in complying with the notice, the board executed the required works, and claims as contribution payable by Evan Thomas in respect of the works the sum of 71*l.* 8*s.*

It is alleged by Evan Thomas that the effect of the works, as executed, is to obstruct the entrance to his house, and to render the access to his doorway dangerous and inconvenient; and, in respect of the injury, he claims compensation under section 144, which enacts that full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the Act.

It was contended on behalf of the local board that, inasmuch as the owners of the houses in the street were bound to do the works themselves, or if done by the board to pay for them, they could not be entitled to compensation for injury incurred by the works. We are of opinion, however, that this argument is not well founded. There is no necessary connection between the cost of the works and the damage which they may occasion. The raising of the level of a street may be very advantageous to the majority of the houses in it, but very injurious to one. Although, therefore, the owner of that house may be bound under section 69. to pay his proportion of the cost (having regard to the frontage of the house) of altering the level, he may still be entitled to compensation out of the general district rate for the special damage which he has sustained in order that his neighbours and the district generally should be benefited.

We are therefore of opinion that Evan Thomas is entitled to have it ascertained whether or not he has sustained damage by the execution of the works in question, and to receive compensation for such damage, if any.

The rule will therefore be made absolute for a mandamus, and the parties have agreed to be bound by our decision.

Rule absolute.

neglected to plead a composition-deed, that upon the pleadings as framed the only question was whether the plaintiff was a creditor bound by the deed, and upon this issue the verdict must be entered for the defendant.

Declaration—That the plaintiff, on December 11, 1866, recovered judgment against Thomas Brassington for 23*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, and on December 14, 1866, sued out a writ of ca. sa. on the judgment, directed to the defendant as sheriff of Kent, commanding him to take Brassington, to satisfy the plaintiff 23*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* with interest; that the defendant as sheriff took Brassington under the writ, but without the consent, &c. of the plaintiff suffered him to escape.

Pleas—first, not guilty; secondly, that after the defendant had taken Brassington in execution of the writ, as in the declaration alleged, Brassington produced to the defendant, or his officer, a copy of the certificate under the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy and the hand of the deputy chief registrar of the Court, of the due registration of a deed or instrument made and executed between Brassington and his creditors within the meaning of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the other statutes relating thereto, wherefore the defendant released and discharged Brassington out of his custody, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute in that behalf, which is the alleged grievance.

Replication—first, a joinder of issue; secondly, to the second plea, that the plaintiff's cause of action against Brassington upon and in respect of which the judgment was recovered first arose and accrued to the plaintiff after the making and after the registration of the deed, and the plaintiff was not a creditor of Brassington in respect of the cause of action when the deed was made nor when the same was produced and left for registration, nor until after the certificate was granted, and the plaintiff was not among the creditors referred to or intended to be bound by the deed.

Rejoinder, taking issue on the replication.

The plaintiff also demurred to the second plea, and the defendant to the second replication; but the Court of Queen's Bench, after argument, held that the plea was bad and the replication good—see Dignam v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 71).

At the trial, before Mellor, J., at the London Sittings after Easter Term, 1868, it appeared that the bill of exchange upon which the action against Brassington was brought was accepted by him, and became due on July 20, 1866. On June 26 previous Brassington executed a deed of composition and release under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and caused it to be registered on the same day. The bill was indorsed to the plaintiff after the registration of the deed. The plaintiff issued his writ on November 27. Brassington did not plead, and on December 11 judgment was obtained against him for 20*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* debt and interest, and 3*l.* 8*s.* costs. He was arrested by the defendant on December 15, but was discharged upon producing the certificate of registration.

A verdict was directed for the plaintiff for the amount indorsed on the ca. sa., with leave for the defendant to move to enter it in his favour.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Digby Seymour shewed cause.—The case of Dignam v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 71) having decided that a debtor is not protected by the certificate of the registration of a deed under section 198. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, before the debt in respect of which the judgment was obtained and execution issued became due, there is a direct authority in favour of the plaintiff. Moreover, Brassington having neglected to plead the deed, it is now too late to take advantage of it—Rossi v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 204).

Raymond, in support of the rule.—If Brassington had applied to a Judge at chambers to be discharged from custody, it is probable that, on the authority of Rossi v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 204), the application would have been refused. But the present question is a different one. It will not be disputed, first, that a running bill, although not due, is provable in Bankruptcy (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 172); secondly, that, being provable, it is included in the order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), sections 161, 162; thirdly, that by section 197. of the latter Act, deeds like the present one are subject to the practice in Bankruptcy; fourthly, that by section 198, the certificate is to be available as a protection in bankruptcy; and fifthly, that by section 113. of the former Act, the sheriff is bound to discharge the bankrupt on the production of the certificate of protection. These propositions are confirmed by the cases of Topping v. Keysell (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 258; 33 L. J. C.P. 225), Wood v. De Mattos (35 L. J. Ex. 64), and Exley v. Inglis (37 L. J. Ex. 145). Apart, therefore, from the decision in Rossi v. Bailey (37 L. J. Q.B. 204), the defendant would have been justified in discharging the debtor. But this case only decided that the debtor could not compel the creditor to discharge him. It does not shew that the sheriff is liable in this action.

[LUSH, J.—Is not the only question raised by these pleadings whether the plaintiff was a creditor within the meaning of the deed?]

The defendant contends that this is the only point before the Court; and if so there is an end to the case, as it cannot be disputed that the plaintiff was a creditor bound by the deed, so that the replication is not proved.

Seymour asked leave to amend, but

The COURT[1] refused the application, on the ground that the objection to the deed was a technical one, and made the rule absolute.

Bankruptcy—Rights of Assignees—Bankruptcy on Debtor's own Petition—Trover—Fraudulent Preference.

BANKRUPTCY. B.—Where an adjudication of bankruptcy is on the debtor's own petition, and goods of the bankrupt have been delivered by him to a creditor by way of fraudulent preference and sold or otherwise disposed of by the creditor before the petition, the assignees cannot recover the value of these goods either in an action of trover or money had and received.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff, as creditors' assignee of the estate and effects of R. P. Jackson, a bankrupt, according to the statutes in force concerning bankrupts, sued the defendant for the conversion of goods of R. P. Jackson before he became bankrupt. Second count, that after Jackson became bankrupt the defendant converted to his own use, and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff as assignee as aforesaid of the use and possession of goods of the plaintiff as assignee as aforesaid. Third count, for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff as assignee as aforesaid.

Pleas, to the first and second counts, not guilty; secondly, to the first count, that the goods were not the goods of Jackson; thirdly, to the second count, that the goods were not the goods of the plaintiff as assignee; fourthly, to the last count, never indebted.

Joinder in issue.

At the trial, before Hannen, J., at the York Spring Assizes, 1868, it appeared that Jackson, who was a jeweller, at Richmond, in Yorkshire, presented a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy on November 16, 1867, and was adjudicated bankrupt on the same day. The plaintiff was appointed creditors' assignee on December 10, 1867. The goods in respect of which the action was brought were claimed by the defendant under a bill of sale of the bankrupt's stock-in-trade, executed by him on July 26, 1867. At the time when the bill of sale was executed Jackson was indebted to the defendant and other creditors. The defendant took possession of these goods on October 12 under the power of entry in the bill of sale, and caused them to be sold by auction on the 18th and 19th. The proceeds, deducting expenses, amounting to 145*l.* 10*s.*, were paid to the defendant. After the bankruptcy of Jackson a demand was made on the defendant for the goods in question, and the present action commenced. It was objected by the counsel for the defendant that, even assuming that the bill of sale was a fraudulent preference, the assignee could not recover as his title did not relate back to the date of the bill of sale. The learned Judge reserved the point; and the jury having found that the giving of the bill of sale was a fraudulent preference, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the value of the goods, with leave for the defendant to move.

A rule having been obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and entered for the defendant, on the ground that there was no relation back to the date of the bill of sale so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover,—

Overend and Forbes shewed cause.—The plaintiff, as creditors' assignee, is entitled to maintain this action. The objection upon which the defendant relies is, that the title of the plaintiff does not relate back to the date of the bill of sale. But, admitting that the plaintiff cannot succeed on the trover counts, he may still rely on the count for money had and received.

[LUSH, J.—Is it not necessary that the plaintiff should have disaffirmed the bill of sale while the goods were still in the possession of the defendant? Young v. Billiter (8 H.L. C. 682; 30 L. J. Q.B. 153) is surely an authority for this.]

In Groom v. Watts (4 Ex. Rep. 727; 19 L. J. Ex. 154) the marginal note is as follows: "The defendant's wife, whilst sole, made, as surety with F, a joint and several promissory-note, payable to L. F. having become embarrassed delivered his effects to W. for the benefit of his creditors. The defendant applied to F. for money to take up the note, when F. voluntarily, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, gave him an order upon W. for the amount, which was paid to the defendant. L. in whose hands the note was, refused to receive the amount unless the whole amount of F.'s debt to him was paid, and the defendant retained the amount which he had received as an indemnity. A fiat in bankruptcy having issued against F, held, that his assignees were entitled to recover from the defendant the sum so paid to him as money received for their use." It appears from the report that this fiat was on the bankrupt's own petition. In the course of the argument Alderson, B. says, "This was money had and received by the defendant to the use of the assignees, inasmuch as it was money handed over by the bankrupt under such circumstances that it was against law that he should retain it." Young v. Billiter (8 H.L. C. 682; 30 L. J. Q.B. 153) was an action of trover by the assignees of an insolvent under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 59, to recover the value of goods seized under a warrant of attorney given to the defendant within three months of the debtor's imprisonment. It was held that trover could not be maintained, as the warrant of attorney was upon the same footing as an ordinary fraudulent preference, and was therefore only voidable as regarded the assignees. But Blackburn, J. in delivering his opinion in the House of Lords to the effect that there was no conversion, says (30 L. J. Q.B. 156), "I think it right, however, to guard against its being supposed that, in my opinion, no action at the suit of the assignees would lie against the favoured creditor. On the contrary, I am strongly disposed to think that as soon as the assignees avoid the transaction they may, by an action for money had and received, or, at all events, by a properly shaped action, make the favoured creditor refund any benefit which he has wrongfully received; and probably, if they can aver and prove that the defendant was a party to the fraudulent transaction, knowing it to be such, they may recover the full damage sustained by the estate, though greater than the benefit received by the defendant; but for this purpose the scienter is material." In the present case the scienter could have been proved without difficulty, as it is quite clear that the defendant was aware of the position in which the bankrupt was placed.

[LUSH, J.—In Young v. Billiter (8 H.L. C. 682; 30 L. J. Q.B. 153) the difficulty which the plaintiff had to contend with was, when could it be said that the proceeds of the sale became money had and received to his use? Certainly not at the time of the receipt.]

To allow the defendant to retain this money is contrary to the policy of the whole bankrupt law.

[LUSH, J.—In Stevenson v. Newenham (13 Com. B. Rep. 285; 22 L. J. C.P. 110), the Court in speaking of a preference similar to this, say "Such acts when voluntary and in contemplation of bankruptcy cannot be valid against the assignees if they choose to avoid them, but they are not absolutely "void." Now, if the buyer has parted with the goods the opportunity of disaffirming the contract is gone.]

It must be remembered that this action is against the person who had the goods, and who now has the money. The plaintiff may be too late to dispute the validity of the sale, but not the validity of the appropriation of the proceeds to the defendant's debt. They cited Nicholson v. Gooch (5 El. & B. 999; 25 L. J. Q.B. 137).

Field, in support of the rule.—Young v. Billiter (8 H.L. C. 682; 30 L. J. Q.B. 153) is a conclusive authority against this action. In that case the ground of the decision was that there was no relation back beyond the date of the vesting order, and here there is no relation earlier than the bankrupt's petition. The defendant was guilty of no tort in selling the goods and in receiving the proceeds, for at the time of the sale it cannot be questioned that the goods were his own property. Nor has the defendant been guilty of any further wrong since the title of the assignees accrued.

[MELLOR, J.—It seems very strange to me that the fact that a man keeps goods in his possession up to the time of a bankruptcy should make a difference. LUSH, J.—I cannot see how a transaction good at the time when it took place can afterwards be made invalid, except by Act of Parliament.]

When the defendant has once parted with the possession of the goods there is no further remedy.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this rule must be made absolute. It was admitted by the counsel for the plaintiff, and there could be no doubt, that this is not a case in which trover would lie. The plaintiff is therefore obliged to rely on the count for money had and received. But I am at a loss to see how he can succeed under this count if trover cannot be maintained, for the reason why trover will not lie is that the act of selling the goods being one which the bankrupt law does not prohibit, the assignees cannot repossess them or recover them in specie when they have been sold before the act of bankruptcy. Now, if the assignees are unable to recover either the goods or their value, I do not see how they can recover the proceeds of the sale of them from the person selling them before the act of bankruptcy. This is the conclusion to which I am inevitably led in the absence of any authority in favour of the plaintiff, and no such authority has been cited.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I find it extremely difficult to see how one proposition can be affirmed and the other denied. If trover will not lie for the goods in question, it must be on the ground that the goods at the time of the supposed conversion were the property of the person who parted with them, and not of the assignees; and if there was a power to part with them, I do not see how money had and received will lie. I confess that, upon principle, I am not at all satisfied with a law which enables the wrongful act to be disaffirmed so long as the goods remain in the hands of the person to whom they were delivered, and protects him when he has parted with them before the act of bankruptcy, particularly where the bankruptcy does not relate back before the debtor's own petition.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The bill of sale was not fraudulent.

within the statute of Elizabeth, and was therefore perfectly good between the parties. The bankrupt then had a perfect right to make the deed, and the defendant to take possession under it. It is true that, according to section 67[1] of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, which contains a provision similar to one which is to be found in the earlier statutes, the deed would have been fraudulent if the debtor had become bankrupt on the petition of a creditor; for then the transaction, though valid at the time, would afterwards become invalid as an act of bankruptcy. But the reason of this is, that the statute not only makes the transaction a fraudulent preference, but also an act of bankruptcy, which is altogether void against the assignees. The case of Stevenson v. Newenham (13 Com. B. Rep. 285; 22 L. J. C.P. 110) and subsequent cases have settled the point that where the bankruptcy is on the bankrupt's own petition, the title of the assignees does not relate back further than the petition, and that section 67. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, does not apply, so that the assignees take only what the bankrupt had at the time of the petition. Therefore, the goods which belonged to the bankrupt before his petition were goods which any creditor would have a perfect right to receive, as he would also have a right to receive and keep money derived from the sale of them; so that, as it must be conceded that section 67. does not apply, it only remains to say that, by the common law, a transaction valid at the time cannot be made invalid afterwards.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. There can be little doubt but that the law on this point is anomalous, the difficulty arising from the fact that there can be no relation back when the bankruptcy is on the bankrupt's own petition. The decisions which have already been given make it impossible for us to give judgment for the plaintiff, though the doctrine upon which these decisions are founded is technical, and, in my opinion, the case is one for the interference of the legislature.

Negligence—Master and Servant—Carman going Journey without Master's Authority.

MASTER AND SERVANT. E.—The defendant, a wine-merchant, carrying on business in the Minories, sent his clerk in a cart to Blackheath, to deliver wine and bring back empty bottles. The cart had reached King William Street, on its way back, when the clerk persuaded the carman to drive to the clerk's house, near the City Road, upon private business of his own. The cart while in the City Road, and about two miles out of its way, ran against and injured the plaintiff:—Held, on the authority of Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. R. Rep. N.S. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100), that, as it appeared that the driver had started upon an independent journey for a purpose unconnected with his master's business, the defendant was not liable for the consequences of the accident.

Declaration by the plaintiff, suing by next friend, stating that the defendant, by his servant, so negligently managed a horse and cart that they struck against the plaintiff, who was knocked down and seriously bruised, wounded, &c.

(1) By the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 67, "If any trader liable to become bankrupt shall depart this realm, &c., or make or cause to be made, either within this realm or elsewhere, any fraudulent grant or conveyance of any of his lands, tenements, goods or chattels, or make or cause to be made any fraudulent gift, delivery or transfer of any of his goods or chattels, every such trader doing, suffering, procuring, executing, permitting, making or causing to be made any of the acts, &c., with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy."

Pleas—First, not guilty; secondly, that the horse and cart were not under the care and management of the defendant's servant.

Joinder of issue.

At the trial, before Hannen, J., at Westminster, in June, 1868, it appeared that the plaintiff, a boy about six years old, was crossing the City Road when he was knocked down by a cart belonging to the defendant and seriously injured. The defendant was a wine-merchant, carrying on business in Vine Street, Minories. Parfitt, the defendant's clerk, had been sent in the cart to deliver a quantity of wine and ale at Blackheath, and it was the carman's duty to bring back empty bottles to Vine Street, and then to put up the horse and cart. The cart, at three o'clock in the afternoon, had got so far as King William Street, on its way back, when Parfitt asked the carman to drive him to his house, in the City Road, and said that he would give him a cup of tea if he would take the cart to Barnsbury, to pick up an empty cask. They had proceeded about two miles out of the way when the accident happened.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the defendant, with leave for the plaintiff to move to enter it in his favour for 80*l*., the damages assessed by the jury.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Prentice and A. L. Smith shewed cause.—The defendant is not responsible for the negligence of his carman, because the carman at the time of the accident was not engaged in his master's business. Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100) is in point. There the carman, instead of putting up his master's horse and cart at the stable, was persuaded to drive the foreman part of the way home, and on his return from this journey drove against the plaintiff, and it was held that the master was not liable, on the ground that the driver had started on a new journey wholly unconnected with his employment.—(He was then stopped.)

Digby Seymour and Finlay, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff relies on the cases of Joel v. Morrison (6 Car. & P. 501), where Parke, B. expressed his opinion that, if a driver being on his master's business made a detour to call upon a friend, the master was responsible, and Sleath v. Wilson (9 Car. & P. 607), where Erskine, J. followed the ruling in the previous case, and held that the master was liable, though the driver, instead of driving to an inn and putting up the horse, was going another way on business of his own, the learned Judge saying that the driver at the time of the accident was acting in the course of his employment.

[LUSH, J.—Suppose the carman in this case had driven the cart to Barnet, and the accident had then happened?]

The driver was only bound to bring back the cart at some time on that day to his master's premises. Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100) is, in fact, an authority in favour of the plaintiff. There the servant had returned to his master's place of business, which was not the case here.

[MELLOR, J.—If the man had remained out till eleven o'clock at night he would still have been in his master's employment, but he could not be said to be on his master's business.]

In Whitman v. Pearson (37 L. J. C.P. 156), where a man who was in charge of a horse and cart drove it to his own house against orders, it was held that there was evidence to warrant a jury in finding that he was acting in his master's employment.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this rule must be discharged, and that the law as laid down in Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100) presents us with a true view of the case. I cannot adopt the proposition of Erskine, J. in Sleath v. Wilson (9 Car. & P. 607), that, whenever the master has entrusted the servant with the control of the carriage, it is no answer that the servant acted improperly in the management of it. I think that a servant can only be said to be acting in the employment of his master, so long as he is doing some act with his master's assent. I think that if a driver while acting in his master's business were to make a slight deviation in order to carry some business of his own into effect, in such a case the master might be liable, and that the question would be one of degree as regards the extent of the deviation. But this is not the present case. Here the man starts upon an entirely independent journey, which has nothing to do with that which he undertook on behalf of his employer. While returning home by way of King William Street he starts on a journey to the City Road, and is two miles out of his way when the accident happens. In Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100) the driver, after returning to his master's house, started upon an entirely independent journey. Here the case is not quite so strong, but in deviating as he did, the driver did, in fact, start upon an independent journey. I think that it would be a strange thing to hold that in such a case the master is responsible; and the rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. A master is generally speaking responsible for the acts of his servant while acting in his service, and, as was said by Cresswell, J., in Mitchell v. Crasweller (13 Com. B. Rep. 237; 22 L. J. C.P. 100), there can be no doubt that if a servant in executing the orders, express or implied, of his master, acts in a negligent, improper and roundabout manner, the master may be liable. But here the servant had collected all the articles which it was his duty to bring back, and all that he had to do was to return home and deliver them. But, instead of doing this, he starts off upon an independent journey, as my Lord has said, to accommodate a fellow-servant. As this journey was entirely for the accommodation of another the master ought not to be responsible for the consequences of it.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in all these cases is, whether the servant at the time of the accident was doing that which his master employed him to do? If this is proved to have been the case the master is responsible. Now here what the master employed the servant to do was to bring the empty casks and bottles home. If, in the ordinary course of things, the man had gone home in a roundabout way, the master might still have been responsible. But here the driver did not, in the literal sense of the words, go home, but started two miles out of his way home on the business of another person.

Rule discharged.

Contract — Breach of Illegal Contract — Detinue — Bailor and Bailee — Pleading.

CONTRACT. E.—To a declaration containing two counts, the first for the breach of a contract to re-deliver a bank note to the plaintiff, the second, detinue for the same note, the defendant pleaded that it was deposited by way of pledge to secure the repayment of money advanced to the plaintiff. Replication, that the money was knowingly advanced for immoral purposes. Upon the trial the facts were proved as stated in the pleadings:—Held, that upon the whole record the defendant was entitled to judgment, as it was impossible that the plaintiff could recover, except through the medium and by the aid of an immoral transaction to which he was himself a party, so that the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis was applicable.

Declaration—That in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, delivered to the defendant the half of a promissory note of certain bankers for the sum of 50*l.*, to be safely kept and taken care of by the defendant, and to be re-delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff on request, the defendant promised the plaintiff to safely keep and take care of the half note and re-deliver the same to the plaintiff on request. Breach, non-delivery of the note to the plaintiff on his request.

Second count—Detinue for a like half note.

Second plea to the first count, that the alleged agreement was subject to the term or condition, that the half note was to be kept by the defendant as a pledge or security for the payment of 20*l.* then due from the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the defendant received the half note for this purpose; and that the plaintiff would not pay the defendant the sum of 20*l.*, and that the defendant was prevented from performing her agreement by the neglect and default of the plaintiff. There was a like plea to the second count.

Replication to both pleas, that the alleged debts, in respect of which the defendant justified the non-delivery and detention of the security claimed by the plaintiff, were due for wine and suppers supplied by the defendant in a brothel and disorderly house kept by the defendant, for the purpose of being consumed there by the plaintiff and divers prostitutes in a debauch to incite them to riotous, disorderly and immoral conduct, and for money knowingly lent for the purpose of being expended in riot and debauchery and immoral conduct in the brothel.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

The cause, as will appear by the judgment, went down to trial, and a question similar to that raised by these pleadings was also raised upon a rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiff.

Hopwood (Holker with him), for the defendant.—Where a dispute arises out of an immoral contract the Court will not interfere between the parties. It cannot be said that the plaintiff is not relying upon the immoral transaction, for, if the whole cause of action had been set out in the declaration, the agreement would have been disclosed, and the defendant might have demurred. In Chitty on Contracts, 6th edit. 579, the law is thus laid down: "Whenever the contract which a party seeks to enforce, be it express or implied, is expressly or by implication borbidden by the common or statute law, no Court will lend its assistance to give it effect; and the test as to whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law is, whether the plaintiff requires to rely on such transaction in order to establish his case." In Holman v. Johnson (Cowp. 341, 343) Lord Mansfield, after stating that the objection that a contract is illegal or immoral is allowed not for the sake of the defendant, but because the Court will not lend their aid to the plaintiff, says, "So if the plaintiff and the defendant were to change sides, and the defendant was to bring his action against the plaintiff, the latter would then have the advantage of it, for where both are equally in fault potior est conditio defendentis." In Biggs v. Lawrence (3 Term Rep. 454), where goods were sold to be delivered in Guernsey in order that they might be smuggled into England, it was held that the vendor could not recover their value; and the same principle was upheld in Clugas v. Penaluna (4 Term Rep. 466). It is not necessary that the plaintiff should rely on the immoral transaction; it is enough if it be brought to light by the pleadings or the evidence. He also referred to Story's Equity Jurisprudence, s. 298.

Herschell (Pope with him), for the plaintiff.—The Court can only allow the defendant to retain this note by giving effect to an immoral agreement. The plea does not set out the real facts of the case, and ought to be considered as if the replication were incorporated with it. The plaintiff does not rely upon the contract of deposit. He knows that this contract can have no effect, and he therefore takes his stand upon his common law right to the note. If the Court decide in favour of the plaintiff, they will prevent the defendant from getting any benefit from the immoral contract. It surely could not be contended that an unlicensed broker could refuse to deliver up shares and other securities belonging to the principal, who had employed him knowing of his disability.

[HANNEN, J.—Ever since Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & A. 179) it has been settled that money advanced for an unlawful purpose cannot be recovered back. If goods were lent for the purpose of prostitution could detinue be brought for them?]

Yes. A special property is merely a right given by contract to hold an article for certain purposes. The defendant admits the plaintiff's property in the note, but says that there is a collateral contract which gives him a right to retain it. But the Court will not acknowledge this contract. Suppose, in an action for goods sold and delivered, the defendant were to plead a set-off in respect of some corrupt bargain, could this prevent the plaintiff from recovering his original debt?

[MELLOR, J., referred to Pearce v. Brookes (35 L. J. Ex. 134; L. R. 1 Ex. 213) and Bridges v. Fisher (3 El. & B. 642; 23 L. J. Q.B. 276) as to the right to recover the price of goods supplied in pursuance of an immoral contract.]

In Feret v. Hill (15 Com. B. Rep. 207; 23 L. J. C.P. 185) it was, it is true, held that ejectment could not be brought for a house which had been taken by the defendant for an immoral purpose. But there the letting of the premises was quite regular, and there was no agreement that they should be used for an improper object. Here there is nothing to affect the property of the plaintiff, but a contract which cannot be enforced.—He cited Scarfe v. Morgan (4 Mee. & W. 270, per Parke, B.; 7 L. J. Ex. 324) and Story on Contracts, 2nd edit. p. 405, s. 487.

Holker, in reply.—This case cannot be decided upon a mere question of pleading. The defendant merely informs the Court of the immoral transaction to which the plaintiff was a party, in order that the Court may not interfere to enforce or adjust it. When the details of this transaction are known it is clear that a special property in the note passed to the defendant, just as in Feret v. Hill (15 Com. B. Rep. 207; 23 L. J. C.P. 185) the term and interest in the premises passed to the defendant as soon as he entered into possession of them.

[HANNEN, J.—The consequence of entering into an arrangement like this appears to be that the special property becomes an absolute property.]

Nothing has happened to divest the interest which the defendant had acquired, and this case must be considered without reference to the order of the pleadings.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Mellor, J., and Hannen, J.) was delivered on April 20 by—

MELLOR, J.—In this case the plaintiff declared on the bailment of the half of a 50*l.* Bank of England note to the defendant, to be re-delivered on request, alleging a refusal by the defendant to re-deliver such half note. The second count was in detinue for the same half note.

The defendant, after traversing the delivery and detention of the note, and to the second count denying that it was the property of the plaintiff, pleaded separately and specially to both counts, in effect that the half not in question had been deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant by way of pledge, to secure the repayment of money due and money then advanced by the defendant to the plaintiff and then due.

The plaintiff joined issue on the defendant's pleas, and also replied specially that the alleged debt or sum in respect of which the defendant justified the non-delivery and detention of the half note, was for wine and suppers supplied by the defendant in a brothel and disorderly house kept by the defendant, for the purpose of being consumed there by the plaintiff and divers prostitutes in a debauch there to incite them to riotious, disorderly and immoral conduct, and for money knowingly lent for the purpose of being expended in riot and debauchery and immoral conduct.

The defendant rejoined, taking issue on the replication, and also demurred to its validity.

On the trial, before me at Manchester, the case of the plaintiff was, that the note had not been deposited at all with the defendant, but had been fraudulently taken and appropriated by her. The jury, however, did not adopt that view of the facts, but found that the note was deposited by way of security as alleged by the defendant, and they further found upon the evidence that the debt was incurred and the money advanced as alleged in the plaintiff's replication to the special pleas. On these findings the verdict was entered for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him for 50*l.*, to be reduced to nominal damages in case the note should be restored to the plaintiff. A rule was accordingly obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, on the ground that the jury "had found all the issues tendered by the plaintiff in his favour." This rule and the demurrer to the replication came on together for argument, at the Sittings in banco after last Hilary Term, before my Brother Hannen and myself, and at the close of the argument we took time to consider our judgment.

It was argued, on the part of the defendant, in shewing cause against the rule and in support of the demurrer to the special replication of the plaintiff, that, upon the finding of the jury and the facts as admitted by the demurrer, the plaintiff and the defendant were "in pari delicto," and that therefore, upon the whole record, judgment must be entered for the defendant. On the part of the plaintiff, it was urged that it was the defendant who was relying on the illegality of the transaction as an answer to a claim of the plaintiff, founded on his ownership of the note and his right to recover back the same, and many startling consequences were pointed out to us as likely to result from a decision that the plaintiff could not recover. We have fully considered the case, and are satisfied that the plaintiff cannot recover under the circumstances found by the jury and admitted on the record. The maxim that "in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" is as thoroughly settled as any proposition of law can be. It is a maxim of law, established not for the benefit of plaintiffs or defendants, but is founded on the principles of public policy, which will not assist a plaintiff who has paid over money or handed over property in pursuance of an illegal or immoral contract to recover it back, "for the Court will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect,"—per Lord Ellenborough, in Edgar v. Fowler (3 East, 222); Collins v. Blantern (2 Wils. 34); per Lord Mansfield, in Holman v. Johnson (Cowp. 343). The true test for determining whether or not the plaintiff and the defendant were in pari delicto is by considering whether the plaintiff could make out his case otherwise than through the medium and by the aid of the illegal transaction to which he was himself a party—Simpson v. Bloss (7 Taunt. 246); Finaz v. Nicholls (2 Com. B. Rep. 501, 512). It is to be observed that in this case the illegality is not in a collateral matter, as in the case of Feret v. Hill (15 Com. B. Rep. 207; 23 L. J. C.P. 185), which was cited for the plaintiff, but is the direct result of the transaction upon which the deposit of the half note took place. Mr. Herschell's argument was based upon the hypothesis that, in spite of the findings of the jury, the plaintiff was entitled to recover by virtue of his property in the half note, and that it was the defendant alone who set up an immoral transaction as the answers to the plaintiff's claim. This argument appears to us to be founded upon an entirely erroneous view of the facts. The plaintiff, no doubt, was the owner of the note; but he pledged it by way of security for the price of meat and drink provided for and money advanced to him by the defendant. Had the case rested there and no pleading raised the question of illegality, a valid pledge would have been created and a special property conferred upon the defendant in the half note; and the plaintiff could only have recovered by shewing payment or a tender of the amount due. In order to get rid of the defence arising from the plea, which set up an existing pledge of the half note, the plaintiff had recourse to the special replication, in which he was obliged to set forth the immoral and illegal character of the contract upon which the half note had been deposited. It was therefore impossible for him to recover, except through the medium and by the aid of an illegal transaction to which he was himself a party. Under such circumstances, the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis clearly applies, and is decisive of the case. It would also appear from the case of Scarfe v. Morgan (4 Mee. & W. 281; 7 L. J. Ex. 324)—per Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court—that, notwithstanding the illegality of the transaction itself, out of which the deposit in this case arose, that the lien would exist because the contract was executed and the special property had passed by the delivery of the half note to the defendant, and the maxim would apply "in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis." It is, however, sufficient in the present case to determine it upon the ground that the plaintiff could not recover without shewing the true character of the deposit; and that being upon an illegal consideration to which he was himself a party, he was precluded from obtaining "the assistance of the law" to recover it back. It is not necessary to consider what might have been the effect of a tender of the amount for which the note was pledged, as there is nothing to raise any such question in this case. The result, therefore, will be that the verdict must stand for the defendant on the issues taken on the special pleas, and for the plaintiff on the issue taken on the replication; but, as upon the whole record it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot recover, judgment will be entered for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Prohibition—Faculty to erect Buildings on Burial-Ground—Proceedings partly within and partly without the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Court—Interest of Party moving for Prohibition.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—A prohibition will not be granted to restrain a petition in the Ecclesiastical Court where it is within the jurisdiction of such Court to grant some of the privileges prayed for, especially where the applicant has no special interest in the proceedings.

The guardians of a parish having presented a petition to the Ecclesiastical Court, praying for a faculty to enable them to desecrate ground duly consecrated for the burial of the dead by erecting on part of it the parish workhouse and upon the rest a chapel for the inmates of the workhouse, a person, not being a rate-payer or in any way interested in the burial-ground, applied for a prohibition to restrain the Ecclesiastical Court from proceeding with the petition. It appeared that the burial-ground had been disused for many years, and that the workhouse had recently at a great expense been erected on a part of it where no corpses had been buried:—Held, that the prohibition must be refused on two grounds: first, that although ground once duly consecrated for the burial of the dead can only be applied to secular purposes by Act of Parliament, yet that so much of the petition as prayed leave to erect the chapel was within the jurisdiction of the Court, and it could not be presumed that the Court would entertain the residue of it; secondly, because the erection of the workhouse appeared to have been bonâ fide, and the applicant had no interest in the proceedings greater than what was common to the public at large.

Rule calling on Sir Travers Twiss, Judge of the Consistory Court of London, to shew cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit him from further proceeding in a certain suit instituted upon a petition of the board of guardians of the parish of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, praying for a licence or faculty to desecrate and erect certain buildings, being part of a new workhouse, upon a burial-ground set apart and duly consecrated for the use of the parishioners of the parish.

The material facts as disclosed by the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court and the affidavits used upon the argument of the rule were, that by the Act 43 Geo. 3. c. xxix., certain persons and their successors were appointed trustees for providing for the better relief and employment of the poor within the parish of Shoreditch, Middlesex, and were empowered to purchase land within this parish for the purpose of providing proper ground for the burial of the dead within the parish, and also a suitable piece of ground for erecting a workhouse for the poor thereof; and accordingly erected a workhouse on a portion of a plot of ground near Kingsland Road.

By virtue of a sentence duly given by the then Bishop of London, in 1778, a piece of this land adjoining the workhouse was consecrated as a burying-place for the use of the parishioners, and was inclosed accordingly. The powers of these trustees were continued by a later Act, which was itself repealed by 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxxxii., and administration of the poor law in the parish vested in a board of guardians, to whom the powers of the former trustees were transferred.

For some years subsequent to the occupation of the land and the building of the workhouse, a portion of the land was used for the burial of the deceased paupers of the parish, but for the last forty years the burial-ground had been disused, and no interments of any kind had taken place in it. It had also been closed by an Order in Council under the Burial Acts. No tombstones, mounds, &c., or other external marks of burials, were ever erected on the ground, and several buildings, consisting of cottages, outhouses and other premises, had from time to time during the last forty years been inadvertently erected upon it. The workhouse of the parish having fallen into decay, it became desirable to remove it, and to erect a new building under the statutory powers. The guardians accordingly, in March, 1863, entered into a contract with builders for the erection of a new workhouse, in accordance with plans approved of by the Poor Law Board, for the sum of 43,750*l*. The contractors, in the execution of the contract, laid the foundations of a new chapel, workhouse and infirmary upon the site of the old workhouse and the burial-ground. Neither the guardians nor the builders were aware at the time of these proceedings that the burial-ground was consecrated ground, and that it was necessary to obtain a faculty for permission to build upon it. The guardians subsequently presented a petition to the Consistory Court as above stated, praying that a licence or faculty might be granted to them for the erection of certain buildings for parochial purposes on the burial-ground.

An affidavit of the proctor to the guardians gave particulars of seven faculties or licences for the erection of buildings upon disused burial-grounds, which had been discovered upon searching the records in the registry of the Diocesan Court in London.

The rule nisi had been obtained at the instance of one Alfred Bedford, who appeared to have no connexion with any public body in the parish, and not even to be a ratepayer.

Digitized by Google

The rule was brought before the Court upon several occasions, when questions were discussed which it is unnecessary to notice.

Cause was finally shewn by

Barnard, Tayler and R. A. Pritchard.—The rule must be discharged. The question is one peculiarly within the cognizance of the Ecclesiastical Court. Faculties appear to have been frequently granted for the erection of schools and other buildings upon graveyards, and it will be for the tribunal which has been in the habit of granting such faculties to decide whether a proper case has been made out, and to what purposes the consecrated ground should be devoted. The case of The Rector, &c. of St. George's, Hanover Square v. Stewart (2 Str. 1126) is not in point. There a prohibition was granted to restrain a suit for a licence to build a charity school on part of a churchyard; but the reason of the decision was that the rector and parishioners had been cited in invitum, a proceeding which was not within the jurisdiction of the Court. Walter v. Mountague (1 Curt. 261) shews that in the opinion of Dr. Lushington a question relating to consecrated ground is peculiarly within the cognizance of the Ecclesiastical Court. Two things are asked for in the present faculty, one of which (the permission to erect the chapel) it is not disputed that the Ecclesiastical Court may lawfully grant. The other may be refused, and it will not be presumed that the Ecclesiastical Court will exceed its jurisdiction. This Court has already acted on this principle in Hallack v. the University of Cambridge (1 Q.B. Rep. 593), where the Court held that, assuming that the faculty prayed for had two objects, one of which could not be entertained, an application for a prohibition before the faculty was granted, was premature, as it could not be presumed that the Ecclesiastical Court would not care to limit the faculty, if any were granted, to those objects which might legally be embraced in it. In Campbell v. the Parishioners, &c. of Paddington (2 Robert. 558), Dr. Lushington granted a faculty for the erection of a vestry-room on consecrated ground, as the room was to be used for ecclesiastical as well as secular purposes. The Court in considering this application will keep in mind the fact that the applicant is a mere stranger, with no special interest in the affairs of the parish, and that the faculty is asked for by the parish authorities to legalize what has already been done, at a great expense, and with every desire to benefit the parish.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. Coleridge), in support of the rule.—There is authority both in ancient and modern times to shew that when ground has once been duly consecrated, and set apart for the purposes of burial, the Ecclesiastical Court has no power to interfere and desecrate it by applying it to secular uses. In The Rector, &c. of St. George's, Hanover Square v. Stewart (2 Str. 1126) a prohibition appears at once to have been granted. In The Rector and Churchwardens of St. John's, Walbrook v. the Parishioners thereof (Robert. 515), upon application for a faculty to make alterations in a burial-ground which was promoted both by the rector and the vestry. Dr. Lushington denied most distinctly that he had authority by the general law to exercise the power which was invoked, and that he remembered that Sir W. Wynne, when Judge of the Arches Court, had been asked for a faculty to convert part of a churchyard into a public road, and had refused, saying that nothing short of an Act of Parliament would enable him to accede to the prayer. In Harper v. Forbes (5 Jur. N.S. 275) the same learned Judge laid down the law in similar terms. It is not a question of discretion; the Ecclesiastical Court has no power to entertain the petition. He also referred to the customary form of consecration—Gibson's Cod. App., and (with regard to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court) to 2 Co. Inst. 489.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that, under all the circumstances, this rule must be discharged. At the same time I do not hesitate to express a very decided opinion that the doctrine laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Rector and Churchwardens of the Parish of St. John, Walbrook v. the Parishioners thereof (2 Robert. 550) is a perfectly right one, namely, that ground once consecrated to sacred purposes cannot, by any authority known to the law of this country, be divested of its sacred character, so as to become applicable to secular purposes. I think that there is quite authority enough in the case of St. George's, Hanover Square v. Stewart (2 Str. 1126), and in the two decisions of Dr. Lushington, to affirm this general proposition. But my reason for saying that I think this rule ought to be discharged rests on a much narrower ground. In the first place, our attention has been called to the fact that the faculty is applied for with reference to several purposes to which it is proposed to apply this churchyard, or rather, for this is the effect of it, to give immunity to the churchwardens, who have already converted this ground to such purposes, against the possibility of proceedings against them.

Now the faculty has reference to an application of the churchyard to distinct and separate purposes, and one of these, as we are informed, is that of the erecting a chapel upon part of the burial-ground. I think the distinction taken by Dr. Lushington between purposes purely secular and purposes of an ecclesiastical or sacred character may well be applied to this case, and that here we may consider, that although the faculty as applied for the erection of a school-house or an infirmary would not be such as the Ecclesiastical Court would be in law warranted in granting, yet the faculty as applied for in reference to the building of a chapel for the purposes of divine worship would be a purpose for which the faculty could be granted.

Now, the case of Hallack v. the University of Cambridge (1 Q.B. Rep. 593; 10 L. J. Q.B. 206) is, I think, an authority for saying that where the proceedings before an inferior Court have reference to purposes, one of which is within the competency of the Court and the other not, this Court ought not, in the first instance, to presume that the Court against which the prohibition is prayed will go beyond its competency and jurisdiction. I do not think the distinction made between that case and the present by the Solicitor-General is a sound one. I think that the principle applies to this case, and that it is good and sound sense, and a true and substantial distinction. If the whole matter pending before the inferior Court, and as to which the prohibition is applied for, be one beyond its competency and jurisdiction the prohibition ought to go. If the proceeding is one as to part of which a prohibition is competent, and part of which it is not, we ought not to presume that the Court below will act in excess of its jurisdiction, more especially as, when the case is well founded, a prohibition may be applied for here as well after sentence as before. In this case if the inferior Court, instead of distinguishing between that which is within its competency and that which is not, should act in excess of its jurisdiction, nothing could prevent the parties coming to this Court after the sentence has been given.

I think, on the authority of that case, this rule ought to be discharged.

Lastly, there is another ground for our decision, and that is the distinction which has frequently been taken in this Court, and which was very much insisted upon by my Brother Blackburn and myself in the case of In re Forster (4 Best & S. 198, 203; 32 L. J. Q.B. 314, 316), with regard to cases where the party at whose instance the application is made is an entire stranger. Here the applicant does not appear to be a parishioner, or in any way interested in the matter of this churchyard, and I presume that he has come forward (I do not say this in his disparagement) with a view of trying the abstract question of whether a churchyard once consecrated as such can ever after, except under the authority of an Act of Parliament, be converted to secular purposes.

I am in hopes that that which is now said by the Court in upholding not only decisions as far back as the time of Strange, but also the well-considered judgment of one of the first lawyers who ever sat in the Ecclesiastical Court, Dr. Lushington, will be sufficient to satisfy everybody that this is an act which cannot be recklessly and inconsiderately done, and not otherwise than by virtue of an Act of Parliament, that is to say, that the bodies of the dead cannot be removed and the ground in which they have been buried divested of the sacred character attached to it by the act of persons who may happen to be the owners of the soil, even though they obtain or purpose to obtain a faculty.

Looking at all the circumstances of the case, and the fact that what has been done was done without an intention to violate the law, or to outrage the proper feelings of those sensitive on such a subject, and that it is desired to obtain immunity from future consequences, I think we may come fairly to the conclusion that it is a case in which we ought to draw the distinction to which I have referred, and discharge the rule on the additional ground that the present applicant is an entire stranger in the matter, and has no interest whatever in this churchyard.

HANNEN, J. and HAYES, J. concurred.

Rule discharged.

Cheque—Time for Presentment—Notice of Dishonour—Country Banker and Customer.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. L.—The payee of a cheque drawn upon a bank at Falmouth paid it on Tuesday to the credit of his account in a bank at Truro, which is about ten miles from Falmouth. The Truro bank having no agent at Falmouth, sent the cheque by the post of the same day to their London agents, who received it on Wednesday morning. On the same day the cheque was handed by the agents through the clearing-house to the London agents of the Falmouth bank, and by the latter forwarded by the post of the same day to the Falmouth bank, who received it on Thursday morning. On the same morning the London agents of the Falmouth bank failed, and the agents of the Truro bank wrote at once to the Falmouth bank requesting them to pay the cheque or return it. The Falmouth bank replied by letter on Friday, refusing to pay the cheque or return it. On Saturday the Falmouth bank stopped payment. On the same day the manager of the Truro bank informed the payee of the non-payment of the cheque, and subsequently informed him that his account had been debited with the amount of it, though it was not so debited till about a fortnight afterwards. It appeared that it was the usage of bankers when a cheque is paid in by a customer to enter the amount to his credit, and if the cheque is not paid, then immediately upon its dishonour to return it to the customer, and upon so doing to debit his account with it. It also appeared that with regard to cheques drawn upon one Cornwall bank and paid into another, there had been during several years an arrangement by which the cheque was sent by post to the bank upon which it was drawn, and the accounts between the two banks adjusted at a weekly settlement. The Truro bank had never been a party to this arrangement, and if they had followed it the cheque in question would have been received by the Falmouth bank on Wednesday, and the payee credited with the amount:—Held, following Hare v. Henty (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 65; 30 L. J. C.P. 302), that the Truro bank was entitled to debit the payee with the amount of the cheque, as the cheque had been presented within reasonable time, and the payee had received reasonable notice of its dishonour.

This was an action brought, by the plaintiff, as public officer of the Devon and Cornwall Banking Company, to recover from the defendant the sum of 106*l.* 4*s.* The declaration contained the ordinary money counts for money lent, money paid, interest, and money due on accounts stated, the defendant pleading never indebted, payment and set-off. By consent of the parties the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court:

The Devon and Cornwall Banking Company, hereinafter called the plaintiffs, carry on the business of bankers in Cornwall, and have branch establishments at several different places, and amongst others at Truro, in Cornwall.

The defendant, for some time previous to the month of June, 1866, and until the month of August in the same year, was a customer of the plaintiffs, and kept an account at their branch at Truro.

At the time of the commencement of this action there was a balance of 106*l.* 4*s.* due from the defendant to the plaintiffs upon his banking account, unless he is entitled to be credited in such account with the amount of the cheque hereinafter mentioned, in which case nothing was due to them.

On Monday June 4, 1866, a person named Anderton, who kept an account with Hawkey & Co., bankers, carrying on business at Falmouth, in Cornwall, drew a cheque upon them for 106*l.* 4*s.* in favour of the defendant. This cheque was received by the defendant at Truro on the afternoon of the same day, and on the following morning, Tuesday, June 5, was paid by him to the plaintiffs to the credit of his account with them at their Truro branch.

The plaintiffs had not any branch establishment or agent at Falmouth (which is about ten miles from Truro), but there was direct postal communication twice every day between these places. Letters posted in the morning at Truro before half-past seven o'clock were delivered at Falmouth before ten, and those posted in the afternoon before four were delivered before six. The business hours of Hawkey & Co., at Falmouth, were from ten till three, but the clerks remained two or three hours after. Letters received by the afternoon post were not answered until the following morning, unless an answer by return of post was requested by the writer.

The manager of the plaintiffs' Truro branch sent the cheque by the post of Tuesday, June 5 (the same day on which it was paid in), to their London agents, Messrs. Barclay & Co., who received it on the morning of June 6. On the same day (Wednesday, June 6) the cheque was handed by Barclay & Co., through the clearing-house, to the Agra and Masterman's Bank, who then were the London agents of Hawkey & Co., upon whom the cheque was drawn. The Agra and Masterman's Bank, by post of the same day (Wednesday, June 6), forwarded the cheque to Hawkey & Co. at Falmouth. The Agra and Masterman's Bank was open until the close of banking-hours, namely, five o'clock, on the 6th. It subsequently, on the same evening, was known that the bank had suspended payment, and would not re-open on the following day. On the morning of the 7th the doors were closed.

Hawkey & Co. received the cheque in due course of post on the morning of Thursday, the 7th, when they knew of the suspension of the Agra and Masterman's Bank. They then debited Mr. Anderton's, the drawer's, account with the amount, and cancelled the cheque, and by the post of the same day wrote to the Agra and Masterman's Bank requesting them to pay the cheque on their account. They did not remit any funds to the Agra and Masterman's Bank to meet the cheque. The Agra and Masterman's Bank received Hawkey & Co.'s letter on Friday, June 8. The cheque was not paid to Barclay & Co., and still remains unpaid.

Upon the suspension of the Agra and Masterman's Bank, Barclay & Co. wrote on Thursday, the 7th, direct to Hawkey & Co. at Falmouth, directing them either to pay the cheque or return it. On Friday, June 8, 1866, Hawkey & Co replied by letter to Barclay & Co., refusing either to pay the cheque or return it, alleging that they had debited Anderton's account with the amount of the cheque, and directed the Agra and Masterman's Bank to pay it.

On Saturday, June 9, Hawkey & Co. suspended payment, and have never resumed payment. The cheque was retained by Hawkey & Co. and by the trustees appointed for winding up their affairs until October 25, 1866, when acting under legal advice they returned it to the plaintiffs, who offered to return it to the defendant's solicitor about a week after it had come to their hands, but he declined to receive it. On Saturday, June 9, the manager of the plaintiffs' Truro branch saw the defendant and informed him of the fact of non-payment of the cheque, stating that he did not know in whose possession it was, but would write and obtain the information. He also subsequently informed the defendant that his account had been debited with the amount of it. The account was not so debited until June 23, 1866.

It is the ordinary usage of bankers when a cheque is paid in by a customer to enter the amount to his credit, and if such cheque is not paid, then immediately upon its dishonour to return it to the customer, and upon so doing to debit his account with it.

The course pursued by the plaintiffs in forwarding the cheque to their London agents to be presented to the London agents of Hawkey & Co. through the clearing-house was in 1866 the usual and ordinary course pursued by country bankers out of Cornwall. It was also the usual and ordinary course pursued by bankers in Cornwall with respect to cheques drawn upon banks out of Cornwall. It was also the usual and ordinary course pursued by the plaintiffs whether the bank upon which the cheque was drawn was in or out of Cornwall. It was also the usual and ordinary course pursued by banks in Cornwall with respect to cheques drawn upon the plaintiffs' Cornwall branches. With respect to cheques drawn upon one Cornwall bank and paid into another, an arrangement or understanding had existed for many years amongst the principal banks in Cornwall as to the presentation of such cheques. The practice pursued under such arrangement or understanding was as follows:

The cheque was sent by post to the bank upon which it was drawn. A settlement took place every Saturday between the bank sending and the bank receiving such cheque with respect to all cheques which, during the preceding week, had been so sent from one to the other, and the balance due from one bank to the other upon such settlement was paid in London on the Tuesday following. The plaintiffs had never been parties to such arrangement, nor had any newly established bank; it was confined to the private banks. If the plaintiffs had followed such practice in the present case, the cheque in question would have been received by Hawkey & Co. on Wednesday, June 6. It would on the same day have been cancelled by them, and charged to the account of Anderton & Co., and the plaintiffs credited with the amount of it. The accounts for the preceding week between the plaintiffs and Hawkey & Co. would, if Hawkey & Co. had not suspended payment, have been balanced in the country on Saturday, June 9, and the balances would have been paid in London on Tuesday, June 12.

The defendant was not aware of the practice followed by the plaintiffs of sending through the clearing-house in London, cheques drawn upon banks in Cornwall, nor was he aware of the practice followed by other Cornwall banks. In the month of May, 1867, a meeting of Cornwall bankers was held. The plaintiffs were not parties to this meeting and were not represented at it. At this meeting resolutions were come to that, for the future, all cheques upon other banks in Cornwall paid in by customers, should be passed through the London clearing-house, and that notice of such resolution should be issued by the bankers, parties to such meeting, to their respective customers. After this meeting such notice was issued accordingly.

After the stoppage of Hawkey & Co., and before the defendant ceased to be a customer of the plaintiffs, they inserted the following notice in the pass-book of the defendant:

"Notice.

"Cheques on Bankers.

"The Devon and Cornwall Banking Company undertakes only, to forward the above by post for collection, to become answerable for the proceeds when they are actually received (nothwithstanding such cheques may have been credited to the accounts of customers for whom they were received), but the company does not undertake to give notice of delay of payment, any loss from which, or from theft, fraud, insolvency, or otherwise, is to be at the customer's risk."

The Court was to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact which a jury might draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, upon the facts above stated, the plaintiffs, at the time of the commencement of this action, were entitled to debit the defendant with the amount of the cheque. If the Court should be of opinion that they were so entitled, judgment was to be entered for the nominal plaintiff for 106*l.* 4*s.*, with interest from the time of the commencement of the action and costs of suit. If the Court should be of opinion that they were not so entitled, judgment was to be entered for the defendant, with costs of defence.

Coxon (Field with him), for the plaintiffs.—The Truro bank in presenting this cheque followed the usage adopted by country bankers generally in presenting their customer's cheques, and there can be no doubt that this usage is a reasonable one. In Hare v. Henty (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 65; 30 L. J. C.P. 302), where a cheque upon a bank at Lewes was paid on Friday into a Worthing bank it was held that a presentment on Monday was in time, as the Worthing bankers were only bound to send it by Saturday's post to their agents at Lewes. This decision is a clear authority in favour of the course adopted by the Truro bank. But even if the practice of the Cornish bankers had been followed, the plaintiffs would not have been bound to forward the cheque till such time on Wednesday as it could not have reached Falmouth till Thursday, so that the result would have been the same.

Sir G. Honyman (J. C. Mathew with him), for the defendant.—The cheque was not presented in due time. A banker who receives a cheque from his customer is not justified in parting with it until he has received the amount. Hare v. Henty (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 65; 30 L. J. C.P. 302) only decided that, as the roundabout way of forwarding the cheques through the London clearing-house did not take more time than if it had been sent directly to a country agent, the presentment was in time. In the present case the plaintiffs ought to have acted according to the course of business among Cornish bankers, and then the cheque would have been presented in time.

[LUSH, J.—It has always been held that you cannot throw an additional obligation on the holders of bills, by shewing that there are extraordinary posts to which they might have had recourse.]

Kilsby v. Williams (5 B. & A. 815) shews that the plaintiffs were agents to receive the money upon the cheque as soon as possible. The defendant cannot be bound by the usual practice of the plaintiffs, as he was ignorant of it—Sweeting v. Pearce (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 534; 30 L. J. C.P. 109). Secondly, the notice of dishonour was too late. The delay arose from the peculiar mode in which the plaintiffs transacted business. Barclay & Co. when they knew of the failure of the Agra and Masterman's Bank on Thursday, the 7th, ought to have presumed that the cheque was dishonoured, and have sent notice accordingly.

[HANNEN, J.—Supposing they had constructive notice of the dishonour, they would not have been bound to inform the plaintiffs of it till the next day, and then this notice on Saturday would have been in time.]

The rule has always been that the presentment of a cheque or notice of dishonour should be sent as soon as practicable the day after it is received or dishonoured.

[HANNEN, J.—In Williams v. Smith (2 B. & A. 500) Abbott, C.J., says, "If we were to say that the party must give notice by the next practicable post we should raise in many cases difficult questions of fact, and should according to the peculiar local situations of parties give them more or less facility in complying with the rule."]

He also cited Rickford v. Ridge (2 Campb. 537) and Bailey v. Bodenham (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 288; 33 L. J. C.P. 252).

LUSH, J.—I think that our judgment should be in favour of the plaintiffs. The first question is, whether the Truro Bank were guilty of any negligence in presenting the cheque. It is contended that they ought not to have forwarded the cheque by post to their London agents, but ought to have sent it directly to Falmouth. But I think that it has been clearly laid down, in Hare v. Henty (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 65; 30 L. J. C.P. 302), that this was not necessary. Erle, C.J., there says, after referring to Rickford v. Ridge (2 Campb. 537), "That decision has been recognized and acted upon, and establishes the general rule in all cases as between the parties to a cheque. And we think the rule applies not only as between the parties to the cheque, but as between banker and customer, unless circumstances exist from which a contract or duty, on the part of the banker, to present earlier or to defer presentment to a later period may be inferred." Assuming, therefore, that each person to whom the cheque is regularly forwarded has a whole day within which he may present it, it is evident that this cheque was presented within a reasonable time. The Truro bank were not required to have an agent at Falmouth, but if there had been such an agent and the cheque had been forwarded to him the presentment would still have been in time, as he might have received it on Wednesday, and would have the whole of the next day to present it. With regard to the notice of dishonour, I think that there were no laches on the part of the bank. The notice was given as soon as the bank were aware of the dishonour of the cheque, and the liability of the drawer was in no way affected. The defendant has, therefore, failed in proving any default on the part of the plaintiffs.

HANNEN, and HAYES, JJ., concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

by the sheriff under a writ of attachment and delivered into the custody of the defendant, the governor of a county gaol, under a warrant commanding him to keep the plaintiff in custody, so that the sheriff might bring her before the Court of Chancery to answer her contempt. The defendant having detained the plaintiff in custody beyond the prescribed period, although the plaintiff in Chancery had not brought her to the bar according to the statute:—Held, first, that in proceeding against the defendant for the undue detention, the proper form of action was trespass, and not case; secondly, that such an action was not within the limitation in 4 Geo. 4. c. 64, s. 75, which applied only to proceedings for acts done in a supposed exercise of the powers of the statute.

Declaration (laying the venue in Middlesex) for assaulting the plaintiff and imprisoning and keeping her in prison for six calendar months and three days, from December 4, 1864, to June 7, 1865, whereby the plaintiff suffered great pain of body and mind, &c., and incurred expense in obtaining her liberation from the imprisonment, and a decree in the High Court of Chancery was obtained against her in her absence, and her estate and effects sequestered by order of the Court.

Pleas—First, not guilty by statute (4 Geo. 4. c. 64, ss. 73-75); thirdly, that before and during the time of the committing of the alleged trespasses, the defendant was keeper of the gaol of and for the sheriff of the county of Devon in and for the county; and a suit was then pending in the High Court of Chancery in which Nicholas Moone was complainant and the now plaintiff was defendant, and a writ of attachment had been issued out of the Court of Chancery in the suit directed to the sheriff, commanding him to attach the now plaintiff if she should be found in his bailiwick, and that he should cause her to be brought to his gaol in the county and delivered to the keeper thereof, who was thereby directed to receive and keep her there safely, so that the sheriff might have her body before the Court of Chancery on November 28 then instant, there to answer to the Court touching a contempt which the now plaintiff, as it was alleged, had committed, as also such other matters as should be then and there laid to her charge; and to perform and abide such order as the Court should make in that behalf; and thereupon the writ was duly delivered to be executed to the sheriff, and he, under and by virtue of the writ, took and arrested the plaintiff, and conveyed her to the gaol, the same being the fit and proper place of confinement for her whilst in the custody of the sheriff; and the sheriff then and there delivered the plaintiff into the care and custody of the defendant as and being such keeper of the gaol, together with the warrant of the sheriff directed to the defendant, and whereby by virtue of the writ he commanded the defendant that he should receive and keep the plaintiff in the gaol safely, so that the sheriff might have her body before the Court of Chancery on November 28 then instant to answer the Court touching the contempt, &c. And the defendant, as and being such keeper of the gaol for the sheriff, and by his authority and command, then and there accordingly received and safely kept the plaintiff, and because neither the sheriff nor the defendant received, or had notice or knowledge of, any writ of habeas corpus or other writ, rule, or order of the Court of Chancery of other competent authority, requiring the defendant to bring the plaintiff before the Court of Chancery, or to discharge the plaintiff or otherwise to deal with the plaintiff, the defendant as and being such keeper of the gaol for the sheriff, and by his authority and command safely kept and detained the plaintiff in the gaol for a certain space of time, under and by virtue of the writ and warrant, which are the supposed trespasses in the declaration alleged.

Replication, to the first plea a joinder of issue, to the third plet, that the contempt for which the plaintiff was ordered to be attached was for not answering a bill filed in the High Court of Chancery, and that at the time of the arrest and confinement in the plea mentioned, the sheriff and the defendant had notice that the contempt for which the plantiff was ordered to be attached was for not answering; and, having such notice, it became and was the duty of the defendant to discharge the plaintiff from custody, if the plaintiff was not brought to the bar of the High Court of Chancery within thirty days from the time of the arrest and confinement of the plaintiff; and the plaintiff was not brought to the bar of the said Court within such thirty days, and the defendant did not discharge the plaintiff from custody though he was requested to do so.

Rejoinder taking issue on the replication.

There was also a new assignment to the third plea, to which the defendant pleaded not guilty, and the plaintiff joined issue.

At the trial, before Hannen, J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Trinity Term, 1868, it appeared that a bill in equity had been filed against the plaintiff to restrain her from committing waste upon land of which she was tenant for life, and that she had filed no answer to the bill, owing, as she alleged, to her poverty. A writ of attachment was accordingly issued against her, and a warrant delivered to the sheriff, as stated in the pleadings. A warrant directed to the defendant as keeper of the gaol was then deliverd to him by the sheriff commanding him to receive and keep the plaintiff in his custody, and in the margin of this warrant it was stated that the plaintiff was committed for not answering in the Chancery suit. The plaintiff was accordingly received into the gaol on November 4, 1864, where it appeared that she was treated with great kindness, but the defendant, being unaware of the practice in Chancery, detained her in custody till the following June.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with 25*l.* damages, leave being reserved for the defendant to move to enter a verdict in his favour.

A rule having been obtained calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict obtained in the case should not be set aside and a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant entered instead, on the grounds that trespass would not lie against the defendant, that the action was brought too late, and that it ought to have been brought against the sheriff, or why a new trial should not be had between the parties, on the ground that the damages were excessive.

J. J. Powell and Anderson shewed cause.—By 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 36, s. 15, rule 5[1], the gaoler in whose custody a defendant is imprisoned under

(1) The Act 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 36. s. 15, rule 5, enacts, "That if the defendant, under process of contempt for not appearing or not answering, be in actual custody, and shall not have been sooner brought to the bar of the Court under process to answer his contempt, the plaintiff, if the contempt be not sooner cleared, shall bring the defendant by a habeas corpus to the bar of the Court within thirty days from the time of his being actually in custody, or detained (being already in custody) upon process of contempt, and if the last day of such thirty days shall happen out of term, then within the first four days of the ensuing term; and where the defendant is in custody of the serjeant-at-arms, or of the messenger, upon an attachment or other process, the plaintiff shall, within ten days after his being taken into such custody, or if the last of such ten days shall happen out of term then within the first four days of the next ensuing term, cause the defendant to be brought to the bar of the Court; and in case any such defendant shall not be brought to the bar of the Court within the respective times aforesaid, the sheriff, gaoler or keeper, serjeant-at-arms or messenger, in whose custody he shall be, shall thereupon discharge him out of custody without payment by him of the costs of contempt, which shall be payable by the party on whose behalf the process issued."

By the 12th of the Consolidated General Orders of the Court of Chancery, rule 3, it is provided that "Where a defendant is in prison under an attachment for not answering, or, being already in prison, is detained under such an attachment, and is not brought to the bar of the Court within thirty days from the time of his being actually in custody or detained (being already in custody) under such attachment, he shall be discharged from the process for want of answer under which he was arrested or detained by the sheriff, gaoler or keeper of the gaol in whose custody he is, without payment of the costs of his contempt, which in such case shall be paid by the plaintiff. But if such defendant does not put in his answer within eight days after such discharge, the plaintiff may cause a new attachment to be issued against him for want of his answer."

By the 4 Geo. 4. c. 64, "An Act for consolidating and amending the laws relating to the building, repairing and regulating of certain gaols and houses of correction in England and Wales," section 75, "All actions, suits and prosecutions to be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of this Act, shall be laid and tried in the county where the facts were committed, and shall be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not otherwise."

By the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 126. s. 73, the whole Act 4 Geo. 4. c. 64, is (amongst others) repealed, and it is provided that no repeal thereby enacted shall affect, 2. Any right or privilege acquired, any security given, or other liability incurred under any Act thereby repealed.

process of contempt is bound to discharge him from custody if he is not brought to the bar by the plaintiff within the prescribed period. Independently therefore of the Consolidated Orders in Chancery, the defendant as gaoler was guilty of a trespass in detaining the plaintiff. The warrant to the gaoler gives him notice that the prisoner is in custody for a contempt of the Court of Chancery. The defendant will rely on Smith v. Egginton (7 Ad. & E. 167; 6 L. J. K.B. 206), where it was held that case and not trespass was the proper form of action against the sheriff for not discharging the defendant from custody under this Act. But this case is distinguishable. There the action was against the sheriff, not the gaoler, and it did not appear that the sheriff had notice of the illegal detention. In Fortescue v. Hallett (26 L. J. Ch. 711) it was held that that part of the 5th sub-section which allows the plaintiff the first four days of the next term in case the thirty days expire out of term is superseded by the 74th Order of May, 1845, an order which is in similar terms to those of No. 12, of the Consolidated General Orders, rule 3, so that the defendant ought to have discharged the plaintiff from custody directly the thirty days had expired. With regard to the objection raised under the plea of not guilty, that the case is within the limitation in the 4 Geo. 4. c. 64, s. 75, this statute is among those scheduled as repealed in the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126. But even assuming that this section applied, the act complained of was done without jurisdiction, and not in exercise of the powers of the statute.

Huddleston and Bullen, in support of the rule.—In the first place, this action is against the governor of a prison, and is therefore subject to the limitation in the Consolidation Act relating to gaols and houses of correction (4 Geo. 4. c. 64), s. 75, which directs that in actions commenced against any person for anything done in execution of the Act the venue shall be local, and the action commenced within six calendar months after the act committed, and Exeter gaol is among those in the schedule to the Act. This limitation is not affected by the repeal of the Act by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126 (passed July 6, 1865), for in the repealing section, 73, it is provided that the repeal shall not affect any right or privilege acquired, any security given, or other liability incurred under any Act thereby repealed. Secondly, the form of the action ought to have been case, not trespass. Smith v. Egginton (7 Ad. & E. 167; 6 L. J. K.B. 206) is an authority for this proposition, where it is laid down that a subsequent irregularity cannot make a detention like the present one, which was originally lawful, a trespass ab initio. In Salmon v. Percivall (Cro. Car. 196), which is there cited, where in a declaration for false imprisonment the defendant pleaded that he was serjeant of the mace in London and arrested the plaintiff under the custom of London till he should find bail, and the plaintiff replied that he tendered sufficient bail, but the defendant notwithstanding would not discharge him, it was held, on motion in arrest of judgment, that even if the defendant could have accepted bail, his refusal did not make the arrest and imprisonment tortious, so as to have trespass, but he might have an action on the case for detaining the plaintiff after bail tendered. The sheriff is the real person liable. The warrant is directed to him, and the gaoler is just as much his servant as the turnkey of the prison. They also argued that the amount of the damages was excessive.

LUSH, J.—I quite agree that this is a very hard action, and I should have been well satisfied if the damages had been nominal only, but the jury thought proper to award a substantial sum, though every point which they ought to have taken into consideration was suggested to them by the learned Judge. We cannot therefore set aside the verdict on the ground that the damages were excessive. We come now to the questions of law. The first objection is, that the action is out of time, and that it is within the limitation in 6 Geo. 4. c. 64, s. 75. By this section, "all actions, suits and prosecutions to be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of this Act, shall be laid and tried in the county where the facts were committed, and shall be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed." Although the whole Act has since been repealed, yet the words in the saving clause of the repealing section are such that I should have thought that the defendant would have been protected by it if it had applied to the circumstances of this particular case. But the section was intended to apply to a case where the act complained of purported to have been done in pursuance of the statute, and was meant to protect those who have attempted to carry out the provisions of the Act, such as those relating to the classification of prisoners, and have failed in doing so. If the action had been brought for an improper classification of the plaintiff as a prisoner, or for disregarding any of the prison rules, the defendant would have been entitled to the benefit of section 75. But the action is for wrongfully keeping the plaintiff in prison beyond the prescribed period, and there is no limitation to the bringing of an action for such an offence in this or the other statutes.

Secondly, it is said that the action ought to have been brought against the sheriff, and not against the gaoler. This question turns on the construction of the 5th sub-section of 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 36, s. 15, and may be decided together with the objection that the form of action ought to have been case and not trespass. The 5th sub-section directs that if the defendant, under process of contempt for not appearing or not answering, be in actual custody, and shall not have been sooner brought to the bar of the Court, under process, to answer his contempt, the plaintiff, if the contempt be not sooner cleared, shall bring the defendant by a habeas corpus to the bar of the Court within thirty days from the time of his being actually in custody or detained (being already in custody) upon process of contempt, and if the last day of such thirty days shall happen out of term, then within the first four days of the ensuing term; and in case any such defendant shall not be brought to the bar of the Court within the respective times aforesaid, the sheriff, gaoler or keeper, serjeant-at-arms or messenger in whose custody he shall be, shall thereupon discharge him out of custody without payment by him of the costs of contempt, which shall be payable by the party on whose behalf the process issued. Now, it is immaterial to consider the subsequent Regula or Order of the Court of Chancery by which the period during which the person in contempt is to be kept in custody after term is shortened, as I understand that the plaintiff was kept in custody beyond the period at the expiration of which the statute makes it the duty of the gaoler to discharge the prisoner. The fact that the prisoner has been kept in custody beyond the prescribed period must be known to the defendant as gaoler, for if a habeas corpus had issued it must have been directed to him. The statute mentions the "sheriff, gaoler or keeper" in whose custody the prisoner may be, and deals with the gaoler as an independent officer, as in fact he is, with duties of his own. He was the person who had the plaintiff in his actual custody, and it was his duty to discharge her out of his custody at the expiration of the prescribed period. This case is very distinguishable from Smith v. Egginton (7 Ad. & E. 167; 6 L. J. K.B. 206), and also from the case of Salmon v. Percivall (Cro. Car. 196). In these cases the plaintiff was only constructively in the custody of the sheriff, or person arresting him, and was really in the custody of the gaoler. This was why the action in Smith v. Egginton (7 Ad. & E. 167; 6 L. J. K.B. 206) failed. A similar remark applies to Salmon v. Percivall (Cro. Car. 196). There was there no statute which imposed upon the serjeant-at-arms the duty of discharging the plaintiff; he was simply required to arrest the defendant, and carry him to prison till he found bail.

I think, therefore, that as the statute imposed upon the defendant the duty of discharging the plaintiff from custody within a prescribed period, the breach of this duty is ground for an action of trespass, and that the gaoler is the person against whom this action ought to be brought. The rule must therefore be discharged, and the verdict for the plaintiff will stand.

HANNEN and HAYES, JJ., concurred.

Rule discharged.

IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH. June 3, 1869.

WELFARE v. THE LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

38 L. J. Q.B. 241; L. R. 4 Q.B. 693; 20 L. T. 743; 17 W. R. 1065.

Carriers by Railway—Passenger—Evidence of Negligence.

CARRIERS. B.—The plaintiff went to the station of the defendants, a railway company, intending to travel by their line to C. A train had started previously, and, upon inquiring of a porter when the next train for C. would start, the plaintiff was directed to go to a time-bill which was hanging outside of the door of the booking-office and under a covering or portico. While standing looking at the time-bill, he received an injury from a plank and a roll of zinc which fell through the covering, and upon looking up he saw the legs of a man protruding through the covering:—Held, that, there being nothing to shew that the defendants knew that the covering was insecure, or that the man who was upon it was employed by them, there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, and that the plaintiff must be non-suited.

The declaration alleged that, at the time, &c., the defendants were carriers of passengers for hire from London to Croydon on a railway, and used a certain station at or near London Bridge for the reception and accommodation of their said passengers, and the said station was then in the possession and under the management of the defendants for the purposes aforesaid. That the plaintiff lawfully, in order to become a passenger on the defendants' railway from London to Croydon, by the defendants' permission and invitation, was about to enter the said station by the doorway over which there was a covering and a wood and iron roof, forming part of the said station, and in the possession of and used by the defendants, which it was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to become such passenger, to pass under. Nevertheless, by and through the mere carelessness, negligence and default of the defendants in that behalf, the said covering and wood and iron roof was then in an insecure and dangerous condition, and unfit for persons to pass under; and, by reason of the said covering and wood and iron roof being in such insecure and dangerous condition, and unfit as aforesaid, and of the mere carelessness, negligence, default and improper conduct of the defendants in that behalf, a large piece of wood fell through and out of the said covering and wood and iron roof upon the plaintiff as he was about to enter the said station, and he sustained bodily injuries, and remained ill and unable to attend to his business, &c.

Pleas—First, not guilty; secondly, that the plaintiff was not about to enter into the said station by the permission and invitation of the defendants in order to become a passenger on the defendants' railway in manner and form as in the said declaration in that behalf alleged; thirdly, that, at the time of the committing, &c., the said covering and wood and ironwork roof did not form part of the said station, nor was it then in the possession of, or used by, the defendants in manner and form as in the declaration alleged.

Issues were joined on these pleas.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at the sittings in Middlesex, after Trinity Term, 1868, it appeared that the plaintiff went on November 25, 1867, to the London Bridge Station of the defendants, intending to go by their railway to Croydon. He found that the train had started, and therefore made inquiry of a porter when the next train for Croydon would start. The porter directed him to a time-bill which was hanging outside the door of the booking-office and under a portico or covering. The plaintiff went to the spot, and as he stood there, looking at the time-bill, he was struck by something on the back of his neck. He found that a plank and a roll of zinc had fallen through the covering, and that one or other of them had struck him, causing the injury in respect of which the action was brought. Upon looking up, he saw that the legs of a man were protruding through the covering.

The learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that there was no evidence to prove that there was any negligence on the part of the defendants.

Subsequently, a rule was obtained calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

Huddleston and Lopes shewed cause against the rule.—The Judge was warranted in holding that there was nothing to be left to the jury. Cotton v. Wood (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 568; 29 L. J. C.P. 333) shews that a mere scintilla of evidence is not sufficient; there Erle, C.J. said that there ought to be proof of well-defined negligence—see also Hammack v. White (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 588; 31 L. J. C.P. 129). Reliance will be placed by the other side on Byrne v. Boadle (2 Hurls. & C. 722; 33 L. J. Ex. 13), where it was held that the mere fact of the plaintiff being injured by a barrel of flour falling upon him from an upper window of the house in which the defendant, a flour-dealer, carried on his business, was evidence of negligence to go to the jury; but that case differs from the present in this respect, that there the barrel must have been moved in the course of the trade and business of the defendant, while here the defendants had nothing to do with the man who was said to have walked across the roof. The nature of the accident may decide whether primâ facie there was any evidence of negligence. In Scott v. the London Dock Company (3 Hurls. & C. 596; 34 L. J. Ex. 220), in the Exchequer Chamber, Erle, C.J. said: "The majority of the Court have come to the following conclusion: that there must be reasonable evidence of negligence; that where the thing is solely under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen to those who have the management of machinery and use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care." But that case also differs from the present in this respect, that the injury was caused by bags of sugar falling from a crane used by the defendants; but here there was nothing to connect the plank or the roll of zinc with the defendants.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The roof from which they fell was the property of the defendants. But if the jury might take into account the universal habit of employing a contractor or tradesman to do repairs to the roof of a house or building, it would seem as if there was nothing to go to the jury.]

It is fair to suppose that the defendants employed a contractor who sent his own men to do the work, in which case the defendants would not be liable; but further, there is nothing to shew that the man was carrying the plank or the zinc. In The Great Western Railway of Canada v. Braid (11 W. R. 444) it was held that the fact of a railway having given way was some evidence of the railway having been insufficiently constructed, and that such evidence, if unrebutted, might become conclusive evidence. But that is very different from the present case.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It may fairly be assumed here that the man was on the roof for the purpose of doing something to it, but it would also be likely that he was employed by an independent tradesman; and if that might be assumed, I thought that there would be no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants.]

C. Wood, in support of the rule.—It is submitted that the plaintiff made out a case which the defendants were called upon to answer. The plaintiff was directed to go to the place over which the defendants had placed the roof; it was their duty to keep it in such a secure condition as that no injury should happen to him while he was standing there.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—You must not put it on the ground that the defendants warranted that the roof should be absolutely secure; but it is not necessary that you should go so far as that.]

No, it is sufficient to put the plaintiff's case in the way in which it was put in Byrne v. Boadle (2 Hurls. & C. 722; 33 L. J. Ex. 13). In that case, Bramwell, B. said, in the course of the argument (see the Law Journal Reports),

Digitized by Google

"Look at this case in a reasonable way. The injury is done to the plaintiff, but he has no means of knowing how; the defendant has all those means, and does not think fit to tell the jury." In the present case, it is certain that there was negligence on the part of some person; how can it be said that the plaintiff could be expected to get upon the roof to ascertain whose negligence it was?

[BLACKBURN, J.—You might have interrogated the defendants.]

It might have been more prudent to have taken that course, but the plaintiff relied upon the decisions, which shew that the case which he was able to prove would entitle him to call upon the defendants for an answer. It may be inferred from the fact that the man was upon the defendants' roof that he was there by their order, and working for them. In Briggs v. Oliver (35 L. J. Ex. 163) the plaintiff was going to the doorway of a house in which the defendant had offices; a packing-case, which was watched by the defendant's servant, was leaning against the wall of the house; the servant pushed the plaintiff out of the way, and the packing-case fell and injured the foot of the plaintiff. It was held that there was a primâ facie case to go to the jury, the fall of the packing-case being some evidence that it had been improperly placed against the wall, Bramwell, B. said, "I quite agree that we should be overruling the cases of Byrne v. Boadle (2 Hurls. & C. 722; 33 L. J. Ex. 13) and Scott v. the London Dock Company (3 Hurls. & C. 596; 34 L. J. Ex. 220) if we held that there was no evidence of negligence in this case. Every case must, no doubt, depend upon its own particular circumstances. Now there was abundant evidence that the defendant was responsible for this packing-case. It was close to his premises, belonged to him, and his servant, as was not denied, was watching it; and therefore, if it was in an unsafe position and did anybody damage, he was responsible. Then, was there any evidence that it was in an unsafe position? To my mind there was, and as has been said res ipsa loquitur. Packing-cases do not fall naturally and of their own accord, when they are carefully placed in a proper position; and we have no right to assume that something was done to this packing-case by somebody else not the defendant's servant so as to cause its fall. Therefore there was a primâ facie case of negligence," &c. It is submitted that that language applies to the present case. Further, a duty was cast upon the defendants to keep the roof in such a state that it would not cause an injury while it was being repaired—see Pickard v. Smith (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 470), where the occupier of a coal-cellar, under the platform of a railway station, was held responsible for an injury suffered by a passenger falling into the cellar-opening, although the opening was left unguarded by the servants of a coal-merchant who were engaged in shooting coals into the cellar.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It cannot be said here that there was anything like a trap, as in Pickard v. Smith (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 470).]

Enough was shewn by the plaintiff to call upon the defendants for an answer. As to the point raised, that the defendants would not be liable if the man was employed by a contractor, the case of Gray v. Pullen (5 Best & S. 970, 981; 34 L. J. Q.B. 265) shews that when it was the duty of the defendant to make a drain, and to fill up the cutting which was made in the public footway, the fact of his having employed a contractor, who had omitted to fill up the cutting, did not excuse him from liability in respect of an injury received by the plaintiff in consequence of getting into a hole caused by the subsidence of the ground. In truth, the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies, and it is submitted that the plaintiff is entitled to have this rule made absolute.

COCKBURN, C.J.—If the question was whether there was any proof of negligence on the part of the man, who may be supposed to have trodden upon a plank lying upon the covering which was over the place where the plaintiff was standing, and if there had been any such proof, it would have been important to have ascertained whether he was a servant of the company, or whether he had been employed by some builder or other tradesman to do work upon the roof, because, if he had been so employed, he would not be the servant of the defendants, and they would not be liable in this action. If it had been necessary to determine such a question, it may be that we should have had to consider whether the case was properly withdrawn from the jury on the ground that there was no evidence. I rather go along with the plaintiff's counsel when he says that when you find a thing done upon the premises of a person, you may generally draw the inference that it was done by a person employed by him and by his order, but it seems to me that rule does not apply here, because it is a matter of general knowledge, that people in the metropolis do not employ their own servants to do such work as this, and I think that the Judge and jury would draw the inference that the man was employed by a contractor or tradesman rather than that he was the servant of the owners of the premises. But I do not think that we get as far as that point. The difficulty is, that the only evidence of negligence is that the company allowed some person to go upon the covering when it was not sufficiently strong to support his weight, so that the plank and roll of zinc fell through and caused injury to the plaintiff while he was lawfully by leave of the defendants upon the spot. But in order to make out negligence so as to make the defendants liable in respect of that injury, the plaintiff must shew either that the defendants knew, or had the means of knowing, that the covering was in an insecure state or that the person who was upon it was employed by them. Now, in the great majority of cases, a person who desires that his roof should be repaired employs a competent person first to see what repair is wanted to the roof, and then to execute the necessary repairs. In this case, there is nothing whatever to shew that the defendants knew, or had the means of knowing, that the covering was in an insecure state, and nothing to shew any want of reasonable care on their part to ascertain in what state it was, so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this action which is brought against them. The rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the maxim respondeat superior does not apply to this case, because there cannot be said to have been any proof of an act of negligence committed by the man who was upon the covering. The injury to the plaintiff may have happened from a pure accident, and, if so, it is immaterial to consider whether the man was the servant of the defendants or not. There was not sufficient evidence to leave to the jury.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Suppose the action had been brought against the man himself, there would have been no evidence to go to the jury to shew that he had been guilty of any negligence. It appears that the plaintiff upon looking up saw the legs of a man through the covering, but it rather seems that that may have been the result of an accident, and I do not see any evidence to go to the jury that the injury was caused by his negligence. The principle of respondeat superior, therefore, does not apply. Next, is there any evidence to shew that the defendants were guilty of neglect in allowing him to be there? There is no proof whatever that they knew that the covering was not sufficiently strong to support him, and no evidence to justify the jury in finding that the defendants were guilty of negligence in allowing him to be there.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Where a master sends his servant to perform some work, and an injury is caused by the servant while doing such work, the master is responsible: but it is otherwise when the person doing the work is the servant of a contractor. In the present case, if the man who was on the covering was the servant of the company and had been guilty of negligence, there would be evidence to shew that the company was responsible. But I very much doubt whether there is any proof that the man was guilty of any negligence; and even if there was, the company would not be liable unless he was shewn to be their servant. But the plaintiff contends that, whether the man was employed by a contractor or not, the defendants are responsible, because a duty was thrown upon them to take care that the place upon which the plaintiff was standing was a fit place, and that the covering was in such a state that the injury should not happen to him, and he cites Pickard v. Smith (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 470); but I think that there is no duty cast upon the defendants to insure that nothing should fall. They were bound, no doubt, to take reasonable care that the covering was in a fit state, so that those whom they invite to come upon their premises should not suffer injury by reason of its defective state; but here there is nothing to shew that they did not take such reasonable care. Something more than the mere occurrence of the accident is wanted to make them liable in this action. But there is in reality nothing more.

Rule discharged.

Costs—Action for Slander—Recovery of Sum not exceeding 10*l.*—30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 5.

COSTS. I.—Where, in an action of slander, the plaintiff recovers less than 10*l., and the Judge declines to certify, under* 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 5, that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court, the Court, if called upon to determine whether costs should be allowed or not, will consider all the circumstances under which the action was brought, the amount of damages recovered, the fact of the Judge declining to certify, and the fact that the action could not have been brought in the County Court.

The 5th section of the above Act is general in its application, and applies to all actions, whether they can be brought in a County Court or not.

The first count of the declaration was for trespass in turning the plaintiff out of his dwelling-house, and the second and third counts were for slander.

Plea—not guilty to the whole declaration. Issue joined.

At the trial, which took place, before Mellor, J., at Westminster, at the Sittings in Easter Term, it appeared that the plaintiff, a lawyer's clerk, was tenant to the defendant of a dwelling-house, and that the trespass complained of was an entry by the defendant into the house, which had been shut up and left by the plaintiff, a quarter's rent being due to the defendant. It was also alleged that the defendant had uttered slanders of the plaintiff, as set out in the second and third counts of the declaration, namely, as alleged in the second count, that he was unable to pay his rent, and, as alleged in the third count, that he had taken the gas-meter away from the house.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the first count, with ½*d.* damages; on the second with 3*l.* damages; and on the third count they found a verdict for the defendant.

The learned Judge having refused to certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in this Court, a rule nisi was afterwards obtained, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why he should not pay to the plaintiff his costs of the action, to be taxed by one of the masters.

Cook shewed cause against the rule.—There is a preliminary objection which arises upon the affidavits. This is an appeal from the decision of a Judge at chambers, and there is no affidavit shewing what facts were brought before the Judge. The rule ought to have been drawn up on reading the affidavits used at chambers—see Warman v. Halahan (30 L. J. Q.B. 48) and Day's Common Law Procedure Act, 3rd edit. 239.

[Per Curiam.—There is no such inflexible rule, and probably the affidavits now before the Court disclose all the facts brought before the Judge at chambers.]

Digitized by Google

Then it is submitted that the rule ought to be discharged. The plaintiff seeks to get his costs upon the second count, upon which he has got 3*l*. damages. The learned Judge who tried the cause refused to certify, and there is nothing to lead the Court to suppose that the circumstances were such as that the plaintiff ought to be allowed his costs. In Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175), this Court allowed the costs, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in Craven v. Smith (38 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 4 Ex. 146), did the same; but it was held in the latter case that the 5th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. applies to actions of slander as well as other actions, and deprives the plaintiff of his costs if he recovers a sum not exceeding 10*l*., unless the Judge grants a certificate, or a rule or order for the costs be subsequently made. But the present action was really an action of trespass against the landlord.

[MELLOR, J.—I refused to certify because I thought that the action ought not to have been brought.]

Just so. It is material to observe that under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 34, there was a security against actions being brought in respect of wrongs which were not substantial, because if the plaintiff recovered less than 5*l*. he could not recover his costs if the Judge certified that the action was not really brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages, and that the trespass or grievance in respect of which the action was brought was not wilful and malicious, and that the action was not fit to be brought. But that section is repealed by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 33, which affords a reason for holding that the 5th section applies to all actions for wrongs; and in Craven v. Smith (38 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 4 Ex. 146) Bramwell, B. said that he did not think that in Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175) Hayes, J. meant that in all cases of slander, when more than 40*s*. was recovered, there was reasonable ground for bringing the action. It is submitted that the Court will consider all the circumstances, and will agree with the learned Judge who tried the cause that this was an action which ought not to have been brought.

Finlay, in support of the rule.—The preamble of the Act shews that it was passed for the purpose of amending the Acts relating to the jurisdiction of the County Courts. Substantially this was an action of slander. In Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175) it was thought that section 5. does not apply to an action of slander, which cannot be brought in a County Court; and it is submitted that if the plaintiff in such an action recovers 40*s*. he is entitled to his costs. That is the limit established by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, which Act is still in force. In Craven v. Smith (38 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 4 Ex. 146) Bramwell, B. was of opinion that in an action of slander, which could not be brought in the County Court, if the plaintiff recovered substantial damages (in that case 5*l*.) a primâ facie case for costs was made out, which called upon the defendant for an answer. The power given to the Judge who presides at the trial to certify, applies only where the plaintiff has a right to elect whether he will sue in the County Court or not, and it is submitted that the present plaintiff has made out a case which calls upon the defendant for a substantial answer.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The case divides itself into two questions, which depend on different considerations. It is said, first, that the 5th section does not apply at all to actions like the present; and, secondly, that if it does, this Court, in the exercise of its discretion, will refuse to order that the plaintiff shall recover his costs. But I think that the section does apply to such actions. I think it is of general application, first, because it is general in its terms, which apply to all actions of tort, and to an action of slander amongst them. But then it is argued that inasmuch as the section is found in an Act, which primâ facie appears to have been intended to force people to bring their actions in the County Courts, it ought not to be construed to be applicable to actions which cannot be brought in such a Court. At first sight the argument seems to be plausible, and would lead us to agree with the conclusion suggested, but then my Brother Blackburn has called attention to the fact that, prior to the passing of this Act there was the 34th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), a most salutary provision, which enabled a Judge to deprive a plaintiff of his costs by certifying that the action was not really brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages, and that the trespass or grievance was not wilful and malicious, and that the action was not fit to be brought. I entirely coincide with what has fallen from my Brother Mellor, that a vast number of frivolous actions of slander have been brought, and then when we find the 33rd section of this Act repealing the 34th section, to which I have just referred, I think it goes far to shew that the 5th section, which is general in its terms, is general also in its application. That being so, the whole question is, whether in the exercise of the power which is given to us, this is a case in which we ought to allow these costs.—[His Lordship read the section, and then continued]—It appears, therefore, that power is given to the Judge at the trial to certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior Court, and power also is given to the Court or a Judge at chambers to allow the costs. Now, is this a fit case for allowing such costs? That depends much upon the nature of the action and the circumstances under which it was brought. My Brother Mellor thinks that this was an action in which he, as the Judge who presided at the trial, could not certify that there was sufficient cause for bringing the action, and he also thinks that this Court ought not to allow the costs. I concur with him. The slander was of a very doubtful character, and the verdict was for 3*l.* only. I therefore think that this rule should be discharged.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have nothing to add, except that Mr. Cook is entitled to the credit of having pointed out that section 34. of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126. is repealed. I give him the credit of the argument which he has used on the appeal of that section. The cases of Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175) and Craven v. Smith (38 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 4 Ex. 146) decide that one of the elements for consideration, in determining the question before us, is that this is a kind of action which cannot be brought in the County Court. There is strong primâ facie ground for saying that we must take into account that fact, and also the opinion formed by the Judge and jury who heard the cause. I agree that in this case we ought not to allow the costs.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The evidence satisfied me that the action was brought entirely independently of the slanderous words which were spoken.—[The learned Judge went through the facts.]—There was the strongest presumption that the plaintiff was not tenant from year to year, but was only temporarily in possession. The jury gave a verdict for 1*s.* only on the count in trespass, and if they had thought that the plaintiff was a tenant from year to year they would have given more than that. Mr. Finlay, by great ingenuity, succeeded in inducing them to give a verdict for 3*l.* upon one of the counts in slander. I was a little surprised at their doing so, and was certainly dissatisfied with the verdict. Probably the action would never have been brought at all, if the plaintiff had not been a lawyer's clerk. The Judge, who presides at the trial determines whether or not he will grant a certificate by considering all the matters which occur before him in the course of the trial, and in this case I thought that I ought not to grant one. But facts may subsequently be brought to the knowledge of the Court which will present a ground for giving the plaintiff his costs. Ought we now to exercise our discretion in favour of the plaintiff? I assume that it never could have been intended that encouragement should be given to frivolous actions of slander, which would be the case if we allowed the present plaintiff to get his costs.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I merely wish to add a few words upon the bearing which Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175) has upon the present case. I think that the 5th section is general in its terms, and extends to actions of slander; the Court or a Judge at chambers has by that section larger powers than the Judge who presides at the trial. The latter may not think it right to certify that there was sufficient cause for bringing the action, and yet afterwards facts may be shewn which make it proper that the plaintiff should have his costs. The Court may also be of opinion that the Judge at the trial did not exercise his discretion properly. In Gray v. West (38 L. J. Q.B. 78; L. R. 4 Q.B. 175) the reasons which influenced the Court to hold that the costs ought to be allowed, are set out at the end of the judgment: "We think, therefore, that, as in the present case the plaintiff has recovered an amount much beyond what would have entitled him to costs under the general law applicable to actions for slander in the superior Court, and as he could not have sued elsewhere, that he ought to be allowed his costs in this action." In that case the Court took into consideration the fact that the jury had given 10*l*., a large amount of damages, and also the fact that the action could not have been brought into the County Court; and I think it was right to hold that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs.

Rule discharged.

PLAYFORD v. THE UNITED KINGDOM TELEGRAPH COMPANY (LIMITED).

38 L. J. Q.B. 249; L. R. 4 Q.B. 706; 21 L. T. 21; 17 W. R. 968; 10 B. & S. 759.

Action, when Maintainable—Telegraphic Message, Property in—Privity of Contract—Mistake in Message.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE.—The plaintiff, having a cargo of ice on board a ship at Grimsby, telegraphed to R. & H, at Hull, asking them to make an offer for it, and requesting them to send an answer by telegraph. R. & H. sent to the office of the defendants, a telegraph company, a message for transmission to the plaintiff, by which they offered to take the cargo at 23s. per ton. In the reading off the message at the defendant's office in London, a mistake was made in the figures, and the telegram sent to the plaintiff represented the offer as being 27s. instead of 23s. per ton. The plaintiff thereupon, in acceptance of the supposed offer, ordered the ship to proceed to Hull; she arrived there, but R. & H. refused to receive the cargo, except at 23s. per ton. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover damages in respect of the injury which he had sustained by reason of the mistake:—Held, that the defendants were not liable, the obligation upon them to use due care and skill in the transmission of the message arising out of contract, and there being no contract between them and the plaintiff.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover damages for the misdelivery by them of a certain telegraphic message under the circumstances stated in the following

CASE.

1. The plaintiff is a merchant in London, and deals, amongst other things, in ice. The defendants are an Electric Telegraph Co., Lim., incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856 and 1857, and in the year 1862 they obtained for themselves a certain Act of Parliament, namely, 25 & 26 Vict. c. cxxxi. (local and personal), to enable them to carry on the works and business of an electric telegraph company. A copy of this Act accompanies, and is to form part of this case.

2. On May 28, 1866, the plaintiff had a cargo of ice, lying on board the schooner "Victor," at Grimsby, and wrote on that day to Messrs. Rice & Hellyer, ice-merchants at Hull, informing them that the "Victor" was at Grimsby, with about 100 tons of ice, and requesting from them an offer for the same by telegraph.

3. Accordingly Messrs. Rice & Hellyer went on the following morning, at about 11 a.m., to the defendants' office, at the Quay Side Station at Hull, for the purpose of telegraphing to the plaintiff, and having obtained at that office from the defendants one of their ordinary printed forms of telegrams, filled it up, and thereby requested them to send to the plaintiff the message, of which, so far as is material to the present case, the following is a copy:

"We can give you 23*s*. for cargo now at Grimsby, small ice, the same cash, thirty tons day."

4. The printed form was directed to the directors of the defendants' company, and was headed,

"Gentlemen,—I request you to send the following message according to the conditions printed hereon, and I agree to abide by the same."

There was the following memorandum at the foot of the printed form:

"All messages taken by this company are received subject to the following conditions." The conditions were as follows: "In order to provide against mistakes, and more effectually insure delivery, every message of consequence ought to be repeated by being sent back from the station at which it is to be received to the station from which it is originally sent. Half the usual price for transmission will be charged in addition for repeating the message. The company will not be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of, unrepeated messages from whatever cause arising, either upon its own lines or those of any other company or government, which may be employed to forward the message to its destination. Nor will the company be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of a repeated message to any extent above 5*l*., unless it be insured at the rate of 1*l*. per cent."

5. When Messrs. Rice & Hellyer had filled up the printed form as above mentioned, they handed the same back to the defendants at their office, and paid them the sum of 1*s*. 6*d*. for transmitting to the plaintiff by telegraph the message, which was to be forwarded, and it was forwarded as an uninsured message. No charge was tendered for repeating such message, and it was forwarded as an unrepeated message.

6. As soon as the message was delivered to the defendants as above mentioned, it was despatched by them to their central station at Hull, and was thence forwarded by them to their head office in London, where it was duly received at 11.43 a.m. of the same day, and where the mistake, in respect of which the present action was brought, originated as hereinafter mentioned.

7. The telegraphic apparatus, which was then and is still used by the defendants in their head office in London, was the best telegraphic apparatus then known, and was in perfect condition.

8. There is a long slip of paper attached to the telegraphic apparatus, and on a message being transmitted to the head office, the letters and numbers contained in such message are by means of the apparatus and the telegraphic wires connected therewith, represented on such slip of paper by certain combinations of dots and of strokes of different lengths which respectively denote the various letters and numbers. These are read off by that clerk of the department at the office whose duty it is to receive the message, and who at once writes down the letters and numbers on a certain printed form.

9. When the message so sent by Messrs. Rice & Hellyer was being transmitted to the defendants' head office it was received there by Edith Smeaton, a clerk of the defendants, whose duty it was at the time to receive such message, to read it off and to write it down on the telegram paper in manner above mentioned. In reading off the message from the slip of paper attached to the telegraphic apparatus as above mentioned she mistook the combination "· · · — —" which was on the slip, and which denotes the number 3. for the combination "— — · · ·", which denotes the number 7, and she consequently wrote down on such printed form, as aforesaid, instead of the message actually sent by Messrs. Rice & Hellyer the following message:

"We can give you 27 shillings for cargo now at Grimsby, small ice, the same cash, thirty tons day."

10. A telegram paper with the last-mentioned message on it was then forwarded by the defendants to the plaintiff.

11. On receipt of the telegram, the plaintiff ordered the schooner "Victor" to proceed to Hull with the cargo of ice for Messrs. Rice & Hellyer, but they refused to accept the same, except at the price of 23*s*. per ton, and it is admitted that by reason of the aforesaid error in the telegram, the plaintiff sustained damages to the amount of 39*l*. 1*s*. 6*d*., and that if entitled to recover at all he is entitled to recover the sum of 39*l*. 1*s*. 6*d*.

12. Edith Smeaton had been at the time when she made the aforesaid mistake, in the service of the defendants for about two years. The defendants had used all due care in testing her competency before engaging her as a clerk, and in fact she was in every respect well qualified for the performance of her duties as such clerk, and had made during the period of two years, a less number of mistakes in reading off messages than the average number of mistakes made during the same period by the numerous clerks who were employed by the defendants in the same department.

13. The extreme charge which the defendants could, under section 75. of the aforesaid statute, 25 & 26 Vict. c. cxxxi, have made for transmitting the aforesaid telegraphic message from Hull to London, was 2*s*.

14. It is the practice amongst ice-merchants, that when a merchant, who desires to sell a cargo of ice, requests from another merchant an offer for such cargo by telegraph, and the latter makes such offer by telegraph, and the offer is accepted, for the merchant accepting such offer to deduct from the price of the cargo sold, the cost of the telegram.

15. The plaintiff has not repaid to Messrs. Rice & Hellyer the sum of 1*s*. 6*d*. so paid by them to the defendants for the telegram, nor have Messrs. Rice & Hellyer claimed the sum from the plaintiff.

16. The Court was to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be entitled to draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether, under the circumstances as above stated, the defendants were liable to the plaintiff, for or on account of the mistake committed as aforesaid, in the transmission of the said telegraphic message.

If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the judgment was to be entered up for the plaintiff for 39*l*. 1*s*. 6*d*., with costs of suit.

If the Court should be of the contrary opinion, then judgment was to be entered for the defendants, with costs of defence[1].

Littler, for the plaintiff (April 20).—The defendants are liable to the plaintiff for the injury which he has sustained. Their liability may be put in two ways: first, a contract was made by Rice & Hellyer as the agents of the plaintiff with the defendants, and the defendants contracted that they would send the message correctly; and secondly, they are liable, because as soon as the message was delivered to the defendants to be sent to the plaintiff it became his property, and he has a right to sue them for not taking due care of the message. On the first point, it appears that the plaintiff desired Rice & Hellyer to send their answer by telegraph, and he was responsible to them for the price of the message. There are no English authorities upon the question, but it arose in De Rutte v. the New York, Albany and Buffalo Telegraph Company (1 Daly, 547), cited in Scott and Jarnagin's Law of Telegraphs, p. 200, where the Court said, "It does not necessarily follow that the contract is made with the person by whom or in whose name a message is sent. He may have no interest in the subject-matter of the message, but the party to whom it is addressed may be the only one interested in its correct and diligent transmission; and when this is the case he is the one, in reality, with whom the contract is made. The business of transmitting messages by means of the electric telegraph is like that of common carriers in the nature of a public employment, for those who engage in it do not undertake to transmit messages only for particular persons, but for the public generally. They hold out to the public that they are ready and willing to transmit intelligence for any one upon the payment of their charges, and when paid for sending it it forms no part of their business to inquire who is interested in or who is to be benefited by the intelligence conveyed. That becomes material only when there has been a delay or mistake in the transmission of a message which has been productive of injury or damage to the person by whom or for whom they were employed, and to that person they are responsible, whether he was the one who sent or the one who was to receive the message. It is somewhat analogous to the question which arises, when goods are lost upon their carriage, whether the action against the carrier is to be brought by the consignor or by the consignee; and the general rule upon the subject is that the one in whom the legal right to the property is vested is the one to bring the action; and if that is the consignee, the consignor in making the contract with the carrier is regarded as having acted as the agent of the other." So here, Rice & Hellyer were the agents of the plaintiff to make the contract for him, and he has a right to sue. Upon the second point, it is submitted that the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for not taking due care of the message. What is the duty which they take upon themselves? There is very little authority, if any, to be found in the English law books, but the law is very fully discussed in the treatise by Scott & Jarnagin above referred to. At p. 115 the learned editors write: "They (the telegraph companies) receive written messages at one place, and undertake to deliver the same words or symbols to the party addressed at another place. This is a bailment," &c. They go on to discuss the matter in the pages which follow.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I am by no means prepared to go along with that reasoning, which is extremely subtle and refined. It can hardly be said to be a bailment. The company do not transmit the thing itself. The message which is sent to them is not the one which they actually transmit. The message is not sent verbally, but by symbols different from those which are used by the sender. Their liability must depend upon the contract, and there is no contract with the plaintiff.]

The New York and Washington Printing Telegraph Company v. Dryburgh (35 Pennsylvania Rep. 298) is an authority to shew that if such a company negligently or wilfully violate their duty of sending the very message, they are responsible to the party to whom the erroneous message is sent.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—My mind does not go along with the reasoning of the judgment in that case.]

It is submitted that a public duty is thrown upon the defendants to deliver the message correctly—see The Western Union Telegraph Company v. John H. Carew (15 Michigan Rep. 525), where Christiancy, J. said, "Impartiality and good faith are the chief, if not the only, obligations required by the statute so far as relates to the question here involved. Beyond these statute requirements, their obligations must be fixed by considerations growing out of the nature of the business in which they are engaged, the character of the particular transactions which may arise in the course of their business, and the application of the principles of justice and public policy recognized alike by common sense and the common law." This passage is cited with approbation in Scott & Jarnagin's treatise, p. 270. Next, the defendants have no right to impose upon the public unreasonable conditions. By their Act they are limited to a charge of 2*s*. for their messages, but they seek to stipulate that they will not be responsible unless the message is repeated and the charge paid for so repeating it. In the present case that charge would be 2*s*. 3*d*.—(The Court gave no judgment upon this point, and it need not be farther referred to.)

agency can be established between the sender of the message and the receiver, the plaintiff can have no cause of action against the defendants. It is true that the plaintiff requested Rice & Hellyer to send by telegraph, but he does not designate the defendants' company as the company to be employed, and the message sent by Rice & Hellyer was for their own advantage. It was not at all necessary that they should take notice of the request of the plaintiff. There is nothing even to shew that there had been any previous dealings between them, so as to shew a practice to use the defendants' telegraph.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—All that took place was in the nature of correspondence only.]

Just so; it is said that the price of the message would be deducted, but that is simply the custom of trade. If goods are sent by a carrier and are lost, the consignor is the person to bring the action in respect of the loss, unless the particular carrier to whom they are delivered is named by the consignee, so as that the property in the goods passes—see Coats v. Chaplin (3 Q.B. Rep. 483; 11 L. J. Q.B. 315); Swain v. Shepherd (1 Moo. & R. 223). But, in truth, there is no analogy between such a case as the present and the case of a carrier of goods, whose responsibility attaches by the custom of the realm—see Readhead v. the Midland Railway Company (ante, Q.B. 169). How can it be said that a telegraphic message is like goods which are to be delivered in specie? Next, the condition that the defendants would not be responsible unless the message was repeated was reasonable—see Breese and Mumford v. the United States Telegraph Company (45 Barb. 274) and M'Andrew v. the Electric Telegraph Company (17 Com. B. Rep. 3; 25 L. J. C.P. 26).—He also referred to the judgment of Bramwell, B. in M'Cance v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (7 Hurls. & N. 477; 31 L. J. Ex. 65); to Harrison v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (2 Best & S. 122; 31 L J. Q.B. 113); and to White v. the Great Western Railway Company (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 7; 26 L. J. C.P. 158), upon the question of the reasonableness of the condition. Even at common law a carrier was allowed to limit his liability —Izett v. Mountain (4 East, 371); Nicholson v. Willan (5 East, 507). But whether the condition be reasonable or not, there is no privity of contract between the defendants and the plaintiff, and the defendants cannot be liable in this action.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[2] was delivered (on July 3) by

LUSH, J.—The plaintiff having a cargo of ice on board a schooner of his at Grimsby, invited an offer for it from Messrs. Rice & Hellyer, merchants at Hull, and requested them to make such offer by telegraph. Accordingly, Messrs. Rice & Hellyer sent to the office of the defendants' company at Hull a message for transmission to the plaintiff, by which they offered to take the ice at 23*s*. per ton. In the reading off of the message at the defendants' office in London a mistake was made in the figures, and the telegram sent to the plaintiff represented the offer to be 27*s*., instead of 23*s*. per ton. The plaintiff thereupon, in acceptance of the supposed offer, ordered the schooner to proceed to Hull with the ice, and upon her arrival there, the mistake was discovered. Messrs. Rice & Hellyer refused to receive the cargo, except at 23*s*. per ton, and this action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the damage he had sustained by reason of the mistake, and which amounted to 39*l*. 1*s*. 6*d*.

It was stated, as a fact in the case, that when an offer made upon the invitation of the seller by telegraph is accepted, the cost of the telegram is allowed to the buyer in account

On delivery of the message for transmission, Messrs. Rice & Hellyer signed the ordinary printed form, by which the defendants stipulated that " they would not be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of unrepeated messages, from whatever cause arising, and that half the usual price for transmission would be charged in addition for repeating the message."

By stat. 25 & 26 Vict. c. cxxxi. (local and personal) certain powers for laying down the line were conferred on the defendants, and by the 61st section it was enacted, "That the use of any telegraph and apparatus erected and formed under the provisions of the Act for the purpose of receiving and sending messages, should, subject to the prior right of use thereof for the service of Her Majesty, and subject to such charges and reasonable regulations as might from time to time be made and entered into by the company, be open for the sending and receiving of messages by all persons alike, without favour or preference." And the 75th section limited the charges, to be made by the company, to the rates specified in the schedule. It appeared that if the message had been repeated, the charge for such repeated message, according to the company's scale and the price paid by Messrs. Rice & Hellyer, would have exceeded the tariff rate.

It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, first, that the defendants were liable either as upon a contract with him made through Messrs. Rice & Hellyer, as his agents, or for the breach of a duty to take due care of a message, which it was argued, became his property as soon as it was delivered to the defendants; and secondly, that the stipulation that they would not be responsible for any mistakes, however caused, unless a charge was paid which exceeded the maximum allowed by the Act, was an unreasonable regulation within the meaning of the 61st section, and therefore void

As we are against the plaintiff on the first point, it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon the second.

The obligation of the company to use due care and skill in the transmission of the message, is one arising entirely out of the contract. There is nothing in their special Act which affects their relation either to the sender or the sendee of a message, or makes it different from what it would have been had no Act of Parliament been passed. We cannot agree with the judgments given in the American Courts, in the cases cited on the argument, that there is any analogy between a consignment of goods through a carrier, and the transmission of a telegram. We cannot see how the person, to whom a telegraphic message is sent, can be said to have a property in the message any more than he could have had, had it been sent orally by the servant of the sender.

The only question therefore is, with whom was the contract made? And to this there can be but one answer. It was made with Messrs. Rice & Hellyer. The offer was sent by them on their own behalf and in their own interest. In so doing they acted, it is true, on the invitation of the plaintiff, but not as his agent or as representing him, and the circumstance that there was an implied understanding between them, that in the event of his accepting their offer, he should reimburse them the expense of making it, in no way alters the relation between the two parties, which was that of seller and buyer, and not that of principal and agent. It follows that the plaintiff, who is a stranger to the contract with the company, cannot maintain an action against them for the breach of it.

Our judgment is, therefore, for the defendants.

the benefit of the estate, will not be compelled to give security for costs, although he himself may be poor and unable to pay the defendant's costs in the action.

Rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Willes, J., by which the plaintiff was ordered to give security for the defendant's costs in this cause, should not be rescinded.

It appeared that the action was one of ejectment to recover possession of certain premises. The plaintiff was the assignee of one Horwood, a bankrupt, and he claimed the premises for the benefit of the estate. The plaintiff was in poor circumstances, and it was alleged that if he failed in the action he would not be able to pay the defendant his costs. Willes, J., had, under those circumstances, ordered him to give security for the defendant's costs.

Bere shewed cause against the rule (on April 22).—The order of Willes, J., was right. There is no case directly in point; but it is submitted that the defendant has a right to call upon the plaintiff to give security. If the plaintiff is suing as an officer of the Court of Bankruptcy, he will not be personally liable for the costs, but he will be entitled to them out of the estate. Generally, if a plaintiff, who is in insolvent circumstances, assigns the debt for which the action is brought, and is suing for the benefit of the assignee, he may be required to give security for costs—Perkins v. Adcock (14 Mee. & W. 808; 15 L. J. Ex. 7). That case was followed by Goatley v. Emmott (15 Com. B. Rep. 291; 24 L. J. C.P. 38)—see also Elliott v. Kendrick (12 Ad. & E. 597). It is also a general rule that when an insolvent is suing for another person he must give security.

C. F. S. Day, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff is suing in an official capacity, and by order of the Court, and cannot be compelled to give security, simply on the ground that he has been unfortunate in his private circumstances. It is his duty to realize the estate just as if he was an official assignee, in which case he could not be required to give security. The cases cited on the other side are all cases where the plaintiffs were suing in their private capacity. They do not touch the present question. The general rule is laid down in Gray on Costs, c. 32. s. 2. It is submitted that the Court will not allow the plaintiff to be impeded in his endeavours to get in the assets for the benefit of the estate.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Hannen, J., and Hayes, J.), was delivered (on July 3) by—

Hayes, J.—This was the case of a rule obtained to set aside an order of Willes, J., requiring the plaintiff to give security for costs in the action, which was ejectment by the plaintiff, as assignee of one Horwood, a bankrupt, to recover some premises formerly occupied by the bankrupt, and claimed by the plaintiff for the benefit of the estate. The order had been made on the ground of the plaintiff's poverty and alleged inability to pay costs if he failed, and because he was suing, not for his own benefit, but for that of the creditors.

The case was argued in Easter Term last, when cause was shewn against the rule by Mr. Bere, on the part of the defendant, and the rule was supported by Mr. Day on the part of the plaintiff.

On the part of the defendant, reliance was placed on the general rule for requiring security for costs in the case of an insolvent, who is suing as a mere nominal plaintiff for the benefit of a third person, and the cases of Perkins v. Adcock (14 Mee. & W. 808; 15 L. J. Ex. 7); Elliott v. Kendrick (12 Ad. & E. 500); and Goatley v. Emmott (15 Com. B. Rep. 291; 24 L. J. C.P. 38) were cited.

On the other hand, it was contended by Mr. Day that the case was distinguishable from the cases cited, and withdrawn from the ordinary rule, on the ground that the plaintiff had, as assignee, a duty to collect the assets for the benefit of the estate, and that there was no instance in such a case of requiring security for costs, which might obstruct him in the performance of his duty, and prevent the assets from being collected. We took time to consider the case, and being unable to find any authority in favour of enforcing security for costs in such a case, we were disposed against requiring it in the present instance.

Very recently the subject has been before the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Sykes v. Sykes (post, C.P. 281), in which the plaintiffs sued as executors for an injury to the assets of the estate, and on an application by the defendant security for costs had been ordered to be given by Brett, J., on the ground that one of the plaintiffs resided in Scotland, out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and the other had become bankrupt, and was unable to pay costs. The Court, who considered the case of an executor to stand on the same footing as the case of an assignee, in regard to the duty of collecting the assets of the estate, held that the circumstances afforded no ground for requiring security, and rescinded the order. This decision entirely agrees with our opinion, and therefore we think that the rule should be made absolute.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—The Bankrupt Act, 1861, s. 197. —Sureties—Deed executed by Principal.

BANKRUPTCY. N.—A bill of exchange drawn upon the defendant was accepted by him, and was then indorsed to the plaintiff. The defendant afterwards executed a composition deed, which was duly registered. It contained no reservation of rights against sureties, but the drawers of the bill, before and at the time of registration, consented to the plaintiff executing and becoming bound by the deed:—Held, in an action against the defendant, that the plaintiff was bound by the deed, he being in the same position as if the right to have recourse to the drawers had been reserved by the deed.

The declaration was upon a bill of exchange drawn by Sadgrove & Belton upon and accepted by the defendant, and indorsed by Sadgrove & Belton to the plaintiff.

Plea—That after the acceptance of the said bill, and before action, to wit, on &c., the defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff and to divers other persons, made and executed the deed following, to wit.—[The plea then set out a composition deed between the defendant and his creditors within the 192nd section of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, and duly registered, but which did not contain any clause reserving rights of creditors against sureties; the plea concluded with the usual averments.]

Replication—That the said bill of exchange, in the declaration mentioned, was accepted by the defendant for a full and valuable consideration in that behalf; and that the said bill was not accepted for the accommodation of the said Sadgrove & Belton, or of any other person or persons, and that the same was indorsed to the plaintiff bonâ fide and for value; and that the defendant, as between himself and the said Sadgrove & Belton, was the principal debtor in respect of the said bill, and that the plaintiff, if he had executed or in writing assented to the said deed, would, by so doing, have discharged the said drawers of the said bill.

Rejoinder—That Sadgrove & Belton, before and at the time of the registration of the said deed, and from thence hitherto, duly consented to the said deed, and to the plaintiff's executing the same and becoming bound thereby and receiving the said composition.

Issue joined.

At the trial, which took place before Cockburn, C.J., at the Sittings in London after Trinity Term, 1867, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff upon the issue joined upon the rejoinder.

The plaintiff then obtained a rule nisi, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff for 50*l*. notwithstanding the verdict found for the defendant, on the ground that a deed, which is otherwise incapable of binding a non-assenting creditor, cannot be made so by circumstances which arose after its execution.

Pearce shewed cause against the rule (Nov. 22), contending that the objection raised by the rule was answered by the evidence and by the finding of the jury.

Murphy, in support of the rule.—The question to be decided does not arise upon the evidence, but is, whether the averments in the rejoinder constitute an answer to the action, as shewing that the plaintiff, a non-assenting creditor, is bound by the deed. It is submitted that he is not so bound. There is no reservation in it of the rights of creditors against sureties, and therefore Sadgrove & Belton would have been discharged if he had assented to the deed. In Johnson v. Barratt (35 L. J. Ex. 15; L. R. 1 Ex. 65) a deed which did not contain any clause reserving rights against sureties was held valid, but upon the ground that there was not any averment that there were any creditors secured by sureties. The point now made, therefore, scarcely arose in that case. Here the plaintiff, by his replication, shews that he would have discharged his sureties, the drawers, if he had assented to the deed. The deed was, therefore, bad on the ground of inequality. Oldis v. Armston (36 L. J. Ex. 181; L. R. 2 Ex. 406) shews that a deed which contains an unreasonable clause cannot be made good by an averment of extrinsic circumstances tending to shew that it could not prejudice the plaintiff. The replication is an answer to the plea, and the facts stated in the rejoinder afford no protection to the plaintiff, who, if he is to be considered as being bound by the deed, loses his rights against the drawers as well as against the defendant, except so far as the composition extends.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court [1] was delivered (on July 3) by—

Lush, J.—This is an action by an indorsee against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, to which the defendant pleaded a composition deed registered under the statute. The deed, which was set out in the plea, contained no reservation of rights against sureties. The plaintiff replied that the bill was accepted for value, and indorsed to him for value, and that, if he had assented to the deed, he would have discharged the drawers. To this there was a rejoinder alleging that, before the registration of the deed, the drawers consented to the plaintiff executing and becoming bound by the deed. Issue was joined upon this allegation, and found in favour of the defendant.

The plaintiff then moved for and obtained a rule for judgment non obstante veredicto, on the ground that, as the deed did not reserve his right against the drawers, he was not on equal terms with the other creditors, and that the consent of the sureties to the composition did not remove the inequality.

We think this argument cannot prevail. It has been held that a composition deed is not necessarily invalid, for not containing a reservation against sureties, because it cannot be assumed that there are any creditors with sureties —Johnson v. Barratt (35 L. J. Ex. 15; L. R. 1 Ex. 65); that is a fact which must be shewn by averment. Here the fact that the plaintiff was such a creditor is shewn by the replication; and were it not for the rejoinder, that would vitiate the deed, because, if he had executed it without the consent of the drawers of the bill, he would have discharged them, and would thus have been in a worse position than the other creditors, who must be supposed to have had no remedy over for the balance of their debts. But the rejoinder, we think, removes this objection, and leaves the deed as it would have been if this fact had not appeared.

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Lush, J. and Hannen, J.

Digitized by Google

A deed under the statute has no operation against non-assenting creditors until it is registered. If, at that date, the plaintiff would have been unable to come in with the rest of the creditors without forfeiting his security, he would not have been bound by the deed, and no subsequent act or assent would have bound him. But as, at that period, the drawer's consent had been given, and he might have come in for the composition, and have held them liable for the balance, he was in precisely the same position as if the right to have recourse to the drawers had been reserved to him in the deed. The case of Oldis v. Armston (36 L. J. Ex. 1; L. R. 2 Ex. 406) is the converse of the present case. There the deed, in terms, bound the creditors to indemnify the debtor against any bills or notes he might have given them on account of their debts, and was therefore bad on the face of it; and the Court held that it was not made good by an averment that at the time of registration there were no creditors, to whom any bills or notes had been given, other than those who had assented to the deed, for creditors were not bound to look beyond the deed, and, being bad on the face of it, no averment could make it good. In this case, the deed is good on the face of it. We cannot assume that there were any creditors with sureties other than the plaintiff, and as the intrinsic fact, which would have vitiated the deed, as regarded him, is met by the rejoinder, and the primâ facie inequality removed, we think he is bound. We therefore discharge the rule.

Rule discharged.

Baron and Feme—Chose in Action—Money received for Use of Wife—Declaration not shewing Wife's interest in money claimed.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. J.—*The defendant received money for the use of a married woman, and wrote offering to forward it to her if required. The wife shortly afterwards died, and there was no evidence that her husband, who survived her, had in any way interfered, either to allow his wife to have the control of this money, or to prevent her from dealing with it. Appeal from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, reported 37 L. J. Q.B. 233, where the facts are fully stated. The declaration was by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate and effects of Mary Ann Ross for money received by the defendant for the use of Mary Ann Ross, for money due from the defendant to Mary Ann Ross on accounts stated between them, and for money due from the defendant to the plaintiff as administratrix, upon accounts stated between the plaintiff as administratrix and the defendant.

In support of the declaration it was proved that Thomas R. Ross was married to the intestate in February, 1864, and that she shortly afterwards accompanied him to India. She died in December, 1864, and he in 1866. In November, 1864, the defendant, who had received a sum of money to be paid to the wife, the intestate, wrote a letter to her, in which were these words: "I received your letter yesterday, and wrote by return of post, on account of your wishing me to send you the money. You will receive my letter sent by last week's mail, where I state that I have received your money and put it at interest at 7*l.* per cent.; but if you wish me to send it after you know what the banks give here, I will do so." It was objected by the defendant that the action could not be maintained, as the husband's administrator was the only person entitled to sue for the money.

The Court of Queen's Bench was of opinion that a chose in action had been conferred on the wife during coverture with which the husband did not during coverture interfere, and therefore that the action was rightly brought.

The defendant now appealed from this decision.

Prentice (Gorst with him), for the appellant.—The appellant does not rely on one of the objections taken in the Court below; but the other objection, that the money in question was received to the use of the husband and to the use of the wife, is fatal to this action. The defendant can only be made liable upon an implied contract to hold the money to the use of another person. In the present case the implied contract was with the husband and not with the wife. Suppose money were paid to a banker for the use of a married woman. The money would immediately become the husband's money, and he only could sue in respect of it. The case is not like one where a bond or promissory note is made to the wife during coverture, for in an action upon these instruments the plaintiff must be the person named in them. This principle is explained in Chitty on Pleading, 7th edit., p. 34, where, after stating that as a general rule the wife cannot join in any action upon a contract during the marriage, it is said, "But when the wife can be considered as the meritorious cause of the action, as if a bond or other contract under seal or a promissory note be made to her separately or with her husband, or if she bestow her personal labour and skill in curing a wound, &c., she may join with the husband or he may sue alone."

[KELLY, C.B.—And it is also said that where the wife is joined in the action in these cases, the declaration must distinctly disclose her interest, and shew in what respect she is the meritorious cause of action. Is there any report of a case in which the interest of the wife did not appear on the face of the declaration?]

No such case is to be found. There are a number of authorities to shew that the right to the money was vested in the husband, the most important of which is a decision in the Exchequer Chamber, Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236), where it is laid down in broad terms that husband and wife cannot join in an action for money had and received. In The King v. Basingham (8 Mod. 199), where husband and wife joined in an action for money lent, the Court expressed their opinion that if the money was lent during coverture the declaration was false, because the wife could have no money. In Abbot v. Blofield (Cro. Jac. 644), assumpsit by husband and wife for money had and received by the wife, it was held that the declaration could not be supported, and although it was objected that it might be for moneys due to the wife dum sola fuit, or for rent during the coverture, it was held that it should not be so intended without it had been shewn. In Johnson v. Lucas (1 El. & B. 659; 22 L. J. Q.B. 174) it was held that a declaration by husband and wife for money found to be due from the defendant to the wife before her marriage on accounts stated between them, and for money found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs since their intermarriage on accounts stated between them since the intermarriage of the plaintiffs, was bad on demurrer, for not averring that the account was stated in respect of money due in right of the wife, or otherwise respecting her interest in the money.—He also cited Carne v. Brice (7 Mee. & W. 183; 10 L. J. Ex. 28); Tugman v. Hopkins (5 Sc. N.R. 464); Molony v. Kennedy (10 Sim. 254); Weller v. Baker (2 Wils. 424); and Holmes v. Wood (cited 2 Wils. 424).

J. Brown (C. M. Griffith with him), for the plaintiff.—The decision of the Court below was right. The law as collected from the decisions is stated in Williams on Executors, last edit., p. 792: "Property falling under the description of choses in action of the wife, are debts owing to her on bond or otherwise, arrears of rent, legacies, trust funds, residuary personal estate, money in the funds, and other property recoverable by action or suit. Marriage is only a qualified gift to the husband of the wife's choses in action, viz., upon condition that he reduce them into possession during its continuance; for if he happen to die before his wife without having reduced such property into possession, she, and not his executors or administrators, will be entitled to it. Accordingly, the general rule of law is, that choses in action which are given to the wife, either before or after marriage, survive to her after the death of her husband, provided he has not reduced them into possession; but with this distinction, that as to those which accrue during the coverture, the husband may for them bring an action in his own name, may disagree to the interest of the wife, and that recovering in his own name is equal to reducing them into possession." In the present case the claim to the money was just as much a chose in action as in the passage referred to. In all the cases cited by the defendant as authorities against an action by husband and wife in respect of a similar claim, the money had actually come into the wife's possession.

[The COURT here suggested that the declaration might possibly be amended, but the counsel for the plaintiff did not accept the proposition, on the ground that an amendment would place the defect (if any) upon the record.]

In Tugman v. Hopkins (5 Sc. N.R. 464) the money was the wife's savings, so that there could be no doubt that it belonged to her husband. Molony v. Kennedy (10 Sim. 254) was a similar case.

[KELLY, C.B.—Have you any precedent for an action like this, except in the case of a bond or a promissory note?]

Bonds and promissory notes are equally with this claim choses in action, and it would be very inconvenient to suggest differences in the remedies upon these rights. He cited Vin. Abr. tit. 'Baron and Feme' (D.), Co. Lit. 351, c, Williams v. Everett (14 East, 582); Gaters v. Madeley (6 Mee. & W. 423; 9 L. J. Ex. 173); The Attorney-General v. Partington (3 Hurls. & C. 193; 33 L. J. Ex. 231); Wells v. Nurse (1 Ad. & E. 65); Ex parte Norton (25 L. J. Bk. 43); Bendix v. Wakeman (12 Mee. & W. 97; 13 L. J. Ex. 15); and Demblyn v. Brown (F. Moore, 887).

Prentice, in reply.

CLEASBY, B.—As there is a difference of opinion among the members of the Court, I have been requested to deliver my opinion first. I think that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. The real question has been fairly stated by Mr. Prentice to be, whether a chose in action was conferred on the wife, Mary Ann Evans, and was reduced into possession during coverture, or rather during her lifetime? There can be no doubt about the correctness of the formula, that marriage is a gift by the wife to the husband of all her movable personal chattels; but as regards choses in action, it must be qualified by the condition that they are reduced into possession by the husband during coverture. It is hardly necessary to refer to Comyns's Digest for an exposition of those rights which do not vest in the husband on marriage. There can be no doubt that marriage is only a qualified gift to the husband of choses in action, and that it is necessary that he should reduce them into possession during the lifetime of his wife. This doctrine applies not only to choses in action existing at the time of the marriage, but to those which come into existence afterwards, such as promissory notes, rent due under leases, and similar cases, where the wife is the meritorious cause of action. I may refer to the well-known passage in Coke upon Littleton, 351 b, "Marriage is an absolute gift of all chattels personal in possession in her own right whether the husband survive the wife or no, but if they be in action, as debts by obligation, contract or otherwise, the husband shall not have them unless he and his wife recover them," making no distinction as far as I can see between choses in action accruing before and after marriage. There is also the case of Brashford v. Buckingham (Cro. Jac. 77), where it was held that husband and wife might join in an action upon a promise made to the wife after coverture upon consideration that she would cure a wound, though in Buckley v. Collier (1 Salk. 114) it was held that they could not sue on a quantum meruit for work done by the wife, as the husband was entitled to her services. Now Sir Edward Williams, in his work on Executors, last edition, p. 792, has defined choses in action to be property recoverable by action or suit, and they are, no doubt, rights which require to be enforced or established by action. How, then, do these rules apply to the present case? I do not think that it can make any difference that the money claimed in this action was not due to the wife by virtue of any instrument. It is quite clear that the property could not be reduced into possession till the time of payment arrived. What appears to have been done was, that a sum of money intended as a gift to the wife was placed in the hands of the defendant. But the defendant did not receive this money as her agent, but with a direction to appropriate part of it for her benefit. This being so, all that the wife had was a right to recover this money from the defendant. If this money had been paid to her, or to her agent, it would have been a reduction into possession of the right to the money. But there was no such reduction into possession. The wife dies before the right is reduced into possession, and it is, according to the authorities a chose in action, which can only be enforced by the person taking out administration to her. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that this action is maintainable, though I cannot say that I am completely satisfied in my own mind.

I will first refer to one or two of the strongest cases which may appear opposed to this conclusion—Bird v. Pegrum (13 Com. B. Rep. 639; 22 L. J. C.P. 166), where it was held that a husband after his wife's death might, in his own name, bring an action against a person to whom the wife had handed money saved from her separate estate. But the fact that the wife had actually received this money and so reduced it into possession enables us to dispose of this case. Then there is the case of Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236). But there seems to be some error as to what was decided in this case. It appears to have been an action for money had and received to the use of the husband and wife, not to the use of the wife alone, and a receipt to the use of the husband and wife would be necessarily to the use of the husband. This case, therefore, as an authority falls to the ground, and it is moreover to be observed that there was a count for money had and received to the use of the wife, so that one cannot see how the technical difficulty was not got over. In Philliskirk v. Pluckwell (2 M. & S. 393), Dampier, J., speaking of this decision, says, "There must be some little inaccuracy in the case, because the Court say that no promise to a married woman, either express or implied, gives any interest, and yet they afterwards admit upon the cases that where a promise is so expressly stated, the husband may assent to give the wife an interest in the contract and join her in the action." I think that the expressions in the report of Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236) are stronger than can be sustained. It is not necessary to consider whether the pleadings are properly framed, as the counsel for the defendant founded his argument upon the proposition that the money claimed was never a chose in action of the wife. We may, therefore, read the declaration as though it contained a statement that money was handed to the wife, that it was not paid over in the wife's lifetime, and that this action is brought by her administrator; and upon these facts I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. It appears to me that a chose in action was vested in the wife during coverture, which might have been, but was not, reduced into possession by the husband, so that her representative may maintain this action. There is a broad distinction between this case and that of Carne v. Brice (7 Mee. & W. 183; 10 L. J. Ex. 28), where the money had been in the hands of the wife and she afterwards invested or lent it. In this case the thing was never in her possession, but was a chose in action only. Where the money comes into the hands of the wife it is reduced into the possession of the husband, but where contracts are made with her before marriage, and benefits accrue to her by contracts made after the marriage, these are choses in action which become hers on the death of her husband, unless he has reduced them into possession. This rule is not confined to bonds or promissory notes, although these securities are more frequently mentioned than any other, probably because it was once thought that they might have passed to the husband as chattels, as the instruments would generally be in the possession of the wife. In Gaters v. Madeley (6 Mee. & W. 426; 9 L. J. Ex. 173) Baron Parke says, "A promissory note is not a personal chattel in possession, but a chose in action of a peculiar nature, which has indeed been made by statute assignable, and transferable according to the custom of merchants, like a bill of exchange, yet still it is a chose in action, and nothing more." The learned Baron again says (p. 427), "The only doubt in this case arose from the observation of Lord Ellenborough in M'Neilage v. Holloway (2 B. & Ad. 447), that a promissory note may be treated as a personal chattel in possession. Now in that respect I think there was a mistake, and an incorrect expression used; but it was unnecessary for his Lordship to lay down such a doctrine in order to decide the case then before him. In fact, the decision in the subsequent case of Richards v. Richards (1 B. & Ald. 221) has qualified that position. In that case the Court of King's Bench said that a promissory note was in the ordinary course of things a chose in action, and that there was nothing to take it out of the common rule that choses in action given to the wife survive to her after the death of her husband, unless he has reduced them into possession." Now, I have listened to everything which has been suggested by Mr. Prentice, and have heard nothing to convince me that this common rule does not apply to the present case. I think, therefore, that we must abide by it, and hold that the wife's representative is entitled to recover this money, which was placed with her aunt for her use. The wife did not select the aunt as her agent, and it does not appear from the facts whether the money was deposited as a gift, a legacy, or in pursuance of some contract, but only that it was for the use of the wife, to be applied as she should direct, and that the defendant, the aunt, wrote letters offering to hold it for the wife. If the defendant resists the payment of this money it is only to be got by action. The claim against the defendant is, therefore, only a chose in action, like money secured by a bond or similar agreement. The form of the contract does not seem to be material. Bird v. Pegrum (13 Com. B. Rep. 639; 22 L. J. C.P. 166) illustrates the position which I have taken. There, when the money came into the hands of the wife, it was reduced into possession; when she afterwards came to deal with it it was her husband's money. It is not necessary to go into all the cases cited by Mr. Prentice. In each of them the money had been reduced into possession, or goods had been purchased by the wife and the property in them had passed at once to the husband. As to any difficulty in the way of recovering this money by reason of the pleading, I see no objection on the face of the record, and all that can be said is that there might possibly be a variance, and that the pleadings would not be supported by the evidence. But the common counts are a general mode of stating that which is a conclusion from the facts; and as to the case in Sir W. Blackstone's Reports, Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236), it arose upon motion in arrest of judgment, and my Brother Cleasby has given an answer to it, namely, that there the money was alleged to be received to the use of the wife, which was the same as money received to the use of the husband, and that at all events it does not govern our decision in this instance. It might have been more satisfactory if there had been a special count stating the facts, but this is a matter of secondary importance, as Mr. Prentice has very fairly said that his objection is that the action is wrongly brought by the wife's representative in any form whatever.

KEATING, J.—In this case I have not had an opportunity of hearing the whole of the argument, and I can only say that, so far as I have heard it, I agree with the judgment of my Brothers Montague Smith and Cleasby.

CHANNELL, B.—With regard to this case I am not entirely free from doubt, but on the whole I think the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed. In the considered judgment prepared by my Brother Blackburn, that learned Judge, after commenting upon the case of Bird v. Pegrum (13 Com. B. Rep. 639; 22 L. J. C.P. 166), says, "We think, however, that in the present case the facts shew that there was a chose in action conferred on the wife with which the husband did not during coverture interfere." Now this conclusion of fact may be divided into two propositions: first, that the wife's right to the money was a chose in action; secondly, that the husband did not during coverture interfere with it. As to the second of these propositions, it is abundantly clear that the husband did not interfere with the wife's right to the money. As to the first proposition, I do not propose to go through those cases which establish the principle that where it appears on the record that the person joining in the action is a married woman the judgment will be arrested unless her interest is disclosed on the face of the pleadings; and secondly, that where the husband has reduced the chose in action into possession the wife has no further interest in it. Here the wife was donee of a sum of money according to the direction of a third person, and this gift could not be reduced into possession until the defendant had assented to the direction which he received, and until this assent had been given no action could be maintained against her. But she did give this assent in letters written by him; and after these letters had been written the husband might have sued for the amount, or he might perhaps have joined his wife as co-plaintiff. And upon the authority of the passage which has been cited from Williams on Executors, I think that the right to the money was a chose in action reducible into possession, though, as I have already observed, it was not reduced into possession. I gather from the observations of my Lord Chief Baron that the principal ground of his objections to this action is, that, although some action might be brought, yet a count for money had and received is not sufficient. But I think that objection may be met in this way. The action for money had and received is an equitable remedy, and cannot be maintained unless the defendant has in some way agreed to hold the money for the plaintiff or to pay it over to her. But the defendant did give such an assent, and at the time when the action was brought it was money had and received to the use of the wife. Now, this is an action for the benefit of the wife's estate, and as the husband never reduced her right into possession during her life I think that the action may be maintained. I am not convinced that both husband and wife might not join in suing for money had and received to their use, but I give my decision on the ground that the case is within the rule that a chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband in the lifetime of the wife survives to her representative.

KELLY, C.B.—I rejoice at the conclusion at which my learned Brothers have arrived, that this action is maintainable, as it enables the decision of the Court to be given according to the merits; but it appears to me to be opposed to the first principles of the law of England. It appears to me to involve the principle that money or other personalty may be the property of the wife during coverture, and that she and her husband may sue jointly in respect of it. But the principle of our law has always been that a feme covert cannot be the legal owner of money or personal chattels. This is an action by the administratrix of a feme covert whom her husband survived. If this action is maintainable, it is necessary that the wife should have been able to maintain it during her coverture, and that when the defendant acknowledged that she held money for the wife, the husband might have joined with his wife in an action for money had and received. But under no circumstances that can exist from any hypothesis, is such an action maintainable by husband and wife. The case of Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236) proceeded upon the ground that an action for money had and received could not be maintained by husband and wife jointly, because no contract could be made with a married woman, and no promise either express or implied gave any interest to her. The mode in which the learned Judges expressed themselves may be open to observation, as was afterwards said by Dampier, J., but the inaccuracy was corrected in the course of the judgment, for they go on to say "The cases cited where the wife is joined do not controvert the doctrine laid down: they are exceptions which prove the rule. They only shew that in such cases so expressly stated, the husband may assent to give the wife an interest in the contract, and may join her in the action. It has been insisted that the Court may intend the estate in question to have been the wife's. But there can be no intendment contrary to the plain meaning of the words. Besides there are general damages, and the count for money had and received cannot be supported by intendment." This proposition has never that I am aware of been questioned, but it has been held in a variety of text-books, such as Chitty on Pleading, that an action for money had and received will not lie at the suit of the wife. There must have been thousands of cases similar to the present one, but in none of them has such an action ever been held maintainable. In the same way an action by husband and wife for money lent by the wife has failed. Now, what are the alleged exceptions to this rule? The passages in Coke upon Littleton and Williams on Executors shew that there are cases of a peculiar and specific nature, such as a bond, shares in a joint-stock company, &c., where the wife is the meritorious cause of action, and the claim can only be enforced by an action on the instrument. Such are the exceptions: special contracts to pay debts which can only be enforced by actions on the particular contract. But this is an action for money had and received to the use of the wife, in which the administratrix represents the wife. If the wife had brought such an action at the time of the acknowledgment, she would have been met by a plea of coverture. If the action had been brought by husband and wife, the case must have been held to be concluded by Bidgood v. Way (2 W. Black. 1236). Nor is this the only objection, for I am of opinion that no action can be brought by the representative of the wife in which her interest does not specifically appear on the record. But in the present case the plaintiff is bound to contend that an action could have been brought by husband and wife without disclosing the wife's interest on the record. I allow that these objections are of a technical nature, but I do not think that we are at liberty sitting here to set aside the first principles of special pleading. I think that this judgment is entirely without precedent, since it decides for the first time that husband and wife could join in an action for money had and received to the use of the wife, and that they could join in an action without the interest of the wife appearing on the record. I say nothing of what might be the result of an amendment, as the counsel for the plaintiff declined to ask for it, and we ought to give our decision upon the pleadings as they stand.

Judgment affirmed.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18, ss. 18, 21, 22, 49, 63, 68)—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20. ss. 6, 16, 86) —Compensation—Injury to premises adjoining Railway—Noise, Vibration and Smoke.

Compulsory Purchase. Maxims. Statute. A.—A house and premises adjoining a railway, but not touched by it, were depreciated in value through vibration, noise and smoke, caused by the running of the trains on the railway after it had been completed. The premises sustained no structural injury:— Held, (by Lord Chelmsford and Lord Colonsay, Lord Cairns dissenting), reversing the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that the owner was not entitled to compensation from the company by virtue of the provisions of either the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act or of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

This was a proceeding in error upon a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench upon a special case without pleadings.

The case in the Court of Exchequer Chamber is reported in 36 L. J. Q.B. 139.

The material facts stated in the special case are given in the report of the case in the Court below, 35 L. J. Q.B. 53.

It is not necessary to state here more than that the original defendants (now the plaintiffs in error) had constructed a railway according to the powers of their special Act, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which railway was leased to the Great Western Railway Company. The railroad crossed the Uxbridge Road near the house of the defendants in error by a viaduct. At an inquisition before the sheriff, a jury had assessed the amount of compensation due to the defendants in error for damage to their house by the railroad under several heads, viz., for obstruction of light, air and doorway, 836*l.*; for damage to garden by lime-dust and smoke in the course of the construction of the railway, 23*l.* and for damage to which the premises would be subjected from the vibration, noise and smoke from passing trains in the user of the railroad after construction, 272*l*.

The question was, whether the defendants in error, the plaintiffs below, were entitled to compensation in respect of the third head of their claim. The Court of Queen's Bench had unanimously decided in favour of the company, the plaintiffs in error. The Court of Exchequer Chamber had reversed that decision, hence this appeal.

The Judges were summoned, and Willes, J., Bramwell, B., Blackburn, J., Keating, J., Pigott, B., and Lush, J., attended.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Karslake) and J. A. Russell (Digby with them) appeared for the company, the plaintiffs in error.—The arguments on both sides are sufficiently noticed in the opinions of the Judges and in the judgments of their Lordships, and are given in the reports of this case in the Courts below. In addition to the cases cited as reported in the Courts below, viz., The Imperial Gas Company v. Broadbent (7 De Gex, M. & G. 436; 26 L. J. Ch. 276: affirmed in the House of Lords, 7 H.L. C. 600; 29 L. J. Ch. 377); In re the Stockport, Timperley and Altringham Railway Company (33 L. J. Sir Roundell Palmer and J. Dixon (Mellish with them), appeared for the defendants in error, and in addition to the cases cited below, viz., The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Bradley (6 Rail. Cas. 551); Chamberlain v. the Crystal Palace Company (2 Best. & S. 617; 32 L. J. Q.B. 173); In re Penny v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (7 E. & B. 660; 26 L. J. J. A. Russell was heard in reply.

The question proposed by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) to the Judges was, Were the defendants in error entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case?

The learned Judges answered as follows:

Willes, J.—I am of opinion that the defendants in error were entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case.

The admitted relevant facts are found at page 9 of the printed appendix, and are as follows: The claimant Mary was seised in fee simple in possession of a house called Cumberland House and its outbuildings; the railway was made so near the house that, although no part of the site was taken, and although it did not appear that any structural injury was or would be caused to Cumberland House, or any of its outbuildings, by the construction of the railway, "yet it appeared, and is admitted, for the purposes of this case, that by reason of the working of the railway after it had been opened for traffic, the house and buildings were and would be subjected to vibration, noise and smoke from passing trains, and were and always would be affected and depreciated and lessened in value thereby."

No compensation was assessed in respect of the noise or smoke. Compensation was assessed at 272*l*., "for vibration from the use of the railway after construction, as before mentioned," which it must be assumed from the terms of the admission, and in the absence of objection as to the extent of the vibration, would have been actionable but for the statutory powers of the company. The result is that the 272*l.* represents the price estimated by a jury of a perpetual right acquired by the company to shake the house and its outbuildings by traffic upon the railway, or, as it was well put in argument, the depreciation of the value of the property by a servitude of vibration imposed in respect of the railway constructed by the company.

Such a servitude, if granted by an ordinary conveyance without being limited in respect of the use of a specified dominant property, would probably have amounted to a licence only, and not have affected the land in the hands of a purchaser; but as limited to vibration by traffic carried on upon a specified railway, it was properly the subject of grant by way of interest in the servient land—Rowbotham v. Wilson (8 H.L. C. 348; 30 L. J. Q.B. 49).

Therefore, as soon as the railway was completed and fit for use, there was, by the conjoint operation of the company's Act and the execution of the company's works thereunder, statutorily taken away from whoever had or should in future have Cumberland House, and transferred to the company as appurtenant to their railway, part of the use and value of the house, and the house was therefore injuriously affected by the construction of the railway or execution of the authorized works within the words, as within the substantial intention, of the compensation section, 68.

No analogy to the use of a road dedicated by a private individual can assist. A private individual could dedicate a road to a limited use, but a private individual could not of his own power dedicate a highway with tolls, nor a railway with the statutory restrictions and privileges.

The cases which furnish the test, " No right of action, no compensation," are satisfied, because the right of action which would have existed but for the statute, is taken away by the statute in respect of the works executed and railway constructed, and to which the law annexes the dominion.

As against the company, it must be presumed, and indeed it is involved in the admissions, that the railway when made was sure to be used, and the probable extent of that use must have been a subject of proof and consideration in committee, and could in like manner be proved before and considered by the jury in assessing the amount.

The uncertainty of the amount is what made most difficulty to my mind; but I think it must be taken that the depreciation was capable of being calculated, without mere guessing, near enough for practical purposes, quite as near as surveyors calculate work to be paid for by measure and value, either done or to be done, in fulfilment of a covenant to repair, for instance, upon which there are often wide differences of opinion which a jury must reconcile. The case of The Imperial Gas Company v. Broadbent (7 H.L. C. 600; 29 L. J. Ch. 377) involved peculiar elements of uncertainty defying calculation.

In the result, I adopt the reasoning of Baron Bramwell (with whom Keating, J., and Montague Smith, J., agreed), in the Exchequer Chamber, being satisfied that there must be either compensation or repeated liability to actions, which latter would defeat the general intention of the legislature as well as contradict a series of authorities too convenient and reasonable to bear overruling.

I therefore answer in the affirmative, and in this opinion my Brothers Keating and Pigott concur.

LUSH, J.—A careful consideration of the judgments of my learned Brethren in the Exchequer Chamber, and of the able arguments addressed to your Lordships on the hearing of this appeal, has induced me to change the opinion which I expressed in the Court of Queen's Bench, and to come to the conclusion that the defendants in error were entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case.

The complaint of the defendants in error was, that " by reason of the working of the railway after it had been opened for traffic their house and buildings were and would be subjected to vibration from passing trains, and were and always would be affected and depreciated and lessened in value thereby." And I take the jury to have found by their verdict that the premises had, as a consequence of this working of the railway, become less comfortable for occupation, and their value substantially diminished.

It is clear that if, without the sanction of parliament, a private individual had caused this damage by making the railway upon his own land, and running the trains upon it, he would have been liable to an action from time to time so long as the nuisance continued, at the suit of the party injured. This proposition was not disputed on the argument, but it was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs in error that this being a public highway, the company are in the same position as if they had made the railway on their own land, and dedicated it to the public, and in that case they would not have been liable for the nuisance caused by the public in using it. The answer to this argument is, that this is not a highway by dedication; if it were, it would not be, as it is, the property of the company, nor could they receive tolls or any other profit from the public for the use of it, as they now do.

The case assumes that this damage results not from any improper or extraordinary use that is made of the railway, or any negligence or misconduct in the management of the traffic, but from the ordinary use of the line as a passenger line, that being the purpose for which it was authorized to be made. It is therefore to my mind equally clear that the defendants in error cannot maintain an action for the damage they have sustained, because the plaintiffs in error have only done what their Act of Parliament authorized them to do.

But that authority was given to them subject to certain conditions, and the question is whether it is one of those conditions that they should pay to persons situated like the defendants in error compensation in gross for the damage to their property, which is the direct and necessary consequence of such a use of the railway. This depends upon the construction to be put upon the 18th, 22nd, 49th and 68th sections of the Lands Clauses Act, and of the 6th and 16th sections of the Railways Clauses Act.

These sections were so fully commented on in the course of the argument that I do not think it necessary to recite them. It is in your Lordships' recollection that their phraseology differs. In some of them the damage for which compensation is to be made is spoken of as damage sustained by reason of "the execution of the works"; in another, "by reason of the execution of the undertaking"; in others "by the exercise of the powers of the Act"; and the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act contains both the latter expression and the phrase "by the construction of the railway."

I cannot assent to the argument that the legislature in adopting in that section of the Railways Clauses Act the expression "by the exercise of the powers of the Act" had any reference to the 86th section, which empowers the company to carry on the business of carriers upon their line, and for that purpose to use locomotives. The same phrase occurs in the 49th section of the Lands Clauses Act, and is there evidently used as synonymous with "the execution of the works" in the 69th and other sections; and I cannot doubt that if a special Act were to incorporate all the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act, except those which enable the company to become carriers, the liability of the company in a case like the present would be the same. I think that the variances were undesigned, and that the same idea is meant to be conveyed by each form of expression.

The question then is narrowed to this: did the legislature intend to compensate for damage occasioned by the "making and using" the railway, or for damage occasioned by the "making" only, apart from its use?

As the intention to give the larger measure cannot be collected from the words themselves, we are in the first place to look to the context, and see if we can collect from the general scope and object of the Act as expressed in its other provisions what the intention of the legislature upon this point was; and if we see that it was their intention to give the larger measure then to determine whether the words in question are sufficient to give effect to that intention.

The Lands Clauses Act is designed not for railways only, but for all undertakings for which compulsory powers of taking lands are given. And every special Act which incorporates its provisions designates and fixes the purpose for which the land is to be taken, and the use to which it is to be permanently appropriated; and the company who are empowered to take it are bound to apply it to that purpose, and to that purpose only. So much of the general Act as is incorporated becomes part of the special Act, and its language as part of that Act becomes pointed to the particular work or undertaking specified, whatever it may be, whether a railway, a dock, a canal, or any other undertaking. It there authorizes the taking of the land for the purpose of and its conversion into the particular railway, dock, or canal, in order that it may be used as such. The undertaking is regarded as a working concern, and the idea of its use as a railway, dock or canal is in the mind of the legislature inseparable from that of its construction. In professing to give compensation for all damage sustained by the owners of the adjacent land by the "execution of the works," or "the exercise of the powers of the Act as regards such lands" (section 6. Railways Clauses Act), the legislature must, as it appears to me, have had in view the ultimate object aimed at, the works when complete and in operation, the dock, railway, or canal, not abstractedly as a mere excavation, embankment, or reservoir, but in connexion with its appropriate traffic, and with the ordinary incidents of a business undertaking.

These considerations lead me to the opinion that the view I took of the Act in the Court below is too narrow a view, and that it is apparent from the context that the legislature intended to compensate for the use as well as for the making of the railway, and thus to make the new remedy which it gave co-extensive with that which it took away.

Taking this to have been the intention of the legislature in framing the compensation clauses, we are to see whether the words in question are capable, upon a fair and reasonable interpretation, of giving effect to such intention.

It cannot be said, I think, that they are so clear as to exclude this meaning, but only that they are ambiguous. Taken in their literal and primary sense, they would, no doubt, be read as denoting the mere work of construction; and if they occurred in a contract between the company and a person who thereby undertook to make the line, this would be their undoubted meaning. But as applied to the subject-matter of the special Act, which regards the user of the railway as the end and object of all its provisions, and looks at the adjacent land as it will be affected by that user, I think they may, without undue straining, be read as embracing both the construction and the user, as if the expression had been "injuriously affected by the railway" instead of "by the execution of the works," i.e., the making of the railway. It seems to me that no violence is done to the language, nor any forced or unnatural sense put upon the words, by holding the latter expressions to be equivalent to the former.

For these reasons I answer your Lordships' question in the affirmative.

BRAMWELL, B.—In this case it must be taken that the jury have found that by the ordinary working of a railway line, by the passing of trains, without negligence or design, by what, in short, is practically necessary (as we are told) for the using of the line by the defendants below and those who pay them for its use, a nuisance will be caused to the occupiers of the premises of the plaintiffs below by vibration to such an amount that the occupiers, if without remedy, will pay the plaintiffs below for the occupation from time to time a less sum than they otherwise would, the fee simple or capitalized value of which is 272*l*. For this nuisance the occupiers would from time to time be entitled to maintain actions—Jones v. the Festiniog Railway Company (L. R. 3 Q.B. 733)—unless some statute has legalized the nuisance with or without compensation, by which I mean the statutory compensation they have claimed. If the nuisance is so legalized, no action is maintainable, whether or not there is a right to such compensation. On the other hand, if it is not legalized an action is maintain-able; and it is agreed on all hands, that if an action is maintainable, the defendants in error are not entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case.

But for the cases I shall refer to, I should be of opinion that such nuisance was not legalized, that the occupiers would be entitled from time to time to maintain actions for the nuisance, that consequently the plaintiffs below would not be entitled to compensation, and that your Lordships' question should be answered in the negative.

It is for those who say that this nuisance is legalized and the right of action taken away to shew it. For this purpose reliance is placed on the clauses of the Railways Clauses Act, 8 Vict. c. 20, and especially on section 86, authorizing the use of locomotives and carriages which will cause the vibration in question. It is said that these clauses shew that locomotives and carriages may be used, and consequently that no action nor indictment lies for their use; and no doubt this has been so held in The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) and in Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679). With great respect, I think those cases clearly wrong, and that they have proceeded on an inadvertent misapprehension of the object and effect of the clauses in question. What that object and effect are I will proceed to point out.

The private Act of a railway company whereby it is constituted is its deed of settlement declaring what are the purposes and objects of the company. It always begins by erecting a corporation for the purpose of making a certain railway. If it stopped there the company could not act as carriers, nor furnish locomotive power, nor do more than make their railway and receive tolls for its use. Anything else would be ultra vires, as would now be their keeping an hotel or having steamboats without special powers for that purpose. Moreover, the Courts of common law have held that the powers of these statutory corporations are limited to the purposes for which they are created, and that an agreement for anything else entered into by them is not merely ultra vires and void, but illegal—see The East Anglian Railway Company v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 775; 21 L. J. C.P. 23); Gage v. the Newmarket Railway Company (18 Q.B. Rep. 457; 21 L. J. Q.B. 398); and many other cases. Your Lordships are aware that, for the same reasons, canal companies could not act as carriers on their own canals till an Act of Parliament enabled them to do so. This would have been the situation of the railways but for the clauses in question. Those clauses have no other object or effect, as I submit, than to obviate the objection I have referred to.

Your Lordships will find that they begin with a general heading, "With respect to the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and the tolls to be taken thereon." All that follows this heading is to be construed in reference to it—see The Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Marriage (9 H.L. C. 32; 31 L. J. Ex. 73). There is not a word in this heading as to the legalizing or allowing of nuisances. The first of the following clauses, section 86, allows the companies to be carriers on their own line, and limits the charges they may make. The "company" wanted no law to enable them to use a locomotive, any more than it did to use "other moving power and carriages and waggons," except to avoid the objection of ultra vires. A man may use a locomotive on his soil and freehold, and so may a corporation. They do want, that is to say, unless given, they do not possess, the power to use it so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours. But if this were intended to be given, where are the words? The words are sufficient if meant to give vires ultra those of of a company to make a railway, but insufficient if meant to authorize the doing of damage. Besides, the use of other moving power and of carriages and waggons is authorized. In what sense? That a nuisance may be committed by their use without remedy? Impossible, for it was never contemplated they would be a nuisance. Section 87. clearly also gives power of contracting with other companies, and has no thought of authorizing nuisances. So sections 88. and 89, 90. and 91. Section 92. gives other companies and persons a right to use the railway with engines and carriages "properly constructed as by this and the special Act directed." The object of this was to define the rights of the public over the line as against the company, not to authorize nuisances. All these sections, down to and including section 113, have the same object, namely, regulating the use of the railway by the company and others.

But it is said that section 114. shews that the interests of others were in view of the legislature, and that they made thereby what they thought was sufficient provision for that object. The argument is, with all submission, bad. They provided for this matter certainly. They said, "We will not let it be discussed whether this is a nuisance." Did they, therefore, say nothing else shall be, or, if it is, it shall be remediless? Certainly not.

Further, the statutes, the Land and Railways Clauses Acts, themselves recite that such clauses as are contained in them usually appear in Acts of Parliament authorizing the taking of land and the construction of railways, and that it is desirable to avoid the necessity of repeating them. They ought to have, therefore, no greater or other effect in the general and public Acts than they had in the particular and private. Now, it is not supposable that in a private Act for a particular company an anomaly so great was to be introduced as that an actionable nuisance might be committed with no common law remedy, and for the benefit of the company, that their profits might be larger if without compensation. If it is said that compensation is given, then it is most surprising that in such private Act there is no provision for it in express words. And the same remark may be made on these general Acts. Why, if the common law remedy was to be taken away, are there not express words to that effect? Why, if there is to be a remedy by compensation, are there not express words to that effect? Why, if there is to be no action and no compensation, is so gross and anomalous an injustice inflicted when such pains are taken to give compensation for the slightest injury occasioned by the very fabric of the railway? It seems to me impossible that it can have been intended that this damage can be done without any compensation.

One reason only for such a state of things is given. It is said that the railway and the working of it are for the public benefit, and therefore the damage must be done, and be uncompensated. Admitting that the damage must be done for the public benefit, that is no reason why it should be uncompensated. It is to be remembered that that compensation comes from the public, which gets the benefit. It comes directly from those who do the damage, but ultimately from the public in the fares they pay. If the fares will not pay for this damage and a fair profit on the company's capital, the speculation is a losing one, as all the gain does not pay all the loss and leave a fair profit. Either, therefore, the railway ought not to be made, or the damage may well be paid for. But, further, though if it were the law and practice to do individuals a damage for the benefit of the public without compensation, no one in particular could complain when it happened to him, as every one would know that he held his property subject to being deprived of it or having it injured when it suited the public; still such a law and practice would be highly inconvenient and mischievous. It is, however, idle to discuss such a question, as the legislature has acted under no such considerations. For if the public benefit is a good reason for damaging a man's property without compensation, so would it be for taking it without compensation. The legislature has made the most careful and minute provisions for the payment of compensation for everything taken, and indeed for everything injuriously affected. And it is absurd to suppose that it was intended that if a house was damaged to the extent of 1*l.* a year by its light and air being diminished compensation should be given, and that it should not be given where the damage was ten times as great, but was caused by the noise and vibration of the trains. Surely when a reasonable meaning can be given to the clauses relied on, it should be adopted rather than one so unreasonable.

It is said that a man might dedicate land as a highway, and no action would lie for the nuisance occasioned by its user. In addition to the other answers given to this, I may add, that the ordinary use of a highway is not a nuisance affecting either the building or its occupants to such an extent and in such a way as to be actionable. But if any one continually used the highway with a very heavy vehicle so as to cause such a vibration as is experienced in this case, I apprehend an action would lie against him.

If there is to be a remedy, and it is to be by compensation and not by action, how is the compensation to be calculated? The line may not be used. Its traffic may double. Branch lines may be made. Further, it is not contended by those who say that the common law remedy is gone that there is an unlimited right to damage, but only a right to do reasonable mischief, or a reasonable right to do mischief. That is to say, if by going a little slower, or being at a little more expense, or some other inconvenience, mischief can be avoided, it must be. But on what principle is this to be settled? Ten trains a day at twenty miles an hour might be no nuisance. This might accommodate the public and pay a dividend. But fifty trains a day at thirty miles an hour might be a grievous nuisance, though much better for the public and the company. Where is the line to be drawn? Take the case of the plaintiff in Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679). There the company declared that they went as slowly as they could, and with every contrivance for safety. But they might have had one servant, or ten, or a thousand at the spot in question to prevent the grass catching fire and burning the plaintiff's wood. This would have cost them money, and it was cheaper to burn the wood, or at all events, on a calculation of chances, better to risk doing so, than to have a sufficient number of servants. But how is compensation to be calculated for such a matter? Moreover, if these plaintiffs are entitled to compensation, so is the owner of every piece of land near the railway. For though there may be no house on it now, it is possible there would have been; but that is now prevented by the railway, at least to the same advantage as before. Therefore such land is injuriously affected, if this is.

In the result, then, the right of action is not taken away in terms; the right to compensation is not given in terms; the principle on which compensation should be given would be most difficult to settle. Though given, the companies would still be liable to actions for excess, which it would be difficult to define, leaving scope for continual litigation. It is impossible that all remedy and redress are taken away; and the only clauses supposed to indicate this are shewn to have another and different object and effect.

For these reasons I think the right of action not taken away, and the remedy by compensation not given, and that the two cases I have referred to were erroneously decided. I may observe, however, as to The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26), that it was not one of private wrong, but of public nuisance. In the latter case, if what was done was for the public benefit, the public is at once the gainer and loser, and the one may in some sense be set against the other, and so it might have been that without an Act of Parliament, the matter complained of there, would have been no public nuisance. But the present is not the case of a public but of a private nuisance, where the loser and gainer are not the same to the same extent. In that case also the point I present to your Lordships was not mooted. It was not noticed that the clause was necessary to avoid the objection of ultra vires. Nor was it used by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error before your Lordships, because though it would relieve them from the present claim, it would do so at the expense of leaving them subject to actions from time to time.

It is said that The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) has been so long decided, and so many railways have been made on the supposition that it was law, that it must be set right, if wrong, by legislation only. That it gives rise to great difficulties I think I have shewn. I believe it has not been acted on; compensation under the compensation clauses has not been given as it ought to have been if The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) is law. This is the first time the question comes before your Lordships, and it cannot be said that railway companies have allowed such compensation to be awarded against them without appeal. So also juries in actions have found negligence in railway companies as they ought not to have done if that case is not law, and compensation ought to have been given. As to railway traffic being stopped by injunction, I apprehend injunctions would not be granted in such cases.

I have deemed it my duty to bring these cases before your Lordships. If your Lordships hold them to have been rightly decided, or think they are so far settled law that they must be acted on, then it seems to me they shew that the judgment below was right, and that your Lordships' question should be answered in the affirmative. Because, for the reason I have given, I am sure the legislature did not mean to leave persons whose property will be injured as in this case without remedy by action or claim for compensation; and I think it right to hold any words that are capable of it to mean to give a remedy by implication. Of course we must not put a meaning on words which they cannot bear to remedy an injustice, however gross. But I think the words " injuriously affected by the construction thereof," and " full compensation for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise as regards such land of the powers," &c., may, and where it is established there is no right of action must, have the effect of giving compensation for the damage. For according to the case of Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679) immediately on the construction of the railway, and " by the construction thereof," a right accrued to do this damage. How then can it be said that the lands are not injuriously affected " by the construction thereof " if they thereby became subject to this? They immediately come under a servitude, as Mr. Mellish put it.

Suppose it had been enacted expressly that on the construction of the railway there should be a right to use it so as to create a nuisance actionable at common law, would not that have been matter for compensation as much as if it had been enacted that the owner should make a grant of such a servitude? But it makes no difference whether it is expressly or otherwise enacted, if it is enacted as Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679) shews it is.

As to the argument that the premises are none the worse, but only the occupiers, it is enough to say that the same thing might be said in answer to a claim for compensation for diminished light. It is to be observed that the word is not " in " or " during," but " by " the construction of the railway. Besides, this is a damage sustained by occupiers by an exercise as regards these lands of the powers of the Act.

The opinions I have expressed here I entertained and expressed in the Court below. But feeling there that I was bound by the case of Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679), I thought the then plaintiffs entitled to judgment in their favour. Should your Lordships hold those cases to have been well decided, or too settled to be overruled, then, for the reasons I have given, I think the then plaintiffs entitled to judgment in their favour, otherwise not. I have necessarily repeated what I said there because I am unable to offer anything better to your Lordships, and because I desired to save your Lordships the trouble of referring to what I then said, had your Lordships been minded so far to honour me.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs below have no right to compensation for the vibration mentioned in the special case. I need not say that finding that I stand alone amongst the Judges consulted by your Lordships, I give this opinion with diffidence. My reasons are as follows:

I think it is agreed on all hands that if a person, not authorized by Act of Parliament so to do, erected a railway or any other private road on his own land, and then worked it by running locomotives and trains or any other species of carriages upon it, so that the vibration and noise was to such an extent as really to be annoying to a neighbour, that injury would be a nuisance, and that neighbour would have a fresh cause of action against the maintainer of the way every time the way was so worked as to give rise to the nuisance; and he might, I apprehend, obtain an injunction to prevent the continuance of the nuisance. But if, instead of making and maintaining a private way of his own, the owner of the land dedicated it as a public highway, and the public brought traffic on it to such an extent that the noise and vibration seriously affected the neighbours, I apprehend they would be without remedy. The common law would leave them suffering a private hardship for the public benefit.

This distinction may have some bearing on the construction of the statutes (8 Vict. c. 18. and 8 Vict. c. 20), on the true meaning of which I think the present case depends.

And I think that it is agreed on all hands that if the legislature authorize the doing of an Act (which, if unauthorized, would be a wrong and a cause of action) no action can be maintained for that Act, on the plain ground that no Court can treat that as a wrong which the legislature has authorized, and consequently the person who has sustained a loss by the doing of that Act is without remedy, unless in so far as the legislature have thought it proper to provide for compensation to him. He is, in fact, in the same position as the person supposed to have suffered from the noisy traffic on a new highway is at common law, and subject to the same hardship. He suffers a private loss for the public benefit.

Now the legislature have thought fit to authorize the defendants to make a railway, and by 8 Vict. c. 20. s. 86. " to use and employ locomotive engines and other moving power, and carriages and waggons to be drawn or propelled thereby." And the first question is, whether this is such a legislative authorization of the use of such power as to render all such consequences as inevitably attend it no longer wrongful.

If this were a new matter I should think there was a great deal in what is thrown out by Baron Bramwell in his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber in this case; but the contrary was held in The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) so long ago as 1832, and acted on in Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679). And if your Lordships were to reverse those decisions the consequence would follow that any owner of a house or field so adjacent to a railway that the inevitable disturbance from the working of the line amounted to a nuisance might (at least where the railway has not been opened for twenty years) stop the working of the line. So large an amount has been invested in the belief that the trains might be run, even though some mischief to others was inevitable, that I think your Lordships will hold that, even if the principle of The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) was originally an error, it has long become communis error, and ought to be held to have made the law.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that but for the statutes the plaintiffs would have had a right of action for the vibration arising from the working of the defendants' line, and that the statutes have taken away that right of action. The question then arises, whether the legislature have given the plaintiffs any compensation; and that must be a question depending on the construction of the statutes.

It has been argued with great force that it is so unjust to take away private rights without compensation that it should be supposed that the legislature at least wished to give compensation in every case where there was a private injury. But I think it is clear that the legislature have not adopted this principle. In such a case as that of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Bradley (3 Mac. & G. 336) where the beer in vaults adjoining to the railway turned sour in consequence of the vibration, the owner of the vaults may or may not have had a right to compensation for the injury to his vaults; but the owner of the beer, if a different person from the occupier of the vaults, could have none, for the right to compensation is strictly confined to interest in lands injuriously affected—see The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvie (2 Mac. H.L. C. 229) and Ricketts v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205; L. R. 2 H.L. 175).

The reason why the legislature so narrowed the claim to compensation is probably that stated by Lord Cranworth, in Ricketts v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205; L. R. 2 H.L. 175), " that any other construction of the clause would open the door to claims of so wide and indefinite a nature." But whatever be the reason, I think it clear that no compensation is given to those whose interest in goods or whose personal interests are injuriously affected, except where it can in some way be annexed to the compensation for an injury to land.

No doubt it is often very difficult to say whether an interest in land is or is not injuriously affected. In the present case, however, I assent to the argument so neatly expressed in the reasons in the appellants' case, that the plaintiffs' house has "become subject to a perpetual servitude," and so their interest in it is injuriously affected.

In my mind, therefore, the question is narrowed to this: Do the compensation clauses in the statutes extend to the consequences of working the railway, and using the statutable powers for that purpose? Or are they confined to the making and maintaining of the railway and the works, and the using the statutable powers for that purpose?

I can see many plausible reasons why the legislature might think fit to adopt the narrower construction. There is the analogy to the hardship which, for the public good, is imposed by the common law on the owner of a quiet villa if his neighbour dedicates the land close under his windows to the public as a highway, it may be, leading to Smithfield Market. Or they might have thought, as Lord Cranworth expresses it, that claims in respect of such damage would be of "a very wide and indefinite character." But I must own that on reading the statutes I do not think that the legislature deliberately excluded such claims. I think they were not in the contemplation of those who framed the statutes at all; and that if there are words used sufficiently large to embrace such a case it is by an unintended accident. My opinion is based on what may be thought the narrow ground, that no right to compensation exists unless given by the legislature, and that I can find no sufficient expression of an intention on the part of the legislature to give compensation for the consequences of exercising the powers given by the 8 Vict. c. 20. s. 86.

I am relieved from the necessity of going through the different sections of the Acts, because Baron Channell in his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber has said everything I could wish to say on that head. I will only add in reference to the argument used in the Exchequer Chamber by Mr. Justice Montague Smith, derived from the general words "they may do all other Acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway," which occur in the middle of the 16th section of 8 Vict. c. 20, that in Jones v. the Festiniog Railway Company (L. R. 3 Q.B. 733) the Court of Queen's Bench (then consisting only of my Brother Lush and myself) thought that similar general words in a Railway Act which did not contain any express authority to use locomotive power left the company at liberty, no doubt, to use locomotives, but on the common law terms that they must keep in the fire at their own peril. So far as it goes, this confirms the reasoning of Baron Channell on this part of the 16th section.

I regret that I am obliged to come to such an unsatisfactory termination; but I think the whole depends on the construction of enactments not sufficiently considered when penned. Opinions will differ on such a point, and it is not capable of much illustration from argument. I can only repeat that in my opinion the onus lies on the plaintiffs below to shew that the legislature have given compensation, and I cannot find in the statutes any language which, in my mind, expresses an intention to give compensation for such an injury.

Lord Chelmsford.—This is a proceeding in error upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversing a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the plaintiffs in error upon a special case.

The question raised for the opinion of the Court below was, whether the plaintiffs in the action, who are owners of a house adjacent to the Hammersmith and City Railway, were entitled to compensation from the railway company for injury to their house from the vibration caused by the passage of trains over the line in the ordinary use of the railway without negligence, whereby the house was depreciated in value to the extent, as found by a jury, of 272*l*.

It is necessary in the outset of the consideration of this case to point out that the question is confined to the injury arising from vibration, because Mr. Justice Lush, in the Court of Queen's Bench, stated that the question was whether the owners of the house were entitled to compensation " for vibration, noise and smoke "; and Sir William Erle, who heard the whole of the argument in the Exchequer Chamber, but retired from the bench before the judgment was delivered in that Court, whose opinion, however, is added to the report of the case (see 36 L. J. Q.B. 150), assumed that the compensation was given for noise and smoke as well as for vibration, and stated that " there was nothing to indicate what was the degree of noise, smoke or vibration, or what was the amount assessed for either of these causes separately, and that there was no evidence of any damage to the realty either in structure or otherwise from these causes, so that the compensation must be taken to have been given for the supposed discomfort of the inmates of the house." The special case, however, expressly states, with reference to this head of claim, that the jury assessed the amount of compensation " for vibration from the use of the railway after construction," at 272*l*.

There has been great difference of opinion amongst the Judges in the Courts below upon this case, and those whose assistance your Lordships had are not unanimous in their answers to the question proposed to them. It must therefore be regarded as one of nicety and difficulty.

It must be borne in mind that this is not a case in which it was possible to claim compensation before the construction of the railway, nor indeed till after its working had commenced, because till then it could not be known whether there would be any vibration injurious to the house occasioned by the passing of the trains. The simple question, therefore, is whether the legislature has provided compensation for any damage to land or houses not arising from negligence, but the inevitable consequence of the proper and ordinary use of the railway.

As an introduction to this question, I must repeat what I said in Ricketts v. the Directors, &c. of the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. Q.B. 205; L. R. 2 H.L. 175): " The criterion of a party's right to damages under the clauses of the Railway and Companies Acts is correctly stated by Lord Campbell in Penny v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (7 El. & B. 660; 26 L. J. Q.B. 25), that unless the particular injury would have been actionable before the company had acquired their statutory powers it is not an injury for which compensation can be claimed." To which I must add, as I added there, the observation of my late noble and learned friend Lord Cranworth, in the case of The Caledonian Company v. Ogilvie (2 Mac. H.L. C. 229), " That it does not follow that a party would have a right to compensation in some cases in which, if the Act of Parliament had not passed, there might have been, not only an indictment, but a right of action."

Assuming that before the passing of their Act the company would have been liable to an action for the injury caused to the plaintiffs' house, it is necessary for the plaintiffs in the first place to establish that the company's Act has taken away the remedy by action in order to open the way to their claim to compensation.

If the cases of The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) and Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679) were rightly decided this question has been determined. It was established by those cases, " that when the legislature has sanctioned the use of a locomotive engine there is no liability for any injury caused by using it so long as every precaution is taken consistent with its use." Mr. Baron Bramwell, in his answer to the question put by your Lordships to the Judges adverting to the above case, said, " With great respect, I think those cases clearly wrong, and that they have proceeded on an inadvertent misapprehension of the object and effect of the clauses in question." And he then reasoned from the Act of the company in this manner: "The 86th section, which gives the company the right to be carriers on their own line, is preceded by a heading, 'With respect to the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and the tolls to be taken thereon.' There is not a word (said the learned Baorn) in this heading as to the legalizing or allowing of nuisances. The company wanted no power to enable them to use a locomotive. A man may use a locomotive on his soil and freehold, and so may a corporation. They do not possess the power to use it so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours. If this were intended to be given, where are the words? The words are sufficient if meant to give vires ultra those of a company to make a railway, but insufficient if meant to authorize the doing of damage."

With great respect to the learned Baron, we do not expect to find words in an Act of Parliament expressly authorizing an individual or a company to commit a nuisance or to do damage to a neighbour. The 86th section gives power to the company to use and employ locomotive engines, and if such locomotives cannot possibly be used without occasioning vibration and consequent injury to neighbouring houses, upon the principle of law, that cuicunque aliquis quid concedit concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit, it must be taken that power is given to cause that vibration, without liability to an action. The right given to use the locomotive would otherwise be nugatory, as each time a train passed upon the line and shook the houses in the neighbourhood actions might be brought by their owners, which would soon put a stop to the use of the railway. I therefore think, notwithstanding the respect to which every opinion of Mr. Baron Bramwell is entitled, that the case of The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30; 2 L. J. M.C. 26) and Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company (5 Hurls. & N. 679) were rightly decided.

The plaintiffs' remedy by action being taken away, the question remains whether they are entitled to receive compensation from the company for the injury done to their house, a question which must be decided entirely by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament relating to the subject. It must be taken as an established fact, that by the use of the railway the plaintiff's house has been depreciated in value to the extent of 272*l.*, and as they cannot recover the damage they have thus sustained by action, one naturally feels a wish to find that the legislature has not left them remediless, but has provided for them the means of redress in the shape of compensation, to be paid by the company as the price of the right given to them to injure the plaintiffs' property. It is with this disposition that I entered upon an examination of the clauses of the Acts to which your Lordships' attention was called in the argument, and I may say that it was with regret I was unable to find anything in them upon which, in my opinion, the claim to the compensation can be established. It is not that the legislature has excluded compensation for injury arising as the necessary consequence of using the railway, but that it has not, as far as I can discover, given any right to claim compensation for this species of injury.

The sections of the Railways Clauses Act which appear to me to be alone necessary to be considered are the 6th and the 16th sections. I do not think that the sections of the Lands Clauses Act which are referred to in the argument are applicable.

The sections of the Railways Clauses Act are, as your Lordships know, arranged in order under different heads, which indicate the general object of the provisions immediately following; and these may be usefully referred to to determine the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under a particular heading.

The heading to the 6th, and all the subsequent sections down to the 30th, and including of course the 16th, is "And with respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, be it enacted as follows." Therefore all the sections to which the heading applies must be taken to have been intended by the legislature to provide for matters relating to "the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith."

The 6th section seems more closely to confine its provisions to these objects, for it begins by enacting that " in exercising the power given to the company to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act and in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act;" and then it goes on, " and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of and all other persons interested in any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company."

It was argued for the plaintiffs that the injury occasioned to the house from the vibration caused by the use of the railway came within the words " injuriously effected by the construction thereof," or, at all events, that it was a " damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company."

Now, as to the words " by the construction thereof," it seems to me that it would be doing violence to language (even without the limitation which is placed upon these words by the general heading to the 6th and the following sections and the context of the section itself) to extend them to any injury which is not the immediate consequence of the construction of the railway. An instance of damage of this sort occurs in this very case, for the jury gave the plaintiffs compensation to the amount of 836*l.* for obstruction of light, air and doorway.

To argue that, as the injury could not have occurred unless the railway had been previously constructed, therefore it was caused " by the construction thereof," is certainly a strong example of illogical reasoning of post hoc, ergo propter hoc, and would extend to every accident or injury occurring upon the railway after its construction, which, of course, could not have happened if it had not been constructed.

With respect to the subsequent words in the 6th section, " damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company," it was argued that they embrace the claim of the plaintiffs, because the powers vested in the company are not merely for the construction of a railway, but also for the use of it after its construction, being the end and object for which it is made. But again we must refer to the heading of this and the following sections, which limit the provisions they contain " to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith." And reading the words of the section with reference to these objects, we find that compensation is to be made to the owners, &c. of lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, for damage sustained (not as regards such lands), but " by reason of the exercise as regards such lands of the powers vested in the company." Now the powers vested in the company " as regards such lands " are to take and use the lands for the purposes of the railway; and to say that the use of the railway after its construction is one of the powers vested in the company in regard to the lands, conveys to my mind no intelligible meaning.

The 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act being inapplicable to the plaintiffs' claim, we must turn to the 16th section, to see whether it affords any countenance to it. The 16th section, as already observed, is one of the sections ranged under the heading which immediately precedes the 6th section. As the words " using the railway " are found in it, great stress is laid upon it in favour of the plaintiffs' claim to compensation. Now it must be observed that this section begins with the words " It shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith, hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works;" and then follows a specification of different works in detail empowered to be done for the purposes mentioned, ending with a general power to do " all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway." The section then provides that, in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted, the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction to all parties interested " for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers."

The counsel for the respondents argued that the proviso comprehended every description of damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company; that power is given to them by the 86th section of the Act, to use and employ locomotive engines upon the railway; and that injury to the plaintiffs' house arose from the use of such locomotive engines, and therefore was sustained by reason of the exercise of the company's powers. It appears to me that this argument claims for the proviso in the 16th section a wider application than is warranted by the purview of the section. The powers specifically conferred by it are expressly referred and limited to " the purpose of constructing the railway." The general power to do all other acts, &c., must be read with reference to this object. If this mode of construing the section by the context is adopted, there will be no difficulty in understanding the words " all other acts necessary for using the railway " to mean, that, for the purpose of constructing the railway, the company may do all acts necessary to enable them to use the railway. This construction appears to me to be aided by the words which are found in juxtaposition with the word " using," viz., " making, maintaining, altering and repairing "; and it seems to me rather a forced interpretation of language to say that the words " the company may do all acts necessary for using the railway " mean they may do all necessary acts in using the railway. I think that the proviso must be limited to the powers conferred by the section, and that it is only if, in the exercise of those powers, damage is sustained that satisfaction is to be made. The 86th section itself having empowered the company to perform certain works for the purpose of constructing the railway, the proviso enacts that, " in the exercise of the powers, &c. they shall do as little damage as can be," clearly pointing to the execution of the works to which this section relates, and confining the satisfaction to be made for damage done in exercising those powers. It appears to me that, in the reasonable construction of this section, it is impossible to hold that it gives any remedy to the plaintiffs for damage occasioned to their house in the course of using the railway. And there being no other legislative provisions upon which the plaintiffs' claim to compensation can be founded except the 6th and 16th sections of the Railways Clauses Act, which I have fully considered and shewn not to apply to that species of injury of which they complain, I am compelled very reluctantly, in a case where real damage has been sustained, though not to a very large amount, to come to the conclusion that the legislature has not provided for their case, but has left them without remedy; and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought therefore to be reversed.

Lord Colonsay.—I have, I confess, found this case to be attended with much difficulty, and I think I need not refrain from stating that, when I find that there has been so much difference of opinion in regard to it among those who have decided it in the other Courts, and that there is even a difference of opinion among your Lordships.

The case arises out of a claim made by a party for injury to her property resulting from vibration caused by the use of the railway belonging to the appellants. The claim is rested on the provisions contained in certain statutes, and depends on the construction to be put on those provisions. Two general Acts have been referred to and the special Railway Act; but I do not understand that under the special Act there is any particular clause that can affect the judgment to be pronounced in this case. The two general Acts that have been referred to are the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, both of which are held to be incorporated in the special Railway Act. It is, I think, upon the provisions of the two general Acts that the question depends. One of those general Acts, to wit, the Lands Clauses Act, has, I humbly venture to think, only an indirect bearing on the question. No land belonging to the respondent, or in which she was interested, was taken or touched by the railway. Her case is not directly within the provisions as I read them of that Act. I think it is very clear that unless it is within the provisions of the 68th section of that Act it is not within the provisions of that Act at all. Nevertheless, in reading the Railways Clauses Act, on which I think the claim of the respondent must be rested, it is not illegitimate to borrow such light as can be got from the language of the Lands Clauses Act, passed at the same time and intended to be co-operative with the Railways Clauses Act, repeatedly referred to in it and intended to be incorporated in the special Act for making the railway.

Now, when I have said that I do not think the Lands Clauses Act bears on this claim otherwise than indirectly, I may explain that it appears to me that the object of the Lands Clauses Act is to give a power to parties engaged in this species of public undertakings to acquire lands. The preamble of the Act says, "Whereas it is expedient to comprise in one general Act sundry provisions usually introduced into Acts of Parliament relative to the acquisition of lands required for undertakings or works of a public nature and to the compensation to be made for the same, and that as well for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of repeating such provisions in each of the several Acts relating to such undertakings as for insuring greater uniformity in the provisions themselves." Then it goes on to enact with regard to the purchase of lands for such undertakings. The Act is classed under various sub-divisions, the first of which is "With respect to the purchase of lands by agreement." That begins with the 6th section and ends with the 15th section. Then there is another heading, "And with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." Then comes another heading, "With respect to the purchase-money or compensation coming to parties having limited interests or prevented from treating or not making title, be it enacted as follows." Then another heading, "And with respect to the conveyances of lands, be it enacted as follows." Then another heading, "And with respect to the entry upon lands by the promoters of the undertaking, be it enacted as follows." And so on, with regard to various matters as to lands. I am not speaking at present of the 68th section; but all the other clauses are clauses which are applicable to the promoters of the undertaking and to the parties from whom lands are to be taken. There is no other class of persons contemplated in that statute. It is not a statute authorizing the execution of any particular kind of works. It is a statute only as to the taking of land. It is intended to regulate the interests of the parties who take the lands and of the parties to whom the lands belong or who are interested in the lands to be taken. It provides on behalf of the parties whose lands are to be taken not only that they are to receive the value of the lands so taken from them, but it provides also that they are to be compensated for the injury done to any lands held along with such lands, whether by severance or any other injury done to them, but it is all with reference to the parties whose lands are to be taken or who are interested in lands to be taken.

The sections which were specially referred to in the argument were the 18th, 21st, 38th, 49th, 63rd and 68th; and it will be seen that, throughout the whole of them, the matter to be dealt with is, the interests of the parties from whom lands are taken or who are interested in those lands, and the interests of the railway company or of the promoters of the undertaking whatever it may be.

Then I come to the 68th section, which is the only one of wider application. Now that section is one of that class of clauses which are placed under the heading "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." That heading covers the sections beginning with the 16th section and ending with the 68th, and then follow the sections "With respect to the purchase money or compensation coming to parties having limited interests." Section 68 says that, "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l*., such party may have the same settled either by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury, as he shall think fit." The words here certainly are, "If any party shall be entitled to compensation in respect of any lands injuriously affected by the execution of the works." But these expressions "injuriously affected by the execution of the works," which occur repeatedly throughout the statute, are limited to the persons who are to get notice and from whom lands are taken, or who have other lands which may be affected by such proceedings. And I think that this section of the statute must be read as a part of that class of sections which have reference to the subject mentioned under the heading prefixed to that class of sections, and must be limited in its operation to the matters with which it is immediately connected. It should be observed that this is not a statute relative to any particular kind of work; it is a statute relative to the taking of lands. Even if it were to be read otherwise, it will be observed that there is a limitation in the expression here used, "affected by the execution of the works," to which I shall afterwards refer. But it appears to me that this section is one of those which have reference to the taking of lands otherwise than by agreement; it has reference to parties who, under the other sections of the statute to which I have referred, would be entitled to compensation, but who have been omitted or overlooked in dealing with the matter. It may be, that parties having certain interests in lands taken, or in lands severed by reason of the taking, may not have been found out at the time, and may have come forward afterwards and made a claim. Notice is required to be given to owners and occupiers, and to all parties known to be interested who have not had notice; and it is right that those parties, if found, should have an opportunity of coming forward forward and making a claim; and it seems clear that this was intended, seeing that it will not apply to claims that do not exceed 50*l*. in value. Why should the claims of smaller amount be excluded? There are modes here given of opening up other claims by arbitration; but where they are above 50*l*., they are to have the choice of arbitration or a jury. That also shews that this is connected with the previous sections under this head.

But it appears to me that the Railways Clauses Act stands upon a different footing. That Act has reference to that particular species of undertaking; and I think that it is in that Act that we may expect to find the materials for dealing with claims in reference to such undertakings as this. It provides for compensation, not referring to the Lands Clauses Act as the rule for compensation, but referring to that Act as the machinery by which compensation is to be adjudged; but not taking the Lands Clauses Act as giving the rule, or as regulating the parties to whom, or the matters for which, compensation is to be given. On the contrary, it contains its own provision with regard to the matter that we are here dealing with. I think the Railways Clauses Act is of wider application than the Lands Clauses Act as regards the parties entitled to compensation, and also as regards the matters for which compensation may be given.

The important sections are the 6th and the 16th. The 6th section appears to me to be on the whole the most important and the most general. It says, that "in exercising the power given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act; and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of and all other parties interested in any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company."

Under this clause the company are to make compensation to certain parties for certain things. They are to make compensation to the owners and occupiers, and other parties interested in any lands. What lands? "Lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway." So far it is clear that it does not stop there. They are to make compensation to the owners and occupiers of lands "injuriously affected by the construction thereof." Now, I think, it is very clear that the owners and occupiers to whom compensation is to be made are to be the owners and occupiers of lands injuriously affected by the construction of the railway. The female respondent in this case is the owner and occupier of land injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, and therefore she is a party who is comprehended within the class of persons who are entitled to claim compensation. Then, what is the matter for which compensation is to be made? It is to be made for "the value of the lands so taken and used." That does not apply to the respondent's case. But the section goes on, "and for all damage sustained by such owners and occupiers" (of whom the respondent is one) "by reason of the exercise as regards such lands" (which includes the lands of the respondent) "of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company."

Now, the claimant of compensation here is an owner and occupier of lands injuriously affected by reason of the exercise of the powers vested by the Act in this company. It is very clear that her property has been injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers vested in the company. It has been injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, the very words of the clause being "by the construction thereof." Therefore, she is a person who under this clause is entitled to come forward and make a claim. Her property was in the predicament which this clause contemplates as property "injuriously affected," and therefore she is a person entitled to compensation. Then the question arises, how far that compensation is to go? Is it to go beyond the measure in which she is injuriously affected by the construction of the railway? Is it to be extended to any injury which her property has sustained by the use of the railway? Compensation has been awarded to her for the injury done by the construction of the railway as affecting the access to her property, and the lights, and so forth. The sum of 800*l.* and odd has been assessed for that. But the question remains whether the statute by this enactment provides for compensation to be given for damage sustained, not only by reason of the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, but by reason of the subsequent use of the railway by the running thereon of locomotives causing vibration.

Before expressing any opinion on that question, I should like to refer to the terms of that section of the statute which has been relied upon in support of the claim. It is the 16th section, and it says that, "subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith, hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works." This is under the heading "With respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith."

Now, the things that are allowed to be done are specially enumerated: to construct inclined planes; to alter the course of rivers, &c.; to make drains; to erect warehouses, &c.; and to make alterations and repairs. And then there is this general clause, that "they may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing and using the railway." And then there is a clause of compensation, "Provided always, that in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein and in the special Act, and any Acts incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers."

Now, it appears to me that that clause for compensation has reference to the matters comprehended in this 16th section of the Act. And the question, therefore, comes to be whether the general expression that they may do "all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway," comprehends the claim now made for vibration in respect of the use of the railway. I confess it does not appear to me to comprehend this. I think this section has reference altogether to the construction of the railway, and to certain things being done to enable the railway to be constructed and repaired and made ready for use. I think it has reference to all these acts here mentioned, the making of drains and inclined planes, altering and repairing the works, and all other acts necessary for making or maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway: all the acts necessary for placing the railway in a condition to be used. That is the construction I put on these words.

Then, when I go back to the 6th section, I think that section points in the same direction; that is, that the claim to compensation is limited to the injury done by the construction of the railway, and that it contains nothing whatever as to the use to be made of it. If compensation had been intended to be given for the using of the railway by locomotives or otherwise, I should have expected something to be said with reference to it. I should not expect to find in the Lands Clauses Act anything specific with reference to any kind of works, because that Act has nothing to do with any particular uses that may be made of the works that are to be constructed. But in the other Act, in which we have statutory exactments with regard to this particular class of public works, namely, railways, I should have expected to find something with regard to claims for compensation, not merely for injury done in the construction, but also for injury arising from the use of locomotion, if such compensation had been intended to be given. I think there may be reasons why such a wide claim should not be given; but, however that may be, I can look only at the statute itself, and I have only to state the construction which I feel myself constrained to put upon the statute, without going beyond that. There is no connexion between this question and the limits of deviation as regards particular lands under the statute. The claim now made could not have been confined to lands within the limits of deviation under the statute, because injury by vibration, or any other injury, might be done to lands more remote, and the claim would be equally well founded. I think that when the legislature gives special powers under any particular Act, the provisions for compensation would be contained in that Act. The legislature has not made Acts in regard to all kinds of public works. It has made an Act with regard to railways, and I do not find within that Act with regard to railways what I consider as a right to claim compensation for vibration by reason of the subsequent use of the railway when made. I therefore feel myself under the necessity of concurring in the judgment that has been suggested by my noble and learned friend.

Lord Cairns.—In a case which is certainly not without difficulties, and which has caused much difference of opinion in the Courts below and among the learned Judges who have assisted your Lordships, it is not perhaps surprising that the same difference of opinion should reach your Lordships' house; and I regret very much that I am unable to concur in the views of my noble and learned friends who have just spoken.

In one part of their view I do entirely concur. It appears to me that the effect of the legislation on this subject is to take away entirely any right of action on the part of the landowner against the railway company for damage that the landowner has sustained. It must be taken, I think, from the statements in this case, that the railway could not be used for the purpose for which it was intended without the consequences of this vibration. It is clear to demonstration that the intention of parliament was that the railway should be used. If, therefore, it could not be used without vibration, and if vibration necessarily caused damage to the adjacent landowner, and if it was intended to preserve to the adjacent landowner his right of action, the consequence would be that action after action would be maintainable against the railway company for the damage which the landowner sustained, and after some actions had been brought and had succeeded the Court of Chancery would interfere by injunction and would prevent the railway being worked, which of course is a reductio ad absurdum, and would defeat the intention of the legislature. I have, therefore, no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that no action would be maintainable against the railway company.

That alone would certainly predispose the mind to find in the enactments upon the subject compensation in some other form for the loss which, beyond all doubt, the landowner in such a case sustains. I do not mean to say that it would be safe to strain the words of an Act of Parliament on account of consideration of that kind, but if there be any doubt or ambiguity in the words the consideration ought not to be overlooked that beyond all doubt the intention of legislation of this kind is that, in some shape or other, compensation should be made to those who sustain loss or harm by the operation of the parliamentary powers.

It appears to me that it is not necessary in any way to strain the words of the Acts of Parliament in this case, but it is necessary in the first place to be perfectly clear as to what Acts of Parliament and what clauses apply. In my opinion there are two Acts of Parliament which must be looked at for this purpose, both the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

With regard to the Lands Clauses Act there is no doubt that it is mainly conversant with regard to the taking and purchase of land, but it would be a great mistake to suppose, and it would be at variance with the well settled practice upon the subject, to hold that the Act is confined to the taking of land from landowners; and in fact the frame of the Lands Clauses Act shews that it is even dangerous to trust to the headings which occur at the commencement of these fasciculi of clauses for the purpose of restraining or confining the natural operation of the words which you find in the various clauses under those headings. I will illustrate what I mean by one fasciculus of clauses in the Lands Clauses Act. The 16th clause is prefaced by these words, "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." The bundle of clauses which occur under that heading runs on to the 68th section; and if you were to take the literal meaning of the words of the heading you might expect to find nothing in the clauses that follow except with regard to the purchase and taking of land, and you might perhaps say that you must interpret every clause that follows as relating to the taking of land and not to the affecting in any way of land which is not taken. But when we turn to the 22nd clause we find this enactment: "If no agreement be come to between the promoters of the undertaking and the owners of, or parties by this Act enabled to sell and convey or release, any lands taken or required for or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands as to the value of such lands, or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50*l.* the same shall be settled by two justices.

It is evident that various classes of land are there spoken of; not merely land which is taken or land which is required, but also land which is injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking. And when we come to the 68th clause the language is still more significant. The enactment is, "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act or any Act incorporated therewith; and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l.*" then it is to be settled by arbitration or by a jury in the way pointed out.

I need not remind your Lordships that under this Act of Parliament, passed as it was many years ago, many hundreds of thousands of pounds, I might perhaps say millions of pounds, have been paid to persons not one inch or one yard of whose land has been taken by the railway company, but whose land has been (in the words of the section) injuriously affected by the execution of the works (whatever that may mean is another point), but "injuriously affected" as a matter entirely distinct from the taking of the land. That shews, I think, that the headings of these clauses are not to be relied upon; and many other instances might be given of the same kind inside the clauses themselves, something shewing (in the same way that an Act of Parliament often goes beyond the preamble) and that provisions have been introduced in the progress of the clauses going somewhat beyond the short and summary definition in the heading of the clauses. In fact, one of these Acts of Parliament shews that these short headings were introduced merely to ear-mark a set of clauses and to afford a short and summary way by which they might be introduced as enactments into other Acts of Parliament.

I have gone through the sections in the Lands Clauses Act which seem to me to be relevant to this matter, and all that I would say more with regard to them is this: As to the 68th section, to which I have referred, I agree that that section does not define the conditions under which the person whose land has become injuriously affected is to be entitled to compensation. It rather assumes that the right to compensation has been given in some other enactments, and it contents itself with pointing out the manner and modus in which that compensation shall be obtained; and I may observe that in the present case the whole of the proceedings have been taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and indeed it is only under the Lands Clauses Act that a jury can be summoned or the aid of arbitration invoked. I therefore commence with the Lands Clauses Act as the mode in which compensation is to be obtained if the landowner is entitled to compensation under any other provision.

I now turn, for the purpose of finding the kind of compensation to be given, to the Railways Clauses Act. I will only ask your Lordships to bear in mind the words, which I mention again, in the 68th section: "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands which shall have been injuriously affected by the execution of the works." Now, turning to the Railways Clauses Act in the fasciculus of clauses, which I agree commences with these words: "And, with respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, be it enacted as follows." The 6th section is in these words: "In exercising the power given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act" (that is, in the 68th section among others); "and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company." And then it proceeds to say that the compensation shall be ascertained under the Lands Clauses Act. I desire, in passing, to point out to your Lordships that the words are evidently to be read reddendo singula singulis. If the land be taken or used full compensation is to be made for the value of the land. If the land be not taken or used, but be injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, the compensation is to be made for the damage sustained by the owner or occupier or other party interested, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act vested in the company.

Then the 16th section I may also refer to, and that will complete the enumeration of the enactments with which we have to deal; it is as follows: "Subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith,"—that is to say, subject to the provisions and restrictions in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act,—"it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith, hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works." Then come a number of what I may call structural works, such as turning the course of rivers, making railways across streets, and so on; and then comes this final power: "They may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, or using the railway." Then comes what appears to me to be of great importance, the term and condition upon which alone they are authorized and empowered to make these structural works; and the condition is, not that, in the exercise of those structural powers, they are to make certain compensation, but the condition is, "that in the exercise of the powers" (that is, of all the powers by this or the special Act granted) "the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers,"—that is, of all the powers vested in the company.

I venture to think that it would be too narrow a construction of these words to say that the powers here mentioned are simply those powers which are immediately being enumerated. If that had been the intention of the legislature, nothing could have been easier than to say, and it would have been much shorter to have said, "provided always, that, in the exercise of such powers, they shall make full compensation to the persons interested." Then we should have known exactly that what was intended was, that if, by reason of the exercise of those structural powers, any damage was done, they should make compensation. But, on the contrary, the provision is in substance this: We, the legislature, will authorize you to make these structural works, but the term and condition upon which we authorize you to make them is, that if by reason of the exercise of any of the powers by this or the present Act given to you you do any damage, you shall make compensation for that damage. In other words, we will authorize the railway to be made, with certain powers appendant and annexed to the making of the railway,—one of the main and special ones of which is, that the railway shall be used as a passage for locomotive engines; but if, by reason of the exercise of any of the powers we give you, you do damage, you shall make full compensation for that damage to the persons injured.

Now, having taken the liberty of pointing out to your Lordships the sections with which we have to deal, I shall sum up what appears to me to be the true and proper construction, even if we were dealing with the 6th section alone of the Railways Clauses Act, of those words which have been referred to already, "injuriously affected by the construction of the railway." Even if we were dealing with that section alone, it would appear to me that those words, "by the construction of the railway," are just the same words and intended to denote the same idea as the words in the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, "injuriously affected by the execution of the works"; and that, even dwelling upon those two sections alone, and not praying in aid at all the 16th section, the position of things would be this:—Parliament authorizes the construction of the railway, but Parliament does not look upon those words, "the construction of the railway" or "the execution of the works authorized," as meaning the digging out so much land, the putting so much brick and mortar together, the making a viaduct or the making an embankment, or the mere structural aspect of the work; it looks upon the railway as an undertaking,—as a going concern, if I may so call it,—as a thing which is to be there for a certain purpose and to fulfil a certain end which the legislature has held in its view; and when it uses the term "the execution of the works" and "the construction of the railway," it appears to me to point to a living and active thing which, placed on the spot where parliament authorizes it, may possibly have an injurious effect on some circumjacent land, and then, pointing to that parliamentary power which is given to construct that railway or to execute that work, parliament says—If by the construction of this railway with these incidents, if by the execution of these works there be a consequence in the shape of damage to those who are in the neighbourhood, that damage must be atoned for by compensation.

This case might be illustrated very easily by putting another case, not the instance of a railway. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act applies to works of all kinds, not merely to a railway. Suppose that, under a special Act of Parliament, a company were authorized to take lands for the purpose of making in a particular locality a gas-works, or were authorized to make on a particular spot a copper-smelting works, either of which we know, when they came to be worked, would most probably produce injury to the circumjacent land, although the land around may not be taken by the company. Supposing parliament authorized the gas-works or the copper-smelting works to be conducted, by words of enactment which would make it impossible for the owner of the adjacent land to maintain an action for the injury sustained, and then parliament said, if by the execution of these works the neighbouring owners sustain any damage you shall pay for such damage, I should understand by an enactment of that kind, not that the neighbouring owner is supposed to be likely to sustain damage by the construction of the building, by putting the bricks and mortar together, but to sustain damage by those works as active, going works, which were there for the purpose of manufacturing gas or smelting copper, as the case may be; and that when parliament said " if by the execution of these works damage is done," parliament meant to say, " If by the execution of these works, qua gas-works or qua copper-smelting works, continuing to exist and actively proceeding, any damage is done," that damage shall be paid for.

I may remind your Lordships that this question was very near having to be decided once in your Lordships' House, although from circumstances the decision became unnecessary. In the case of Broadbent v. the Imperial Gas Company (7 H.L. C. 600; 29 L. J. Ch. 377) the case which I have supposed was very near happening. The company was authorized to make a gas-works in a particular place, and the Lands Clauses Act was incorporated to a certain extent in the provisions of the special Act; but there was a clause in the Gas Clauses Act, also incorporated, which provided that in carrying on their works and making gas no nuisance or injury should be occasioned to any of the surrounding land. And it was held by this House, as might be expected, that the consequence of that section being introduced was, that the right of action was not taken away; and therefore it was not necessary to consider the case I have suggested. But if you had a case where the right of action was taken away, and where parliament had provided that compensation should be made for injury done by the execution of the works, then, in my opinion at least, it would mean and imply the execution of the works of the undertaking as an active and going concern. That would be the opinion which I should entertain of the 6th section alone, even without the 16th section.

As it appears to me Mr. Justice Lush has expressed with great felicity the same idea which I have entertained, I cannot do better than remind your Lordships of what Mr. Justice Lush says: " The Lands Clauses Act is designed, not for railways only, but for all undertakings for which compulsory powers of taking lands are given. And every special Act which incorporates its provisions designates and fixes the purpose for which the land is to be taken, and the use to which it is to be permanently appropriated; and the company who are empowered to take it are bound to apply it to that purpose, and to that purpose only. So much of the general Act as is incorporated becomes part of the special Act, and its language, as part of that Act, becomes pointed to the particular work or undertaking specified, whatever it may be, whether a railway, a dock, a canal or any other undertaking. It there authorizes the taking of the land for the purpose of, and its conversion into, the particular railway, dock, or canal, in order that it may be used as such. The undertaking is regarded as a working concern, and the idea of its use as a railway, dock or canal is in the mind of the legislature inseparable from that of its construction. In professing to give compensation for all damage sustained by the owners of the adjacent land by the execution of the works, or the exercise of the powers of the Act as regards such lands, the legislature must, as it appears to me, have had in view the ultimate object aimed at, the works when complete and in operation, the dock, railway or canal, not abstractedly as a mere excavation, embankment or reservoir, but in connexion with its appropriate traffic, and with the ordinary incidents of a business undertaking."

It appears to me that if it is necessary to go beyond that, and to make the case still clearer, the case is made clearer by the 16th section, because, as I interpret that section, it gives a number of structural powers, I agree; but it also seems to me to make it the term and condition of exercising those structural powers,—of interfering with rivers and with roads, and exercising those other, which may be termed violent powers, which are given by that Act or by the special Act,—that the company shall make full satisfaction to every person for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers, that is, of all the powers given by the Act to the company.

Now, that being certainly the view which I should take of the construction of these Acts of Parliament, the only other matter which I have to refer to is what appears to have weighed in the minds of some of the learned Judges who were unable to adopt this view. I observe that some of those learned persons say that there would be very great difficulty in estimating the compensation, because the damage could not be ascertained until the undertaking became what I may call a going concern, and until by experience you had ascertained exactly what the amount of damage or injury actually was. Now I do not think there is any difficulty at all on that head. In the first place, in the present case which we have here before us, no difficulty seems to have occurred. A sum has been found by the jury, not representing merely the past damage, but representing the whole damage which, in the opinion of the jury, both had been sustained and would be sustained by the exercise of the powers given to the company. In addition to that, the problem which has to be solved appears to me not to be at all beyond the powers or the province of a jury. What you have to find is, what is the actual deterioration in value. You have a certain house, and near it what I may call a vibrating railway. I mean a railway in the use of which there cannot fail to be vibration. The house was of a certain value before the railway was put there. If the railway causes vibration, evidence can easily be obtained to prove what the amount of deterioration in value is, and the sum can be awarded accordingly. The subject may be illustrated further by supposing a house used for a particular trade, say that of a watch or clock maker, which requires particular steadiness. Serious injury might be done there, and the house might become useless for the particular purpose for which it was used before.

But in addition to that, it is said that you ought to know how many trains a day there will be running, and the weight of them, and the speed at which they will pass. There is a well-known principle which applies to such cases, which is, that if the company against which the claim is made are not willing to bind themselves as to the maximum number of trains, or the weight, or the speed, then the sum must be taken most strongly against the company, upon the principles enunciated in the well-known old case of Armorie v. Delamirie (1 Strange, 504) and the largest amount of injury which can be sustained would probably be considered to be the amount to be awarded by the tribunal which has to award compensation.

I might mention another case in which every one would admit that compensation would have to be assessed at the commencement, and where the same difficulty might occur. Your Lordships will recollect cases which have come before this House arising upon questions of which The Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprott (2 Macq. H.L. C. 449) may be taken as an instance. In those cases it was held that a landowner selling a strip of land to the railway company is bound to give lateral support to resist the pressure which a heavy train passing over the land might occasion. Now in that case there must be compensation assessed and payable for the land taken in the first instance. Yet at the time when that compensation was so assessed it might not be known what the number of trains passing along the railway, or the weight or speed of them would be, and therefore it might not be possible to say with mathematical exactitude what would be the precise amount of support which would have to be given to the land on each side. In such a case the landowner would make his claim; he would shew that the nature of the ground was such that the lateral support would be particularly desirable; he would shew that he might have to support the land against the pressure that would be created by a great number of trains passing every day; and he would claim, and probably would recover, compensation for the maximum amount of support which the land might require.

I therefore cannot accept the suggested difficulty as to ascertaining the amount of compensation as any reason why the Act of Parliament should be taken as having a meaning other than what appears to me to be the plain meaning of the words.

I regret very much to say that I am afraid that the result will be, that although a clear injury and damage has been sustained, and although a substantial sum has been awarded by a jury to the landowner, that sum will not be recovered. But I have been unable to do otherwise than to express to your Lordships the view which I entertain as to the construction of these statutes in a case which, as it appears to me, may be one of great importance.

Mr. Digby.—I am instructed to ask your Lordships to reverse the judgment with costs in the Court below.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The costs will follow.

Mr. Digby.—I understand not.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—In the case of a writ of error, surely the reversal carries the costs. There can be no doubt about it.

Mr. Digby.—I understood there was some doubt.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—We shall take care that the costs will follow the ordinary course.

Mr. Digby.—I understand that the costs always follow when the appeal is affirmed. But in this case the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber is reversed, and I understand the rule is somewhat different.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—Whatever the ordinary rule is, this case will follow it.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant not to Assign—Covenant not expressed to be on behalf of Assigns—Equitable Assignment of Term.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—A farm was let for a term of years, the lessees covenanting, for themselves, their executors and administrators, not to "underlet, assign or otherwise part with the possession of the demised premises, or any part thereof, without the written consent of the lessor, his heirs and assigns, being first had and obtained for that purpose," with a power of re-entry in default. The lessees sold their interest in the term to W, the lessor writing a letter in which he consented to W. taking the term of the lessees "on the same conditions and in accordance with their lease." W. entered and took possession of the farm, but no assignment of the term was executed to him. W. afterwards executed a deed assigning his property, including his interest in the farm, to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, the lessor assenting to the assignment to them. The trustees then agreed to sell the premises to the defendant, who entered upon them, whereupon the lessor brought ejectment for breach of the covenant not to assign without his consent:—Held, without deciding whether the covenant, not being expressed to be made by the lessees on behalf of their "assigns," did or did not run with the land,—that there had been no forfeiture, as there never was any assignee of the whole term so as to be subject to the covenants in the lease, and the trustees could not be considered as agents of the lessees in parting with possession of the premises, and, secondly, because the consent to the assignment did not prohibit the lessees from parting with possession of the premises till a lease had been executed.

Ejectment to recover possession of two farms in the parish of Kenwyn.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Cornwall Spring Assizes, 1868, it appeared that on September 29, 1860, the plaintiff being then the owner in fee of the two farms, granted a lease of them to Messrs. Tedder and Pridham, their executors and administrators, from June 24, 1860, for a term of fourteen years, the lessees covenanting, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, "that they, their executors or administrators, should not nor would underlet, assign, or otherwise part with the possession of the said demised premises, or any part thereof, without the written consent of the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, being first had and obtained for that purpose;" and the lease contained a power of re-entry in case the lessees, their executors or administrators, should fail in the observance or performance of any or either of the covenants on their part contained in the lease. It was for breach of this covenant that the ejectment was brought. The lessees occupied the premises until March, 1865, when their interest in them was sold to a Mr. Wade. The plaintiff before this sale wrote to Mr. Wade as follows:

"According to the understanding I had with you and Messrs. Tedder and Pridham on Thursday last, I beg to say that I consent for you to take the two estates that Messrs. Tedder and Pridham have been renting of me on the same conditions, and in accordance with their lease. This will be sufficient authority for Messrs. Tedder and Pridham to transfer the lease to you on their paying 75*l*., being for three quarters year's rent due to this day.

"P.S.—It will be necessary for you to write me accepting these terms."

Mr. Wade wrote in reply:

"Sir,—Your favour to hand, granting permission to hold your farms on the same terms as Messrs. Tedder and Pridham. Mr. Tedder has handed me the lease, and I accept it on same terms as they did."

Wade then took possession of the premises included in the lease, but no assignment of the term was ever executed to him by Tedder and Pridham. He continued in possession until January, 1867, when, becoming embarrassed, it was proposed that his estate and effects should be vested in trustees upon trust, after payment of his debts, for the benefit of himself and family. Before the execution of a deed for this purpose, and on January, 21, 1867, the solicitors acting for Mr. Wade wrote to the plaintiff a letter, in which they said: "By the lease granted by you to Messrs. Tedder and Pridham, the lessees cannot underlet without your written consent, and the object of this communication is to ask you to be kind enough to give your written consent to the lease being vested in Messrs. Chirgwin and Hamilton, as you did when Mr. Wade took possession."

In reply, the plaintiff wrote: "I have no objection to consent to the trustees, Messrs. Chirgwin and Hamilton, acting for Mr. Wade in respect of the two farms, to vest the same in their hands similar to the transfer I allowed Mr. Wade from Messrs. Tedder and Pridham."

In February, 1867, Wade executed an assignment of all his estate and effects, including his interest in the premises, to Chirgwin and Hamilton as trustees, for the benefit of his creditors, and they entered into possession, paying rent, and so remained until November, 1867, when they entered into and signed an agreement with Mrs. Dobb (the defendant) for the sale to her of their interest in the farms. Mrs. Dobb thereupon took possession of the premises, and the plaintiff brought ejectment.

The learned Judge was of opinion that there had been no forfeiture, and nonsuited the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter a verdict in his favour.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Pinder shewed cause.—The defendant will contend, first, that the act of the trustees in selling the premises did not work a forfeiture, for the trustees and Wade, under whom they claimed, were only equitable assignees, and nothing done by them ought to affect Tedder and Pridham, who remained legal owners of the term; secondly, even if there had been a legal assignment to the trustees there would not have been a forfeiture, as the covenant was not expressed to be made by the lessees on behalf of their assigns, and therefore only bound the original lessees, who have committed no breach. With regard to the first point, the following decisions are material: Doe v. Payne (1 Stark. 86), where the covenant was " not to assign, set over, or otherwise let the demised premises," and proof was given that the defendant in ejectment was in possession of the premises, carried on business there, had placed his name over the door, and had said that he took the premises from two of the directors of the Commercial Sale Room, Lord Ellenborough said, " this does not prove that Dyer (the lessee) either assigned or let, and it is incumbent on the plaintiff to shew that he did either the one or the other: upon the evidence non constat that the defendant was not a tortious intruder. This evidence would not be sufficient even though Dyer had covenanted not to part with the possession." Seers v. Hind (1 Ves. jun. 295), where the Lord Chancellor said, " If A. lets a farm to B. with covenant not to alien, and B. dies, may not his executors dispose of it? I think it has been determined that they may; and I have always taken it as clear law. It is an alienation by the act of God." Roe v. Harrison (2 Term Rep. 425), where Ashurst, J., says, speaking of a covenant not to assign, " If indeed the word ' executors ' had not been inserted in the proviso, but it had been confined to an assignment by the lessee himself, it might have been doubted whether the restriction would have extended to the present case." With regard to the second point, that the covenant does not run with the land so as to bind the defendant, Whitchcot v. Fox (Cro. Jac. 398) seems to shew that the right to enforce the clause of re-entry is founded on contract, and that it does not run with the land so as to bind the assignee. But the more important cases are, Doe d. Cheere v. Smith (5 Taunt. 795) and Paul v. Nurse (8 B. & C. 486). In the first of these cases the covenant, for breach of which the power of re-entry was given, was that the lessee, his executors, or administrators, should not grant, demise, let, sell, assign, set over or part with the indenture of lease without the consent of the lessor. The lessee became bankrupt, his assignees took to the lease and sold it to a purchaser who underlet to the defendant. It was held that there was no forfeiture, the Court saying, " If he (the lessee) had actually assigned the lease while he remained lessee no doubt it would have been a breach of covenant, but the covenant does not extend to assigns." The act of the lessee is therefore no forfeiture. In Paul v. Nurse (8 B. & C. 486) Bayley, J., speaking of the liability of the defendant, who was assignee of the lessee, says, " The plaintiff's remedy is by an action on the covenant not to assign. Besides, it may admit of some doubt whether the defendant is within the covenant, for the lessee only covenants that he, his executors or administrators, will not assign." The recent case of Williams v. Earle (37 L. J. Q.B. 231) is no authority against the defendant, for it merely decided that when in a covenant like this assigns are mentioned, it runs with the land. He also referred to 2 Platt on Leases, 272, 273; Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 9th edit., p. 550; Davidson's Conveyancing, vol. 5, 176 n. (c).

Kingdon and Charles, in support of the rule.—Williams v. Earle (37 L. J. Q.B. 231) is identical with the present case.

[BLACKBURN, J.—All I said in my judgment in that case was that the covenant so far touched and concerned the land as to come within the second resolution in Spencer's case (Smith's Lead. Cas., 5th. ed., 44) as to covenants where assigns are mentioned.]

In Tatem v. Chaplin (2 H. Black. 133) a covenant that the lessee, his executors and administrators, should constantly reside upon the demised premises during the demise was held binding on the assignee though not named in the covenant. There can be no distinction in principle between such a covenant and the present one. Doe d. Cheere v. Smith (5 Taunt. 795) was decided upon the construction of the bankruptcy statutes; and it is submitted that this covenant runs with the land equally with those a list of which is given in Spencer's case (Smith's Lead. Cas., 5th ed., 44). But, assuming that the covenant does not run with the land, the lessees have been guilty of a breach. Neither of the two succeeding assignees was ever anything at law, but tenant at sufferance.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The only fact relied on as a forfeiture is that the lessees, with the assent of the lessor, have put themselves in a position in which they cannot prevent a breach of the covenant. A covenant not to part with possession does not amount to a covenant to resume possession when you have lawfully parted with it.]

The moment that the lessor finds any one in possession of the premises without his permission he is entitled to bring ejectment.

[BLACKBURN, J.—As soon as Wade was discovered to be in possession the primâ facie inference was that he came in under the lessees, but when the real facts were known the inference was rebutted.]

A tenant at sufferance has nothing to assign. To adopt the defendant's view would enable the premises to be transferred to a number of paupers in succession. Thirdly, the terms of the letter authorizing the first transfer only permitted a proper legal transfer of the lease and have not been pursued. The receipt of rent from Wade did not waive this irregularity, as the plaintiff was not aware of the real state of the case.—They also referred to Bally v. Wells (3 Wils. 25, 33).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was (on May 31) delivered by

BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action of ejectment tried, before myself, during the Spring Assizes, 1868, at Bodmin. It appeared on the trial that the plaintiff had, in 1860, demised the premises in question for fourteen years to Tedder and Pridham. This lease contained various covenants made by the lessees not expressed to be on behalf of their assigns; and amongst others, a covenant not to assign or part with the possession of the demised premises without the written assent of the landlord; and there was a clause of re-entry in case of the breach of any of the covenants. As the term had not expired by efflux of time, the question at the trial was whether it had been forfeited or not. The facts were not disputed. The plaintiff, by a letter addressed to Tedder and Pridham, dated March 25, 1865, assented to a transfer of the lease by them to one Wade, on the same terms as those on which they held it. Wade, who had purchased the term from them, entered into possession without having any formal assignment of the term. Wade continued in possession, paying rent, until 1867, when, by the written licence of the plaintiff, he assigned (inter alia) all his interest in the lease to Chirgwin and Hamilton as trustees for his creditors. It appeared that the plaintiff had assented to this transfer under the belief that, by an arrangement between the trustees and Wade, the family of Wade were to be allowed to continue in possession; but the trustees, taking a different view of the matter, sold the term to the defendant, and the defendant entered into possession. Two grounds of forfeiture were relied on at the trial: first, the unlicensed parting with the possession by Chirgwin and Hamilton, the trustees, to the defendants; and, secondly, the parting with the possession by the original lessees, Tedder and Pridham, to Wade without executing a transfer of the lease, so as to make him an assignee, and as such bound by all such covenants as ran with the land. A nonsuit was directed, reserving leave to enter a verdict for the plaintiff. Mr. Kingdon obtained a rule nisi accordingly, which was argued in the last term.

There was much argument at the bar as to whether, upon the true construction of the covenant, as expressed in the lease, it bound the lessees themselves only not to assign, and was merely a personal restriction not affecting their assigns, or whether it was a covenant running with the land and binding every assign. In the view we take of the matter, it is not necessary to express any opinion on this point, as there never was, in our opinion, any assignee of the whole term, so as to be subject to any of the covenants in the lease; and therefore, if there was any forfeiture of the term, it could only be in consequence of a breach of covenant by the original lessees, Tedder and Pridham. It was also argued that the parting with the possession by Chirgwin and Hamilton, the trustees for Wade's creditors, to the defendant, was such a breach of covenant on the part of Tedder and Pridham, the original lessees, because, it was said, the law takes no notice of the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, and therefore it was argued that the possession of Chirgwin and Hamilton, the cestui que trust, must be considered at law as the possession of Tedder and Pridham, and the change of the cestuis que trust from Chirgwin and Hamilton to the defendant must be considered a parting with the possession by the trustees, Tedder and Pridham, and consequently a breach of covenant on their part for which they would be liable in damages, though they neither were parties to the change nor had any power to prevent it. But no authority was cited in support of this very artificial reasoning. And we think it obvious that it involves in itself the fallacy of requiring the Court to hold (contrary to the fact) that Chirgwin and Hamilton (the assigning cestuis que trust) were merely servants to Tedder and Pridham, and yet to take notice that the defendant, to whom they transferred their equitable interest, was more than a servant to Tedder and Pridham. The second ground of forfeiture depends upon the effect of the written licence of March 25, 1865. We do not doubt that the plaintiff might have granted a licence to assign the term so expressed as to forbid the lessees parting with the possession until a complete transfer of the legal interest had been executed. But the practice of letting a purchaser into possession before the legal estate is transferred is so common that, if it was intended to forbid such a change of possession, it ought to have been clearly expressed; and in the present case it was not. The utmost effect which can be given to the expressions in the letter is, that the landlord had a right to call upon the parties to complete the transfer of the legal estate; which he never did. The rule, therefore, must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

*Insurance on Life—Policy not containing Name of Person Interested—Husband and Wife—*14 Geo. 3. c. 48. s. 2.

INSURANCE. A.—By the 14 Geo. 3. c. 48. s. 2, a life policy in which there is not inserted the name or names of the person or persons interested therein, or for whose use, benefit, or on whose account the policy is made, is unlawful.

A husband, whose wife was a minor and entitled to a sum of money on attaining the age of twenty-one, applied to her trustees for an advance, which they agreed to make upon having the repayment of it secured by one J. in the event of the wife dying before attaining twenty-one. J. having consented to become security upon condition that an assurance was effected on the life of the wife, a policy was executed by an insurance company which was expressed to be made between them and the wife, who was described as a married woman. Neither the name of the husband nor that of any other person besides the wife was inserted in the policy as being interested in it:—Held, that the policy was void, as not containing the name of the husband or other person interested in it.

Declaration by the plaintiff, William Evans, administrator of the personal estate and effects which were of Mary Ann Evans, deceased, who died intestate, against the defendant, as secretary of the Norwich Life Insurance Society, and duly appointed and liable by virtue of a statute passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third to be sued as nominal defendant for the society, upon a policy of assurance bearing date November 2, 1863, made by the society in the lifetime of Mary Ann Evans, in which—after reciting that Mary Ann Evans had agreed to effect an insurance on her own life with the society in the sum of 200*l.*, according to the rules, regulations and conditions prescribed by the constitution thereof, and had, by herself or by her agent, made and signed a declaration in writing setting forth her age and certain particulars relative to her health, and had agreed to pay to the society the sum of 3*l*. 19*s*. as a premium for the first year of such insurance, and to continue such payment yearly during the term of her life,—it was declared that if Mary Ann Evans should die between the day of the date of the policy and November 1, A.D. 1864, inclusive, or in the event of her living beyond the last-mentioned day, if she or her assigns should pay unto the society the sum of 3*l*. 19*s*. on or before November 2 in every subsequent year of the term, the funds and property of the society should, pursuant to the regulations, be subject and liable to the payment unto the executors, administrators and assigns of the assured, within three calendar months after satisfactory proof of her death should have been received by the directors of the society, of the sum of 200*l*., and such further sum or sums as should, at any time or times thereafter, be appropriated under the regulations of the society, as a bonus upon the insurance; provided always, that the policy should be void in any or either of the cases mentioned on the back of the policy, and the money paid on account of the insurance should be forfeited to the society. Averment, that afterwards, and whilst the policy remained in force, Mary Ann Evans died, and satisfactory proof of her death was, more than three months before this suit, given by the plaintiff to the directors of the society, and all premiums were paid and all conditions were observed and performed (except so far as the society waived and dispensed with the same), yet the plaintiff, as such administrator, has not been paid the sum of 200*l*. out of the funds and property of the society.

Plea—That the policy was, in truth and in fact, made by the plaintiff in the name and on the pretended behalf of Mary Ann Evans, but for the use and benefit and on the account and behalf of the plaintiff, and not for the use, benefit or on account of Mary Ann Evans, and that the name of the plaintiff was not inserted in the policy as the name of the person interested therein, or for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy was made; and the policy was and is an unlawful policy under and pursuant to the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided[1].

Replication, joining issue upon the plea.

The following CASE was, by the consent of the parties, stated for the opinion of the Court, a copy of the pleadings to be annexed and to form part of the case, but the Court to have the power of amending the pleadings in accordance with the facts as found, should any amendment be necessary.

The late Mrs. Mary Ann Evans, the wife of the plaintiff, to whom she was married during her minority, was entitled under the will of her father to a sum of money upon her attaining the age of twenty-one years, viz., 227*l*. and upwards. After her marriage, and during her minority, her husband was in want of a sum of 200*l*., and applied to the trustees of her father's will to advance that sum to him in part payment of his wife's legacy, which the trustees agreed to do upon having the repayment of the money secured by a Mr. Jacobs in the event of Mrs. Evans dying before she attained the age of twenty-one years. Mr. Jacobs having consented to become security for the repayment of the money on condition of an insurance being effected on the life of Mrs. Evans, the 200*l*. was accordingly advanced by the trustees to the plaintiff, and the following policy

(1) By the 14 Geo. 3. c. 48, after reciting that it has been found by experience that the making insurances on lives, or other events wherein the assured shall have no interest, has introduced a mischievous kind of gaming, it is enacted that, from and after the passing of the Act, no insurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, on the life or lives of any person or persons, or any other event or events whatsoever wherein the person or persons for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policies shall be made shall have no interest, or by gaming or wagering; and that every assurance made contrary to the true intent and meaning hereof shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever. 2. That it shall not be lawful to make any policy or policies on the life or lives of any person or persons, or other event or events, without inserting in such policy or policies the person or persons, name or names interested therein, or for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy is so made or underwrote.

of insurance was, on November 2, 1863, at the request of Mr. Jacobs, effected by the plaintiff with the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society in the name of his wife. The policy was in the words and figures following:

"Whereas Mary Ann Evans, of No. 44, South William Street, Cardiff, wife of William Evans, hath agreed to effect an insurance upon her own life with the Norwich Union Life Insurance Society, in the sum of two hundred pounds, according to the rules, regulations and conditions prescribed by the constitution thereof, and hath by herself, or by her assent, made and signed a declaration in writing, setting forth her age and certain particulars relative to her health, and hath agreed to pay to the said society the sum of three pounds nineteen shillings and — pence as a premium for the first year of such insurance, and to continue such payment yearly during the term of her life. Now, know all men by these presents, that if the said Mary Ann Evans shall die between the day of the date of this policy and the 1st of November, 1864, inclusive, or in the event of her living beyond the last-mentioned day, if she or her assigns shall pay to the said society the sum of three pounds nineteen shillings and — pence on or before the 2nd day of November in every subsequent year of the said term, the funds and property of the said society shall, pursuant to the said regulations, be subject and liable to the payment unto the executors or assigns of the said assured, within three calendar months after satisfactory proof of her death shall have been received by the directors of the said society, of the sum of two hundred pounds, and such further sum or sums as shall at any time or times hereafter be appropriated under the regulations of the said society as a bonus upon this insurance; provided always, that this policy shall be void in any or either of the cases mentioned on the back hereof, and the money paid on account of the said insurance shall be forfeited to the said society. In witness whereof the undersigned, being three of the directors of the said society, have hereunto set our hands and seals, the 2nd of November, A.D. 1863.

"Thomas Beevor (L.S.)
"W. R. Clarke (L.S.)
"Robert Fitch (L.S.)

The conditions indorsed on the policy and referred to therein are not material to be stated for the purposes of the present case. Mary Ann Evans attained the age of twenty-one years on November 28, 1864. The premium of 3*l*. 19*s*. payable for effecting the insurance on the life of Mary Ann Evans, and the same sum for continuing the same during the year ending on November 2, 1865, were paid by the plaintiff to the society. After the renewal premium had been paid, as in the last paragraph mentioned, namely, on March 15, 1865, Mary Ann Evans died during her confinement. Due proof of the death of Mary Ann Evans was subsequently furnished to the directors of the society pursuant to the provisions of the policy, but the society declined to pay the sum insured, upon the grounds set forth in their pleas to this action. It is agreed that the Court are to have the same power of drawing inferences of fact as a jury might have.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether under the circumstances above stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in the present action. If the Court shall be of the opinion in the affirmative, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 200*l*. and costs. If the Court shall be of opinion in the negative, their judgment is to be entered for the defendant.

Pinder, for the plaintiff.—The policy was a legal one. In the first place, Jacobs had no legal interest in it.

[Lush, J.—If the wife had died under age Jacobs would have had an equitable interest in the money insured.]

The husband is the only person who will be said to have had the legal interest in the insurance. He had an insurable interest in his wife's life, and might have insured her life in his own name, or have allowed her to insure in her own name, in which case it would be unnecessary to state his interest.

[Cockburn, C.J.—How can the wife contract in her own name?]

The husband might confer a chose in action on the wife. In Dalton v. the Midland Counties Railway Company (13 Com. B. Rep. 474; 22 L. J. C.P. 177) it was held that a married woman (subject to a plea of abatement) might sue for the dividends of stock which she had purchased in her own name, and of which she was registered as owner; and the late case of Fleet v. Perrins (37 L. J. Q.B. 233) is to the same effect. The wife having this chose in action was the person interested in it, as the husband could never reduce it into possession in his lifetime.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—A person may be interested in a policy in two ways: interested in the event, which is one thing, and having the legal interest in the policy, which is another. Can we shut our eyes to the fact that this policy was made for the husband's benefit?]

In Halford v. Kymer (10 B. & C. 724), a case where a father had effected an insurance on his son's life in which he had no pecuniary interest, Bayley, J., says, p. 729, "If a father, wishing to give his son property to dispose of, makes an insurance on his son's life, in his (the son's) name, not for his (the father's) own benefit, but for the benefit of his son, there is no law to prevent his doing so."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In Wainwright v. Bland (1 M. & Rob. 481) it was said that an insurance of her life by a woman in her own name, but for the benefit of another, was prohibited by the statute.]

That was a case of gross fraud and suspected murder. Here the transaction was an honest one, and it is quite consistent with the circumstances that it was intended after the wife had attained twenty-one to keep up the policy for her benefit. In Shilling v. the Accidental Death Insurance Company (2 Hurls. & N. 42; 26 L. J. Ex. 266), where it was pleaded that the policy was made for the benefit of a person other than the one whose life was insured, both Martin, B., and Bramwell, B:, gave their opinion that if there was an understanding between two persons that one should insure his life, and the other pay the premiums, and that the policy should be bequeathed to the latter, the plea would not be proved. The policy is a chose in action, in which, by the form in which it is prepared, the husband has allowed the wife to take an interest. He has disabled himself from interfering with it during her life, and it is like a bond executed in her favour.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—At any rate the policy is for the joint benefit of husband and wife.]

Both Jacobs and the husband have more or less interest in it, but their interest is too remote to make it necessary to be stated.

H. T. Cole (Raymond with him), for the defendants, cited Hobson v. the Observer Life Assurance Society (8 E. & B. 40; 26 L. J. Q.B. 303).—(He was then stopped.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this case is too clear to make it necessary to delay our judgment any longer. I will take it in favour of the plaintiff that the policy was intended to operate in the first place for the protection of Jacobs, the surety, and therefore in the language of the statute for his use and benefit, but that after the contingency of the wife dying under twenty-one had been guarded against, it was to enure for the benefit of the wife. But even in this view, it seems to me that when one person has an interest in a policy after its immediate purposes has been satisfied, the terms and spirit of the Act require that the names and interests of the persons first interested in it should be inserted in the policy one after another. Now, this has not been done in the present case, for I think that at any rate the name of the husband ought to have been inserted as a person interested. I was at first strongly impressed with the idea that the defence was a merely technical one; but as an explanation has been offered, I do not wish to make any observations against the company.

MELLOR, J.—I have come, with great reluctance, to the same conclusion. When you come to look at the policy you find that the wife is stated in the recital to be a married woman, therefore, although the husband made the policy and paid the premiums, the company knew that the person insured was a married woman, and might, one would think, have presumed that the husband had an interest in the policy. But we must decide the case according to the law; and, looking at the words of section 2, I think that they cannot be got over, as the husband was no doubt a person for whose benefit the policy was made.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the statute may operate hardly in some instances, but it is based on the soundest principles. It was meant that no person should have an interest in destroying the life of another, and in order that it might be known who was the person interested in the death, the statute required that his name should be inserted in the policy. The plea alleges that the policy was made in the name and on the pretended behalf of Mary Ann Evans, but for the use and benefit and on the account of the plaintiff. Do the facts prove this statement? I think that they do most conclusively. It appears that the wife being a minor and entitled to money when she came of age, her husband applied to her trustees for an advance, which they agreed to make if the repayment of the amount was secured by one Jacobs, and that Jacobs agreed to become security upon condition that the insurance was effected for his protection. The policy was accordingly effected by the wife at her husband's request, and the plea is in my judgment proved to the very letter. She made the policy to protect her husband from liability, and it was the same thing in contemplation of law as if she had made it as a surety for him. It may be that as the policy is not limited as to time, it was intended that the husband should continue it for the wife's benefit after she attained twenty-one. But this does not take the case out of the statute; it only made it necessary that the names of both husband and wife should be inserted in the policy.

County Coroner, Election of—Holding of Sheriff's Court—Finality of Proclamation of Person Chosen.

CORONER.—Where, at a contested election of coroner for any county district, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, a Court has been duly held and one of the candidates proclaimed by the sheriff as the person chosen, the election cannot be disturbed by quo warranto on the ground that the candidate was not elected by a majority of duly qualified voters, as the sheriff's declaration of the state of the poll and proclamation of the person chosen are judicial acts.

This was an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, calling upon the defendant, Dr. T. B. Diplock, to shew by what right he exercised the office of coroner for the western district of the county of Middlesex.

Plea—That, after the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92. and the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, the coroner for the district in question having died, a writ was delivered to the sheriff commanding him to cause another coroner to be chosen and certify his name; that a Court was duly held by the sheriff for this purpose, and the defendant and two others offered themselves as candidates; that the defendant was duly qualified; and that a poll was demanded, and the sheriff then adjourned the Court till eight in the forenoon of the next day but one, and duly appointed a number of persons as clerks to take the poll with him. That, before they began to take the poll, every clerk so appointed as aforesaid was duly sworn truly and indifferently to take the same poll, and to set down the names of each elector and place of his residence and for whom he should poll, and to poll no elector who was not sworn, if required to be sworn by the candidates or either of them; that the poll was duly taken by the clerks in the presence of the sheriff, and continued for one day only, for eight hours of such day, and was not kept open later than four o'clock in the afternoon of the day; and at the close of the poll the poll clerks inclosed and sealed their several books, and publicly delivered them so inclosed and sealed to the sheriff, who duly received and kept them unopened until the re-assembling of the Court. That the Court re-assembled on the day next but one after the close of the poll, and then and there the sheriff openly broke the seals on the books, and cast up the numbers of votes as they appeared on the several books, and openly declared the state of the poll, and made a proclamation, not later than two o'clock in the afternoon of the day, that the defendant was duly chosen by a majority of such persons residing within the district as were, at the time of the election, duly qualified to vote at the election of a coroner for the division of the county. Averment—That the defendant was duly proclaimed by the sheriff to be the coroner for the division, duly chosen and elected to be such coroner as aforesaid by a majority of such persons residing within the said district as were, at the time of the election, duly qualified to vote, &c.; and that the defendant then and there was duly sworn and took the oaths required by law to be administered to and taken by a person appointed or elected coroner for any county, and accepted and took upon himself the duties of the office.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Second replication: That the defendant was not elected to the office by a majority of valid voters duly qualified.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Keane (Day with him), for the relator.—It will be said that the question whether the defendant was elected by a majority of voters duly qualified was concluded by the election before the sheriff. But this proposition is wholly untenable; the law relating to the election of county coroners is to be found in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92.[1] and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116. s. 2. These statutes repealed the old Act, 58 Geo. 3. c. 95, and, by reducing the time within which the poll

(1) By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92. s. 1, after reciting that the regulations for the elections of coroners are insufficient, and that the elections are made with inconvenience, and attended with great and unnecessary expense, the 58 Geo. 3. c. 95. is repealed.

By section 9. every corner is to be chosen by a majority of such persons residing within the district as shall at the time of such election be duly qualified to vote at the elections of coroners for the county.

By section 10, "From and after the division of any county into coroners' districts, upon every election to be made of any coroner or coroners for any county the sheriff of the county where such election shall be made shall hold a Court for the same election at some convenient place within the district for which the election of coroner shall take place, on some day to be by him appointed, which day shall not be less than seven days nor more than fourteen days after the receipt of the writ de coronatore eligendo; and in case the election be not then determined upon the view, with the consent of the electors there present, but that a poll shall be demanded for determination thereof, then the sheriff, or in his absence his under-sheriff, shall adjourn the same Court to eight of the clock in the forenoon of the next day but one, unless such next day but one shall be Saturday or Sunday, and then of the Monday following; and the sheriff, or in his absence the under-sheriff, with such others as shall be deputed by him, shall then and there proceed to take the poll in some public place or places by the same sheriff, or his under-sheriff as aforesaid in his absence, or others appointed for the taking thereof as aforesaid; and such polling shall continue for two days only [reduced to one day by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116. s. 2.], for eight hours in each day; and no poll shall be kept open later than four of the clock in the afternoon of either of the said days."

By section 11. places are to be appointed for taking the poll at elections for coroners.

By section 12. the sheriff is to erect booths for taking the poll at the Court or principal place of election.

By section 13. for the more due and orderly proceeding in the poll the sheriff, or in his absence the under-sheriff, or such as he shall depute, shall appoint such number of clerks as to him shall seem meet and convenient for the taking thereof, which clerks shall take the poll in the presence of the sheriff or his under-sheriff, or such as he shall depute; and before they begin to take the poll every clerk so appointed shall by the sheriff or his under-sheriff, or such as he shall depute as aforesaid, be sworn truly and indifferently to take the same poll, and to set down the names of each elector, and the place of his residence, and for whom he shall poll, and to poll is to be taken, have deprived the candidates of the power of obtaining a full and satisfactory scrutiny at the time of the election. In The Queen v. Day (3 El. & B. 859; 23 L. J. Q.B. 317), the question whether a coroner was elected by voters duly qualified was raised by quo warranto.

[LUSH, J.—Yes, but only by the consent of the parties.]

That case is approved of by Lord Cranworth in In re the Coroner of Hemel Hempstead (5 De Gex, M. & G. 228). The election before the sheriff is not a judicial act. No judgment is given, and the sheriff is bound to take the votes as they are tendered.

Gray (H. H. Shepherd with him), for the defendant.—The question in the present case was finally decided at the election before the sheriff. The election of the coroner at the County Court of the sheriff is a judicial act. The right to the office may be inquired into for some purposes, but this Court is unable to try the question whether the voters were entitled to vote. The sheriff is the Judge of the Court, and his proclamation is final. In Dyer, 165 a, resolutions by the Justices, &c. upon the stat. 1 Edw. 6. c. 7, it was resolved, first, the king, who is heir or successor, may proclaim and commence his reign on the same day that his progenitor or predecessor died. Also, all patents of the Judges of the one bench and the other, the Barons of the Exchequer, sheriffs, &c. are determined by the death of the king who made them: otherwise it is of coroners, who are chosen by writ. In Coke's Inst., 2nd part, 175, it is said, "It is holden in our books, that albeit the king dieth, yet the coroner, because he is elected by the freeholders of the county by writ, and returned of record in the Chancery, which is a judicial Act, remained." The mode of electing the candidate is now practically the same as that under the repealed statute, 58 Geo. 3. c. 95; and by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92. s. 10. the sheriff is directed to hold "a special County Court." The statute also provides that an oath may, if necessary, be administered to the electors, and any one falsely making this oath is liable to the penalties for perjury, so that there can be no difficulty in testing the qualification of the voters.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that our judgment must be in favour of the defendant. I entertain no doubt that the sheriff in holding his special County Court for the election of coroner, in taking the poll at such Court, and in making proclamation of the person chosen, was exercising judicial functions. He is Judge of that Court, and there can be no doubt that under the old practice it was his business while holding that Court to take a scrutiny when there was a dispute as to the votes. Many of us are old enough to remember that before the passing of the Reform Act the sheriff or his deputies used to inquire into the validity of votes tendered at a parliamentary election while it was going on, and this inquiry was a judicial proceeding. We have also the high authority of Lord Coke that the sheriff upon this occasion exercises a judicial function. Now, I think that no elector who is not sworn, if required to be sworn by the candidates or either of them. The oath to be taken is as follows:

"I SWEAR [or, being one of the people called Quakers, or entitled by Law to make Affirmation, solemnly affirm], That I am a Freeholder of the County of and have a Freehold Estate, consisting of lying at within the said County; and that such Freehold Estate has not been granted to me fraudulently or colourably on purpose to qualify me to give my Vote at this Election: and that the Place of my Abode is at [and, if it be a Place consisting of more Streets or Places than One, specifying what Street or Place]; that I am Twenty-one Years of Age, as I believe; and that I have not been before polled at this Election [adding, except in Cases of solemn Affirmations] 'So help me GOD.'"

By section 14. every elector wilfully or falsely taking the oath or affirmation shall incur the penalties by law inflicted on persons guilty of perjury; and any person unlawfully and corruptly procuring or suborning any freeholder, or other person, wilfully and falsely to take the oath or affirmation in order to be polled, shall incur the pains and penalties inflicted on persons guilty of subornation of perjury.

By section 15. the poll-books at the close of the poll are to be transmitted to the sheriff or under-sheriff, who is to receive and keep them until the re-assembling of the Court on the next day but one after the close of the poll, when he is to cast up the votes and "openly declare the state of the poll, and make proclamation of the person chosen, not later than two o'clock in the afternoon of the said day."

in former times, when there was a scrutiny, it could not have been contended that there was an appeal from the decision of the presiding officer to this Court. Noboby ever came to this Court to ask for a fresh scrutiny, and that the decision of the sheriff might be questioned by the intervention of a jury. It is said that the Act of Parliament has rendered a scrutiny impossible by limiting the duration of the election, so that it is not possible to determine the legality of the votes. This may be so, but it is not because the statute has rendered an inquiry more difficult that therefore the duty of making it is to be transferred to this Court, where no such duty existed before. The time of polling was reduced because it was found that when it lasted for ten days the expense was such as to deter candidates from offering themselves for election. The Act of Parliament has therefore limited the time of polling within narrower limits, and I must confess that I have thought that the time might be still further abridged. The oath that the elector is a freeholder is practically substituted for the scrutiny, and though the change may be open to this inconvenience, that by this means any person by perjuring himself has an opportunity of voting which he did not enjoy before, yet the legislature may have thought that very few persons would take upon themselves the risk of committing this offence. At all events, I think it better that matters should remain as they are instead of having the question decided by a jury, which is not the tribunal best adapted for the purpose. I am very far from saying that there may not be many cases in which a quo warranto might lie as regards the office of coroner; for example, where the candidate had not the qualification required by the statute, or where the election had not been properly conducted. But when, as in the present case, no such objection is made, and all that is asked for is a scrutiny into the votes, we must assume that the Court was duly held, that a sufficient number of duly qualified votes was given, and that the proclamation was duly made. Our judgment must therefore be in favour of the defendant.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Is the question whether the candidate was elected by a majority of duly qualified voters to be determined by the County Court or this Court? I think that the allegations which the pleadings contain are sufficient to shew that the proceedings before the sheriff were duly held. The votes must be received and the voter left to the penalties of perjury if he is not duly qualified. This may be an imperfect remedy, but it is the only one which the legislature has provided. I cannot think that the plea is bad for omitting to state that the defendant was elected by a majority of voters duly qualified.

Bankruptcy—Debt or Demand provable—Contingent Liability—Interest.

BANKRUPTCY. H.—In January, 1866, a sum of money in consols was lent to the promoters of a bill before parliament. The plaintiffs, the defendant and others entered into an undertaking with the lenders that if the bill was thrown out the consols should be returned, and that if it passed (which was the event that happened) an equal amount of stock should be transferred to the lenders, and a sum in the nature of interest on the value of the consols at the time they

In July he obtained his order of discharge. In August the bill was passed, but the consols were not transferred till the May following, and the plaintiffs were thereupon compelled to pay, under their agreement, a sum of money as the equivalent for interest:—Held, in an action against the defendant for contribution in respect of the amount so paid, that his bankruptcy afforded no answer to the claim, as his liability could not have been valued at the date of the adjudication so as to be provable either under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 178, or 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 154.

The declaration contained the common counts for money paid, interest and money due on accounts stated.

Second plea.—The defendant's bankruptcy and order of discharge before action. Joinder of issue.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1867, it appeared that the plaintiffs, the defendant, and three others had promoted a railway bill in parliament, and it became necessary to make the usual deposit required by the Standing Orders. The Marine Insurance Company undertook to make the deposit by transferring to the Accountant-General a sufficient amount of stock, upon condition that interest on the stock for six months, at an agreed scale, should be paid them in advance (over and above the current dividends), and an agreement was accordingly signed in January, 1866. By this agreement the promoters undertook, jointly and severally, that, on the withdrawal or rejection of the bill, the sum of consols so deposited should be forthwith transferred to the company; and that, on the passing of the bill, a sum of consols equal to the sum so deposited should forthwith be purchased in the names of the company or transferred to them, and that they would pay to the company a sum equal to the dividends that might have accrued on the sum of deposited consols at the date at which an equal sum of consols should be so purchased. And they also undertook to pay the company interest, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. on the value of the deposited consols, at the date of the transfer, for any period which might elapse after the expiration of six months from the date of the agreement until the amount of the deposited consols should be transferred to the company, or that a sum of consols equal thereto should be purchased in their names or transferred to them.

The bill was passed on August 10, 1866, but the stock was not re-transferred to the company until May, 1867. The company accordingly required interest under the latter part of the agreement, which the plaintiffs paid to the amount of 500*l.*, and brought this action against the defendant for contribution. The defendant was adjudicated bankrupt on April 27, 1866, and received his order of discharge on July 12, 1866.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the defendant, with leave for the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict in their favour for the amount of the defendant's contribution.

A rule having been obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the plea of bankruptcy afforded no answer to the plaintiffs' claim, as it was not provable under the bankruptcy.

J. P. Murphy shewed cause.—The plaintiffs' claim might have been valued and proved under the bankruptcy. At the time of the bankruptcy it was certain that the consols must, at some time or other, be returned by the promoters. In Warburg v. Tucker (El. B. & El. 914; 28 L. J. Q.B. 56), where the bankrupt before his bankruptcy had assigned a life policy as security for the repayment of a loan, and covenanted to keep up the premiums, it was held that the bankruptcy was no answer to an action for a breach of the covenant after the bankruptcy, as the breach was not a liability to pay money upon a contingency, but a liability to damages which would be greater or less according to circumstances. But the effect of this decision is altered by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 154, which enables a liability to pay sums of money yearly or otherwise to be proved in bankruptcy.

Digitized by Google

He also referred to the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. ss. 172, 177, 178, Saunders v. Best (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731); Simpson v. Maravita (38 L. J. Q.B. 76).

Henry James, in support of the rule.—At the time of the bankruptcy there was no debt which the plaintiffs could have proved, and they are therefore not barred. The liability of the defendant was not a liability to pay such money as should be found to be due upon the happening of a single contingency. If the bill had been withdrawn, no interest would have been due. If it had been rejected, no interest would have been due. If the consols had been transferred at an earlier date, the amount of the liability would have been smaller. It was also uncertain what amount the lenders would be entitled to receive on account of dividends. The claim was therefore incapable of a certain valuation. He cited Martin's Patent Anchor Company v. Morton (37 L. J. Q.B. 98); Ex parte Hastie (38 L. J. Ch. 233); and Brett v. Jackson (38 L. J. C.P. 139).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was now (June 8) delivered by BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action for money paid. The only material plea was bankruptcy.

On the trial, before me, it appeared that the Marine Insurance Company had, in January, 1866, lent a large sum in consols, to be deposited by the promoters of a bill then before parliament. The plaintiffs, the defendant and others, six in all, entered into an undertaking with the company, that if the bill was thrown out, the consols should be returned, and that if it passed (which was the event that happened), an equal amount of stock should be transferred to the company, and that a sum in the nature of interest on the value of the consols at the time they were lent, from the end of six months to the day of the transfer, should be paid to the company. Interest for the first six months had been paid to the company as the consideration for the loan of the consols. In April, 1866, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt. In July, 1866, he obtained his order of discharge. In August, 1866, the bill was passed, but the consols were not transferred until May, 1867, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay, under the undertaking, 500*l.* as the equivalent for interest. The action was brought to recover contribution for one-sixth part of this sum. A verdict was entered for the defendant on the plea of bankruptcy, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs. A rule accordingly was obtained, against which cause was shewn in this term. The only question was, whether the claim against the defendant in respect of his undertaking could in any way have been proved under the bankruptcy, for if so, the defendant was discharged by his order. Had the undertaking been to pay the value of the consols within a reasonable time after the passing of the bill, together with interest from a fixed day up to the actual payment, there seems to be no doubt that the principal debt would have been provable under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 178, as a contingent liability, and the interest would in that case have been so much considered an accessory to the principal that it might have been proved along with it, as in Ex parte Barwise (25 L. J. Bk. 10), though in this case at the time of the bankruptcy it was uncertain what sum might be payable as interest along with the principal in the event (which has happened) of the bill not being passed till after the fixed day. But though a promise to replace a particular amount of consols at a future day is not in substance different from a liability to pay a sum of money, and though if the contract be broken before bankruptcy, the amount which is then ascertained may be proved—see Betteley v. Stainsby (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 477; 31 L. J. C.P. 337),—still, whilst the day at which the stock is to be replaced, and consequently the value of what is then to be replaced is at the time of the bankruptcy unascertained, we think it cannot be treated as a liability to pay money within section 178.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 153. removes the objection that a jury is required to ascertain the amount when the liability to damages is at the time of the adjudication already incurred: but there is no provision in the Bankrupt Laws, as yet, under which such a liability not yet incurred at the time of bankruptcy, can be proved. The liability therefore under the promise to pay the interest must, if provable at all, be proved as a separate matter, and we think that the case of Warburgh v. Tucker (El. B. & El. 914; 28 L. J. Q.B. 56) is a decisive authority that it cannot be proved under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 178. The question then arises whether it can be proved under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 154? We think that though the general words, "any other sums of money, whether yearly or otherwise," taken by themselves, would include every kind of payment, yet they must be restrained by the context to sums of money so far as ejusdem generis with premiums of insurance, that the liability may at the time of the adjudication be capable of valuation. This is distinctly laid down by Lord Justice Giffard, in Ex parte Hastie (38 L. J. Ch. 233). And we are unable to see how, or on what principle, a value could have been put in April, 1866 (when the adjudication took place) on the liability of the defendant, in case he and his co-contractors failed to transfer the stock in due time according to their undertaking, to pay interest until they did perform it. We think, therefore, that the rule must be made absolute.

CRIMINAL LAW. D. MANDAMUS. A. MAGISTERIAL LAW. D.—A magistrate before whom a charge or complaint is made of an offence which cannot be the subject of an indictment (such as an alleged agreement or conspiracy by Members of either House of Parliament to deceive the House, by denying the truth of charges contained in a petition presented to it, though they knew that these charges were true) is not bound to take the recognizance of the prosecutor according to the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17. s. 2[1]. Therefore, where complaint was made before a magistrate that certain Members of the House of Lords had conspired to deceive the House by stating that a charge of falsehood contained in a petition presented to the House was false, though they knew it to be true, in order to prevent the prayer of the petition from being granted, to the injury of the petitioner:—Held, that the complaint did not charge an indictable offence, as an agreement by members of either House to make defamatory speeches there could not be the subject of an indictment, and that the magistrate was therefore right in refusing to take the recognizance of the prosecutor according to the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17. s. 2.

(1) The 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, "An Act to prevent vexatious indictments for certain misdemeanours," enacts, in section 2, "Where any charge or complaint shall be made before any one or more of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace that any person has committed any of the offences aforesaid (among which conspiracy is included) within the jurisdiction of such Justice, and such Justice shall refuse to commit or to bail the person charged with such offence to be tried for the same, then in case the prosecutor shall desire to prefer an indictment respecting the said offence, it shall be lawful for the Justice and he is hereby required to take the recognizance of such prosecutor to prosecute the charge or complaint, and to transmit such recognizance, information, and depositions, if any, to the Court in which such indictment ought to be preferred, in the same manner as such Justice would have done in case he had committed the person charged to be tried for such offence."

This was a rule calling on Mr. Tyrwhitt, a metropolitan police magistrate, to shew cause why he should not take the recognizance of the prosecutor on a charge of conspiracy against Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron. The rule was moved by the prosecutor, Mr. Rigby Wason, and it appeared from his affidavit that the information alleged that, in 1867, he had entrusted Lord Russell with a petition to the House of Lords, in which he (Mr. Wason) charged the Lord Chief Baron with falsehood in giving evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons. That Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron prevented the course of justice, to the injury of a third person, by making statements which they knew were not true, in order to prevent the prayer of the petition from being granted; and they made these statements after conferring together. That Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron did, between February 5 and 13, 1867, conspire and agree together to prevent the course of justice, to the injury of a third person (the deponent). That the conspiracy consisted in an agreement on the part of Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron, to make statements which they knew were not true, in order to prevent the prayer of the petition from being granted. That the conspiracy consisted in an agreement on the part of Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron to deceive the House of Lords, by stating that the charge of falsehood contained in the petition was false when they knew that the charge was perfectly true.

The magistrate after adjourning the case for the purpose of taking Mr. Wason's recognizance, afterwards refused to take it, on the ground that the information did not charge an indictable offence.

Mr. Rigby Wason, in person, was heard in support of the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this rule must be refused. I entirely agree that if the matter brought by Mr. Wason before the magistrate had been matter cognizable by the criminal law, and for which an indictment would lie, the magistrate would have had no discretion, and could not have refused to take the recognizance in the manner required by the statute, and if he had declined to interfere, it would have been our duty, ex debito justitiæ, to grant a rule directing him to take the recognizance. But where the case submitted to the magistrate does not afford ground for an indictment, I think that it is in his discretion whether he shall entertain the application or not, and that this is a discretion which we ought not to review. The question remains, whether the matter brought before the magistrate was such that it could properly form the subject of an indictment. It is necessary to consider Mr. Wason's affidavit, and we find that it states that he gave to Earl Russell a petition to present to the House of Lords containing a charge of falsehood against the Lord Chief Baron, and that Earl Russell, Lord Chelmsford and the Lord Chief Baron conspired to deceive the House of Lords by stating that this charge was unfounded, when they knew it to be true. Now, these statements are stated to have been made with the object of preventing the prayer of the petition from being granted, and as this object could not be attained unless they were made in the House of Lords, we may assume that the alleged conspiracy is a conspiracy to make such statements in that House. I think, then, that the magistrate, looking at the whole of the information, was warranted in coming to the conclusion that the proposed ground of the indictment was an agreement by these three persons to deceive the House of Lords, by statements to be made there, for the purpose of defeating the petition. But I am distinctly of opinion that such an indictment could not be maintained in point of law. I think that a supposed conspiracy to make statements in either House for the purpose of influencing the members must stand on the same footing as statements actually made there, and there can be no doubt that speeches delivered in parliament cannot be made the foundation of legal proceedings. For this reason only, I think that the magistrate was right, and that this Court ought not to interfere.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, was passed to prevent an indictment being preferred for certain specified offiences without previous authorization, and section 2 is as follows.—[The learned Judge read the section.]—Now, I perfectly agree that where a charge or complaint of any one of these offences is made before a Justice, and he is required after refusing to commit or to bail the person charged with the offence, to take the recognizance for the prosecution of the charge, that he has no discretion, but is bound to take, and that this Court would issue a mandamus to compel him to do so if it thought that the charge was one for which an indictment would lie. Then comes the question whether what was brought before the magistrate did amount to a charge of an offence for which an indictment would lie? I perfectly agree with what my Lord has said, that when either House of Parliament is sitting, it is part of its privilege that each of its members is at liberty to make statements without being liable to criminal proceedings in respect of them. If the privilege did not exist, the example of Hampden and Pym would not be likely to be followed. Therefore, as it is clear that no indictment will lie for statements made in either house, or for agreements among the members themselves that such statements should be made, and as the information only charges an agreement to make false statements in the House of Lords, I think that the magistrate's second thoughts were best, and that the rule must be refused.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question is, whether the information charges an indictable offence; if it does not, the magistrate was right in the course which he took. I quite agree with the observations of the Court as to the language of the information. The conspiracy charged is a conspiracy to deceive the House of Lords by certain persons in their capacity of members of the House. Now, I am clearly of opinion, and I do not think that it ought to be a matter of doubt for one moment, that the conduct of members with reference to their deliberations in the House ought not to be inquired into in a criminal Court.

HAYES, J., concurred.

Damages, Measure of — Vendor and Purchaser — Default in Delivering Possession of Property—Loss of Profit on Re-sale.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER. B.—Where the lease of a house was sold by auction the conditions of sale providing that possession should be given on the completion of the purchase, and the vendors, who were mortgagees of the property and entitled to convey it, failed to give possession because of their unwillingness to incur the expense of an ejectment against the mortgagor, who refused to quit the premises:—Held, that the ordinary rule limiting the damages in sales of real property did not apply, and that the purchaser could recover, not only the amount of the deposit and the expense of examining the title, but the loss of the profit on a re-sale of the premises, and the cost of the conveyance to the sub-vendee.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, reported 37 L. J. Q.B. 145.

The following is an outline of the facts, which are fully stated in the judgment of the Court below. The defendants had offered for sale by auction, subject to certain conditions of sale, the lease of two houses mortgaged to them as trustees, with a power of sale, which they had become entitled to exercise. Of one of these houses, lot 48, it was stated in the particulars that "possession would be given on the completion of the purchase." The lease was knocked down to the plaintiff as the highest bidder, and the deposit required by the conditions paid by him. No difficulty arose as to the title of the defendants, but the mortgagor, who was in possession of No. 48, refused to give it up, so that the defendants were unable to give possession at the time appointed. The plaintiff had in the meantime re-sold the house at an advance of 100*l.*, and on applying for possession the vendors, after stating that the mortgagor refused to go out, and it would be necessary to incur considerable expense in order to eject him, claimed the right of rescinding the contract under one of the conditions of sale[1].

The plaintiff then brought an action for breach of agreement to convey the premises. The question in the Court of Queen's Bench was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover, as damages, not only his deposit and the expenses of investigating the title (the amount of which was paid into Court), but also the loss of the profit on the re-sale, as well as the expenses which he had incurred in preparing for the sale to his vendee. The Court having decided in favour of the plaintiff, the defendants appealed from that decision.

Manisty (Beasley with him), for the defendants.—The judgment of the Court below was wrong. The vendor of real property, whether there is a re-sale of the premises or not, is not liable to make compensation for the loss of the bargain. With the exception of cases where there is a fraudulent misrepresentation, the purchaser is only entitled to recover back his deposit and the expenses of investigating the title. Even the cases where larger damages were awarded on the ground that there was fraud on the part of the vendor, have been over and over again questioned. The mortgagee has a perfect right to suppose that the mortgagor will go out of possession in due time. In this case, as it happened, he remained in possession. But the vendors ought to be in the same position as if they had failed to make out a title. The contract to give possession and the contract to complete are equally absolute.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Suppose the deeds were in the hands of a wrongdoer, ought you not to have obtained them and handed them over?]

That raises the same question as the present one. Title must be understood to mean title coupled with possession. The purchase of real property for re-sale is treated by the Lord Chief Justice in the Court below, as a matter of everyday occurrance. But it is submitted, that this view cannot be supported; where the vendor as here is willing to put the purchaser in statu quo, he ought not to be called upon to pay for the loss of some extraordinary bargain. He cited Sedgwick on Damages, 2nd edit. p. 206, Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit. p. 360, Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078); Sikes v. Wild (4 Best. & S. 421; 32 L. J. Field (Clare with him), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

KELLY, C.B.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. There is no plea which goes to the whole root of this action, but merely a plea of payment into Court. And the question arises whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the damages following upon a re-sale of the property, for if he is not, it is agreed that the sum paid into Court is sufficient. If we had been called upon to decide the broad question whether, upon every breach of a contract for the purchase of a landed estate the purchaser is entitled to recover the loss on a re-sale, I should have been by no means prepared to decide, as a general proposition of law, that such damages could be recovered in every case. But looking to this particular case, and to the intention and meaning of the parties, it appears to me that as there is evidence of what were the proceeds of a re-sale, and no other evidence of the damage from the breach of contract, that this re-sale must be taken as evidence of the market value of the property, where the breach arises not from some defect in the title, but from the vendor's neglect in delivering possession of the premises, and that the question is whether the purchaser in the case before us, is entitled to recover this difference in the market value? Now, if this be the question which is raised, I will say at once that we are prepared to adopt the rule laid down by Parke, B., in Robinson v. Harman (1 Ex. Rep. 850; 18 L. J. Ex. 202): "The rule of the common law is, that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the contract had been performed. The case of Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078) qualified that rule of the common law. It was there held that contracts for the sale of real estate are merely on condition that the vendor has a good title; so that when a person contracts to sell real property, there is an implied understanding that if he fail to make a good title the only damages recoverable are the expenses which the vendee may be put to in investigating the title."

Now, I am far from wishing to throw any doubt upon the doctrine in Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), but it applies to a case where the vendor is unable by reason of defect in his title to carry out the contract, and the doctrine has been truly called an exception to the general law of the land. It is founded on difficulty in making out a title to real estate and the probable ignorance of law on the part of the vendor. Is this breach of contract within the principle thus entertained?—[His Lordship stated the facts of the case.]—On the face of the case it appears that the defendants had a perfectly good title. But what happens? We find that they refused to complete because of their unwillingness to incur the expense of an ejectment against the mortgagor in possession. But the contract was a contract to sell and deliver possession of the premises. I think, therefore, that this case is not within the exception, and that the contract to re-sell the lease was good evidence of its marketable value, which, under any circumstances, must have been proved by ascertaining what it would probably fetch. No case since Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078) has been cited in which it was held that a purchaser was not entitled to recover such damages as those now claimed. I quite agree with the observations of the Chief Justice, as to Hopkins v. Grazebrook (6 B. & C. 31), that there is an obvious difference between the case of a man who takes upon himself to sell property which is only contracted to be sold to him and the case where he is really in possession as owner. And I also agree with the observations of his Lordship as to the damages upon the re-sale being within the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. Rep. 341; 23 L. J. Ex. 179), at any rate in this particular case. The defendants have made default not because of the state of their title, but because of their improvident contract to deliver possession. The damages claimed by the plaintiff are recoverable, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. STOCKS.

Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27), ss. 2, 3.—Right to Dig Gravel —Surveyor of Highways.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF). B. HIGHWAYS. E.—A gravel-pit and a road to it were allotted to surveyors of highways under a local Act. The surveyors continued to take gravel from the pit till the year 1837, but from that year till the year 1863 they took no steps whatever to assert their rights over either the road or the pit. In the year 1837 the tenant of the plaintiff's predecessor in title filled up part of the pit with rubbish, and from that year until 1863 took the surface of it into regular cultivation. In 1839 another such tenant ploughed up the remaining portion of the pit, and from that time till 1863 this portion of the pit and the whole of the road were taken into cultivation by the plaintiff's tenants. In 1844 one of the plaintiff's tenants, who was in the occupation of the greater portion of the surface of the pit, was elected surveyor of highways, and held the office for one year:—Held, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact, first, that the plaintiff had by his tenants been in actual possession of the gravel-pit and road from 1837 to 1863, so that the title of the surveyors to the soil and their right to dig gravel had become extinguished by twenty years' adverse possession; secondly, that the fact that the tenant occupying a portion of the pit had been elected surveyor after possession had been taken, made no difference, as the character of the previous possession was not altered during the tenant's year of office.

This was an action for an injury to the plaintiff's reversion in certain land by digging gravel and stones thereon, and trespass for seizing and taking such gravel.

Pleas—First, to the whole declaration, not guilty; secondly, a denial of the land being in the possession of the plaintiff's tenants; thirdly, as to the whole declaration, a justification alleging the land to be the defendant's as surveyor of highways for the parish of Messingham, in the county of Lincoln.

The plaintiff replied to the last plea, relying on a title under the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27[1], to the estate and interest in the land in question before the alleged grievance and trespass.

The case came on for trial at the Lincoln Spring Assizes, 1867, before Montague Smith, J., when a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for 40*s.* damages, subject to the opinion of this Court upon the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1. By an Act of Parliament passed in 1798 for dividing and inclosing and allotting the open and common fields and other uninclosed lands in the township of Messingham, and that part of the hamlet of East Butterwick, in the parish of Messingham, in the county of Lincoln, and which Act is to form part

(1) By 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 2, "No person shall make any entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same."

By section 3, "The right to make an entry or distress or bring an action to recover any land or rent shall be deemed to have first accrued at such time as hereinafter is mentioned; (that is to say,) when the person claiming such land or rent, or some person through whom he claims, shall, in respect of the estate or interest claimed, have been in possession or in receipt of the profits of such land, or in receipt of such rent, and shall while entitled thereto have been dispossessed, or have discontinued such possession or receipt, then such right shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance of possession, or at the last time at which any such profits or rent were or was so received."

of this case, certain Commissioners therein named were empowered, before any allotments were made in pursuance of the Act, to appoint and stake out all such public and private roads over the lands to be inclosed as they should think proper.

2. By the same Act the Commissioners were authorized and required, before any other allotments were made in pursuance of the Act, to set out and appoint such one or more piece or parcel, pieces or parcels, of land from and out of the lands and grounds thereby directed to be divided and inclosed in such convenient places within the township of Messingham, and part of the hamlet of East Butterwick respectively, as they should think proper for getting stone, gravel, and other materials for repairing the roads and ways within the township and hamlet; and by the Act it was provided that such parcel of land as should be allotted in the township and hamlet respectfully for such repairs should be vested in the respective surveyor or surveyors of the highways of the township or hamlet in the Act mentioned.

3. The same Act further provided that after the setting out the roads or ways within the same township or hamlet, and making such allotments for land for the repairs thereof as aforesaid, all the grass and herbage growing, arising, and renewing on the roads and ways within the same township and hamlet, as also upon the pieces or parcels of land so to be set out and appointed for getting stone, gravel, sand, or other materials for repairing thereof, should belong to and be the property of such person or persons to whom the Commissioners should allot the same, exclusive of all other persons whomsoever, or should otherwise be applied to and for some general parochial and other use or purpose, and should be occupied and enjoyed in such manner as the Commissioners should in and by their award order, direct or appoint.

4. The Commissioners appointed by the above-mentioned Act duly and in accordance with the statute made their award in the year 1804, part of which award, being so much of it as is material, is annexed to and forms part of this case, and thereby, amongst other things, set out and appointed a piece or parcel of the lands and grounds by the Act directed to be divided and inclosed as one private carriage, bridle and drift road, described in the award of the breadth of 20 feet, and as leading out of the Bottesford Road, at the south-east corner of an old inclosure, No. 114, in a westward and northward direction, through an allotment therein made to Ann Walker, Eleanor Walker, Elizabeth Walker and Mary Walker, No. 107, to an allotment, No. 106, therein made to the surveyors of the highways within the township of Messingham, and that part of East Butterwick lying in the parish of Messingham for the time being, for the use of these surveyors and their and every of their servants, agents and workmen, and all other persons by them authorized to pass or repass to and from the same, and which they directed to be called "The North Gravel Pit Road."

5. By the same award the Commissioners, previously to setting out or making any other allotment, set out, appointed, allotted and awarded unto the surveyors and their successors for ever for getting stone, gravel, sand or other materials for repairing the roads and ways within the township and hamlet respectively (amongst others) a piece or parcel of land, No. 106, lying in the north field (now called Wood Boar Field), containing 1a. 2r., bounded by an allotment to Ann Walker, Eleanor Walker, Elizabeth Walker and Mary Walker, No. 107, on or towards the east, north and south, and by an ancient inclosure on or towards the west.

6. The Commissioners thereby also ordered and directed that all the grass and herbage growing and renewing upon the roads and highways within the township of Messingham, and that part of the hamlet of East Butterwick lying in the parish of Messingham, should belong to and be the property of the surveyor or surveyors for the time being, and their successors for ever, of the township and hamlet respectively, upon trust, for the purposes of keeping the roads and ways in good and complete repair, and all the grass and herbage growing, arising and renewing upon the pieces or parcels of land so set out and [illegible] awarded for repairing the roads and ways, should belong to and be [illegible] of the person or persons in whose allotment or allotments the same [illegible] respectively situate, lying and being.

7. At the time when the Commissioners made their award the land allotted as the road and gravel-pit mentioned in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of this case was entirely surrounded by old inclosures belonging, and land allotted to the plaintiff's predecessors in title, and which have continued in their or his possession to the present time.

8. After the Commissioners had made their award the surveyors of the highways within the township and hamlet opened a gravel-pit in the allotment referred to in the fifth paragraph of this case, being the land in the declaration mentioned and therein described as Wood Boar Field, and continued to get gravel from such pit for the repair of the parish highways, using for this purpose the allotted road mentioned in the fourth paragraph up to the year 1837, and subsequently thereto as mentioned in paragraph 16. of this case.

9. Since the year 1837 (until the times hereinafter mentioned) the surveyors have not taken gravel from the allotted pit nor used the allotted road, and from that time until the year 1863 they took no steps whatever to assert their right to the pit or road.

10. In or about the year 1837 the surveyors got gravel for the repair of the parish highways from a pit in a field called the Beggar Hill Field, situate at a distance of two miles from the allotted pit, and this gravel they purchased from time to time from the plaintiff's father and from the plaintiff himself at the price of 60*l.* per acre.

11. In the year 1837 Mr. Sowerby (then tenant to the plaintiff's father), who occupied the greater part of the land in which the allotted pit was situated, commenced filling up part of the allotted pit by carting into it several hundred loads of earth and rubbish, and from the year 1837 until the year 1863 Mr. Sowerby took the surface of that part of the allotted pit into regular cultivation as arable land, together with the adjacent parts of the field in which it was situate.

12. In the year 1839 Mr. Elsome (another tenant of the plaintiff's father) ploughed up the small remaining portion of the allotted pit which abutted upon land in his occupation, and also the allotted road which passed through other land in his occupation, and from that time until 1863 this portion of the allotted pit and the whole of the allotted road were used and cultivated by the plaintiff's tenants as ordinary arable land.

13. Mr. Sowerby, in the year 1844, being then the tenant of the plaintiff, and in the occupation of the Wood Boar Field, and the surface of the greater part of the allotted pit, was elected surveyor of the highways within the township and hamlet, together with Mr. William Stocks, and held that office for one year.

14. After the year 1837 Mr. Sowerby from time to time took small quantities of gravel and other materials from the allotted pit and other parts of the same field, and used them for the repair of a private occupation road leading from the town street to his own house, and to other land of the plaintiff's in his occupation, and over part of which road a Mr. Wakefield also claimed a right of way.

15. From the year 1837 until the happening of the events mentioned in the next paragraph neither the surveyors for the time being of the highways within the township and hamlet, nor any other person, interfered with the quiet enjoyment by the plaintiff's tenants of the surface of the allotted pit and road as such agricultural land as stated in the eleventh and twelfth paragraphs; nor did the plaintiff or his tenants during that time pay any rent or make any acknowledgment to the surveyors or to any other person for such use and enjoyment.

16. In the year 1863 the defendant (who was surveyor of the highways in that year, also for the township and hamlet), accompanied by other persons, entered upon the plaintiff's land and commenced digging upon the site of the allotted pit, and took away some small gravel and earth for the purpose of repairing the highways. For this act, which the plaintiff alleged to be a trespass, an action was commenced by him against the defendant and those persons who were assisting him at the time, which action was discontinued on January 28, 1868.

17. On June 7, 1866, the defendant, being one of the surveyors of the highways for the township and hamlet for that year, in order to obtain access to the allotted pit for the purpose of getting stone, gravel and other materials out of the pit for repairing the roads and highways within the township and hamlet, and because he could not otherwise obtain access to the allotted pit, broke the lock of the gate between the Bottesford Road and the allotted road, and then for the purpose aforesaid proceeded along the course of the allotted road to the allotted pit, and there staked out the site of the allotted pit, and in so doing trampled down the growing corn of the plaintiff's tenant. On the two following days the defendant, as such surveyor, requiring materials for the repairs of the roads and highways within the township and part of the hamlet, for the same purpose of getting such materials, accompanied by other persons, again proceeded to the site of the allotted pit and dug into the soil and took away a portion of the gravel, soil and stones from it for the purpose of repairing the highways within the township and part of the hamlet, and there used and applied the same in so repairing the road and highways (the same being materials fit for that purpose), which are the acts complained of in the declaration in this action. It is agreed between the parties that the pleadings in this action on both sides shall form part of this case. Also that the Court shall be at liberty to draw any inferences or find any facts which, in the opinion of the Court, a jury ought to have drawn or found.

18. The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, upon the facts stated, the defendant was justified in committing the acts complained of, and is entitled to succeed upon any, and if any which, of the issues joined in the action. And if the Court should be of opinion that he is so entitled, then the verdict shall be entered for the defendant upon such issues accordingly; but if the Court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the verdict as entered is to stand.

Barker (Hannay with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action as he has a good title to the land in question under the Statute of Limitations. In Thew v. Wingate[2], a case decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in June, 1862, but unreported, and where a question very

(2) THEW v. WINGATE.—This was a special case, with power for the Court to draw inferences of fact.

In this case it appeared that certain Commissioners, under a local Act, were directed to set out any two or more pieces of land for the purpose of getting stone, gravel and other materials, and it was provided that these pieces of land should be vested in the surveyor or surveyors of the highways in the parish of Ludford Magna and Ludford Parva, upon trust for the purposes of the Act. The Commissioners in the exercise of their powers allotted a tract of land, No. 158 (save and except the herbage thereof), to the surveyors of the highways in the parish, and awarded the grass and herbage of the allotment to John Parkinson (the plaintiff's predecessor in title) and his heirs. Another tract of land adjoining allotment No. 158 was allotted to Parkinson. From the year 1813 to 1858, the time of the trespass complained of, the parish surveyors had ceased to take gravel from allotment No. 158, and it appeared that, in 1813, Parkinson had thrown a portion of it into his own allotment, and had converted another portion into a stack-yard. He had also erected a barn, a cottage and sheds upon a third portion, and had converted a disused gravel-pit into a pond, and surrounded it with a fence, besides making a road through the locus in quo.

June 3, 1862.—Mellish (Field with him), for the plaintiff, and Lush (Beasley with him), for the defendant.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Our judgment must be for the plaintiff. The effect of the award made by the Commissioners under the Act of Parliament was to vest the soil in the surveyors of the highways for the time being, and their successors, and all that Parkinson, in whose place the plaintiff stands, had granted to him, was the right of taking the grass and herbage on the soil. Mr. Lush contended that the acts of ownership which Parkinson had exercised were referable to the interest in the land which he took under the award. But this argument fails the moment we arrive at the conclusion that Parkinson took nothing in the soil except the right of pasture. The next question is, whether there was sufficient evidence of acts of ownership by Parkinson to lead to the conclusion that the surveyors had discontinued their possession. The authorities which have been cited shew that a mere abandonment on the part of the owner is not sufficient.—

similar to the present one arose, the Court held that the surveyors had lost their right to dig gravel from the locus in quo.—(He was then stopped.)

Quain (Philbrick with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiff cannot avail himself of the Statute of Limitations. The surveyors were guilty of no laches, as they were not bound to interfere till their rights as surveyors were interfered with. Their rights could only be barred by an adverse user of the right to dig gravel. A mere trespass upon the pit was no dispossession of the surveyors; it was for the plaintiff to shew that he or his tenant had actually worked it. In M'Donnell v. M'Kinty (10 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 514) it was held, that where in a grant of the fee, the minerals are excepted to the grantor and his heirs, his right to them is not barred or extinguished if he omit to work them for twenty years, Blackburn, J., saying, p. 526, "The word 'discontinuance' I understand to mean an abandonment of possession by one person followed by the actual possession of another person." Cruise's Dig., tit. 1, s. 29, shews that a mere trespass is not a disseisin, but that a disseisin is when one enters intending to usurp the possession, and to oust another of the freehold. Either the profits must be taken or the inheritance claimed. Keyse v. Powell (2 E. & B. 133; 22 L. J. Q.B. 305) shews that in order to preserve the right to quarries or mines it is not necessary that they should be actually worked. And Smith v. Lloyd (9 Ex. Rep. 562; 23 L. J. Ex. 194) confirms this proposition. Secondly, the occupation of Sowerby after his election in 1844 must be considered as an occupation in his character of surveyor. His possession therefore ceased to be adverse in that year, and by the doctrine of remitter his previous possession was placed on the same footing. As surveyor he might have excluded his landlord from the pit. He cited Sugden's New Laws of Real Property, 2nd edit. p. 33, and Andrews v. Hailes (2 E. & B. 349; 22 L. J. Q.B. 409).

Barker, in reply.—In the first place, there can be no doubt that as soon as the pits were filled up or brought under cultivation, the rights of the surveyors were invaded. Supposing that the plaintiff and his predecessors in title were entitled to the herbage this would not justify them in ploughing up the soil. With regard to the argument that Sowerby's election as surveyor operated so as to alter the character of his occupation it can only be said that it has no support in authority. In Coppin v. Coppin (2 P. Wms. 295), the Lord Chancellor says, "The only matter which made the difficulty in this case was that there happened to be one and the same person both heir and executor of the testator, and likewise vendor of the land, but this must be considered in the same light as if there were several persons, et cum duo jura in una persona concurrunt, æquum est ac si essent in diversis." Brown v. Gordon (16 Beav. 308; 22 L. J. Ch. 65) also shews that everything depends upon the character in which acts are done. He also cited Saunders v. Lord Annesley (2 Sch. & Lef. 9) and Archbold v. Scully (9 H.L. C. 360).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[3] was (on June 8) delivered as follows, by

MELLOR, J.—We are of opinion that the verdict entered for the plaintiff

[His Lordship then stated the evidence of the discontinuance of the practice of taking gravel by the surveyors, and the acts of ownership by Parkinson.]—Are these not all strong acts to shew that Parkinson had taken possession of the locus in quo, making no distinction between it and the land of which he had the fee simple by the allotment of the Commissioners. I think there is quite sufficient to establish a discontinuance of the possession of the surveyors and the existence of a possession adverse to them by Parkinson.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The acts done by Parkinson seem to be wholly inconsistent with the right of the surveyors, and are evidence of a general dispossession of the fee which they had in the corpus of the close.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Mellish was quite correct in his argument when he said that the question of fact was, had Parkinson and the plaintiff, who claims under him, twenty years before this action, taken such an actual possession of this ground below the surface that they would have been able to maintain trespass against a stranger who should meddle with the sub-soil?

should stand. The substantial question for our determination was whether the title of the defendant as surveyor of highways to a certain gravel-pit and road to it, had become extinguished by the adverse possession of the plaintiff for more than twenty years. It appears from the case that from the year 1837 down to 1863 the surveyors of highways have ceased to take gravel from the pit or to use the road to it; but it was contended for the defendant that the surveyor for the time being did not by such non-user lose his right to the gravel, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not been in actual possession. And the case was likened to that of an owner in fee of land with minerals under it conveying the surface, reserving the minerals with the right of entry to get them, in which case it has been held that the right of entry to get the minerals is not barred by mere non-user for more than forty years unless some other person has worked or been in possession of them during that time—Smith v. Lloyd (9 Ex. 562; 23 L. J. Ex. 194). We are, however, of opinion that the plaintiff has, by his tenants, been in actual possession of the gravel-pit and road from 1837 to 1863. This is a question of fact depending on the intention with which certain acts were done, and we come to the conclusion that since 1837 the gravel-pit has been treated as practically exhausted, and that by filling up the greater portion of it with earth and rubbish, and by taking the whole surface into cultivation as well as the road in 1837 and 1839, possession of the gravel-pit and road was actually taken in those years, and consequently the time of limitation began to run from those years respectively. We are further of opinion that the circumstance of the tenant occupying a portion of the gravel-pit being elected surveyor for one year after possession had been taken of it can make no difference. The possession which he previously held was as tenant under the plaintiff, and the character of that possession was not altered during the tenant's year of office. We were referred in the course of the argument to a shorthand writer's note of a case of Thew v. Wingate (see note (2)), argued in this Court in 1862, before the Lord Chief Justice, Wightman, J., Crompton, J., and Blackburn, J. The facts were not substantially different from those of the present case, and the Court there adopted the same view which we have taken. Our judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff.

Animals—Liability of Owners of Dogs for Injuries to Cattle or Sheep (28 & 29 Vict. c. 60.)—Horses included under Word "Cattle."

ANIMALS. C.—By 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60, s. 1, after reciting that it is expedient to amend the law as to the liability of the owners of dogs for injuries done to cattle and sheep by such dogs, it is enacted, that "the owner of every dog shall be liable in damages for injury done to any cattle or sheep by his dog; and it shall not be necessary for the party seeking such damages to shew a previous mischievous propensity in such dog, or the owner's knowledge of such previous propensity, or that the injury was attributable to neglect on the part of such owner:—Held, that horses are included under the term "cattle" in this enactment.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Thirsk.

A CASE was stated as follows.

This was an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of 41*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*, for that the defendant knowingly kept a certain ferocious dog, which was accustomed to injure and bite cattle, and which dog, in the month of July, 1868, bit and injured the plaintiff's mare, and caused damage to the amount aforesaid. And for a further count, that the defendant's dog, in the month aforesaid, bit and injured the aforesaid mare of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage to the amount aforesaid.

At the trial, evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff that in the month of July, 1868, the plaintiff was driving his mare in a gig on the high road from Thirsk to Kilvington, and when about a mile from Thirsk the dog in question flew out and bit the leg of the mare and caused it to kick and be injured, and that the damage was done as alleged. No proof was given by the plaintiff to shew that the defendant knew the dog was accustomed to bite horses or mares, or was of a savage or ferocious character, and the plaintiff contended that such evidence was unnecessary since the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60.

The Judge considered it necessary for the plaintiff to prove a scienter in the defendant, as, in his opinion, the plaintiff's mare did not come within the true intent and meaning of the term " cattle " in the 1st section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60[1], and that the statute did not therefore apply in this action; and he directed a judgment of nonsuit to be entered against the plaintiff, with costs.

The question for the Court of Queen's Bench is, whether the term " cattle " in the above Act includes horses and mares.

Kemplay, for the plaintiff.—The term " cattle " in common parlance applies to horses, and it was the object and intention of the statute to deal with a case like the present one. It was assumed that dogs had a peculiar propensity with regard to quadrupeds. The word " cattle " in Webtser's Dictionary is stated to include " camels, horses, asses," &c. In The King v. Paty (2 W. Black. 721) it was held that a mare and colt were " cattle " within the meaning of the Black Act, 9 Geo. 1. c. 22. Horses grazing in a field are peculiarly liable to the attacks of dogs, and there is no reason why the word " cattle " should have a narrow construction.

A. Wills (Steele with him), for the defendant.—It is submitted that the word " cattle " in the statute was not intended to include horses and mares, but only cows and sheep, which would be turned out to graze upon unfrequented places.

[LUSH, J.—Is not this a remedial Act?]

Yes; but as it imposes a fresh liability upon a large class of persons, it ought to be interpreted with all possible strictness. The word " cattle " may properly be confined to horned beasts.

LUSH, J.—Many Acts of Parliament are encumbered with useless definitions; but this is one in which of all others a definition would have been very desirable; none is to be found in it, and it is extremely difficult to say what was in the minds of the framers of the Act. However, the word " cattle " does in its primary sense include horses, and I cannot see that the legislature intended to exclude them, except it be said that the use of the word " sheep " must shew that the framers of the Act did not employ the word " cattle " in its fullest sense; nevertheless, as the Act is a remedial one, and, as far as I know, horses are as liable to be bitten by ferocious dogs as cows are, I do not see why they should be excluded from its operation. I am therefore of opinion, without being at all satisfied that I am doing what the legislature intended, that the County Court Judge was mistaken in his view of the matter, and that our judgment must be in favour of the appellant.

HAYES, J.—I am of the same opinion. No good reason can be assigned for the defendant's construction of the statute. The word " cattle " has a wide

(1) The Act 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60. s. 1, after reciting that it is expedient to amend the law as to the liability of the owners of dogs for injuries done to cattle and sheep by such dogs, enacts that, " The owner of every dog shall be liable in damages for injury done to any cattle or sheep by his dog; and it shall not be necessary for the party seeking such damages to shew a previous mischievous propensity in such dog, or the owner's knowledge of such previous propensity, or that the injury was attributable to neglect on the part of such owner. Such damages shall be recoverable in any Court of competent jurisdiction by the owner of such cattle or sheep killed or injured."

signification, and we should not narrow it without a satisfactory reason. The word ordinarily applies to the larger animals, and this may be the reason why the word "sheep" is inserted in the section. But I know of no reason why horses should be excepted from its operation.

Bribery— "Offer" or "Promise" to procure Money—Municipal Election —17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. s. 2.—22 Vict. c. 35. ss. 11, 12.

ELECTION LAW. B.—By the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. s. 2, which by the 22 Vict. c. 35. s. 12. applies to municipal as well as parliamentary elections, any one who shall "give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, is guilty of bribery." The defendant, while soliciting a vote, told the voter that "he would be remunerated for loss of time":—Held, that the defendant had been guilty of bribery within the meaning of the section.

This was an appeal from the County Court of Staffordshire, holden at Lichfield.

The defendant was sued in the County Court for the amount of a penalty[1], to which he was alleged to be liable as having offered a sum of money to a voter at an election of councillors in the city of Lichfield, to induce him to vote at the election. The evidence upon which the claim was supported is stated in the judgment of this Court.

Gray and R. H. Collins, for the plaintiff, contended that there was ample evidence of an "offer" within the meaning of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. s. 2[2], and cited Cooper v. Slade (6 H.L. C. 746; 27 L. J. Q.B. 449).

Manisty and Bosanquet, for the defendant, insisted that there was no evidence of an offer which, if accepted by the voter, would have constituted a binding contract, but that there was only a representation of a probable consequence of the voter, which did not bring the case within the statutes.

Cur. adv. vult.

COCKBURN, C.J. (on July 3) delivered the judgment of the Court[3].—This was a case stated by the Judge of the County Court of Staffordshire, by way of

(1) By the 22 Vict. c. 35. ("An Act to amend the law relating to municipal elections"), s. 11. "If any person at any election of mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors for any borough shall be guilty of bribery, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 40*s.* to any person who shall sue for the same in the County Court," &c.

By section 12, "The word 'bribery' shall include anything committed or done before, at, after, or with respect to the election of any mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors, which, if committed or done before, at, after, or with respect to any election of any member to serve in parliament, would render the person committing or doing the same liable to any pains, penalties, forfeitures, or conviction for bribery, treating, undue influence, corrupt practices, or other offence under any Act or Acts for the time being in force with respect to the election of members to serve in parliament for boroughs in England and Wales."

(2) By the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. ("An Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to bribery, treating, and undue influence at elections of members of parliament"), s. 2, it is enacted that "The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly: Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election," &c.

appeal from his own decision, whereby judgment was given for the defendant. The plaintiff in the County Court, Thomas Simpson, sued the defendant, William Yeend, for 40*s.* forfeited by him by reason of having been guilty of bribery at the election of councillors in the north ward of the city of Lichfield, held on November 1, 1867, " for that he, the defendant, did on that day directly offer a sum of money to one George Marshall, one of the citizens of the said city, to induce him as a voter in the said ward to vote at the said election."

The evidence on which the plaint was tried is set out by the Judge of the County Court, and the question proposed to us is, " whether the transaction as described by the defendant is bribery under the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102." The evidence of the defendant, as stated by the Judge of the County Court, is as follows: " I saw Marshall's wife. I told her I called to solicit a vote. She told me he did not intend to vote; if he did, he should offend Mr. Muckleston and Mr. Playfair. She also said he had been offered something very handsome on the other side, " and I am sure he will not vote." She also said he would lose much time by going to vote; I said he would be remunerated for what loss of time might occur. Never mentioned money—7*s.* 6*d.* I saw Marshall next morning. I again said, ' I solicit your vote.' He told me he did not intend to vote.' I did not offer him money. I said he would be remunerated for loss of time. I did not offer him a sovereign."

The statute referred to by the Judge of the County Court, viz., 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. s. 2, makes it bribery in " every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any other person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election." In answer to the question proposed to us by the Judge of the County Court, we are of opinion that " the transaction as described by the defendant is bribery under the statute." We delayed giving our judgment at the close of the argument, not because of any doubt existing in our minds as to the answer which we ought to return to the question put by the Judge of the County Court, but because we were assured by the counsel for the defendant that the election Judges had in their decisions upon this section taken a view differing from that which we were disposed to take. Had the fact been as suggested we should not have felt ourselves bound by the opinion of the election Judges, unless, upon consideration, we had agreed with it; but we thought it desirable to ascertain what opinion had in fact been expressed by them with reference to a subject with which their duties had necessarily made them familiar. Upon inquiry, we find, as we had anticipated, that those learned Judges had expressed no opinion adverse to the conclusion at which we have arrived. Their observations upon this section, so far as it refers to an " offer " or " promise " not accepted, merely expressed a rule of prudence and caution as to the quantum and character of the evidence by which such an " offer " or " promise " should be considered as proved. In the present case we are relieved from considering the truth of the evidence, as it is the statement of the defendant himself which is submitted to us for consideration. We cannot doubt that the words admitted to have been used by the defendant, viz., " that the voter would be remunerated for what loss of time might occur," did, under the circumstances, amount to an " offer," or " promise " to procure or to endeavour to procure, money or valuable consideration, to a voter, " in order " to induce him to vote at the election in question. The expression, " remuneration for loss of time," would necessarily convey to the apprehension of the voter that if he would vote for a particular candidate, he should receive, either directly from the person offering or by his procurement, money or valuable consideration which he would not otherwise obtain; and any assurance of that kind which can only be so understood is calculated to operate upon the mind of the elector as a direct inducement to vote for such candidate. If any authority were required to induce us to adopt this view of the transaction in the present case, it is supplied by that of Cooper v. Slade (6 H.L. C. 746; 27 L. J. Q.B. 449), which upon this point is not distinguishable in principle from the present case. It is so important to the public interest that at elections voters should be left to vote without any disturbing influence of any kind that we feel ourselves bound, in construing the statute in question, to give full effect to the plain meaning of the words used, and to apply them to the substantial parts of the case without raising subtle distinctions or refinements as to the precise words or expressions in which the promise or offer may be conveyed. The case will be remitted to the Judge of the County Court, who will set aside the verdict for the defendant, and enter it for the plaintiff for 40*s*., being the penalty provided by the Municipal Act for the offence in question

Bankrupt—Detention after Production of Certificate of Protection—Liability of Gaoler—"Officer."

The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 113, which makes "any officer" who shall detain a bankrupt in custody after he shall have produced his protection liable to penalties, does not apply to the gaoler or governor of a prison to which the bankrupt is taken after his arrest, but only to the officer actually arresting the bankrupt.

Declaration—That, after the passing of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, the plaintiff was duly adjudicated a bankrupt under the provisions of this statute and the other statutes in force concerning bankrupts, and had duly surrendered, and at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned was protected and free from arrest and imprisonment by virtue of an order of the Court having jurisdiction in that behalf; and whilst the plaintiff was so protected by the order, he was arrested for debt within the meaning of section 113. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849[1]; and the defendant, being an officer within the meaning of the section, detained the plaintiff after the plaintiff had shewn to the defendant such protection for a longer time than was necessary for obtaining a copy of it, and, after the plaintiff had given the defendant a copy of the same, that is to say, for six days thereafter, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided; whereby the defendant forfeited and became liable to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 5*l*. for every day the defendant so detained the plaintiff.

Pleas—First, not guilty by statutes 21 Jac. 1. c. 4. s. 4, and 21 Jac. 1. c. 12. s. 5. Secondly, that at the time of committing the alleged grievances the defendant was not an officer within the meaning of section 113. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. Thirdly, that the plaintiff did not shew to the defendant the protection as alleged.

Issues thereon.

At the trial, before Lush, J., at the Liverpool Winter Assizes, 1868, it appeared that the plaintiff was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition on

(1) By the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 113, "If any bankrupt shall be arrested for debt, or on any escape warrant, on coming to surrender, or shall after his surrender, and while protected by order of the Court, be so arrested, he shall, on producing such protection to the officer who shall arrest him, and giving such officer a copy thereof, be immediately discharged; and if any officer shall detain any such bankrupt after he shall have shewn such protection to him, except for so long as shall be necessary for obtaining a copy of the same, such officer shall forfeit to such bankrupt, for his own use, the sum of 5*l*. for every day he shall detain such bankrupt, to be recovered by action of debt in any Court of record at Westminster, in the name of such bankrupt, with full costs of suit."

June 16, 1868, and obtained protection until July 23. On July 15 he was arrested on a ca. sa. by the assistant of one Ambler, a sheriff's officer. He shewed his original protection to the man arresting him, and to Ambler, to whose office he was taken, but was unable to give them a copy of it, as he had no such copy in his possession. He was on the same day lodged in Walton Gaol, of which the defendant was governor. On July 17 an office copy of the protection was served on the defendant, but the plaintiff was detained in custody till the 23rd, when he was discharged under an Order of the Court of Bankruptcy.

A verdict was directed for the plaintiff, with 30*l.* damages, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that he was not an officer within the meaning of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, section 113. A rule having been obtained accordingly.

C. Russell shewed cause.—It is submitted that the gaoler is an officer within the meaning of section 113. The section may be divided into two parts: the object of the first is to procure the release of the bankrupt directly after his arrest, and the words "officer arresting the bankrupt" are used. In the latter part it is assumed that this object has failed, and it is intended to secure the bankrupt from a prolonged detention in prison. And the general words "any officer" are substituted for "officer arresting." But if the defendant's construction is adopted and a gaoler is not such an officer, this part of the section can have no operation, for it is the duty of the bailiff arresting the bankrupt to lodge him in prison with as little delay as possible. The omission of the word "such" in the latter part of the section strengthens the defendant's argument.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In the old Act, 5 Geo. 2. c. 30. s. 5, it was provided that in case any bankrupt should be arrested for debt, &c., he should, on producing a summons or notice under the hand of the Commissioners to the officer who should arrest him, and making it appear to such officer that such notice or summons was signed, as aforesaid, be discharged. And the section proceeds, "And in case any officer shall detain such bankrupt." There the general word "any" is used, but it is quite plain that what is meant is the officer arresting the bankrupt; and I can find nothing to shew that section 113. was intended to alter the law in this respect.]

Bancroft v. Mitchell (36 L. J. Q.B. 257) is an authority that the gaoler is an "officer" within this section.

[BLACKBURN, J.—No such point was raised in the case.]

The Court will consider the hardship of leaving the bankrupt without any remedy for an unjust imprisonment. He also cited Lees v. Newton (35 L. J. C.P. 285).

C. Crompton, in support of the rule, was not heard.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute to enter a nonsuit. It must be remembered that this section is a penal one, and that we have to find out the person upon whom the penalty is imposed. The section is as follows—[the learned Judge read the section],—and it appears that the plaintiff after he had become bankrupt was arrested by a sheriff's officer. Now, if he had produced his protection to the officer arresting him, and given the officer a copy of it, he would have been entitled to be forthwith discharged, just as under the old Act he would have been protected by a notice or summons signed by the Commissioners. He did not, however, furnish the sheriff's officer with a copy of his protection, and was lodged in gaol. Now, I cannot see that the statute imposes any duty on the gaoler with reference to any bankrupt so arrested, and I think it extremely doubtful whether the gaoler could safely discharge him without the order of a Judge or of some Court of competent jurisdiction. It has been argued, that the meaning of the word "officer in the latter part of this section may be extended beyond the meaning of the words "officer who shall arrest" in the earlier part and the simple word "officer" may include the gaoler who detains the bankrupt in custody after receiving a copy of his protection. But this requires us to assume that the gaoler has the power of discharging the bankrupt (which, as I have already said, I think very doubtful), because if he had no such power there would be no reason for imposing the penalty upon him. And I think that such a construction of the section is not the right one. I think that, as in the former Act, 5 Geo. 2. c. 30. s. 5, upon which the section in the later statute was evidently founded, the penalty is confined to the sheriff's officer who actually arrests the bankrupt, and then after receiving a copy of his protection refuses to discharge him. But when once the bankrupt has been lodged in prison, I do not see how the enactment can be made to apply to the gaoler.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot think that we are justified in extending by implication a penal section to a class of officers who are not mentioned in the earlier part of it. I agree with my Brother Blackburn that the section was only intended to apply to the officer arresting the bankrupt; and that the word " officer " in the latter part of the section is used in the same sense as the word " officer who may arrest " in the earlier part.

BANKRUPTCY. G.—*The plaintiff rented a room of the defendant, who was tenant of the whole house under P, the owner. CASE stated on appeal against a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in the Liverpool County Court.

The action was tried, before the Judge of the Liverpool County Court, with a jury, on November 5, 1868, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiff with 25*l.* damages.

The following are the particulars of demand: " This action is brought to recover compensation for the injury and loss sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the defendant wrongfully allowing certain rent payable by him, as the tenant of a warehouse, No. 4, Argyle Street, Liverpool, to be in arrear and unpaid, whereby the goods of the plaintiff (who occupied one of the rooms of the warehouse as tenant to the defendant) were lawfully distrained by the defendant's landlord for such arrears of rent, and the plaintiff was compelled to pay to such landlord certain moneys in order to obtain the release of his said goods, and was put to great inconvenience, and was injured in his credit. The plaintiff claims 50*l.*"

The defendant occupied as tenant to one Mr. Pemberton (the owner) a warehouse at a certain yearly rent. Whilst the defendant was such tenant, the plaintiff became his sub-tenant of one of the rooms, into the occupation of which room the plaintiff entered, and placed therein cotton, his property, of considerable value.

In the month of February, 1868, whilst the defendant's tenancy and the plaintiff's sub-tenancy continued, the defendant's rent being then in arrear to the amount of 30*l.*, his landlord lawfully distrained the goods in the warehouse, including those of the plaintiff. To obtain the release of his goods the plaintiff was required by the defendant's landlord to pay, and did in fact pay to him the sum of 15*l.*, and upon that payment being made his goods were restored to him. After the distress and payment by the plaintiff of this sum of 15*l.* the defendant became bankrupt on his own petition in the Liverpool Bankruptcy Court, and in due course obtained his order of discharge.

The plaintiff has not proved, or claimed to prove, under the bankruptcy in respect of the subject-matter of this action, nor have any steps been taken under the 153rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to obtain an order of the Court of Bankruptcy directing an assessment of the damages which the plaintiff sustained by reason of the entry by bailiffs employed by the defendant's landlord, upon the room in the warehouse occupied by the plaintiff and the seizure of his goods thereon, nor were such damages assessed until the jury assessed them on the trial of this action. After the defendant had obtained his order of discharge in bankruptcy the plaintiff commenced this action, in which he claimed, as part of his special damage, the 15*l.* before referred to.

At the trial, in addition to the defence raised by the defendant on the merits, it was contended on his behalf that the plaintiff's right of action for damages was barred by the order of discharge.

The Judge ruled that it was not.

The question for the opinion of this Court was whether this ruling was correct in point of law.

R. G. Williams, for the defendant[1].—The question turns upon the 153rd section of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, which provides that, "If any bankrupt shall at the time of adjudication be liable, by reason of any contract or promise, to a demand in the nature of damages, which have not been and cannot be otherwise liquidated or ascertained, it shall be lawful for the Court, acting in prosecution of such bankruptcy, to direct such damages to be assessed by a jury, either before itself or in a Court of law, and to give all necessary directions for such purpose; and the amount of damage when assessed shall be provable as if a debt due at the time of the bankruptcy. Provided that, in case all necessary parties agree, the Court shall have power to assess such damages without the intervention of a jury or a reference to a Court of law." It is submitted that the County Court Judge was wrong in deciding that the claim of the plaintiff was not barred. The defendant was liable by reason of the contract made by him to a demand in the nature of damages. The action is not brought against the landlord for seizing the goods, but against the defendant upon the contract for quiet enjoyment of the room which the plaintiff occupied as under-tenant, and for the non-interference with that occupation by the landlord. In the books upon Pleading this action has always been treated as an action upon contract—see Bullen and Leake upon Pleading, 3rd ed., 179. Next, the Court of Bankruptcy is empowered, by the section above referred to, to direct that the damages shall be assessed, and therefore the demand would then be provable as a debt under the bankruptcy, the consequence being that the plaintiff's right of action would be barred. Such an interpretation has been put upon the 154th section, the language of which is almost identical—see Saunders v. Best (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 731). Other decisions have been given upon deeds of this kind, such as Hagaston v. Taylor (36 L. J. Ex. 61); Sharland v. Spence (36 L. J.C.P. 230); and Robertson v. Goss (36 L. J. Ex. 251); but there is no decision to be found which is against the view now submitted on behalf of the appellant. See also Ex parte Townsend (35 L. J. Bk. 17); Woods v. De Mattos (35 L. J. Ex. 64; L. R. 1 Ex. 91); and Ex parte Willmott (36 L. J. Bk. 17; L. R. 2 Ch. Ap. 795).

(1) The arguments brought before the Court several important questions, but it is thought better to confine this report to the single point decided by the Court.

Wheeler, for the plaintiff.—This case does not fall within section 153. at all, and the action was maintainable. The defendant cannot be said to have been liable by reason of any "contract," and the word "promise" does not carry the meaning any further. The action was not brought upon the contract, but for the tort. A construction has been put upon the words "action of contract" in the County Court Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 30, in Tattan v. the Great Western Railway Company (29 L. J. Q.B. 184), where it was held that an action against common carriers for the loss of goods delivered to them, as common carriers, to be carried for hire, is founded upon the breach of the common law duty, independently of contract, and therefore is not an action of contract within that section—see also Griffiths and Holmes's Bankruptcy, p. 588. Again, Burnett v. Lynch (5 B. & C. 589) shews that this is not an action on contract. In that case, Littledale, J. says, at page 609, "Assumpsit lies where a party claims damages in consequence of a breach of promise not under seal. That promise may either be express or it may be implied from a legal obligation to do a particular act. Where there is an express promise, and a legal obligation results from it, then the plaintiff's cause of action is most accurately described in assumpsit, in which the promise is stated as the gist of the action. But when, from a given state of facts, the law raises a legal obligation to do a particular act, and there is a breach of that obligation, and a consequential damage, there although assumpsit may be maintainable upon a promise implied by law to do the act, still an action upon the case founded in tort is the more proper form of action, in which the plaintiff, in his declaration, states the facts out of which the legal obligation arises, the obligation itself, the breach of it, and the damage resulting from that breach. For that is the most accurate description of the real cause of action, and that form of action in which the real cause of action is most accurately described is the best adapted to every case." That case is referred to in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, edited by Cole, p. 670. Next, the 153rd section only applies where there is an admitted breach of contract. The case stated by the County Court Judge shews that the claim was contested upon the merits, and therefore the breach could not have been admitted. It cannot therefore be compulsory upon the creditor to avail himself of the machinery of the Court to be set in motion under a provision which was only meant to apply where the question to be determined was simply the amount of the damages, not the question of liability. If the breach is not admitted the creditor has a right to resort to the ordinary tribunals of the country.

R. G. Williams, in reply.—The words of the section are general, and apply equally where the demand is admitted and where it is disputed.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the respondent. The case has been extremely well argued, and we are much indebted to the learned counsel on both sides. I should have had considerable difficulty in giving an answer to some of the points raised; but I am of opinion the case may be decided in favour of the plaintiff upon this ground,—that there was no such liability upon the defendant as was contemplated by the legislature in enacting this 153rd section.—(His Lordship read the section.)—Looking at the cases which have been decided previously to the passing of this enactment, I think that it was passed with a view to meet the case of bankrupts who, at the time of adjudication, were liable by reason of some express mercantile contract to a demand in the nature of damages, but which by reason of such damages not being ascertained at the date of the bankruptcy were not provable under it. It applies to contracts popularly so called. Then does this claim arise out of such a contract? I think clearly not. It is a claim by the plaintiff against the defendant to indemnify him against the injury which he has suffered by reason of the seizure of his goods under the distress for rent which the defendant owed, and ought to have paid. The action is not founded upon an express contract by the defendant with the plaintiff that he will pay the rent due; but upon a liability out of which the law constructs an implied contract, which may be sued upon either in the shape of an action of assumpsit or of tort, a contract, implied from the breach of duty, arising out of the relation in which the parties stood, and is not a liability of the sort intended by the legislature. I think that, upon that ground, the judgment in the County Court was right.

HAYES, J.—I entirely agree. The 153rd section was chiefly intended to meet the cases of bankrupts liable by reason of mercantile contracts. I may illustrate it by referring to the class of cases of which Green v. Bicknell (8 Ad. & E. 701; 7 L. J. Q.B. 271) is one, where the measure of damages in an action of contract is the difference between the contract and market prices at the time when the contract should have been fulfilled. Under such circumstances the claim for damages was formerly not provable under the bankruptcy. This was a very great grievance, which has now been remedied. But the contract in the present case is quite different from that which is contemplated by section 153; and I do not think that the appellant can be said to be liable by reason of a contract to a demand in the nature of damages. The cause of action is well described in the particulars as being for wrongfully allowing the goods of the plaintiff to be seized under the distress for rent. I think that this point is very like that which was raised in Tattan v. the Great Western Railway Company (29 L. J. Q.B. 184), where this Court held that the action against common carriers for the loss of goods is founded upon the breach of duty independently of contract. The claim is founded upon an implied contract, which does not come within section 153.

Marine Insurance—Capture—Abandonment—Claim for Partial Loss—Subsequent Claim for Total Loss.

MARINE INSURANCE. D. J.—The plaintiffs insured with the defendants the cargo on board a ship bound from Liverpool to Matamoras, against the usual perils, including "takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people." The policy also contained a suing and labouring clause, by which, in case of misfortune, it was provided that "it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance, the charges whereof the said company (the defendants) will bear in proportion to the same hereby insured." It was also provided that the "acts of the insurer or insured, in recovering, saving, or preserving the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment." The ship sailed on her voyage, and being captured by a United States cruiser, was taken to New Orleans, where the captors instituted a suit for her condemnation in the Prize Court. The insured contested the suit, electing to treat the seizure as a partial loss. They obtained the judgment of the Court in their favour. Against this judgment the captors, on July 1, 1864, appealed, and the judgment was suspended. On September 12, the insured gave a formal notice of abandonment, which the insurers refused to accept. Subsequently the insured informed the insurers that endeavours were being made to sell the ship and cargo, and that they were resisting such sale, and they requested them to assist in giving bail to prevent it. The insurers refused to interfere. The sale of the goods could have been prevented by depositing the full value of the goods, or by giving bail for them, and the insurers had opportunity for taking either of such steps, but declined to do so. The ship and cargo were then sold by order of the Prize Court, and the insured gave a fresh notice of abandonment, which was again refused. The insured could not, under the circumstances, by any means which they could reasonably be called upon to adopt, have prevented the sale:—Held, that although the insured had at first elected to treat the loss as a partial one, and although the fact of the appeal against the judgment would not justify them in changing their election, and claiming for a total loss, yet that the sale of the cargo by order of the Prize Court did amount to such a change of facts as would give them a right, if they chose, to maintain an action upon the policy for a total loss.

This action was brought upon a policy of insurance for 5,000*l.* effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants on goods, to recover for a total loss.

The defendants paid into Court 1,100*l.*

By consent a SPECIAL CASE was stated, which was substantially as follows:

1. In July, 1863, the goods which formed the subject-matter of insurance were shipped on board the "Dashing Wave," a British ship then about to sail from Liverpool to Matamoras in the empire of Mexico.

2. The insurance was effected by the plaintiffs, on behalf of the owner, with the defendants[1].

3. The ship sailed for Matamoras, where the goods were to have been delivered to the consignees thereof. At that time war was being carried on between the United States and the Confederate States of America. Matamoras is near to certain forts which were then blockaded by the United States.

5. On November 2, 1863, the ship anchored about three miles off Matamoras; and on the 5th she was seized by the United States cruisers, and carried into New Orleans.

6. A suit was instituted by the captors in the Prize Court at New Orleans, for the purpose of having the ship and cargo adjudged a lawful prize. The owner of the cargo contested the suit, and wrote to the firms who had shipped the cargo, on his behalf, informing them of the facts.

8. On June 16, 1864, judgment was given against the captors, decreeing restitution of the ship and cargo. On the 22nd judgment was signed, and on July 1 the captors appealed, the ship and cargo being detained, restitution being suspended.

10. On September 12, 1864, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants informing them of the facts, and giving them notice that they abandoned the cargo, and claiming immediate payment of a total loss.

11. On September 17, 1864, the defendants wrote declining to receive the abandonment.

12. A notice of abandonment had been given previously to the said letter of September 12, and after that time all letters and communications on the subject received by the plaintiff were communicated to the defendants.

13. Application was made by the captors to the Prize Court to order that the cargo should be sold, unless bail were given by the defendants in the prize suit.

14. The following letter was then written to the defendants by the plaintiffs:

"By advices recently received from New Orleans, it appears endeavours

(1) The insurance was against the usual perils, including "takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people." The policy contained a provision that in case of misfortune "it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of the insurance; the charges whereof the said company will bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured." It was also expressly declared and agreed "that the acts of the insurer or insured in recovering, saving or preserving the property insured shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment."

are being made to sell the 'Dashing Wave' and her cargo, and a meeting of the parties interested has recently been held at Liverpool for the purpose of arranging to give bail and prevent such sale. The result of this meeting was that Mr. Dean (the managing owner) has been authorized to wait upon the Foreign Office, and endeavour to prevail upon the authorities there to give such instructions as shall prevent the sale of the ship and cargo until the appeal be decided. But as it is uncertain whether the interference of the Foreign Office will be successful, we are instructed by our friends, for whom we effected the policy for 5,000*l.* on goods by her, and which was underwritten by you, to inquire whether, in case such interference does fail, you will be willing to join in giving bond to the extent of 5,000*l.*, covered by the above-named policy, in order to prevent such sale."

15. On December 9 the defendants wrote declining to interfere in any way in the matter.

(The case was amended so as to set out the evidence as to the expediency of giving bond or bail in order to prevent the sale of the cargo, and power was given to the Court to draw inferences of fact. It will be seen from the judgment, that the Court did draw such inferences, and it is not necessary to set out the evidence here.)

16. In order to procure bail and prevent the cargo being sold, the plaintiffs again wrote the defendants, who again refused to interfere.

25. On April 26, 1865, no bond or bail having been given by or on behalf of any of the parties interested in the suit, the ship and cargo were sold by order of the Prize Court, and the proceeds paid into Court to be detained pending the appeal; and such proceeds were still in the said Court at the commencement of this action.

27. On receipt of the intelligence of the sale, the plaintiffs gave a fresh notice of abandonment, and claimed for a total loss.

28. The defendants again refused to accept it.

29. This action was commenced, and while pending, the appeal was heard and judgment given affirming the aforesaid judgment of the Prize Court.

The question for the opinion of this Court was, whether, under the above circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for a total loss of the goods.

If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for a total loss, then judgment was to be entered for them for 5,000*l.*, and such interest thereon as the Court should think fit, in addition to the sum of 1,100*l.* paid into Court, together with all costs of suit.

If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for a total loss, it was to be referred to an average-stater to ascertain whether the money paid into Court was sufficient to cover the average loss and the expenses under the suing and labouring clause: and judgment for costs was to be entered for the plaintiffs, or for the defendants accordingly; provided that the costs of and attending this special case should be the defendants' costs in any event.

The case was argued (on June 8) by Mellish and Watkin Williams, for the plaintiffs, and by Sir G. Honyman (Kemplay and Cohen with him), for the defendants.—It is considered unnecessary to report the arguments, as they sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

The following cases were cited, in addition to those which are mentioned in the judgment.—Farnworth v. Hyde (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 835; 34 L. J. C.P. 207); Palmer v. Naylor (10 Ex. Rep. 382; 23 L. J. Ex. 323); Rosetto v. Gurney (11 Com. B. Rep. 176; 20 L. J. C.P. 257); Fleming v. Smith (1 H.L. C. 513); Benson v. Chapman (2 H.L. C. 696); and Moss v. Smith (9 Com. Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court [1] was delivered (on July 3) by—

BLACKBURN, J.—By this case it appears that the plaintiffs had, in the year 1863, made insurance with the defendants to the amount of 5,000*l.* on goods valued at 11,500*l.* per the ship "Dashing Wave," from Liverpool to Matamoras, against the usual perils, including "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes and people," and the policy contained a provision that in case of misfortune "it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travel for, in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance; the charges whereof the said company will bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured." And it is expressly declared and agreed "that the acts of the insurer or insured, in recovering, saving and preserving the property insured, shall not be considered a waiver or acceptance of abandonment." We may observe that while, on the one hand, such acts do not, of themselves, produce any such effect as that suggested in this provision—see per Lord Abinger, Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N.C. 287; 7 L. J. Ex. 328), cited post,—the provision itself does not, on the other hand, prevent such acts from having their effect properly due to them as evidence that the parties have made their choice. Being so insured the "Dashing Wave" sailed with the goods on board, and during the continuance of the risk she was, on November 5, 1863, seized by a cruiser of the United States and carried into New Orleans, where a suit was immediately instituted by the captors in a Prize Court against the ship and cargo, for the purpose of having them adjudged a lawful prize. It is clear at this time the cargo was, by one of the perils insured against, taken entirely out of the control of the assured under circumstances which rendered it doubtful whether it would ever be restored, or if restored, at what period. Under such circumstances the assured has a right to elect whether he will retain the property in himself, and treat the loss as a partial one, or abandon it to the underwriters and claim for a total loss; and he is bound to make that election promptly, and, where it is practicable, to inform the underwriters that he has so made it. This is very clearly explained by Gibbs, C.J., in Gernon v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (6 Taunt. 387). And the regular mode, according to mercantile usage, of notifying such an election is by giving notice of abandonment. We need not inquire, in the present case, whether it is the only mode, or how long the assured might have waited after hearing of the seizure of their goods, before determining whether they would abandon or not, for we think it clear, as a matter of fact, that they did elect to treat the seizure as a partial loss, no doubt under the expectation that their goods would be soon restored to them, and that at Matamoras they would be of such a value as to make it their interest to keep them, coming on the underwriters for compensation for the detention and expense of getting back the goods, instead of coming on them for the whole insured value, giving up the property to the underwriters in proportion to their insurance. They intervened, and conducted the litigation so successfully, that on June 16, 1864, the Prize Court, at New Orleans, gave judgment against the captors, and decreed the restitution of the ship and cargo. On July 1 the captors appealed; and, in consequence, the judgment of restitution was suspended till the decision of the Court of Appeal. It does not appear distinctly when the news of these proceedings arrived in this country; but on September 12, 1864, the assured, who must have then known that there was an appeal, for the first time sent the defendants a formal notice of abandonment, which they, as is the usual course, refused to receive, and declined to interfere. After this time it is stated in the case that all letters and communications on the subject, which were received by the assured, were from time to time communicated by them to the defendants.

On December 7, 1864, and again on February 9, 1865, the assured informed the underwriters, that endeavours were being made in New Orleans to sell the ship and cargo, and that they were endeavouring to prevent the sale of the cargo, and requesting them to assist in giving bail to prevent it. The underwriters on each occasion refused to interfere. The case has been amended by stating the evidence as to what occurred, and giving the Court power to draw inferences of fact; and we think that, in fact, the sale of the goods which are the subject of this insurance could have been prevented by depositing the value of these goods, or giving bail for them in the Prize Court, without giving security for the ship and the rest of the cargo, but could not have been prevented in any other way, and that the underwriters had full opportunity to take either of those steps if they pleased, and that they declined to do so. And that the assured also declined to take either of those steps.

On April 24, 1865, the Prize Court made an order that the ship and cargo should be sold, and on May 25, 1865, they were sold, and the proceeds paid into Court. The assured gave a fresh notice of abandonment, which was again formally refused, and this action was commenced; and the question is whether the plaintiffs can recover as for a total loss. We think that this depends upon a question of fact, namely, whether, under the circumstances, the assured ought to have given bail to prevent the sale; but before discussing the evidence set out in the case, it will be more convenient to consider how the point arises.

The assured having elected to treat the seizure and detention as a partial and not a total loss, and proceeded with the suit on their account, were bound by this election, and could not afterwards turn round and treat the same seizure and detention as a total loss. As is well pointed out in 2 Phillips on Insurance (sect. 1669, 3rd edit., p. 370), where the cargo still subsists in specie and may be recovered, the question depending on abandonment is, which party should be at the risk of the market and the solvency of agents, neither of which, independently of the direct effect of the perils insured against, concerns the insurers. To allow the assured to change his election whilst the circumstances remain the same, would enable the assured to treat the property as his as long as there was a prospect of profit from the rise in the market, and as the property of the insurers as soon as there was a certainty of loss, which would be inequitable—Qui commodum sentit sentire debet et onus. But that election, though binding so long as the circumstances remain the same, does not prevent the assured from claiming for a total loss, if a change of circumstances occurs, which makes the loss actually total. In Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N.C. 287; 7 L. J. Ex. 328), Lord Abinger thus states the law: "If the assured prefers the chance of any advantage that may result to him, beyond the value insured, he is at liberty to do so, but then he must also abide the risk of the arrival of the thing insured in such a state as to entitle him to a partial loss only." Lord Abinger, speaking with reference to the circumstances of the case before him, in which the question was whether the goods could have reached their destination, uses language not generally applicable, though the principle is. He then proceeds, "If, in the event, the loss should become absolute, the underwriter is not the less liable upon his contract because the insured has used his own exertions to preserve the thing insured, or has postponed his claim till that event of a total loss has become certain, which was uncertain before."

In Phillips on Insurance (3rd edit.), vol. 2. c. 17. v. 12, the author collects the various authorities, English and American, on this subject with great learning, and also treats the subject with great force of reasoning. He comes to the conclusion, p. 371, s. 1669, we think rightly, that the assured having once by delay shewn that he did not mean to abandon, "loses the right of abandoning on the same state of facts relative to the extent and degree of the operation and effects of the perils insured against." He explains what he means by this in the following sections. He expresses an opinion, that if an embargo or other detention were, in the result, to turn out much longer than was reasonably anticipated, the assured, though he might, in the first instance, have elected to treat the loss as partial, might on discovering this treat it as total, unless something had occurred in the interval in consequence of the delay, although the detention had never changed its nature and by condemnation or sale been turned into a total destruction of the thing. We are unwilling to say that this could never be the case; but we think it can only be where it is shewn that the delay occasioned by the detention is much greater than could have reasonably been anticipated at the time of the election made, and we think that, in this case, the prolongation of the litigation by the captors appealing was not more than might have been reasonably anticipated when the ship and cargo were first libelled. We think, therefore, that the appeal on July 1 did not amount to such a change of facts as would justify the assured in changing their election, and consequently that the assured could not, by the notice of abandonment, on September 12, 1864, make the loss by the seizure and detention a total loss, after having elected to treat it as partial only.

But we think the sale by the Prize Court stands on a very different footing. If, notwithstanding the intervention and opposition of the plaintiffs, the Prize Court in America had wrongfully condemned the goods, and they had been under the sentence sold, the case would have been identical with that of Mullett v. Shedden (13 East, 304), where the very point decided was that by the sale, "the property was totally lost to the owner, and the necessity of any abandonment was altogether done away with"; and the principle is, as stated by Lord Abinger, in the passage already cited, from the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N.C. 287; 7 L. J. Ex. 328), that inasmuch as in the event the loss had turned out to be absolute, "the underwriter is not the less liable upon his contract because the insured has used his own exertions to preserve the thing assured, or has postponed his claim till that event of a total loss has become certain which was uncertain before."

But, in the present case, the sale occurred not under a condemnation but because the assured did not give security to prevent the sale. The defendants had the fullest notice of what was about to happen, and had ample opportunity to interfere and give security so as to prevent the sale; but still the assured, if by any means such as he could reasonably be expected to use, could have prevented the sale, he was bound to use them; and if the sale was directly occasioned by his default, though remotely, by the seizure, he cannot recover against the underwriters, on account of that sale. But the assured are not bound to use unreasonable exertions in order to preserve the thing insured; and if the giving of bail or deposit of the money would have exposed them to expense or risk of expense beyond the value of the object, or as the same idea is often expressed, if the steps necessary to prevent the sale were such as a prudent uninsured owner would not have adopted, we think they were not in default, and the sale was then a total loss occasioned by the seizure. The question is therefore one of fact. The case has now been amended by setting out the evidence on this question, and giving the Court power to draw inferences of fact.

It appears that the assured might have prevented the sale by depositing the full value of the goods; but we think it can seldom be reasonable to require an assured to deposit the full value of the subject-matter in a foreign Court and country, and consequently that, without reference to the peculiarity arising from the state of the American currency, the assured was not bound to adopt that alternative. He might have prevented the sale by giving security; and generally, we think, that it would be a reasonable thing to give security rather than allow the goods to be sold. But in this case, from the peculiarly fluctuating nature of the American currency at the time, those who became sureties must have bound themselves, in the event of condemnation, to pay the value of the goods estimated in paper dollars at a time when gold was at from 150*l*. to 180*l*. premium, and it was not improbable that they might be called upon to pay when gold was at par, thus being liable to pay from 150*l*. to 180*l*. per cent. more than the value of the goods.

No doubt it was also possible that when called upon to pay, gold might have been at a still higher premium, so that they would have been called on to pay less than the value; but we do not think it was reasonable to require the assured to enter into such a very speculative transaction. It is true that in the event which, since the commencement of this action, has happened, of the judgment being affirmed, it would be quite immaterial for how much the security was given, but that could not be known at the time when the assured were called upon to determine whether they would give security, and we find that in fact an uninsured owner of part of the cargo, Mr. Simpson, who had nobody's interest to consider but his own, did, after considering the question, decline either to deposit money or to give bail for his goods, and allowed them to be sold, which, though not conclusive, is strong evidence as to what course a prudent man would take.

We come, therefore, to the conclusion of fact, that the assured could not by any means which he could reasonably be called on to adopt, have prevented the sale by the American Prize Court, which at once put an end to all possibility of having the goods restored in specie, and consequently entitled the assured to come upon their insurers for a total loss. Even then the assured was not bound to do so. If he had thought that it was more for his interest still to claim the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the American Court as his money, and come on the underwriters only for the partial loss, he might do so. But it is clear, as a matter of fact, that he elected to come upon the insurers for an indemnity for a total loss, and that by so doing the insurers when they have indemnified him will be entitled to be subrogated for him, and get what they can out of the hands of the Americans for their own benefit—see Randall v. Cochrane (1 Ves. sen. 98); Mason v. Sainsbury (3 Dougl. 61); Yates v. Whyte (4 Bing. N.C. 272); and Wright v. Morley (11 Ves. 22): see also sta. 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 5. Whether this will ultimately turn out advantageous to the underwriters or not, is a matter which concerns the parties only.

It only remains to add, that the interest should be at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. from May 25, 1863, the date of the sale, to the day on which judgment is given.

Judgment accordingly for the plaintiffs.

Slander of Title—Liability for threatening to bring Action—Proof of Malice—Patent.

PATENT. E. SLANDER OF TITLE.—The plaintiff and the defendant were each of them possessed of a separate patent for the construction of spooling-machines. The plaintiff was negotiating for the sale of his machines to different manufacturers, some of whom were already using the defendant's machines under licences from him. The defendant wrote to these manufacturers letters stating that the plaintiff's machines were infringements of a patent of the defendant's, and that if they were used he (the defendant) would claim royalties for their use, and if they were not paid take legal proceedings. In consequence of these threats, the plaintiff lost the sale of his machines. The plaintiff then brought his action, the declaration stating the facts above mentioned, and averring that the letters were falsely and maliciously written; and the defendant pleaded not guilty. At the trial the plaintiff tendered evidence to shew that the defendant's patent (which had not been disputed by scire facias or otherwise) was void for want of novelty; so that the plaintiff's machines were no infringement of the defendant's patent, and the evidence was rejected and a nonsuit directed:—Held, that this evidence was properly rejected, as, if admitted and accepted as true, it could only shew that the patent was void, and not that the plaintiff made the communication to the intended purchasers mala fide, and without any intention of instituting proceedings against them:—Held, also, that the nonsuit was right, as the plaintiff did not affirmatively prove that the defendant's claim was not bonâ fide, but a malicious attempt to injure the plaintiff by asserting a claim which, to his knowledge, was unfounded; and that in the absence of such proof the action would not lie.

The action for slander of title applies not only to cases where the false and malicious assertion relates to real property, but where it relates to personal chattels; and,

Semble—That an action will lie against one for taking civil proceedings which, to his own knowledge, are without any foundation.

Declaration—That before and at the time when, &c., the plaintiffs carried on the trade and business of engineers and machine-makers, under the style or firm of Wren & Hopkinson, and in their trade and business made for sale and sold, and were making for sale and selling from time to time certain machines called spooling-machines, and by the making and selling of such machines were acquiring great gains and profits, and the plaintiffs had sold some of the machines to certain persons, carrying on trade under the style and firm of R. F. & J. Alexander & Co., and thereupon the defendant, in a letter written and sent by the defendant to these persons, falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiffs in relation to their trade and business, and in relation to these machines being so made and sold by them, and in relation to the machines sold by the plaintiffs to these persons, the words following, that is to say: "It has come to our knowledge that you (meaning the said persons) have on your premises, and are using spooling-machines made by Wren & Hopkinson (meaning the plaintiffs) of this city, (and thereby meaning the said machines sold by the plaintiffs to the said persons) under an alleged patent of Ermen & Smith, which we have been advised is an infringement of our patent spooling-machine. You are, perhaps, not aware that other manufacturers have had similar machines, and when they became aware that they were an infringement of our patent they at once discontinued their use and returned them to the makers. We should regret exceedingly that any misunderstanding between us on this point should arise, but, in justice to ourselves, should you think fit to dispute our claim, which is 25*l.* per spindle, we shall reluctantly be compelled to enforce it, along with damages, as we may be advised. Your reply per return, stating the number of spindles you have, will oblige, yours truly, WILLIAM WEILD & Co." (meaning the defendant).

The declaration contained other counts alleging similar statements by the defendant, and in each count there was an allegation of special damage to the plaintiffs through certain specified persons, who would otherwise have purchased their machines, being prevented from doing so.

Plea, not guilty, and joinder in issue.

At the trial, before Lush, J., at the Manchester Spring Assizes, 1869, a nonsuit was entered and a rule afterwards obtained. The nature of the proceedings at the trial and the arguments upon shewing cause against the rule are described in the judgment of the Court.

Quain and Aston, for the defendant, shewed cause, and Webster and Baylis, for the plaintiffs, supported the rule.—For the plaintiffs the following cases were cited: Green v. Button (2 Cr. M. & R. 707; 5 L. J. Ex. 81); Evans v. Harlow (5 Q.B. Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was (on July 3) delivered by

BLACKBURN, J.—This was a rule to set aside a nonsuit, against which cause was shewn in these sittings, before my Brothers Lush and Hayes, and myself. The declaration in this case contained eight counts, to the effect that the plaintiffs made and sold spooling-machines, and that the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote to persons in treaty with the plaintiffs for such machines that they were infringements of a patent of the defendant's, and that if they were used, he would claim royalties for their use, and, if not paid, take legal proceedings; in consequence of which the plaintiffs lost the sale of their machines. There was no allegation that the defendant did this without reasonable and probable cause, nor, except in so far as might be implied from the terms of the defendant's letters (which, however, were averred to be false), did it appear on the face of the declaration that the defendant had any patent, or was other than a gratuitous intermeddler. The defendant pleaded not guilty, upon which issue was joined. On the trial, before my Brother Lush, it was proved that the defendant had a subsisting patent. The specification described a very complicated machine, and claimed the whole as a new combination, and also separately claimed many subordinate parts of the machine as new. The plaintiffs' machine did not comprise in it anything precisely identical with any of those subordinate parts, but so closely resembled them as at least to give plausible grounds for contending that they were equivalent to them. The plaintiffs, it appeared, were negotiating for the sale of their machines to different manufacturers, some of whom, if not all, were already using the defendant's machines under licences from him. The defendant wrote to them the letters complained of in the declaration. There were then some abortive attempts at arranging the terms of an indemnity to be given by the plaintiffs to their customers, but, those going off, the customers refused to buy the plaintiffs' machines with the risk of litigation with the defendant. The plaintiffs then brought the present action. At the trial the plaintiffs' counsel offered to prove, in addition to the facts above stated, various specifications and machines existing before the date of the defendant's patent, which according to his contention would shew that the defendant's specification claimed matters that were not new; and also that the defendant had himself used them, and consequently, as it was argued, knew the facts which would render his patent void. My Brother Lush was of opinion that inasmuch as the patent was still subsisting, and not set aside on scire facias or otherwise, this evidence was immaterial. Mr. Webster, on the argument before us, contended that this evidence would not only have shewn that the defendant's patent was void, but would also have shewn that the plaintiffs' machines were not an infringement of the patent, inasmuch as, he said, the plaintiffs did not use the whole of anything the defendant claimed, and the evidence would shew that the part they used was not new, and therefore not an infringement upon the rule laid down in Sellers v. Dickinson (5 Ex. Rep. 312; 20 L. J. Ex. 417). The evidence was rejected, and my Brother Lush directed a nonsuit. The most favourable view for the plaintiffs is to consider whether, if this evidence had been received, and had proved all that it could prove, namely, that the patent of the defendant was void, and that even if it was good, an action brought on it against those who used the plaintiffs' machine must have failed, and that the defendant when he wrote the letters, knew the fact which would have produced this effect, this would leave evidence which the Judge ought to have left to the jury in support of the issue in the present action. And we think that there would not have been such evidence, and consequently that the nonsuit should not be set aside. It becomes therefore necessary to consider what would support the issue here joined. No action precisely like this has ever been brought, but there is a well-known action for slander of title, where an unfounded assertion that the owner of real property has not title to it, if made under such circumstances that the law would imply malice, or if express malice be proved, and special damage is shewn, such as, for instance, that a bargain to sell the land is lost, is held to give a cause of action. And we see no reason why a similar rule should not apply where the false and malicious assertion relates to goods, and the damage arises from the loss of a bargain to sell them. And accordingly in Green v. Button (2 Cr. M. & R. 707; 5 L. J. Ex. 81) it was held on demurrer that a declaration which shewed that the defendant knew that he had no claim, and that his assertion of claim of right was made falsely and maliciously without reasonable and probable cause, and that special damage ensued, was good. The case of Lovett v. Weller (1 Rolle, 409) and the first resolution in Sir G. Gerard v. Dickenson (4 Coke, 18 (a); Cro. Eliz. 196) are authorities that without the allegation of knowledge or at least of want of reasonable and probable cause, the declaration would have been bad. But it is obvious that where a person claims a right in himself which he intends to enforce against a purchaser, he is entitled, and indeed in common fairness bound to give the intended purchaser warning of such his intention—see Pitt v. Donovan (1 Mau. & S. 639), and consequently we think no action can lie for giving such preliminary warning, unless either it can be shewn that the threat was made malâ fide, only with the intent to injure the vendor, and without any purpose to follow it up by an action against the purchaser, or that the circumstances were such as to make the bringing an action altogether wrongful. That an action may be brought under such circumstances as to render it morally wrong and injurious in fact, is certain, though the authorities leave it in doubt whether under any circumstances the person so sued can recover damages for the vexation and annoyance caused to him by the false suit. In Maynard's Long Quinto there is a case where (5 Edw. 4. 126) an action was brought alleging that the now defendant forged a bond in the name of the plaintiff, and afterwards sealed it in the name of the plaintiff, and sued on it, and recovered on it. It is now quite settled that the fact that the former suit had terminated against the second plaintiff would be fatal to his right of maintaining the second action, but that does not seem to have been settled law at the time, and though no decision was come to, the inclination of the Court seems to have been that for bringing a suit so manifestly wrongful to the defendant's own knowledge an action might be maintained. In Sir G. Gerard v. Dickenson (4 Coke, 18 (a); Cro. Eliz. 196) the point seems to have been considered, and according to the report by Lord Coke, who was himself counsel in the case, it was resolved, secondly, that inasmuch as the declaration shewed that with knowledge that the plaintiff was bargaining to sell his land, and the defendant alleged against her own knowledge that a lease, which was a forgery, gave her title to the land, and the bargain was thereby lost, the action lay; and Lord Coke cites the opinion in 5 Edw. 4. c. 126. with approbation. The case seems to have been a peculiarly hard one, as the defendant pleaded that she did not know that the deed was a forgery, and judgment was given against her on the assumption that she did know, because of grounds of special demurrer to the plea. In Waterer v. Freeman (Hob. 267), which was an action for maliciously and vexatiously issuing a second fi. fa. whilst the first was unreturned, the Chief Justice says, "If a man sue in a proper Court, yet if his suit be utterly without ground of truth, and that certainly known to himself, I may have an action on the case against him for the undue vexation and damage that he putteth me to by his ill practice." This was not necessary for the decision of the case before the Court, but it was by no means irrelevant, and is therefore an authority entitled to weight. On the other hand, in Saville v. Roberts (1 Ld. Raym. 374), Lord Holt, in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, expresses an opinion that no such action would lie without alleging and proving some collateral wrong, as that he was maliciously held to bail, or the like. For this he gives two reasons, first, that a man is entitled to bring an action if he fancies he has a right, which is in accordance with Lord Ellenborough's reasoning in Pitt v. Donovan (1 Mau. & S. 639). But this reason is quite consistent with Lord Hobart's position, that the action will lie when it was certainly known to him that the action was utterly without ground. His second reason is, that the law considers that the party grieved has an adequate remedy in his judgment for costs. And on this the Court of Common Pleas acted in Purton v. Honnor (1 Bos. & P. 205). But this artificial reason does not apply in the present case; for whether the judgment for costs would or would not have been a recompense to the party sued, it could be none to the plaintiffs for the loss of their bargain if occasioned by a wrongful and malicious threat. If, therefore, the plaintiffs had given evidence on which the jury might properly find that the defendant made the communication to the intended purchasers malâ fide, and without any intention to institute legal proceedings at all against the purchasers, so that it was not a step taken in support of his real or fancied right against the purchasers, but entirely out of malice against the plaintiffs, or on which they might properly have found that the defendant did not, to use Lord Holt's phrase, so much as fancy he had a right, but, as Lord Hobart says, knew certainly that his claim was utterly without ground of truth, we are inclined to think that it would have been proper to leave that evidence to the jury in support of the plaintiffs' allegation that the defendant's letter was false and malicious; the question, whether that is enough without an express allegation of knowledge or want of reasonable and probable cause being on the record. But we think that as soon as it was shown in evidence that the defendant really had a patent right of his own, and was asserting it, the occasion privileged the communication, and the plaintiffs were bound to prove such malice as would support the action. As the evidence which they tendered was rejected, they are entitled to a new trial if, supposing it to have been received and to have turned out as favourable as possible to the plaintiffs, it would have made a case proper to have been left to the jury. But we think that, supposing everything had been proved which the evidence, if tendered, could have proved, there would have been no case on which the jury could properly have found for the plaintiffs. The whole reasoning of the Judges in Pater v. Baker (3 Com. B. Rep. 831; 16 L. J. C.P. 124) seems to us strongly in support of this conclusion. The advisers of the plaintiffs seem to have thought it was enough to maintain this action to shew that the defendant could not really have maintained any action, and that, if well advised, he would have been told so, so as in this action indirectly to try the question whether an action for the infringement of the patent could have been maintained: whilst, as we think, the action could not lie unless the plaintiffs affirmatively proved that the defendant's claim was not a bonâ fide claim in support of a right which, with or without cause, he fancied he had, but a malâ fide and malicious attempt to injure the plaintiffs by asserting a claim of right against his own knowledge that it was without any foundation. The rule therefore must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

INTERNATIONAL LAW. L.—Where a foreign Statute of Limitations requires proceedings to be taken within a period shorter than that prescribed by the English statute, but like the English statute, does not affect causes of action, but only the remedy in respect of them; a foreign judgment declaring that a claim is barred by the local Statute of Limitations is no bar to an action here for that same claim within the period prescribed by the English law.

SOLICITOR. K.—Two attorneys in partnership having been retained to defend an action, it was decided in favour of the defendant upon which the plaintiffs appealed. While the appeal was pending, the partnership was dissolved, and the proceedings were continued by one of the partners separately:—Held, that the partners were not entitled to sue for their costs till the appeal was decided, so that the Statute of Limitations did not until then begin to run as against their claim.

Declaration (the writ having been issued January, 1868) for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs for the work, &c., of the plaintiffs done as the attorneys and advocates of and for the defendant, at his request, and for fees payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs in respect thereof, and for materials and necessary things by the plaintiffs provided in and about the work for the defendant at his request; for money paid; and for money due from the defendant to the plaintiffs on accounts stated.

Second plea—The Statute of Limitations. Third plea—That the plaintiffs ought not to be admitted to say that the money is payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs as in the declaration mentioned, because before this suit the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant in the Deemsters Court, Douglas, Isle of Man, for the same debt and cause of action as in the declaration mentioned, and such proceedings were thereupon had in that action that afterwards and before this suit it was considered by the judgment of the Court in the action that the defendant did not owe the debt or any part thereof, and that the plaintiffs should take nothing by their writ or in respect of the debt and cause of action; and the judgment still remains in force, &c.

Demurrer to the third plea and joinder in demurrer. The plaintiffs also joined issue on the pleas.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Middlesex Sittings, in Trinity Term, 1868, it appeared that the plaintiffs, Messrs. Harris and Adams, carried on business in the Isle of Man as attorneys, solicitors and advocates, in co-partnership, until October 1, 1862, when the co-partnership was dissolved.

In March, 1858, the defendant retained the plaintiffs as his advocates to defend a petition presented against him in the Ecclesiastical Court of the Isle of Man, to compel him to amend his return of the estate of Jane Quine, deceased, of which he had been appointed administrator. The case was finally heard in the Ecclesiastical Court on April 25, 1861, and decided in favour of the defendant. On September 2, 1861, the petitioners appealed from this decision to the Staff of Government, the Manx Court of Appeal, and (after a reference for the purpose of taxing the accounts and reporting to the Court) the appeal was heard on April 7, 1865, when the appellate Court varied the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Court.

The costs of the proceedings from the inception of the cause in the Ecclesiastical Court to its final termination by the judgment of the Court of Appeal on April 7, 1865, amounted up to the day of dissolution of partnership between Messrs. Harris and Adams, to the sum of 46*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*, and from that period to the end of the suit to 18*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* After the dissolution of the partnership the legal proceedings were conducted by Mr. Adams alone, with the sanction of the defendant.

The defendant having refused to pay the amount of the costs, two actions were brought against him in the Deemsters Court, Douglas, Isle of Man, one in the name of Harris and Adams for the sum of 46*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*, and the other in the name of Adams alone for 18*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* In the action by Adams alone the defendant paid the amount, subject to taxation. In the action by Harris and Adams he pleaded the Manx Statute of Limitations (three years).

He also contended that although where a single advocate brought an action for costs the action would not begin to run till the termination of the suit in respect of which these costs were incurred, yet that on the dissolution of the partnership of Harris and Adams, on October 1, 1862, there was a debt due to them, and that the statute ran from that date. The Court gave judgment for the defendant, the judgment stating that the defendant had pleaded the Statute of Limitations in bar of the suit, and that the plea was a good bar to it.

By the Manx Statute of Limitations it is provided that "actions of debt grounded upon any lending contract or demand, without specialty, which shall be sued or brought in any of the temporal Courts of the Isle shall be commenced and effectually prosecuted within three years next after the cause of such action, plaint or suit, and at no time afterwards."

The verdict was for the plaintiff for 45*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, with leave for the defendant to move to set it aside and enter a non-suit or a verdict for the defendant.

A rule having been obtained for the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and entered for the defendant, or why the damages should not be reduced to 7*l.* 18*s.* (the costs of the appeal), or such sum as the Court might think fit, on the ground that the judgment for the defendant in the Isle of Man Court is, that the plea of the English Statute of Limitations was a bar to the plaintiff's claim, or some part of it; or why the Court should not amend the third plea; and ordering that the rule should come on for argument with the demurrer,—

R. G. Williams shewed cause, and argued the demurrer to the third plea.—The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The judgment in the Isle of Man merely decides that a term of three years has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, and not that the action cannot be maintained here. A foreign judgment for the defendant in a former suit, is no answer to an action in this country, unless there has been a decision on the merits. Whether or not a claim has been barred by a foreign Statute of Limitations is a question affecting the remedy, and not a question upon the merits—Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 576. The leading case upon which this passage is founded is Huber v. Steiner (2 Bing. N.C. 202; 4 L. J. C.P. 233). There an action was brought in England on a French promissory note, and it was proved that according to the law of limitations in the Code Civil no action could have been brought on the note. The Court in giving judgment, p. 210, assumed that if the prescription of the French law was only a limitation of the time within which an action could be brought in the French Courts, it would be no bar to the right of action in England. Ruckmaboye v. Mottichund (8 Moore P.C. 4) is an authority to the same effect. Jervis, C.J., saying, p. 35, "In truth it has become almost an axiom in jurisprudence that a law of prescription or law of limitation, which is meant by that denomination, is a law relating to procedure having reference only to the lex fori." In Don v. Lippmann (5 Cl. & F. 1; Tudor's Lead. Cas. 213), it was held by the House of Lords that where a bill was accepted in France and a judgment obtained there against the acceptor that he might still be sued in Scotland, and that the Scotch law of prescription would apply to the suit.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—That case appears to have been the converse of the present one. But is it not another thing to say that where the cause of action is a foreign one, and the plaintiff has resorted to the foreign Courts, that he may still maintain his action here?]

Where the decision of the foreign Court is not upon the merits, there can be no bar here.

[HAYES, J., referred to The British Linen Company v. Drummond (10 B. & C. 903), where in an action in this country on a Scotch bond an opinion seems to have been expressed that the English law of limitation would apply.]

In the case alluded to it could not have been said that an action in Scotland would be barred by the proceedings in England.

Digitized by Google

[BLACKBURN, J.—No; it would have been said, "You are setting up the law of England against that of Scotland."]

In The Bank of the United States v. Donnally (8 Peters (American Rep.), 361), where an action was brought in Virginia on a promissory note made in Kentucky, it was held that the Statute of Limitations in Virginia must govern the case, Story, J., saying, page 371, "As the contract upon which the original suit was brought was made in Kentucky, and is sought to be enforced in the state of Virginia, the decision of the case in favour of the defendant, upon the plea of the Statute of Limitations, will operate as a bar to a subsequent suit in the same state, but not necessarily as an extinguishment of the contract elsewhere, and especially in Kentucky." In Westlake on Private International Law, p. 376, par. 393, it is laid down that in order that a plea of a foreign judgment should be a conclusive bar here, it must have been given on the merits, referring as an authority to Garcias v. Ricardo (14 Sim. 265; 14 L. J. Ch. 339); and this view is further illustrated by Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 577. With regard to the second point, it is quite clear that the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run till the termination of the whole suit, including the appeal. Wadsworth v. Marshall (2 Cr. & J. 665; 1 L. J. Ex. 250) shews that an attorney cannot insist on payment of his bill at any stage of an action at law; and in Whitehead v. Lord (7 Ex. Rep. 691; 21 L. J. Ex. 239) this doctrine was confirmed in the case of a Chancery suit in which no step had been taken for many years. All that is required is, that the attorney should elect to consider the appeal as a continuation of the suit.

Baylis, in support of the rule.—The third plea is a good one. It is admitted that questions upon Statutes of Limitation are part of the lex fori, but this rule is subject to another, Nemo debet bis vexari pro eadem causa. The plea shews that a foreign Court has pronounced judgment against the defendant, and this judgment must be considered as a judgment on the merits. A plea of a foreign judgment is an issuable plea, and an issuable plea is defined as a plea going to the merits—Mackay v. Wood (7 Mee. & W. 420; 10 L. J. Ex. 176).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But only a plea to the merits as distinguished from a dilatory plea.]

The Court in holding the judgment conclusive would be paying regard to the comity of nations.

[BLACKBURN, J.—This judgment cannot estop the plaintiff from denying that the suit is more than six years old.]

The American authorities all shew that where the debt is extinguished the foreign law must prevail. The late case of Phillips v. Eyre (38 L. J. Q.B. 113) is an example of this rule.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In Phillips v. Eyre (38 L. J. Q.B. 113) the right of action was taken away on the merits.]

With regard to the second point, the attorney's right to costs accrues directly a final judgment is given. In Rothery v. Munnings (1 B. & Ad. 15) it was held that the right accrued when judgment was given on an appeal, and Lord Tenterden said (page 17), "When the suit was terminated by a sentence, there is no doubt that the proctor had a right to call for the amount of his bill."

[BLACKBURN, J.—In the present case, though judgment had been given, there was an instant appeal.]

The suit in the common acceptation of the term had come to an end.—He cited Harris v. Osbourn (2 Cr. & M. 629; 3 L. J. Ex. 182) and Phillips v. Broadley (9 Q.B. Rep. 744 16 L. J. Q.B. 72).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the rule must be discharged. As regards the question of whether a judgment recovered on a plea of the Statute of Limitations in the Manx Court is a bar to the bringing of an action here, I think we are bound by authority, and that the case of Huber v. Steiner (2 Bing. N.C. 202; 4 L. J. C.P. 233) is binding and conclusive upon us. If the matter were res integra, I should have required further time to consider whether a regulation as to the time within which a debt may be sued for is wholly a matter of procedure, and not a matter forming part of the contract. I think it might well be argued that where by the law of a country money due from one person to another can only be recovered by suit within a certain time, the contract may be interpreted as binding the debtor only to pay the debt when due, or within the period to which the right of action is limited. But the case is a binding authority, and the judgment in the Manx Court can have no effect in this action. The plea is no plea to the merits, and the question is, whether it comes to more than this, that by the law of the Isle of Man the term of prescription is three years. If this be so, the issue in the Manx Court is not the same which would arise here, viz., whether the cause of action had accrued within six years. Upon the other ground of the argument I have nothing to add to what has been already said. Mr. Baylis's argument might have been a good one if nothing had been done after the first judgment in the administration suit. But, as soon as the defendant instructed his attorney to appeal from the judgment, the whole matter of the appeal was nothing more than a continuation of the original suit, and the attorney was not in a position to bring an action to recover the amount of his bill till the appeal was terminated.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that it must now be taken to be decided that Statutes of Limitation are matters relating to the conduct of a suit, and part of the lex fori. It must follow, therefore, that a plea of the Manx Statute of Limitations cannot be good in the case of a debt contracted in the Isle of Man, and sued for in this country. Mr. Baylis argues that the plea shews that the Manx Court has decided that the claim is barred by the lapse of three years, and that according to the comity of nations we ought to hold that the claim is barred here. But I can see no reason why the comity of nations should produce any such effect. Where it appears that the very point in dispute has been the subject of an express decision in a foreign Court, we are estopped from dealing with it, but it would be very strange if the decision of the Manx Court that three years has elapsed since the cause of action, should be an answer to it in England. Then, as to the other point, the case of Harris v. Osbourn (2 Cr. & M. 629; 3 L. J. Ex. 182) shews that where an attorney undertakes to carry on a suit the Statute of Limitations runs from the termination of it; but where the client is dissatisfied and gives notice of his intention to carry on the suit to a Court of error, then what was primâ facie a termination of the suit is shewn by the conduct of the parties to be no real termination. Applying this rule to the present case, I think that the statute did not run till the decision of the appeal.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the Manx law had been analogous to our law of limitations as regards real property (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27), not only barring the remedy but extinguishing the right, the plea might have been good. But the Manx statute merely affects the remedy, and the judgment only decided that the plaintiffs had lost their right to sue in the Courts of the island. With respect to the other point, I agree with my Lord and my Brother Blackburn.

HAYES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The distinction between statutes extinguishing the right and barring the remedy is considered at large in Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 582.

Bill of Exchange—Notice of Dishonour, where excused—Ostensible Place of Business.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. G.—A bill of exchange was accepted by a joint-stock company and indorsed by the defendant, who was a director of the company.

Digitized by Google

The bill was accepted and indorsed in the presence of the plaintiffs at the office of the company, which the defendant was in the habit of attending. A notice of dishonour was sent by the holders to the defendant, addressed to him at this office, but as he had ceased to attend it, the notice did not reach him until some time afterwards. The holders also made inquiries as to the defendant's private residence of other directors of the company, and at an office with which the company had had dealings, but not at the office of the company itself:—Held, that there had been sufficient notice of dishonour. That if nothing more had appeared in the case than that the holders were ignorant of the indorser's private residence, it might have been doubted whether the holders could be taken to have used due diligence in searching for the address. But looking at the facts, that the bill was indorsed at the company's office, that the holders knew nothing of the defendant's address, and that the defendant was described as director on the bill, they were justified in thinking that as far as the bill was concerned he was, as it were, domiciled at the office, and that he intended that the office should be the place where any notice respecting the bill should be sent to him.

Declaration against the defendant on a bill of exchange for 72*l.* 10*s.* accepted by the Industrial Loan and Interest Company (Limited), and indorsed by the defendant.

Plea, amongst others, denial of notice of dishonour, and issue thereon.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1868, it appeared that the Industrial Loan and Interest Company (Limited), was indebted to the plaintiffs for goods supplied to the company, and that the plaintiffs had threatened to bring an action to enforce payment, but ultimately agreed to give further time upon receipt of a bill of exchange for 72*l.* 10*s.*, drawn by them upon and accepted by the company, and indorsed by the defendant and a Mr. Johnstone, both of whom were directors of the company and in the habit of attending at its office, 20, Great George Street, Westminster. The bill was taken to the company's office, and there accepted by the manager on behalf of the company, indorsed by the defendant and his co-director, and delivered to the plaintiffs. The company shortly afterwards became insolvent, and the bill, when it became due, was dishonoured. A notice of dishonour was on July 27 sent to the defendant, directed 20, Great George Street, Westminster. It appeared that the plaintiffs were ignorant of the defendant's private residence, although the plaintiff Berridge had made inquiries respecting it from one of the directors and at the office of the Provident Union Company, which had had dealings with the insolvent company. The defendant at the time when the notice was sent to him at the office had ceased to attend there, and did not receive the notice till some time afterwards. A writ was, however, issued against the defendant, and his residence having been discovered to be at Petersham, in Surrey, the writ was served there on August 4. It was objected that there had been no due notice of dishonour. A verdict was directed for the plaintiffs for 74*l.*, with leave for the defendant to move.

A rule having been obtained to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no notice of dishonour or circumstances to excuse it,— Warton shewed cause.—The question is, whether the plaintiffs have used due diligence in finding out the place of residence of the defendant—Rowe v. Tipper (13 Com. B. Rep. 249; 22 L. J. C.P. 135). Now, it appears that inquiries were made in every quarter where the information was likely to be obtained. The case of Beveridge v. Burgis (3 Campb. 262), shews that it is not enough to make the inquiries at the place where the bill is payable. And it must not be forgotten that the defendant was a director of the company. So that their office may be said to have been his place of business, or at any rate, supposed to be so.

Hodgson, in support of the rule.—It cannot be said that there was anything like due diligence in searching for the defendant's residence. It may be that an inquiry at the office would not, by itself, have been sufficient, but it was a precaution which ought not to have been neglected. The company's office could not have been considered as the defendant's place of business, for he indorsed the bill in his personal capacity, and not on behalf of the company. The case of In re the Leeds Banking Company; Ex parte Prange (35 L. J. Ch. 33), shews that without strong and satisfactory evidence that a person to whom notice is sent is the defendant's agent to receive it, the holder is not excused from personally communicating with the defendant.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this rule should be discharged. There can be no doubt that the holder of a bill is bound to give due notice of its dishonour to the drawer or indorser. If the bill is not met when it falls due, the holder must find, or use due diligence to find the indorser against whom he proposes to bring his action, either at his place of business, if he is engaged in business, or, if not, at his place of residence. In the case in hand, the notice was not sent to the defendant's place of residence, but to the office of the company by whom the bill was accepted. Now, we have to consider whether this office was, in any sense, the place of business of the defendant, or whether he authorized the plaintiffs to treat it as his place of business, or the place where he might reasonably be expected to be found. It appears that the bill was indorsed by the defendant, who was a director of the Industrial Loan and Interest Company, and that the bill was handed to the plaintiffs in respect of a claim against the company. The plaintiffs insisted that two additional names should be put upon the bill, and the defendant indorsed it under an erroneous notion that he would not be liable in his private capacity. By indorsing the bill as director he, as it seems to me, authorized and warranted the plaintiffs in treating the indorsement as a transaction on the part of the company, and in thinking that the company's place of business would be the place where the defendant would be likely to be found, and his place of business with reference to this transaction. If it had been necessary to search for the defendant's place of residence, I should certainly have thought that the plaintiffs had not exercised due diligence in inquiring for it. But, under the circumstances, I think that the company's office was a proper place for the notice to be left at.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt about the rule of law, that the holder of a dishonoured bill of exchange is under the obligation of giving notice of its dishonour to the indorser, unless something has happened which according to the law excuses him from this liability. Now the holder would be excused if, after searching with due diligence, he was unable to find the indorser, and I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that if the plaintiffs had only relied upon the fact that they did not know the private residence of the defendant, it would be very doubtful whether they could be considered to have exercised due diligence in seeking for it, and I should not like to support the verdict upon the supposition that they had. But then comes the question, whether this is a case where the indorser has held out a place of business as being his own, just as where a person drew a bill dating it generally "London" (Clarke v Sharpe, 3 Mee. & W. 166), and it was held that proof of a letter containing notice of the dishonour of the bill having been put into the post-office addressed to the drawer generally "London," was evidence of notice, on the ground that he must be taken to have said "London is the place where I shall be found." In the same manner, the usage of trade and course of business have made a man's place of business for this purpose equal to his residence. It appears that the defendant resided at Petersham, in Surrey, where in all probability no one knew much about him. An action against the company was compromised, and the bill received at the company's office. It was there that the defendant put his name on the bill, the plaintiffs being utterly ignorant of anything concerning him, except that he was one of the indorsers. The question is, Have the plaintiffs fulfilled their duty as to sending notice of dishonour? It seems to me that the decision as to the address "London" is an authority for holding that it was enough to send the notice directed "20, Great George Street." I wish to guard myself from saying that such an address would in every case be sufficient. I only wish my observations to apply to a case where the defendant as far as the bill was concerned was as it were domiciled at the address, and as it were, said, "You may send a notice to me here." With this limitation, I think that what was done by the plaintiffs was sufficient, and that the rule must be discharged.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. A man has sometimes different places of business. Now here, having regard to the fact that the defendant had attended at the office, I think that we may consider that he held it out as one of his places of business.

Costs, Taxation of—Feigned Issue under General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118.)—Finding of Jury for Defendant in respect of Part of his Claim—"Event of Trial."

COSTS. F.—By the General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), s. 56, if any person, claiming to be interested in any land proposed to be inclosed under the Act, shall be dissatisfied with any determination of the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioner concerning any claim or interest in or to the land proposed to be inclosed under the powers thereinbefore contained, and shall cause notice in writing of such dissatisfaction to be delivered to the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for such person so dissatisfied, &c. to bring an action upon a feigned issue against the person in whose favour such determination shall have been made, or against the Commissioners, &c., and the verdict given upon the trial of such action shall be binding and conclusive upon all parties thereto, &c.; and after such verdict shall be given and final judgment obtained thereon, the Commissioners shall act in conformity thereto, and allow or disallow the claim thereby determined, according to the event of such trial; and the costs attending any such action shall abide the event of the trial.

The valuer appointed under the Act allotted to the defendant rights of common in respect of 198 acres of land, and this allotment was confirmed by the Assistant Commissioner.

The plaintiff appealed from the decision and brought an action on a feigned issue, in which the question was, whether the decision of the Commissioner allowing the defendant rights of common in respect of the 198 acres was erroneous. A verdict was given for the plaintiff as to so much of the 198 acres as lay within a certain boundary, and for the defendant for the residue. The defendant's portion was slightly inferior in value to the other.

The master, on taxation, allowed the plaintiff the general costs of the cause, and only allowed the defendant the costs exclusively relating to the issue on which he succeeded:—Held, that the taxation must be reviewed; that the fact of the statute requiring the party appealing to be the plaintiff must be put out of the question; and that the Master must treat the costs of both plaintiff and defendant as if there had been two records and two issues, and for this purpose look at the briefs and ascertain how many of the witnesses and how much of the expenses related to the portion of land in respect of which the plaintiff and the defendant had respectively succeeded.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the Master should not review his taxation of the plaintiff's and defendant's costs in this action.

It appeared from the affidavits that the cause was a feigned issue, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118[1], to decide the right of the defendant to an allotment of rights of common on Haresceugh Fell, in the manor of Kirkoswald, Cumberland, in respect of his estate there, containing 198 a. 1 r. 23 p.

The issue stated that C. Webster, the valuer, acting in the matter of the inclosure of Haresceugh Fell, &c., in Cumberland, under the provisions of the Acts for the inclosure, exchange and improvement of land, ordered that the claim of T. Fetherstonhaugh of the rights of common of pasture over Haresceugh Fell and Berry Moor, in respect of a mansion-house, pleasure-grounds and closes in his occupation, containing 198 acres 1 rood 23 perches, should be allowed, and that the assistant commissioner duly appointed under the Acts decided that the claim should be confirmed. That C. Hardy claimed to be interested in Haresceugh Fell and Berry Moor, and was dissatisfied with the decision of the valuer and assistant commissioner allowing the claim of T. Fetherstonhaugh to rights of common of pasture over Haresceugh Fell, &c., in respect of the mansion-house and land containing 198 acres 1 rood 23 perches, and had caused due notice of his dissatisfaction to be delivered according to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, and that he affirmed, and T. Fetherstonhaugh denied, that the decision of the assistant commissioner was erroneous in so far as the decision confirmed the allowance of the claim of Fetherstonhaugh to rights of common of pasture over Haresceugh Fell, in respect of the mansion-house and lands containing 198 acres 1 rood 23 perches.

The case came on for trial at Carlisle, at the Summer Assizes, 1866, when a verdict was taken for the plaintiff as to so much of the 198 acres 1 rood 23 perches as was on the south side of the Raven Beck, and in the parish of Kirkoswald, and for the defendant as to the residue of the 198 acres 1 rood 23 perches. The difference between the two portions of land in respect of acreage and value was not great, but rather in favour of the plaintiff. The plaintiff signed judgment, and his bill of costs was afterwards taxed by the Master, who allowed him all the general costs of the cause, although it was objected on behalf of the defendant that there had been no event of the trial within the meaning of the Act, so as to entitle the plaintiff to any costs at all, and that if there had been any such event, the defendant had succeeded as much as the plaintiff, so that neither party could have the general costs. A bill of costs was then prepared by the defendant, but the Master refused to tax any of these costs which did not relate exclusively to that part of the issue on which the plaintiff succeeded. A rule was accordingly obtained, as above mentioned.

Gray now shewed cause.—The plaintiff in the feigned issue was entitled to the general costs of the cause. The plaintiff is bound by the statute to appeal

(1) By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. s. 48, claims in the matter of any inclosure under the Act are to be heard and determined by a valuer, subject to an appeal to Commissioners.

By section 56, "If any person claiming to be interested in any land proposed to be inclosed under this Act shall be dissatisfied with any determination of the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioner concerning any claim or interest in or to the land proposed to be inclosed under the powers hereinbefore contained, and shall cause notice in writing of such dissatisfaction to be delivered to the Commissioners within thirty days next after notice of such determination shall have been given to the several parties or persons specially interested, if any such there be, it shall be lawful for such person so dissatisfied, and giving such notice as aforesaid, to bring an action upon a feigned issue against the person in whose favour such determination shall have been made, or against the Commissioners, and to proceed to a trial at law at the then next Assizes, or at the Assizes immediately following such next Assizes, to be holden for the county wherein the land relating to which such dispute shall arise shall be situate; and the defendant in such action shall, upon being served with the usual process therein, appear thereto, and accept one or more issue or issues, whereby such claim, and the right and interest thereby insisted upon, may be tried and determined, such issue to be settled by the proper officer of the Court in which the said action shall be commenced, in case the parties shall differ about the same; and the verdict given upon the trial of such action shall be binding and conclusive upon all parties thereto, unless the Court wherein such action shall be brought shall set aside such verdict, and order a new trial to be had; and after such verdict shall be given, and final judgment obtained thereon, the Commissioners shall act in conformity thereto, and allow or disallow the claim thereby determined according to the event of such trial; and the costs attending any such action shall abide the event of the trial."

against the decision of the Commissioner in the form of an action, and this action must proceed like an ordinary action at common law.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Why could not the plaintiff say, "I appeal against so much of the decision as allows the defendant rights of common in respect of land within a certain boundary," instead of objecting to the whole allotment?]

The plaintiff would have had great difficulty in restricting his claim. In Staley v. Bedwell (10 Ad. & E. 145; 8 L. J. Q.B. 233), where an interpleader rule directed the sheriff to sell the goods claimed and pay the proceeds into Court to abide the event of an issue between the claimant and the execution creditor to try the right to them, and the jury found that part of the goods were the sole property of the claimant, and the residue the joint property of the claimant and the party levied upon, it was held that the claimant was entitled to be paid by the execution creditor the general costs of the feigned issue (deducting the issues found for the latter), although in such a case there was no more reason than in the present instance why the claimant should be plaintiff. In the case of an ejectment, the claimant is entitled to the general costs although the jury find that he is only entitled to a portion of the property.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Without saying whether that is a satisfactory rule, it must be remembered that there can always be a defence as to part of the property.]

In the present case, the defendant might have abandoned a portion of his claim. The case of M'Carthy v. Nepean (6 Q.B. Rep. 252; 13 L. J. Q.B. 358), where the plaintiff in a feigned issue under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 71. s. 46, was not allowed the general costs though he had a finding in his favour upon a distinct issue, may be cited by the other side, but there the Court under the Act had a discretion as to costs. The case of Lewis v. Holding (2 Man. & G. 875; 10 L. J. C.P. 204), where the plaintiff recovered part of his claim and the costs were apportioned, may also be relied on, but there the Court had a discretion in giving costs under the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58. and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45. s. 2.—[He also cited Fitzwillian v. Maxwell (7 Taunt. 30).]

T. Jones, in support of the rule, was stopped by the Court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute. There can be no doubt that the section is somewhat inartificially worded, but if we were to adopt Mr. Gray's construction of it, we should establish a state of things so anomalous that it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended it. Where the landowner has made a claim before the valuer to rights of common, and has obtained an allotment of rights of common in respect of so many acres of land, he has upon this hypothesis obtained a decision in his favour. Well, suppose that another person comes forward and requires that the question whether the claimant is really entitled to his allotment shall be decided by a feigned issue. Upon a further investigation it turns out that the claimant is only entitled to an allotment in respect of 95 instead of 100 acres of land. Now, according to Mr. Gray, although the claimant was bound to establish his right to the allotment in respect of the 95 acres in the feigned issue, and has succeeded in doing so, yet he is to have no costs. I turn to the words of the statute to see whether such an anomaly cannot be prevented. After directing a feigned issue the section proceeds, "the verdict given upon the trial of such action shall be binding and conclusive upon all parties thereto, &c., and after such verdict shall be given and final judgment obtained thereon, the commissioners shall act in conformity thereto, and allow or disallow the claim thereby determined according to the event of such trial." What the commissioners here had to do following the event of the trial was to allow part of the claim and disallow the rest. Now the words of the section as to costs are in the same terms as those relating to the allowance of the claim, "the costs attending any such action shall abide in the event of the trial." The costs must, therefore, be allowed according to the success of the claim, and in this way substantial justice will be done.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite true that in an action at law, if the plaintiff succeeds upon any one of his claims, he gets the general costs of the cause, so that where the plaintiff in an expensive action recovers a small sum only, the defendant may be compelled to pay an excessive amount of costs. This is the rule in an ordinary action, but I do not think that this statute intended to adopt it. Section 56 provides—(the learned Judge read the section). Now we might well suppose that the legislature would give costs to the party succeeding, but what we find enacted is, that the unsuccessful and dissatisfied party is to be the plaintiff in an action against the successful party, and that the verdict upon this issue is to be conclusive. Now in the issue in the present case, the finding of the jury was that as to one close, Blackacre, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed, but as to the other close, Whiteacre, he was not. So that the event of the trial being that the claimant was partly in the right, the costs are to be allowed or disallowed according to this event; and it does not matter who was plaintiff or defendant in the feigned issue; just as in the case of Fitzwilliam v. Maxwell (7 Taunt. 30), the Court of Common Pleas held that the costs, where the local Act directing a feigned issue said nothing about them, were to abide the event of the verdict. Under the old rule, where the plaintiff recovered anything he got all the costs and the defendant got nothing. According to the modern practice, the plaintiff gets the general costs of the cause. In the present case it would seem just and proper that the defendant should be entitled to these costs, and the legislature might very well say that the costs should abide the event of the verdict as distinct from the event of the action, and that the party who succeeds as to one part of his claim should have the costs in respect of it. If the legislature meant this, and it seems to me that the legislature can have meant nothing else, the Master must look at the briefs as if there had been two records and two actions tried at the same time, in one of which the plaintiff had succeeded, and in another the defendant; and he must ascertain how much of the briefs and witnesses and other expenses relate to the land in respect of which the defendant has succeeded. If the Commissioners had decided against the defendant in the first instance, there can be no doubt that he would now be in the position of a plaintiff who has succeeded as to a great part of his claim, and it seems quite unfair that his right to costs should depend upon a mere accident.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not profess to understand the reason for making the person dissatisfied with the decision of the Commissioner, the plaintiff in the feigned issue, but the section directs that the action shall be brought in this form, and that the defendant shall accept the issue, which is to be settled by the proper officer of the Court in which the action is commenced, and that the verdict given in the trial is to be binding and conclusive upon all parties thereto. After this verdict is given the Commissioners are to make a fresh determination, and to allow or disallow the claim, according to the event of the trial. Now, the Commissioners here have to allow part of the right claimed by the defendant and to disallow the rest; and as the costs are also to follow the event of the trial, they must be divided according to the allowance of the claim. I do not think that in a case like the present, where the issue is settled under the authority of the Court, the right to costs should depend upon any technical consideration, and I think the Master will have no difficulty in appropriating the costs to that part of the claim on which each party has succeeded, and in awarding him his proportion accordingly.

Apprentice—Covenant for Personal Service—Performance Impossible—Act of God.

ACT OF GOD. APPRENTICE. A.—A covenant in an apprenticeship deed that the apprentice will honestly remain with and serve his master for a certain term, is, though in terms absolute, subject to an implied condition that the apprentice shall continue in a state of ability to perform his contract. To an action, therefore, by the master for breach of the covenant, a plea that the apprentice was prevented by the act of God, to wit, permanent illness, which arose after the making of the deed and before breach, is good.

The declaration alleged, that by an indenture of apprenticeship, under seal, between the intestate, his son, and the plaintiff, the son, with the consent of the intestate, bound himself apprentice to the plaintiff, to be taught in the art and trade of a chemist and druggist, and with the plaintiff, after the manner of an apprentice, to remain and serve from a certain day until the term of five years thence next following should be fully complete and ended. And that the intestate covenanted with the plaintiff that the son should and would honestly remain with and serve the plaintiff as his apprentice during all the term. And that, though after the making of the indenture the plaintiff received the son into his service as such apprentice for the term aforesaid, and though the plaintiff had performed all things, &c., yet the son, after the making of the indenture, and during the term, did not nor would honestly remain with or serve the plaintiff as his apprentice during all the term, whereby the plaintiff lost, &c.

Plea, that the son was and is prevented by the act of God, to wit, by permanent illness, from remaining with or serving the plaintiff during all the term.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder therein.

Tapping (with him Waddy), for the plaintiff.—The plea is bad in substance. Permanent illness is no excuse—Com. Dig. tit. 'Justices,' (B. 57), Addenda, says, "Sessions cannot discharge the master from his apprentice for the apprentice's incurable sickness; the master is to provide for him in sickness and in health;" founded on The King v. Hales Owen (1 Str. 99)—see Hawksworth's case (1 Wms. Saund. 313 (2) and 316 (2)) and stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. There cannot be one law for the master and one for the servant. This is an unconditional covenant to perform service. The law will not imply any exception. Paradine v. Jane (Aleyn, 26) points out the distinction: "Where the law creates a duty or charge, and the party is disabled to perform it without any default in him, and hath no remedy over, there the law will excuse him." Hall v. Wright (27 L. J. Q.B. 345: in error, El. B. & El. 746; 29 L. J. Q.B. 43) is in the plaintiff's favour.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—There it was not impossible to perform the marriage contract. The woman had the option of taking the man in spite of the illness; civil rights might be involved.]

If the apprentice cannot personally serve, he can pay damages. The plea is also bad in form. First, it ought to have averred that the illness arose after the making of the indenture and before breach. As it stands, the illness may have existed when the contract was made. Secondly, notice of the illness ought to have been given to the plaintiff, that he might elect to dissolve the contract. The contract has not been rescinded, and the defendant might still treat it as subsisting, and sue upon it—Cuckson v. Stones (1 El. & El. 248; 28 L. J. Q.B. 25); Harmer v. Cornelius (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 236; 28 L. J. C.P. 85). Thirdly, the plea ought to state what the illness is, that the Court may decide whether it is the act of God. It raises no certain issue for trial by jury. The illness may have been caused by the apprentice's own negligence.—See for instances of the "act of God," Story on Contracts, s. 752, New York Civil Code, p. 215, s. 727, Broom's Maxims, 227, and Pothier, Traité des Obligations, s. 142.

Thrupp, for the defendant.—The act of God has always been held an excuse for non-performance of a contract, e.g., where a covenant to leave a wood in the same plight if excused if the wind blows down trees—Sheppard's Touchstone, 173; Williams v. Lloyd (W. Jones, 179). In Hall v. Wright (27 L. J. Q.B. 345; in error, El. B. & El. 746; 29 L. J. Q.B. 43) impossibility to perform the contract was not alleged. Wightman, J., and Erle, J., in the Court below, and three Judges as against four in error, held the plea good without averring notice. Notice is here immaterial, since there is an implied condition that the apprentice continue capable. In Taylor v. Caldwell (3 Best & S. 834, 836; 32 L. J. Q.B. 166, 167), recognized in Appleby v. Meyers (36 L. J. C.P. 331; 2 L. R. C.P. 651), a contract in terms absolute was held subject to an implied condition "that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor"; and Blackburn, J., says, "In the ordinary form of an apprentice deed, the apprentice binds himself in unqualified terms to 'serve until the full end and term of seven years to be fully complete and ended,' during which term it is covenanted that the apprentice his master 'faithfully shall serve'; and the father of the apprentice, in equally unqualified terms, binds himself for the performance, by the apprentice, of all and every covenant on his part. It is undeniable that if the apprentice dies within the seven years, the covenant of the father that he shall perform his covenant to serve for seven years is not fulfilled; yet, surely it cannot be that an action would lie against the father. Yet the only reason why it would not is that he is excused because of the apprentice's death." There is no difference in principle between illness and death. The form of the plea is good, for it is pleaded to the whole of the breach, which it traverses in terms.

Tapping replied.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I think the defendant is entitled to judgment. This is an action on a covenant in an indenture of apprenticeship, by which the apprentice's father, since dead intestate, covenanted that the apprentice would honestly remain with the plaintiff, and serve him in the apprenticeship, during all the term for which he was bound. The breach alleges that the apprentice, after the making of the indenture, did not and would not honestly remain and serve during all the term. The plea, pleaded to the whole of the breach, avers that the apprentice was prevented by the act of God, namely, permanent illness, from remaining and serving all the term. Several objections were taken to the form of the plea, but I think they ought not to prevail. The substance of the plea is, that the apprentice was prevented from serving his time by permanent illness, which was occasioned by the act of God. The main question is, whether such an illness, so caused, is an answer to the plaintiff's claim for loss of the personal service of the apprentice. I think it is. The contract is for personal service, depending on the personal capacity of the apprentice, and obviously that may be prevented by his illness caused by the act of God, or by his death, also the act of God. It seems to me that it must be taken to have been in the contemplation of the parties that a prevention by the act of God should be an excuse for non-performance of the personal service of the apprentice. If there had been no authority on the subject, I should have thought that the parties intended it to be an obligatio certi corporis, that the contract was to be performed only if health and life continued to enable it to be performed. In such a contract it is implied that ability on the part of the apprentice to perform the contract is to continue. If the apprentice is placed by the act of God in such a state that he cannot perform the contract, the parties must be taken to have contemplated that, and no right to compensation should arise.

Taylor v. Caldwell (3 Best & S. 834, 836; 32 L. J. Q.B. 166, 167) seems to have been decided on the principle that where parties are contracting about a certain thing or person, there is an implied condition that the thing or person shall continue to exist in a state fit for the performance of the contract, and that if that state ceases to exist then the obligation ceases. Mr. Tapping relies on Hall v. Wright (27 L. J. Q.B. 345: in error, El. B. & El. 746; 29 L. J. Q.B. 43), but that case is distinguishable. It was a contract for marriage, and the defendant, though in a state of illness, might still have fulfilled his contract, and so have given the woman, so far as he could, the benefit of that contract. It rested with her to say whether she would take him as he was, or renounce the contract. The present case is different. I construe the plea to mean that the apprentice was unable to perform his service, and could not in any way fulfil his contract; whereas the man who contracted to marry could have performed that contract. This view renders it unnecessary to amend the plea by an averment that the plaintiff had notice of the apprentice's illness. The defence is good without that averment. If, however, Mr. Thrupp wishes to insert an averment of notice he can do so on payment of costs. The averment that the illness arose after the making of the indenture and before breach may be added to the plea at once without costs[1].

BRETT, J.—It was argued that this covenant was unconditional, and that though the apprentice was, by the act of God, prevented from fulfilling it, still the defendant must pay damages. If the first proposition, that the covenant was unconditional, could be maintained, then I think the second must follow. But the first is denied, on the principle that where from the nature of the contract the parties must have known that if certain circumstances arose it would be impossible to perform the contract, there, when those circumstances do arise, there is an excuse for non-performance. In such contracts an exception is implied, and I think this was such a contract. When, therefore, the impossibility is caused by the act of God, the exception applies and performance is excused. I further agree that this being the construction of the contract, notice to the plaintiff was unnecessary, and that an amendment as to notice should be made only on the payment of costs; but that the other amendment is necessary and should be made without costs. I also agree that Taylor v. Caldwell (3 Best & S. 834, 836; 32 L. J. Q.B. 166, 167) is an authority for the principle of this case.

to be assessed in a particular way, and be partly paid over to the Crown; by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxviii. a railway company was empowered to make a railway bridge over the Thames, but the works were not to be commenced without the consent of the conservators and their approval of the plans; the railway company obtained approval of the construction of the bridge as proposed, and thereupon erected the piers of their bridge in the bed of the river:—Held, that the conservators were entitled to have compensation assessed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which was incorporated as usual in the said Railway Act.

This was an action by the conservators of the river Thames against the Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company, on an award, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, of compensation for taking and injuriously affecting a portion of the bed and shore of the river Thames in constructing the bridge.

The first count of the declaration alleged the taking and injuriously affecting of the plaintiffs' land by the defendants for the purposes of their railway, the plaintiffs' right to compensation, and the occurrence of the various steps necessary to the assessment thereof by certain arbitrators under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; set forth an award by such arbitrators of 80*l.* as compensation for the defendants "having entered upon and taken, damaged and injuriously affected the said land and hereditaments, being portions of the bed, shore and soil of the river Thames"; and averred non-payment. The second count was based on the first, and claimed the costs of the arbitration and award.

The defendants pleaded, first, that the said portions of the said bed, shore and soil of the river Thames in the notice of the said conservators in the declaration mentioned were not entered upon, or taken, or damaged, or injuriously affected, nor were nor are the plaintiffs entitled to compensation in respect thereof within the meaning of the said Acts, in manner and form as in those behalfs in the declaration are alleged. Secondly, that the alleged taking and injuriously affecting the lands and hereditaments of the plaintiffs in the declaration mentioned consisted in the making by the defendants of a railway crossing the said river Thames by means of a bridge which the defendants were authorized to make and erect by the said Railway Act in the declaration mentioned, and in placing and making in certain parts of the bed and shore of the said river certain works and supports which were necessary for the construction and support of the said bridge and authorized by the said Railway Act. And the defendants say that before executing or commencing the said works, or any of them, in or upon any part of the bed or shore of the said river, they duly obtained the consent and permission in writing of the plaintiffs, signed by the secretary, pursuant to the provisions of the defendants' Railway Act and of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1857, in that behalf, for the performance by the defendants of the said works in the bed and shore of the said river, and the defendants in all respects performed the said works according to the said consent and permission, and not otherwise.

The plaintiffs took issue on these pleas, and demurred to the second.

At the trial, the following facts appeared. The statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., by section 50, vested the bed, soil and shores of the river Thames, within the flux and reflux of the tides, in the plaintiffs; by section 52, vested the conservancy of the said river in them; by sections 53, 56, 57, gave them power to license people to make embankments, docks and jetties, on payment of a fair and reasonable compensation; by section 54. prohibited the erection, &c. of any erection, building or works in or upon the bed or shore of the river Thames, or the driving of any piles therein without the conservators' permission; by section 58. provided that the consideration for the licences should be such as in the judgment of a person appointed in a specified way should be deemed the true and fair worth or value thereof to the person obtaining such licence, and that no such licence should be granted by the conservators without such previous valuation; and by sections 103. and 104. provided that the conservators should render an account to the Crown, and pay over one-third of the money received for such licences.

The statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxviii. (which enabled the defendants, amongst other things, to make the bridge) provided, by section 31, that the defendants should not execute or commence the execution of any work whatsoever upon the shore of the river Thames without the consent in writing of the conservators of the river Thames, signed by the secretary of the said conservators; by section 32, that the bridge to be erected for the purpose of carrying the railway across the river Thames should be executed according to a plan and elevation and upon a site to be approved by the conservators of the Thames, and deposited in their office; by section 34, that nothing in the Act should authorize the defendants to embark, encroach upon, or interfere with any part of the soil or bed of the river Thames, or the shore thereof, except according to such plan; and by section 35, that nothing in the Act should extend to prejudice or derogate from the estates, rights, interests, liberties, privileges or franchises of the conservators of the Thames, or to prohibit, defeat, alter or diminish any power, authority or jurisdiction which at the passing of the Act the conservators did or might lawfully claim, use and exercise.

The site of the bridge was included in the deposited plans and schedule. The piers of the bridge were erected on the bed of the river, and were erected without payment of and before claim for any compensation; but before the commencement of the works the defendants received the following letter from the plaintiffs' secretary:

"Thames Conservancy Offices,
"41, Trinity Square, Tower Hill, E.C., "August 10, 1858.

"Sir,—Having laid your letter of July 29 last before the conservators of the river Thames, together with a plan of the proposed railway bridge over the Thames for the Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company, I am directed to inform you the conservators have given their approval for the construction of the bridge as proposed. I am, Sir, &c.,

"E. BURSTAL.

"John Fowler, Esq., Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company."

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with leave to the defendants to move generally to enter a nonsuit or verdict for themselves, and a rule nisi having been obtained, it was arranged that the arguments of the rule and the demurrer should be taken together.

Prentice (Raymond with him) shewed cause and supported the demurrer.—The other side say that they can take the land without compensation, and that, at all events, the wrong mode of recovering it has been adopted. By 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. ss. 50, 52, 56, 58. the soil of the bed, foreshore and bank of the river is vested in the plaintiffs, and certain powers are given to them to consent to the erection of piers, &c., and the user of the banks, such consent, however, only to be granted on payment of compensation, which is to be assessed by a certain officer and to be accounted for, as the Crown has an interest therein. Then, by 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxviii. ss. 31, 32, 35, power is given to the defendants to make a bridge across the river on obtaining the consent of the plaintiffs to the works. This consent is merely with respect to the nature of the works, but as respects the taking of the land the plaintiffs are in the same position as other landowners, and, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, are entitled to compensation. It is said that the plaintiffs may give a licence for nothing, and have done so; and that even if the licence be not for nothing, yet an action on the licence is the proper remedy. Even if this were a licence under the Conservancy Act, it could not be granted for nothing, but, in truth, it has been only obtained under section 31 of the Railway Act, and is an approval merely of the works. By that Act the defendants cannot make the bridge without the plaintiffs' approval; but the plaintiffs' rights are not abridged, and they are entitled to compensation. This being so, the rule should be discharged, and the plaintiffs have judgment on the demurrer to the plea of consent under section 31.

J. Brown and J. O. Griffits, in support of the rule and demurrer.—Under the Conservancy Act there was no power to make a bridge, and it does not apply; the power to make a bridge is under the Railway Act, which allows it to be made on the plaintiffs' approval, and, as it would be a public benefit, it might well be intended that the plaintiffs might grant their consent for nothing, and, notwithstanding the various provisions in sections 21, 31, 32, 34. and 35. of this Act, there is not one word about compensation. It may be that the conservators might have asked for money for their consent, though obliged to give consent to proper works; but the defendants have got it without, and cannot now be asked to pay. Again, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, under which the plaintiffs acted, applies where land is not taken by agreement, but here it was; consent was given, and the land not taken adversely. Further, the plaintiffs must rely on the land being taken as well as injuriously affected within the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; for if only one be the case, compensation has been awarded as to a matter for which no compensation was due. Now, under the Conservancy Act, the plaintiffs are not ordinary landowners; the conservators are statutory owners only; and it is submitted that, looking to the various provisions of their Act, that they granted, and the defendants obtained, not the land, but only a statutory easement or right to put up the bridge, and if so, the award is bad.

KEATING, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The plaintiffs bring their action to recover the amount of compensation awarded them, by an award made under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in respect of the defendants "having entered upon and taken, damaged and injuriously affected portions of the bed, shore and soil of the river Thames." It appears that the plaintiffs are the conservators of the river Thames, and that by statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. the bed, soil and shore of the Thames were vested in them, and it is beyond dispute that the soil on which the piers of the bridge stand was theirs. Certain powers are given also to them for the protection of the nevigation and banks of the river, and authority under certain circumstances to grant persons licences to erect jetties, and take the banks on receiving compensation, and the proceeds are to be accounted for. This was so when the defendants obtained the Act of Parliament, which authorized them to make their railway and do that which the plaintiffs could not have done, viz., to build a bridge across the Thames. The bridge was not built by the licence of the plaintiffs, but by authority of the defendants' Railway Act, and that Act contains a clause similar to clauses generally inserted in other Acts, where there exists a public body to protect the navigation of any river which will be affected by the authorized works,—a clause which says that "the company shall not execute or commence the execution of any work whatsoever upon the shore of the river Thames . . . without the consent in writing of the conservators of the river Thames, signed by the secretary of the said conservators," that is to say, before the defendants executed their works on the soil taken, the mode of execution was to be approved of by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs gave a consent in the terms of this section, and it is said by the defendants that this consent was a licence to take the land, and that the plaintiffs therefore are not entitled to compensation. I am of opinion that the consent had no such effect, and I take the same view as that expressed by my brother Montague Smith in the case of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (37 L. J. C.P. 281). That case was a similar one to the present, and the same argument was there used. In that case the railway company had by their works injured a sewer belonging to the Board of Works, who claimed compensation under an award made under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the answer was that no right had been injured, and even if so, still the board had given a licence which deprived them of any right to compensation. The section under which the licence was there given was very similar to the one in the present case; it provided that "no building should be erected in, over or under any sewer vested in the Commissioners without the consent of the Commissioners first obtained in writing," a consent which had been obtained. As the majority of the Court there held that no right existed to be injured, and that therefore there was no right to compensation, there was no occasion for it to express an opinion on the second point; but as my Brother Montague Smith differed, he was therefore obliged to dispose of the question as to the effect of the consent, and as to this he says: "Again, it was rather suggested than relied on as a distinct point, that the approval of the plans for the railway works by the board was equivalent to a licence to execute them; but this cannot, I think, be so. The approval is not a voluntary licence by the board, but a condition imposed on the railway company. It would be the duty of the board not to refuse their approval of the plans if at the time they appeared to afford sufficient security to their own works; but such approval so given in compliance with the Act does not, as it seems to me, carry with it the consequence of a voluntary licence, so that if any damage is done to the works of the board in the execution of the plans the railway company are absolved from making compensation." So here, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to give consent if satisfied that the works were proper, and such consent does not interfere with the right to compensation. As owners of the freehold the plaintiffs were to part with it in consideration of a pecuniary recompense, and therefore there is nothing in their position to prevent them from recovering compensation. It has been said that they have not parted with the land, and that if it be only injuriously affected the award is bad. If this were so, the objection would be valid; but the land has been taken; it is contained in the schedule of the Act, and was taken under it; the consent had nothing to do with the land, but was only an approval of the nature of the works. Why, then, are not the plaintiffs to be entitled to recover compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act? The remedy given by that statute is incorporated, and is the proper remedy, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to compensation, and have taken the proper mode of recovering it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the rule should be discharged, and as the demurrer to the second plea depends on the same point there must also be judgment for the plaintiffs on the demurrer.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The railway company built the bridge on the land of the plaintiffs. They have taken the land for the piers, in the ordinary course of the construction of the railway, which is no greater public benefit than other railways, and the plaintiffs' property having been injured and taken, they are entitled to be compensated. Here the conservators of the Thames are the owners of the land and seek compensation; it is for the company to shew that the Act deprives them of it, and this the company has failed to do. It is admitted that the land is included in the plans and schedule deposited, and the Act gives the company power to take these lands. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act also is incorporated, and if the clauses of that Act stood alone the conservators clearly would have the same rights as other landholders; and they are so, unless there be some exception in the Acts which have been referred to in argument. It has been answered that the land is valueless, but there is no foundation for this, for the Conservancy Act shews, on the contrary, that it was considered valuable, inasmuch as power is given by sections 53, 56. and 57. to the conservators to grant licences to embark, make docks and erect piers; but that power is restricted by the condition that they are not to be granted without pecuniary compensation, to be assessed by a certain officer; there being an express provision in section 58 that no such licence shall be granted without a valuation being made by him. What then is there to shew that the railway company is to take the land without payment? I can find nothing. If so, the conservators, as owners, are entitled to the price. It is then said that the land was taken by agreement, and no price mentioned, and that therefore it was granted for nothing. This contention depends on sections 21 and 22 of 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxviii.; but it seems to me that they are consistent with our decision that the company is bound to pay. These clauses do not affect the compensation, but relate to the works; their object is to give to the public an additional security, and prevent the railway company from making the bridge over the Thames as they think fit; and the powers contained in them are analogous to the powers which have been inserted in other Acts, where the navigation of a river may be affected. The plaintiffs claimed in the double capacity of conservators of the river and owners of the soil; in the latter capacity they are entitled to compensation, in the former they have power to prevent an obstruction to the navigation. The main objections therefore fail. It is then said that the claim is not enforceable in this way, where there is consent; but what I have said is an answer to this; the consent has nothing to do with the land, and if compensation is contemplated by the legislature, it is more consistent to leave the amount to the machinery of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act than to the conservators alone. The defendants have failed therefore in all their contentions, and the plaintiffs are entitled to have this rule discharged, and to have judgment on the demurrer.

BRETT, J.—The action is on an award made under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and it is said that the plaintiffs are not entitled to succeed, first, because the matter is not within that Act; and secondly, because no compensation is due to them: the ground of the first contention being that the land was taken by agreement; of the second, that there was a consent to give the land without compensation. The whole of this argument seems to me to be based on a fallacious mixing up of the two characters of the plaintiffs, and of the consents in the two Acts of Parliament. The conservators became owners of the land by the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., and under the powers of that Act they were enabled to give licences and consents; but the consent in question was not given under this Act, and the whole matter depends on the Railway Act, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. cxviii. By this Act the railway company is authorized to take the land and build the bridge. The land is in the schedule; and, as landowners, the conservators, just as other landowners, have a right to take proceedings under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act to obtain compensation. But the conservators are also guardians of the navigation, and to protect it there are various sections (section 31. particularly,) which apply only to the mode of constructing the works, and it is provided that the works are not to be constructed on the land taken unless the conservators give their consent. This consent is not a consent to the taking of the land, but as to the mode of constructing the works. It is admitted that if the works are proper the conservators ought not to refuse that consent; and therefore this is the ordinary case of land not taken by consent, but by the Act, and if so the taking is subject to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which is to apply; and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to compensation. It follows that the rule must be discharged, and it equally follows that the demurrer must be decided in the plaintiffs' favour.

This was a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be allowed to tax his costs. The action was in tort. On October 5, 1867, the action was commenced; on November 29, 1867, the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 5*l.* damages (no certificate), with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for themselves; in Hilary Term, 1868, a rule was applied for, but stood over at the suggestion of the Court, and on May 1, 1868, the motion was abandoned. In that month an application was made at chambers by the plaintiff to be allowed to tax his costs; this application was refused by the Master, and, on appeal, by Lush, J., also, without prejudice to an application to the Court. But for the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, the plaintiff would have been entitled to his costs on the ground of concurrent jurisdiction.

Mangles shewed cause.—It is conceded that but for the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, the plaintiff would be entitled to costs, on the ground of concurrent jurisdiction. But the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128. and the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4. were repealed by section 33. of that Act, which was passed in August, 1867, and by section 36. came into force on January 1, 1868; and it is submitted that section 5. of that Act applies, and prevents the plaintiff from having his costs. The case of Wood v. Riley (37 L. J. C.P. 24) was relied on for obtaining the rule, but there the action was commenced before January 1, 1868, whilst Wood v. Hunt[1] is in point. The cases of Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89) and Butcher v. Henderson (37 L. J. Q.B. 133) were also referred to, but they do not apply here, because there the actions were commenced before August, 1867, and the only question was as to whether the Statute of Gloucester was repealed, just as was the case in Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325). The case of Morgan v. Thorn (7 Mee. & W. 400; 10 L. J. Ex. 125) is in the defendants' favour, and also shews that the reservation of leave does not affect the question.

Wright, in support of the rule.—In Wood v. Riley (37 L. J. C.P. 24), it was held that section 5. did not come into force till January 1, 1868.

[BOVILL, C.J.—That is quite consistent with its then affecting cases, in which the action is brought after the passing of the Act.]

The plaintiff would have got his costs if no leave had been reserved, and it is unfair that the defendants by having leave and obtaining a rule which they afterwards abandoned, should prevent the plaintiff from getting them. In Restall v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (37 L. J. Ex. 89), Kelly, C.B. speaks of "the verdict which entitled the plaintiff as matter of right," and here the verdict was before January 1, 1868.

[BOVILL, C.J.—That action was commenced before the Act was passed.]

In Mount v. Taylor (37 L. J. C.P. 325) the effect of the Act has been discussed.

[BOVILL, C.J.—That action, also, was commenced before the Act was passed.]

As to Morgan v. Thorn (7 Mee. & W. 400; 10 L. J. Ex. 125), the statute there in question speaks of the verdict of the jury, which is not the case here. The motion being abandoned, the plaintiff is remitted back to the verdict, and is entitled under the Statute of Gloucester, if not otherwise.

BOVILL, C.J.—This action was commenced after the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. was passed, and the question is, whether the case is within section 5. of that Act. If it is, the Statute of Gloucester is out of the question, because as to cases within section 5. it is repealed. Does this case, then, come within section 5? The Act came into operation on January 1, 1868, and then operated in those actions commenced after August 20, 1867; and there was no injustice in this, and it was not post facto legislation, because there was full notice as to what would happen on the Act coming into operation. The case is clearly within section 5, for the action was commenced after the Act was passed, and only 5*l.* was recovered, and that recovery was after January 1, 1868, for though the trial was in 1867, leave was reserved, so that there was no recovery then, and the recovery was after January 1, 1868. I am therefore of opinion that section 5. applies, and that the plaintiff is entitled to no costs.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The questions turns on when the recovery was. It is said it was on November 29, 1867, and, if there had been an absolute verdict, this would be so; but there was a conditional verdict—conditional on the plaintiff keeping it, which he did eventually, but after January 1, 1868. Our decision does not impeach Wood v. Riley (37 L. J. C.P. 24), for there the judgment was before January 1; here it was not. It is said that when the motion was abandoned, the verdict by relation must be taken to have been on November 29, 1867; but we should violate the Act if we held this.

BRETT, J.—It is first said that the case is not within the Act, because the recovery was before January 1, 1868; but it seems to me that there is no recovery, at all events till judgment can be signed, and it could not here have been signed till after that date, therefore the case is within the statute. Secondly, it is said, even if this be so, still section 5. is to be read as if it were "any action after the Act comes into operation." The proper construction, however, is that it is to apply to any case commenced after the passing of the Act; and Wood v. Hunt so decides.

Rule discharged, with costs.

Costs—County Court Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 5.—Action after Passing of Act.

Day moved that the plaintiff might have his costs.—The action, which was for a debt of 4*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, was brought after August 20 last, and judgment was signed on January 2 last, one day after the County Court Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 143, came into operation. According to Wood v. Riley (37 L. J. C.P. 24), it was submitted that section 5, which deprives a plaintiff of costs where the debt is under 20*l.* in actions brought after the passing of the Act, must mean after the Act has come into operation.

[Patch (amicus Curiæ) stated that the Court of Queen's Bench had refused, this term, to grant a plaintiff costs where the action was commenced on August 23 last, on the ground that the concurrent jurisdiction of the superior Court ceased to exist on January 1 last.]

This COURT (Bovill, C.J., Byles and Keating, JJ.) also refused to grant a rule, being of opinion that although, as decided in Wood v. Riley (37 L. J. C.P. 24), the Act did not come into operation until January 1, 1868, it then spoke from August 20, 1867.

Contract—Sale of Shares—Usage of Stock Exchange—Liability of Jobber to indemnify Vendor against Calls.

Stock Exchange. D. E.—The plaintiff being the holder of eighty shares in a joint-stock company, employed B. & Co., who were stock-brokers and members of the Stock Exchange, to sell them; and B. & Co. sold the shares on the Stock Exchange to the defendants, who were stock-jobbers and members of the Stock Exchange. It is the practice of the Stock Exchange for jobbers on the re-sale of stock or shares bought by them to give the name of the party from whom, together with the price at which they have bought, to the broker of the parties buying from them on a ticket used for that purpose; and when the time for completing the purchase with the original seller arrives, for the broker of any sub-vendee to hand the ticket on which he has inserted the name of such sub-vendee, together with the quantity of stock bought and the price, to the broker of the original seller, who thereupon makes out a transfer of the stock or shares from his principal, the seller, to the sub-vendee named in the ticket, and, having procured the execution by his principal hands over the transfer to the broker of the sub-vendee on receiving the price due to the original vendor, any difference in the price being accounted for in settlement between the jobbers and the brokers. By the usage of the Stock Exchange (as interpreted by the Court), the jobber claimed a right to transfer the shares and be free from liability on giving the name of a proper transferee, who accepted the transfer and paid the price; and it was admitted by the plaintiff that the defendants had a right to substitute their vendee for themselves, as the parties by whom the shares were to be purchased. The defendants having re-sold the shares, the brokers of the ultimate buyers, in conformity with the usual practice, transmitted to B. & Co., as brokers for the seller (the plaintiff), the accustomed tickets and the names of the buyers, whereupon B. & Co. prepared transfers to such buyers, procured them to be executed by the plaintiff, and, acting on behalf of and with the authority of the plaintiff, delivered the transfers to the brokers of the buyers, and received from them the price of the shares; while, on the other hand, the brokers of the buyers received and accepted the transfers on behalf of their clients. The buyers did not, however, execute the transfers, or register themselves as shareholders, and were precluded from the possibility of registering, inasmuch as almost immediately after the transfer of the shares a petition was presented for winding up the company, and, an order to that effect having been made, the further registration of new shareholders became impossible. The plaintiff, thus remaining the registered holder of the shares, was compelled to pay a call made subsequently to the transfer; and the question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified by the defendants:—Held, that there was nothing unreasonable in the usage; that the plaintiff was in the dilemma that he must stand either on the contract of sale apart from the usage, in which case, having parted with his shares for a price, he could not perform his contract by a transfer to the defendants, or on the contract together with the usage, in which case, by the usage, having accepted the price from the transferees, he had released the defendants; that, as this was a case in which the contract was not sought to be repudiated but to be enforced, the defendants could only be made liable to the extent to which they had consented to be bound, that is to say, they could only be bound by the contract as qualified by the usage; that even if the defendants had only tendered persons able and willing to pay for and accept the shares the contract would have been fulfilled; but that, at all events, as the plaintiff had transferred the shares to other persons, he could not enforce the obligations of the contract against the defendants; and that he, therefore, was not entitled to be indemnified.

This was a SPECIAL CASE, in substance raising the question whether, under the circumstances disclosed, the plaintiff, who had sold shares to the defendants, was entitled to be indemnified by them against future calls. The Court of Common Pleas had decided that they were, and that decision was now appealed against. The case will be found fully set forth in the report of the case below, 37 L. J. C.P. 89.

The plaintiff, being the holder of eighty shares in the incorporated company of Overend, Gurney & Co. (Limited), employed certain persons named Barry & Co., who were brokers and members of the Stock Exchange, to effect a sale of the shares. Barry & Co. sold the shares on the Stock Exchange to the defendants, who were jobbers and members of the Stock Exchange. It is the practice of the Stock Exchange for jobbers, on the re-sale of stock or shares bought by them, to give the name of the party from whom, together with the price at which they have bought, to the broker of the parties buying from them, on a ticket used for that purpose; and, when the time for completing the purchase with the original seller arrives, for the broker of any sub-vendee to hand the ticket on which he has inserted the name of such sub-vendee, together with the quantity of stock bought and the price, to the broker of the original seller, who thereupon makes out a transfer of the stock or shares from his principal, the seller, to the sub-vendee named in the ticket, and having procured the execution by his principal, hands over the transfer to the broker of the sub-vendee, on receiving the price due to the original vendor, any difference in the price being accounted for in settlement between the jobbers and the brokers. The defendants having re-sold the shares, the brokers of the ultimate buyers in conformity with the usual practice, transmitted to Barry & Co., as brokers for the seller, the plaintiff, the accustomed tickets and the names of the buyers, whereupon Barry & Co. prepared transfers to such buyers, procured them to be executed by the plaintiff, and, acting on behalf of, and with the authority of the plaintiff, delivered the transfers to the brokers of the buyers, and received from them the price of the shares; while, on the other hand, the brokers of the buyers received and accepted the transfers on behalf of their clients. The buyers did not, however, execute the transfers, or register themselves as shareholders, and, in fact, were precluded from the possibility of registering, inasmuch as, almost immediately after the transfer of the shares, a petition was presented for winding up the company, and an order to that effect having been made, the further registration of new shareholders became impossible; and the plaintiff, thus remaining the registered holder of the shares, was compelled to pay a call made subsequently to the transfer.

The case also set forth evidence of a usage of the Stock Exchange exonerating the defendants from liability, as to the construction and admissibility of which there was much dispute;—the time at which, and circumstances under which, by the usage, the jobber became exonerated, and the reasonableness and binding effect on strangers thereof, being all subjects of contention, although there was no dispute as to the right of the defendants to substitute their vendees for themselves.

Mellish (Macnamara with him), for the appellants.—The question relates to the respective liabilities of jobbers on the Stock Exchange and transferees of shares who have never executed the transfer, and is, whether the transferor is entitled to an indemnity from the jobbers; and it is submitted that he is not. A jobber is a person who buys and sells for the convenience of others, and has a commission. The broker of an intended purchaser or seller goes to him and simply asks the price; the jobber gives it, and is then told whether the broker desires to buy or sell. Inasmuch, however, as there may be a vast number of transactions in the same kind of shares on the Stock Exchange, the practice is for a member only to receive or give the difference between the number of shares bought and sold by him and any other member, the object being to get matters settled; and without an arrangement of this kind the jobbers and brokers could never do their business, certainly not complete it by the settlement-day. The method adopted to carry out this arrangement is this: the broker of the ultimate transferee of the shares (which may have passed through various hands) issues a ticket, with the name of the transferee, and the price at which he bought, and his own name as broker, and hands it over to the jobber from whom he bought; and it is then passed on till it reaches the broker who originally sold, the differences of price being settled between the various brokers and jobbers. By two o'clock on the same day the jobber who has bought from the first seller must give this ticket to the broker of that seller, who draws out a contract, inserts the name of the transferee, and what the transferee has to pay (which does not matter, as he settles the difference with the jobber), gets it executed within ten days by his client, and takes it to the broker of the transferee, who pays the price mentioned.—[To substantiate these statements, the learned counsel read the Rules, set forth at the end of the judgments (38 L. J. C.P. page 20).] The question is, if the transferee never executes, is the jobber or the intended transferee liable to indemnify the transferor for the consequences? And the question resolves itself into this, at what stage is the jobber discharged from liability? It is said, on the other side, that, till the transferee executes, there is no privity of contract between him and the transferor; but the answer is that the agent of the transferee, in effect, says he is willing to stand in the place of the jobber, if the transferor will accept him, for the original ticket is issued by the transferee's agent, and then by his agent the first seller acts on this offer by making out a transfer and delivering it to the transferee's agent, who takes it and pays the money. This being so, though it is impossible to say the jobber is released till the transferee is fixed to the transferor, it is equally impossible to say that the transferee is not fixed and the jobber released. A. transfers to B, B. to C, and by agreement between the parties A. accepts C; that is the whole matter, with the exception that here it is a part of the original contract that this shall be the case. In this particular case, instead of going through the whole transaction, a balance was struck; but that makes no difference, and, indeed, is part of the custom. The transferee having been accepted, and having paid through his agent, how can it be said that he is not liable to the transferor till he has executed? As to what has been said below about this being unreasonable, if the action were against the present plaintiff on the contract made by his agent, it might perhaps be open to him to repudiate, on the ground that he never authorized an unreasonable condition; but when he sues on it, he must take it as he finds it. The actual contract was verbal, and, according to common sense, must have been meant to be carried out by the rules; that clearly was meant. There is no necessity for the appellants to rely on a particular custom; they need not rely on what was actually done and the legal result of that. The legal result of what was done is to exonerate the jobber and bind the transferees. On looking to the authorities, it will be found that they are in the appellant's favour. It was settled in Walker v. Bartlett (18 Com. B. Rep. 845; 25 L. J. C.P. 156, 263) that where a transferee does not get registered he is liable to indemnify the transferor against calls, and that case shews that the liability depends on the transfer by the transferor. In Shaw v. Fisher (1 Jur. N.S. 971; 5 De Gex, M. & G. 596) a sub-purchaser's name was sent in and a transfer made to him; and it was held that the old privity was at an end and a new privity created, and the sub-purchaser liable; and that case is particularly valuable, because, the sale being by auction and not on the Stock Exchange, it shews there is liability apart from any custom. In Hawkins v. Maltby (37 L. J. Ch. 58) the judgment shews that the acceptance of the transfer and retention of the deed is sufficient evidence of a contract between the seller and sub-purchaser, and entitles the former to be indemnified by the latter. In Sheppard v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948; Irish Rep. 1 Eq. 490, below), on appeal, and in Hodgkinson v. Kelly (16 W. R. 1078) the transfer was accepted and payment made by the broker, who gave the name of the transferee; and it was held that the transferee was liable to indemnify the transferor. In none of these cases was there any execution by the transferee, but it was still held that there was a privity of contract between him and the transferor, and that the jobber was freed from liability. The case of Coles v. Bristowe (37 L. J. Ch. 737) will be relied on by the other side; but when that case was decided, there were both this case of Grissell v. Bristowe (37 L. J. C.P. 89) and also Sheppard v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948; Irish Rep. 1 Eq. 490, below) in the Irish Courts, which decided that the jobber was not released; but since then Sheppard v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948; Irish Rep. 1 Eq. 490, below) has been reversed, this case is now being argued on appeal, and Coles v. Bristowe (37 L. J. Ch. 737) has been argued on appeal, and time taken to consider[1].

J. Brown (Llanyon with him), for the respondent.—The shares were sold in the first instance to the jobber on his own account, and all the cases shew that a liability to indemnify follows. The usage that the jobber's liability is to cease on his giving a proper substitute who accepts and executes, is comprehensible; but the usage set up in the Court below was, that the jobber was discharged on merely giving a name, and the judgment of the majority of the Court was based on this, and not on there being an acceptance. The important question in this case is, whether some one else has become liable. The onus of shewing this is on the other side, and it ought to be shewn clearly; and as there is nothing distinctly to shew that the plaintiff had a good right of action against any other person, the jobbers must be held to continue liable; and the course taken in the Court below shews that the question of acceptance was never intended to be insisted on. Now, assume that the brokers acted with the authority of the transferees, and that the latter can be said to have accepted, yet the jobber's liability is not at an end; there is no substituted contract. By the rules of the Stock Exchange and the authorities, until the transferee executes the jobber remains liable. The respondent is not interested in disputing that the jobber does not remain liable longer than that. The contract of the seller is to sell to the jobber and transfer to him or his nominee; that of the buyer is to buy of the jobber and take transfers. And when matters are completed, only the original contracts are carried out, and no new privity is created. And there is no case of an action by the original seller against the ultimate transferee having been held to lie; for Sayles v. Blane (14 Q.B. Rep. 204; 19 L. J. Q.B. 19), the only case at all bearing on this, turned on the form of pleadings. The cases which have been cited are equity cases, and the Courts of equity interfere because a relation of trustee and cestui que trust is created, and also because equity considers what ought to be done as done. Further, in all the equity cases the authority of the broker was clearly shewn, and those cases only shew that then the Courts of equity on equitable grounds will compel a performance, and, at the most, that the plaintiff has a right to an equity suit. The consequence of the doctrine of the other side is this, that a man may find that instead of one action of law, he has several Chancery suits. Again, the sub-contracts may be at different prices, and though the seller gets the price, he does not usually get it all from the ultimate buyer; and though it matters not from whom he gets the money, yet this has an important bearing on the question of whether there be a transferor of the contract, or a new contract. Rule 79. shews that the original buyer is responsible for the price, and rules 84. and 90. shew that the parties regard the profits and liabilities as belonging to the purchaser from the time of the first purchase. And by the articles of association the execution by the transferor and transferee is necessary to compel registration, and till then the transferor is to be liable, and thus there is only a right to have the property, not a transfer of the property. By the execution of both parties, it is admitted that a new contract arises between the transferor and transferee, but the cases go no further than that. In Shaw v. Fisher (1 Jur. N.S. 971; 5 De Gex, M. & G. 596) it may be doubted if the ultimate transferee did not execute. In Torrington v. Lowe (17 W. R. 78) it was decided that the liability of the original buyer was gone when the transferor and ultimate transferee executed, because there a privity arose between those two. In Evans v. Wood (37 L. J. Ch. 159) both executed, and the money was paid, and therefore it was decided that a privity arose. These cases shew that there is a privity then, and it now will be shewn that till then there is none. In Sheppard v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948; I. R. 1 Eq. 490, below), though there was payment with authority, there was no execution, and the Vice-Chancellor held there was no privity, and in the Court above the one Judge declines to say that an action would lie, but says a relation of trustee and cestui que trust is constituted, whilst the other Judge, who, no doubt, uses expressions in favour of the other side, really decides only that an equitable contract exists. In Coles v. Bristowe (37 L. J. Ch. 737) the Vice-Chancellor says that even apart from Grissell v. Bristowe (37 L. J. C.P. 89) he should have come to the same conclusion, and in Hodgkinson v. Kelly (16 W. R. 1078) the Master of the Rolls goes far beyond anything which had been previously decided, and his judgment is open to much criticism, but even he does not dissent from the decision of this case of Grissell v. Bristowe (37 L. J. C.P. 89) in the Court below. Hawkins v. Maltby (37 L. J. Ch. 58), no doubt, is against the respondent, but that is the only case. Lastly, the form of the contract shews that it is one intended to be executed by both parties, and till then it is only inchoate.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[2] was delivered, on December 3, by COCKBURN, C.J.—This is an action founded on an implied agreement by the defendants that on the sale by the plaintiff to them, or to such other person or persons as they should name, of certain shares in the incorporated joint-stock company of Overend, Gurney & Co., Lim., and the transfer of such shares to them or their nominees, they, or such nominees, would accept the same, and cause them to be registered in the names of the defendants, or of such nominees, as the owner or owners of the shares.

The shares having been transferred to the nominees of the defendants, but such nominees having omitted to execute the transfers, or to cause themselves to be registered as the owners, and the plaintiff thus remaining the registered holder of the shares and having been compelled to pay a call since made, he now brings his action against the defendants to be indemnified in respect of the payment so made. The defendants deny ever having entered into any such implied agreement, and deny their liability in respect of it.

The case is one of considerable importance as regards dealings on the Stock Exchange on the sale of stocks and shares; but when the facts are duly appreciated, and seen in their true light, the case does not appear to us to present any serious difficulty. The facts essential to the decision of the case may be briefly stated.

The plaintiff, being the holder of eighty shares in the incorporated company of Overend, Gurney & Co., Lim., employed Barry & Co., stock-brokers on the Stock Exchange, to effect a sale of the shares. Barry & Co. sold the shares on the Stock Exchange to the defendants, who are what are there called "jobbers,"—that is to say, persons who buy stocks and shares on the Stock Exchange, not for the purpose of investment or speculation, but for that of immediate sale at a slight advance of price to persons wanting to buy, making a profit by what is termed the turn of the market. It is the practice of the Stock Exchange for jobbers, on the re-sale of stock or shares bought by them, to give the name of the party from whom, together with the price at which, they have bought, to the brokers of the parties buying from them, on a ticket used for that purpose. When the time for completing the purchase with the original seller arrives, the broker of any sub-vendee hands the ticket, on which he has inserted the name of such sub-vendee, together with the quantity of stock bought and the price, to the broker of the original seller, who thereupon makes out a transfer of the stock or shares from his principal, the seller, to the sub-vendee named on the ticket, and having procured the execution by his principal, hands over the transfer to the broker of the sub-vendee on receiving the price due to the original vendor, any difference in the price being accounted for on settlement between the jobber and the brokers. By this means the last purchaser obtains the shares at the price he has agreed to pay, and the seller, as he parts with his shares, receives the price at which he has sold. The transaction is frequently multiplied by intermediate sales, often at varying prices, of all which the particulars are entered on the ticket, but the result is the same. In the end the transaction becomes one which is to be carried out between the last vendee and the original seller, as though such vendee had purchased immediately of such seller.

Thus far both parties appear to be agreed. The plaintiff admits that the defendants had a right to substitute their vendees for themselves as the parties to whom the shares were to be transferred. But the question between them is as to how far a jobber under such circumstances becomes released from the obligations of his contract with the seller—a question which becomes all-important when the further facts connected with the case are detailed.

These facts are as follows: The defendants having re-sold the shares, the brokers of the ultimate vendees, in conformity with the usual practice, transmitted to Barry & Co., as brokers for the seller, the accustomed tickets with the names of the buyers; whereupon the plaintiff's brokers prepared transfers to such buyers, and procured them to be executed by the plaintiff, after which, acting on behalf of the plaintiff, and as we must, in the absence of anything to the contrary, assume, with the authority of the plaintiff, delivered the transfers to the brokers of the transferees, and received from them the price of the shares, while on the other hand, the brokers of the buyers received and accepted the transfers on behalf of their clients. There is nothing to lead us to suppose that the transaction, as regards the nomination of the proposed transferees by the defendants, or the acceptance of the transfers and payment of the price by the brokers, was not in all respects bonâ fide and regular, or that all that was done by the latter was not done in the ordinary course of their business as brokers acting for real and responsible parties. The transferees did not, however, execute the transfers, or register themselves as shareholders; indeed, they were precluded from the possibility of registering, inasmuch as, almost immediately after the transfer of the shares, a petition was presented for winding-up the company, and, an order to that effect having been made, the further registration of new shareholders became impossible. The plaintiff, thus remaining the registered holder of the shares, has been compelled to pay a call made subsequently to the transfer, and it is to be indemnified in respect of such payment that he brings this action.

That he is entitled to be indemnified in respect of such payment is undoubted: the question is, whether he is entitled to be thus indemnified by the defendants. We are of opinion that he is not.

It appears plain that the questions as to how far the defendants are absolved from their contract by the substitution of the parties to whom the shares have actually been transferred must depend on the usage, and its effect on the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants for the purchase of these shares.

It is admitted that, at least to some extent, the usage must be taken as having been imported into and governing the contract. The action is not brought against the defendants for a breach of contract in not accepting and paying for the shares. It is based on the admission that the defendants were at liberty to substitute other parties in their place as buyers, and on the assumption that it was an implied condition of the right to substitute others as buyers, that the defendants should guarantee that the parties thus substituted should, even after they had been accepted by the plaintiff, the seller, fulfil all the obligations and liabilities incidental to the original contract. We have consequently an admitted departure from the ordinary incidents of a contract of sale, such as would have attached on a contract for the sale of shares if effected outside the walls of the Stock Exchange. The action is, therefore, based on the contract of sale as qualified by the usage of the Stock Exchange, and we can therefore deal with it only according to the usage, as it is to be collected from the case before us, and as it is applicable to and incorporated with the contract. Admitting this to a certain extent, the plaintiff contends that the right of the defendants, as arising from the usage, is simply to have the shares transferred, under the original contract, to their nominees instead of to themselves, leaving them still liable to all the obligations of the original contract till these shall have been discharged by those to whom, by any sub-contract, they may have transferred their rights. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that, by the usage, they, as jobbers, are not only entitled, on nominating at the appointed time substitutes prepared and willing to accept the transfers and pay the price, to have the shares transferred to those substitutes, but that, on such acceptance and payment by the latter, they, the jobbers, become entirely released from all further liability on their contract to the seller.

Such being the conflict between the parties, it is necessary to see what the usage is, as it is to be gathered from the statement of the case before us. Now, on turning to the evidence as to the usage, we find no trace of any such limited or qualified usage as that for which the plaintiff contends, or of any such indemnity as that on which he insists. On the contrary, the evidence is, that when the nominee of the jobber has paid the price of the shares all further liability on the part of the jobber, the original buyer, is at an end. The sum and substance of the usage, as we collect it, after a careful consideration of the statement in the case, may be thus stated: It appears that in transactions between members of the Stock Exchange there is an implied understanding that on the purchase of stock the jobber shall be at liberty by a given day, commonly called "the name-day," to substitute, if he is able to do so, another party or parties as buyers, and so relieve himself from further liability on the contract, provided that such party or parties be persons to whom the seller cannot reasonably except, and that such party or parties accept the transfer of the shares, and pay the price agreed on between the seller and the jobber—in other words, become the buyers of the shares at the price originally agreed on. This appears to us to be the true statement of the usage.

It was, indeed, contended by Mr. Brown, with a view to shew that the usage was an unreasonable one, and therefore not binding in the absence of express agreement—or on anyone not being a member of the Stock Exchange, and not being aware of the usage—that the alleged usage was that the jobber was to be at liberty to recede from the contract and be exonerated from all further liability in respect of it on giving the name or names of any proposed transferee or transferees, as prepared to pay the price, though such transferees might be of insufficient ability to insure to the seller the performance of the obligations of the contract. But we are of opinion that the statement of the usage in the case must receive a reasonable intendment, and be understood as claiming for the jobber a right to transfer the contract and claim exemption from liability in respect of it, only on his giving the name of a buyer to whom the seller has no reasonable ground to object. And we are further of opinion, from the particulars of the usage, as stated in the case, that it is only when the nominee or nominees of the jobber have paid for the shares—in other words, have accepted the transfer and placed themselves in the position of buyers and taken upon themselves the obligations of the contract—that the jobber is held to be released. The usage being thus ascertained, the result appears to us to be fatal to the plaintiff's case.

On the part of the plaintiff, it is assumed that the right of a jobber purchasing shares under the usage is limited to the right of having the shares transferred to his nominees; and, starting from this assumption, it is contended, as matter of law, that the execution of the transfer to such nominees is merely a fulfilment of the contract with the jobber, and creates no privity of contract with the transferee, and no discharge of the jobber from all the obligations of the contract. But this mode of dealing with the question is to convert into matter of law that which is properly matter of fact. If it turns out, in point of fact, that by virtue of the usage the defendants were entitled, on producing a competent buyer, to withdraw from all the obligations of the contract, it follows that, the contract having been founded on the usage, as the defendants have produced buyers who have paid the price and accepted the shares, the case of the plaintiff fails. It is, however, said, as a reason why the plaintiff should not be bound by the usage,—first, that the usage is unreasonable, inasmuch as it deprives the seller of his hold on the first buyer, the jobber, a known and responsible person, and substitutes for the latter a party whom may be unknown and possibly insufficient; and, secondly, that the plaintiff was not aware of its existence. As regards the latter position, independently of the question as to how far the knowledge of the plaintiff's agents, the brokers, would not, in point of law, be the knowledge of the plaintiff, we should be prepared to draw the inference as one of fact, looking to the circumstance of the plaintiff having accepted the nominees of the defendants, having received the price from them, and having executed the transfers to them without any reference to the defendants, that he either knew of the usage beforehand, or, at all events, was made aware of it afterwards, and, having become aware of it, ratified the contract as made by his agents. It is, however, unnecessary, in the view we take of the case, to enter further into this question.

As regards the alleged unreasonableness of the usage, the ground suggested by the counsel for the plaintiff appears to us altogether untenable. There can be nothing unreasonable, any more than unlawful, in a person to whom it is proposed to purchase a particular thing saying, "I will agree to buy, provided that if when the time for completing the contract arrives it should suit me to substitute another buyer able and willing to take my place and perform the contract I shall be at liberty to do so." What would not be unreasonable in a single buyer would not be so in a class of persons dealing in a particular commodity, and if, from a long series of dealings, a habit or usage of always dealing on such an understanding, even when not expressed, should become established, such a usage would no more be unreasonable than such a stipulation would be if introduced expressly into each particular contract. Besides, a usage founded on a general convenience of all parties engaged in a particular department of business can never be said to be unreasonable. Now, the intervention of jobbers in these transactions is obviously for the advantage both of sellers and buyers, who are thus brought readily into contact. And there is no hardship or injustice on the seller in the substitution of another buyer. All that the seller desires is to find a customer who will pay the price, accept the shares, and relieve him from all further liability in respect of them. If a buyer is found as to whom the seller's broker is satisfied, the seller has all that he has sought for. In practice, no seller employing a broker to sell stock or shares for him thinks of limiting the authority of the broker to selling exclusively to a jobber. He is satisfied with the buyer whom the broker finds for him, and for the obvious reason that he has it in his own power, by reasonable diligence on the part of himself or his broker, to protect himself against loss. He need not part with his shares till the price is paid and the instrument of transfer is executed by the buyer. He may insist on the registration of the shares being made in the name of the new buyer as part of the transaction. On the other hand, it would certainly be a considerable hardship on the jobber if, for the small profit realized on the re-sale of stock or shares, he were to be held responsible in respect of any non-fulfilment of any part of the contract when the matter has passed out of his hands by the seller assenting to complete the transaction with the substituted buyer, or for loss occasioned, as in the present instance, by the laches of the seller in parting with the shares without insisting on the execution of the transfers by the party to whom he transfers them. Far, therefore, from being unreasonable, the usage appears to us to be fair and equitable with reference to the interests of all parties concerned.

But there is another, and a more conclusive answer to the objection thus urged against the usage. As has been already pointed out, the plaintiff, in taking his present ground of action, admits that the contract on which he sues was based on the usage, of which, as he alleges, the right of indemnity claimed constitutes a part. But the plaintiff, if he adopts the usage as forming part of the contract, must take it in its entirety—for better or worse; he cannot claim the benefit of it so far as it suits his purpose and reject the rest. He is in this dilemma—either he must take his stand on the contract of sale independently of the usage, in which case, having parted with the shares for a price, he would be unable to perform his part of the contract in transferring them to the defendants; or he must take the contract as incorporating the usage,—in which case, by the effect of the usage, having accepted the price of the shares from the transferees, he has released the defendants. There is another view of the case, to which, it seems to us, sufficient prominence has scarcely been given, and which is equally fatal to the plaintiff's claim. It is necessary to consider, as lying at the very foundation of the case, what was the contract to which the the defendants assented to become bound; for, however unreasonable the terms on which a contracting party may insist, he cannot be bound by a contract except so far as he has assented and agreed to its terms. The plaintiff may have known nothing of the usage of the Stock Exchange; his broker may have acted contrary to or exceeded his authority; the contract may have been one which the plaintiff, if so minded, might have been justified in repudiating: but when the contract is sought to be enforced against the defendants their liability can only be carried to the extent to which they consented to be bound. Now, it is not denied, and must be taken as an admitted fact, that the plaintiff's brokers and the defendants dealt with one another and entered into this contract on the footing of the usage in force on the Stock Exchange. The defendants can, therefore, only be bound by the contract as qualified by the usage; they are entitled to any immunity which the usage affords, and the extent of their liability must be determined by reference to the usage. Now, according to the usage, as stated in the case, the defendants were only bound to find a party, or parties, able and willing to stand in their place, and discharge the obligations of their contract, or, in the alternative, to fulfil the contract themselves. But the first of these alternatives the defendants have in fact performed. They have found parties able to perform the contract, and who, by accepting the transfers, have assented to stand in the position of buyers, and have bound themselves to the performance of all the remaining obligations of the contract. While, therefore, we agree that the defendants would not have satisfied the exigency of the contract as qualified by the usage by merely giving in the names of parties able to carry out the contract, unless those parties had placed themselves under the same obligations as they themselves were under; yet, as soon as they produced persons who paid the price and accepted the transfers, and thereby took upon themselves the ulterior liabilities of the contract, they had done all which, according to the contract, they undertook to do. If, then, the case had rested here, and all that appeared had been that the defendants had tendered parties able and willing to pay for and accept the shares, we should have been prepared to hold that the defendants had satisfied the contract they had entered into, and were exonerated from further liability. But, in the present instance, the case is infinitely stronger in their favour, for it appears that on receiving the names of the proposed sub-vendees, according to the accustomed course, the plaintiff's brokers prepared transfers to the proposed nominees, got those transfers, so filled up, executed by the plaintiff, received the price from the brokers of the transferees, and thereupon handed over the transfers. Now, by so doing, it is obvious that the plaintiff has for ever deprived himself of the power of transferring the shares to the defendants. Yet it was in consideration of having the property in the shares—which must always be assumed to have some value—conveyed to them in the event of their nominees not fulfilling their obligations as buyers that the defendants assented to be bound to the obligations of the contract. When, therefore, the plaintiff has, by his own act, put it out of his power to give to the defendants the consideration which formed the basis of the contract, and has transferred that benefit to another, it would obviously be unreasonable and unjust that he should be at liberty to enforce the obligations the consideration for which entirely fails. It is said, indeed, on behalf of the plaintiff, that in transferring the shares to the nominees of the defendants, the plaintiff has only acted on the original contract with the defendants to transfer the shares to such persons as they should appoint, leaving them responsible for the performance by the transferees of all the obligations of the buyer. In this view we are unable to concur. In our opinion the contract, as interpreted by the usage, was that the defendants, the first buyers, were to be at liberty to transfer the contract, with all its rights and obligations, to any sufficient buyers who would take it upon them with all its incidents. When, therefore, the seller adopted the substituted parties as the buyers, and the price was paid by the one and the property transferred by the other, a contract and the relation of vendor and vendees immediately arose between them. In this view alone could the seller be entitled to a specific performance of the contract by the transferees in the execution of the transfers and a registration of the shares, or an indemnity in respect of calls—a right which was held to exist by the Court of Appeal in Equity in Ireland in the case of Sheppard v. Murphy (16 W. R. 948; I. R. 1 Eq. 490), the circumstances of which were precisely similar to the present—a right which it seems impossible to doubt the seller would have against the transferees under the circumstances, and as to which it is only necessary to say that we entirely concur in the reasoning and conclusion of Lord Justice Christian, in the case referred to, and to which it seems to us impossible to add anything with advantage. But, assuming even that the view of the original contract contended for on the part of the plaintiff is correct, and that the defendants, the intermediate buyers, were bound to indemnify the seller against any loss by reason of the non-performance by the ultimate buyers of any part of the contract; still, this, like any other contract of indemnity, can only attach where the position of the party against whom it is sought to be enforced has not been unnecessarily deteriorated by the acts or laches of the party who seeks to enforce it. Now, here, the plaintiff by parting with the property in the shares, has obviously deprived the defendants of the alternative to which they were undoubtedly entitled, of themselves taking the shares and performing the contract. He has, by his own laches, in parting with the transfers, without insisting on the execution of them by the transferees, enabled the latter to obtain an advantage to which they were not entitled, by enabling them to acquire a property in the shares without fulfilling the obligations which ought, in the ordinary course of dealing, to have accompanied the transfer—an undue advantage as against the defendants, as well as against the seller, inasmuch as it took from the transferees the motives for fulfilling the ulterior obligations of the contract. It is by the act of the plaintiff himself that the state of circumstances of which he complains has been brought about—a state of circumstances, to which, as it seems to us, the implied indemnity relied on can by no reasonable intendment be held to apply.

In no point of view, therefore, in which the case can be looked at, can, in our opinion, the decision of the Court below be upheld; and our judgment, therefore, reversing that of the Court of Common Pleas, must be for the defendants.

KELLY, C.B.—I am desirous of adding a few words to the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, in every part of which I entirely concur, and the observation I wish to make is this: that when the practical effect of this usage or mode of dealing on the Stock Exchange comes to be considered it will be found that there is no hardship or injustice in it as regards the interests of the public, but the contrary. In the great majority of transactions which occur, the solvency or responsibility of the nominee or ultimate buyer is a matter of indifference to the seller; for when the settling-day arrives, the seller transfers and the buyer pays the price, or if he make default it is at once paid by the jobber, and the transaction is closed. It is only upon a sale of shares in a joint-stock company, with an unpaid-up capital, and of which the solvency is doubtful, or which (as was the case with Overend & Gurney at the time of the contract in question) has actually stopped payment, that it concerns the seller to ascertain that the ultimate buyer is a responsible man; and this he has an opportunity of doing under the regulations of the Stock Exchange. And surely there is nothing unreasonable or unjust in subjecting to whatever degree of trouble and risk may attend such a transaction the seller of shares, which are often worse than valueless, which he is glad to part with at an almost nominal price, or at a premium paid to the buyer for taking them, and which have become the symbols not of a title to profits and dividends, but of a liability to losses and calls. On the other hand, this practice affords to the public the very great advantage of being enabled, by means of a stockbroker and a jobber, to buy or to sell at any moment any quantity of stock, or any number of any description of shares, at the market price of the day, and concluding the transaction at the latest on the settling-day; whereas, without such practice, every one having any given amount of stock, English, foreign or colonial, or of debentures, or shares in railways or other joint-stock companies to buy or to sell must wait till a seller or a buyer could be found to sell or to buy the exact quantity of stock or shares which is to be parted with or acquired—a state of things which in this country, where some hundreds of these purchases and sales are effected every day, would be found intolerable, and would speedily demand a remedy than which no better could be devised than this practice, so long established, and which has never until now been called in question.

Judgment reversed.

Note.—The following Rules of the Stock Exchange in force at the time of sale, having in the present argument been referred to as important by counsel, it is thought advisable to insert them here, as they were omitted in the report below as unnecessary to it.—

Fulfilment of Bargains.—Legal Proceedings.

49. The Stock Exchange does not recognize in its dealings, any other parties than its own Members: every bargain, therefore, whether for account of the Member effecting it, or for account of a Principal, must be fulfilled according to the Regulations and usages of the House; and should a Principal, without the consent of the Committee, attempt to enforce by law a claim against a Member of the Stock Exchange, the Committee will decide as to the liability of the Broker or Agent of such Principal for any cost or damages incurred in consequence of legal proceedings.

Rules applicable to Shares and Stock of Public Companies.

81. Bargains in shares or stock, when no time is specified, and bargains made before twelve o'clock on name days, shall be considered to be made for the existing account.

82. The Committee will not take cognizance of any bargain in stocks or shares effected for a period beyond the end of the ensuing two accounts.

83. An offer to buy or sell an amount of shares or stock at a price named, is binding as to any part thereof, that may be a marketable quantity; and an offer to buy or sell shares or stock, when no amount is named, is binding to the amount of Ten shares, if in value under 500*l*., or a number not exceeding in value that sum, or to the amount of 1,000*l*. stock.

84. The seller of registered shares or stock is responsible for the genuineness and regularity of all documents delivered, and for such Dividends as may be received, until reasonable time has been allowed to the buyer to execute and duly lodge such documents for verification and registration. When the buyer shall have obtained an official certificate of the registration of such stock or shares, the Committee will not (unless bad faith is alleged against the seller) take cognizance of any subsequent dispute as to title, until the legal issue has been decided between the buyer and the company, the reasonable expenses of which legal proceedings shall be borne by the seller.

85. The Committee will not (except under special circumstances) interfere in any question arising from the delivery of shares, stock, bonds, or debentures in blank transfer.

86. When shares of railway or other companies have been converted into consolidated stock and are so quoted in the authorized list, buyers are required to pass names for stock, and not for shares.

87. The buyer of stock, shares, bonds, or debentures shall pass a ticket for the same at a marketable price, containing the names and address of the buyer in full, before twelve o'clock on the name-day, either in the Stock Exchange or at the office of the seller; and in the event of his not doing so, should the stock, shares, bonds, or debentures be sold out, the loss, if any, shall fall upon him; it is, therefore, required, if the ticket should not be passed before twelve o'clock, that the person taking it should certify the same on the back thereof. The time for selling out shall be from half-past two to three o'clock. If the ticket be regularly passed before twelve o'clock, the person holding it at two o'clock shall be responsible for the loss occasioned by selling out on that day, but should the stock or shares not be sold out until the following day, then the person who held the ticket at THREE o'clock on the preceding day shall be liable. When the name-day is fixed for a Saturday, the time of selling out shall be from half-past twelve to one o'clock, and the person holding the ticket at half-past twelve o'clock shall be liable. Every person passing a ticket is required to write on the back of the ticket the name of the Member to whom it is passed. A Member dividing a ticket shall retain the original ticket, that access may be had to it, should any portion of the shares have been sold out; and the Member who has passed on the original ticket shall be required to trace it, in the event of any portion of the stock or shares having been sold out. Tickets may be left at the office of the seller up to one o'clock on name-days. Every person who receives a ticket "after two o'clock," or "after three," on the name-day, shall notify the same on the back of the ticket, by drawing a line, or otherwise, in order to facilitate the tracing when shares are sold out; and any person neglecting to do so will be held responsible for any loss that may be incurred.

88. A Member who makes an alteration in a transfer ticket for stock or shares, or improperly detains the same shall make good any loss that may occur thereby.

89. The seller of shares or stock shall cause the same to be transferred at the price marked upon the ticket given him by the buyer; but the seller shall not be compelled to take a ticket at a price not quoted in the authorized list during the account, unless the bargain represented by such ticket shall have been made within the two preceding accounts.

90. The seller may, previous to delivery, pay any call made on registered shares, although not due, and claim the same of the buyer.

91. The buyer of transferable shares or stock, shall pay the ad valorem duty, and all expenses attending the conveyance of the same; and shall state on the ticket the amounts in which he may desire to have the shares or stock transferred (provided no such amounts require a higher stamp than 9*l.* 15*s.*)—and the seller shall pay any increased expense caused by the sub-division of a ticket. Split tickets must bear the name of the original buyer.

92. The buyer of shares or stock shall, in the event of his ticket being divided, pay for any portion which may be presented, provided the number be not less than 10 shares, or the value less than 200*l.*

93. The buyer of stock or shares may refuse to pay for a transfer unaccompanied by coupons or certificates, unless it be certified thereon officially that the coupons or certificates are at the office of the company. But if the transfer presented be perfect in all other respects, the stock or shares must not be bought in until reasonable time has been allowed to the seller to obtain the verification required. If the seller have a larger coupon than the amount of stock conveyed, or only one coupon, representing stock conveyed by two or more transfers, the coupon may be deposited with the Secretary of the Share and Loan Department of the Stock Exchange, who shall forward it to the office of the Company, and certify to that effect on the transfers, which shall then be a valid delivery. No person is to look to the Managers or Committee of the Stock Exchange, as being liable for the due or accurate performance of those duties, the Managers and Committee holding themselves, and being held, entirely irresponsible in respect of the execution, or of any mis-execution, or non-execution, of the duties in question.

94. The buyer is entitled to new stock or shares issued in right of old, provided that within reasonable time, he specially claim the same, in writing, from the seller. Claims should be entered as bargains, and as such be checked in the usual manner.—When practicable, claims are required to be settled by Letters of Renunciation, but if not practicable, and there be sufficient time for registration, the seller may, after due notice, require the buyer to complete the bargain in old stock or shares. If the new stock or shares cannot be obtained by Letters of Renunciation, or by the transfer of the old, the Committee will fix a price at which the same shall be temporarily settled, and which amount may be deducted by the buyer from the purchase-money of the old stock or shares, until the special settlement. The Committee will not entertain any dispute relating to unchecked claims, unless brought before them within ten days after the special settling-day.

95. A Member not refusing an antedated ticket, when tendered as such, takes it with all its liabilities; but if it be passed as an ordinary ticket, the liabilities remain with the Member putting such ticket again into circulation; and any person holding an undated ticket shall not be liable for any loss arising from the shares or stock having been bought in, if such ticket had not been ten days in his possession.

96. A Member who shall allow two clear days to elapse, without availing himself of his right to sell out shares or stock, shall release the buyer from all loss caused by the failure of any person, through whose default the ticket was not passed; and if the stock or shares be not delivered within fifteen clear days, the issuer of the ticket shall alone remain responsible.

97. When stock or shares are sold out, if a ticket be not given within half an hour after the time of sale, the transfer may be made into the name of the buyer; and if a name is guaranteed, the rule shall apply as if the stock or shares had been actually sold out.

98. Registered shares, or stock, if not delivered within ten days, may be bought in against the seller, at or after twelve o'clock on the eleventh day after the date of the ticket, and all loss incurred thereby shall be paid by him. The broker employed to buy in the shares is required to give one hour's public notice before proceeding to make such purchase, and if the purchase be not made or attempted within half an hour after the expiration of the time fixed, the notice shall be cancelled. Shares or stock thus bought in, and not delivered by one o'clock on the following day, may be repurchased for immediate delivery without further notice, and the loss, if any, shall be paid by the member causing such repurchase.

99. A Member, who shall allow fifteen clear days from the date of the ticket to elapse, without buying in, or attempting to buy in, registered shares or stock, shall release the seller from all loss, caused by the failure of any member, through whose default the shares or stock were not delivered, unless such right has been waived at the request, or with the consent of, the seller. The right to buy in shares or stock is limited to the original buyer, whether the name of the first buyer or that of any other Member is placed on the ticket to pay; but in order to identify the original ticket, the name into which the stock or shares are to be transferred must be stated on the order given to the broker employed to buy in, to whom holders of over-due tickets may apply.

100. On the day previous to, and on the name-day of, every settling-day in securities deliverable by transfer, the clerk of the House shall, at twelve o'clock, fix the making-up prices for such securities at the actual market prices, and no making up shall be binding, unless at such fixed prices. On name-days the clerk of the stock and share market shall (with the concurrence, if necessary, of a Member of the Committee) fix the price of shares at three o'clock (or on Saturdays at one o'clock), at which prices unsettled accounts shall be temporarily made up, and the differences paid in the usual way.

101. No person shall be required to pay for registered shares or stock presented after half-past two o'clock; or after one o'clock on Saturdays.

Costs—County Court—Action on Bill of Exchange under 20*l.*

COSTS. I.—The County Court Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 4.) has not deprived the County Court of its jurisdiction to issue a summons under the Bills of Exchange Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67). A refusal therefore of the officer of a County Court to give a plaintiff any other than the ordinary summons in respect of a claim for less than 20*l. on a bill of exchange is no ground for allowing the plaintiff, under* 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 5, his costs of proceedings under the Bills of Exchange Act in the superior Court; nor is it any ground for allowing such costs that the expense and delay of obtaining judgment in the County Court on the ordinary summons would be greater than that of obtaining judgment in the superior Court under the Bills of Exchange Act.

W. Willis moved for an order for the plaintiff's costs. The action was brought under the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67, to recover the sum of 15*l.* 15*s.*, balance due upon a bill of exchange for 21*l.* 5*s.*

By an Order in Council, made on January 30, 1856, pursuant to the power given by section 9. of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67, that Act was extended to all the County Courts in respect of actions upon bills of exchange where the sum claimed did not exceed 50*l.* The affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney in support of the present motion stated that before he commenced this action he applied to the proper officer of the Lambeth County Court, within the jurisdiction of which Court both the plaintiff and the defendant resided, for a summons under the Bills of Exchange Act, but he was told by that officer that he could not have such summons, as the claim was under 20*l.*, and that he must take an ordinary summons. The attorney also stated in such affidavit that he well knew the defendant would avail himself of every delay, and that he had ascertained that the hearing under the ordinary summons would be at the end of about twenty-one days, and by the rules of that Court payment would be ordered about ten days after such hearing; that a sum of 17*s.* would be required to be paid for the summons, and 1*l.* 12*s.* for hearing fees, besides expense of witnesses' and attorney's attendance, amounting to 3*l.* 10*s.*, beyond the fact of delay; whereas in the superior Court the costs to and including judgment, would amount to 2*l.* 14*s.*, and the judgment might be obtained in twelve days from service of the writ and enforced immediately.

By the County Court Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. s. 4, the provisions of that Act and of previous County Court Acts there recited, "which apply to any debt not exceeding 20*l.*, shall apply to such debt or any part thereof, although the same shall be secured by or claimed upon bills of exchange or promissory note, and notwithstanding the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67." It was considered by the Judge of the Lambeth County Court that that 4th section has deprived the County Court of the jurisdiction which it had, by the application to such Court of the Summary Procedure of Bills of Exchange Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The language of the 4th section is not restrictive.]

No; and it is difficult to understand why the County Court had not jurisdiction to issue a summons under the Bills of Exchange Act.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—How can we fix the defendant with costs in the superior Court because the County Court Judge has put a wrong construction on this Act?]

The 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. s. 5, which has deprived a plaintiff of costs if less than 20*l.* be recovered in an action on contract, gives the Court or Judge a discretionary power to allow them; and the present, it is submitted, is a fit case for the exercise of such power.

[BRETT, J.—It may be morally right that the plaintiff should have the costs, but not that the defendant should have to pay them.]

It is shewn by the affidavit that, had the ordinary summons been taken out in the County Court, there would have been greater delay and more expense before judgment could have been obtained than by proceeding in the superior Court under the Bills of Exchange Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (Montague Smith, J. and Brett, J.) was delivered on November 9, by—

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—In this case we think there should be no rule. The action was brought to recover a balance of 15*l.* 15*s.* due on a bill of exchange. The application was made on two grounds: first, on the ground that the officer of the County Court refused to give a summons under the Bills of Exchange Act, although ready to issue an ordinary summons; and secondly, on the suggestion of the greater expense and delay in the County Court. It was stated at the Bar that the County Court refused the summons under the Bills of Exchange Act on the ground that the jurisdiction to do so was taken away by the 4th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108. That section, however, does not seem to us to take away any jurisdiction possessed by the County Court under the Bills of Exchange Act, and the learned counsel did not contend before us that the construction of the Act attributed to the Judge of the County Court was correct. This being so, we think the alleged refusal of the summons is not a ground for placing the costs of the action in the superior Court upon the defendant. The proper course would have been for the plaintiff to have applied for an order on the Judge. We also think that the suggested greater expense and delay is not a ground for allowing the costs. The legislature clearly intended, by the enactment in section 5. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, that actions for small amounts which are defined by the Act should be brought in the County Courts, and that if brought in the superior Courts the plaintiffs, as a rule, should not be entitled to costs; and we think the expense and delay, if they really are greater in the County Court, do not form, in cases like the present, a sufficient exceptional ground for an order for costs. If the costs are really unduly heavy, or the delays unduly long, in the County Courts, no doubt their practice in these respects will be reformed in conformity with this view of the Act. The Court of Queen's Bench has already decided that the distance at which the plaintiff and defendant resides from each other, and the expense occasioned thereby, is no ground for allowing costs—Thompson v. Dallas (37 L. J. Q.B. 133; 3 L. R. Q.B. 258). This rule, therefore, must be refused.

Rule refused.

GUEST v. THE WORCESTER, BROMYARD AND LEOMINSTER RAILWAY COMPANY.

COMPANY. K.—By agreement a railway company were to allot paid-up shares to A. and B, as trustees for a banking company, as security for overdrawing their account. The certificate stated that the shares were registered as paid up, but in the register there was no such entry, whilst in the call-book they were stated to have been deposited as security for an overdrawn account. A judgment creditor of the railway company applied for a scire facias against A. and B.—The Court held A. and B. not liable, but allowed the scire facias to issue so that the question might be taken to a Court of error.

This was a rule calling on two persons, named Padmore and Abell, to shew cause why a writ of scire facias on the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in this action should not be issued against them as shareholders of the defendants' company, to enable the plaintiff to have execution upon the said judgment to the extent of the amount not paid up on their shares.

The following facts were admitted on behalf of the plaintiff.

The railway company, having an account with the Worcester City and County Banking Company, were desirous of overdrawing their account, and it was therefore agreed between the banking company and the railway company that the latter might overdraw to the extent of 5,000*l.* on giving to trustees for the former 1,500 paid-up shares in the railway company, as security, till debentures might be lawfully issued and exchanged for them. The railway company thereupon allotted to Padmore and Abell, as such trustees, 1,500 shares (value 10*l.* each), and gave them a certificate that they were registered proprietors, across which was written that the shares were registered as fully paid, and then overdrew the 5,000*l.* The register however, in fact, did not shew that any calls had been paid, though in the call-book various calls were entered as paid by other shareholders, whilst against these shares was merely written "deposited as security for draft overdrawn."

Mellish and A. Wills shewed cause.—The other side are in this dilemma, either these are paid-up shares if the transaction be good, or Messrs. Padmore and Abell are not shareholders if it be bad. As Lord Justice Turner said in the similar case of Ex parte Currie; In re the Great Northern Coal Company (32 L. J. Ch. 57), "The agreement with B. was either valid or invalid; if the agreement was valid, then neither B. himself nor any alienee from him can be called upon to contribute in respect of those shares; but if, on the other hand, that agreement is invalid, the transaction must be disregarded altogether." The creditors are in the same position as the company, and they could not make a call. Further, the point was in truth decided in Ashworth v. Bristol (15 L. T. 561) and Ex parte Leifchild (13 L. T. 267).

Bridge, in support of the rule.—On the register nothing appears to be paid, and therefore there was a holding out to the public which would induce credit to be given. The cases cited were between companies and their shareholders, and the difference between the cases of a company and creditors is shewn by Oakes v. Turquand (36 L. J. Ch. 949). It is said in 1 Lindley on Partnership, 618, 2nd edit., "But the issue of paid-up shares otherwise than for full value received is primâ facie a breach of trust on the part of the directors and the company, and its creditors are entitled to have such shares treated as not paid up," though certainly the cases there referred to hardly support the proposition. At all events, the Court will not now decide the question, but let the writ go, so that the question may go into error if desired.

BOVILL, C.J.—As the case is now put, the plaintiff accepts the facts stated in the affidavits, and, in truth, we cannot doubt the nature of the transaction, and that no liability was dreamt of. We can have on the facts no reasonable doubt that Messrs. Padmore and Abell are not liable. They accepted a certificate which stated that the shares were registered as fully paid up. If this be so, it disposes of the point that they held out that they were liable. The authorities which have been cited are strongly in favour of these gentlemen, and even without them we should come to the same conclusion. We are asked, however, not to exclude the plaintiff from going into error, and as there is a large amount at stake, if it be desired, we will not exclude him, and will let the writ go on condition, as the facts are undisputed, that the question be raised by special case to be stated within a month. If no notice be given within a fortnight this rule to be discharged without costs; but if the plaintiff goes on, the question of costs is reversed, and the general rule is to apply.

KEATING, J., and BRETT, J., concurred.

Judgment accordingly.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Women.

ELECTION LAW. A.—Neither at common law nor by statute are women entitled to vote at elections for Members of Parliament.

This was an appeal (consolidated with a great many others) from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Manchester.

CASE.

At the Court, held at the Town Hall, in the city of Manchester, on September 15, 1868, for the revision of the list of voters for members of parliament for the parliamentary borough of Manchester, before the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the said list, the name of Mary Abbott, appearing on the list, published by the overseers, of claimants to vote in the township of Manchester, was duly objected to by Matthew Chadwick, a person on the list of voters for the said parliamentary borough.

Digitized by Google

The name of the said Mary Abbott appeared upon the said list of claimants in the following manner:

Christian Name and Surname of each Claimant at full length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, or other like Place in this Township, and number of House, if any, where the Property is situated.
Abbott, Mary.	51, Edward Street.	House.	51, Edward Street.

It was was admitted that the said Mary Abbott was a woman of the age of twenty-one years and unmarried, and that she had for twelve months previously to the last day of July, 1868, occupied a dwelling-house, stated in the said claim, within the said township, and had been duly rated by the said overseers in her own name, for such occupation, and that she had paid the rates for the relief of the poor assessed in respect of such dwelling-house before July 20 last, and in other respects had complied with the requirements of the Registration Acts.

On behalf of the claimant it was contended that, under the existing statutes, the claimant was duly qualified and entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote in the election of a member of parliament; and that women for the purpose of being registered as electors and voting in elections for members of parliament are not subject to any legal incapacity. It was maintained on the part of the objector that, under the existing statutes, the claimant was disqualified on account of her sex.

The Revising Barrister held that Mary Abbott, being a woman, was not entitled to be placed on the register, and her name was erased from the said list of claimants.

If the Court should be of opinion that the said Mary Abbott was not entitled to have her name inserted in the list of voters for the said borough of Manchester, then her name was to remain erased; but if the Court should be of opinion that the said Mary Abbott was entitled to have her name inserted in the said list of voters, then her name was to be restored.

Coleridge (Dr. Pankhurst with him), for the appellant.—The contention on behalf of the appellant is, that women have the franchise, as men have, as a matter of law, and that they have in fact exercised it in ancient times in cases where men exercised it, and that no statute has taken away this identity of position of the sexes; in other words, it is contended that, as regards the franchise, there was no distinction of sex in early times, and that there is no statute which has altered the rights of women in this respect. In the first place, it is proposed to shew that women have exercised a right of voting for members of parliament in counties, because if they have in counties, this fact will go a great way towards shewing they also have done so in boroughs. The first statute as to counties is 7 Hen. 4. c. 15, which gives the franchise to all suitors in the County Court, and seems therefore to include women as well as men; and in the next statute, 1 Hen. 5. c. 1, the words are also large enough to include women. It is laid down in Black. Com. 178, that "Elections of knights of the shire must be proceeded to by the sheriffs themselves in person at the next County Court." From 1 Reeve's History of the English Law, 47, we find that by an ordinance of William the Conqueror the bishop with ecclesiastical causes was separated from the sheriff, that the sheriff presided at the County Court, and the freeholders were Judges there, and that at the tourn all persons, whether peers or commoners, clergy or laity, had to attend to hear the charge of the sheriff and take the oath of allegiance. By 52 Hen. 3. c. 10, it was enacted "De turnis vicecomitum provisum est ut necesse non habeant ibi venire archiepiscopi, episcopi, abbates, priores, comites, barones, nec aliqui viri religiosi, nec mulieres, nisi eorum presentia ob aliquam causam specialiter exigatur." Here

"religiosi" agrees with "viri" as well as "mulieres," which shews that women had the right to be present, but that nuns were exempted from what was considered a burden in certain cases; and even if "religiosi" does not apply to "mulieres," still the argument equally applies, that women had the right, and as they are to come if called it shews there was a capacity in them to vote. Prynne's Brevia Parliamentaria, 152, 153, and certified copies from the Record Office now in Court shew that in 13 Hen. 4, 2 Hen. 5, 6 Edw. 6, 1 & 2 Ph. & M., 2 & 3 Ph. & M., and 14 Eliz., the indentures then used in parliamentary elections were sealed by women, which shews that they joined in returning members to parliament. Heywood, on County Elections, 255, 2nd edit., whilst he says that women are incapacitated, and cites Lord Coke, points out that women have interfered in elections in person, and gives several cases of return made by them; and from the burgess list of Lyme Regis given in 2 Luder, 13-15, it appears that women were entered as "burgenses, sive liberi tenentes." And Mr. Hallam, in his Constitutional History, ch. 13, whilst he lays down that the change in government which took place at the end of the thirteenth century was founded on the doctrine that those who had property were not liable to taxation unless they consented by their representatives, as respects women, goes no further than saying they have "been generally supposed capable of no political right, except reigning." These statutes and authorities shew that women had the right, and, in fact, exercised the right of voting in counties. Did, then, any of the restraining statutes alter this? On looking at 8 Hen. 5. c. 7, 10 Hen. 6. c. 2, 7 & 8 Will. 3. cc. 4, 25, 10 Ann. c. 23, 2 Geo. 2. c. 24, and 20 Geo. 3. c. 17, we find that the words are large enough to permit women still to vote. It is true that the word "man" is used in some, but that implies woman where there is no inconsistency, and "man" is frequently used in statutes where "woman" must be included. We now come to the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. ss. 18, 19, and it is curious to note the difference between the restraining and the enabling section. In section 18. the restraining one, the word "person," is used, whilst in section 19, the enabling one, we find "male person." The statute meant, therefore, not to take away from women any right they had more than from men, but, at the same time, not to give to women any fresh right. No doubt the appellant's great difficulty is, that, for centuries, women have not exercised this right, and have been considered not to have it, because it may be asked, why was this? But still, if the right existed, non-user cannot take it away. This being the case as to 40*s*. freeholders in counties, how does the matter stand as to boroughs? Mr. Hallam, in his Constitutional History, ch. 13, clearly shews that the burgesses were the electors in boroughs; and if this be so, then women were entitled, because, as has been shewn from the roll of Lyme Regis, they could be "burgesses." The 23 Hen. 6. c. 14, in its terms, would include women, and there are many statutes which, although they would not confer, at least would not take away the right. But, secondly, the Reform Act of 1867 has expressly given the right of voting to women, for it having been enacted, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. s. 4, that words importing the masculine gender are to include females, unless the contrary be expressly provided, the Reform Act, 1867, uses the word "man" throughout, without any such provision, and therefore, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, the word imports "woman" as well as "man." This being so, is there then any legal incapacity which prevents women from exercising the franchise? It is clear that mere non-user has not this effect. Is there then anything in the law of England which incapacitates them? It is submitted that there is not. In Olive v. Ingram, as reported in 7 Mod. 263, there are various dicta in favour of the right of women to vote. It was held in The Queen v. Stubbs (2 Term Rep. 395) that a woman might be overseer, because "the only qualification required by 43 Eliz. is that they shall be substantial householders; it has no reference to sex," and it was there pointed out that they might fill offices "of trust and likewise in a degree judicial." In The Queen v. Crosthwaite (17 Irish Com. Law Rep. N.S. 157, 463), where the question was whether women could vote under the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854, which provides that the voters were to be "persons" of full age, who had occupied tenements in a particular way, four Judges of the Queen's Bench in Ireland held women qualified, and this decision, though overruled in the Exchequer Chamber, was overruled by only four Judges against three, so that seven Irish Judges, including the three chiefs, were in favour and only four against their qualification. And, in conclusion, it may be pointed out that the principle of taxation and representation going together has been considered the foundation of our constitutional liberty, and this principle entitles a woman to a vote as much as a man.

Mellish (R. G. Williams with him), for the respondent.—The question in this case turns entirely on section 3. of the late Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, for the franchises given by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. are given to every "male person." It is admitted that for centuries it has been understood that women could not vote, and that has much the same effect in construing statutes as that which is the law. Again, in construing old statutes, modern usage is always referred to in interpreting them; and it is admitted that for about three centuries there is not a scintilla of evidence that women have voted. Again, nothing is shewn that would satisfy an antiquary, much less a lawyer, that women ever voted at any period of our history. The doctrine that there could be no loss of a public right by non-user would be intolerable without the qualification that, where a certain construction has been adopted for a long period as law and acted on, it is to be taken to be correct. And if it has been supposed to be the common law, and has been acted on for years, that women in consequence of their sex are disqualified from voting, the Court will give the greatest weight to this consideration. Independently of Lord Romilly's Act, there really could be no question in the present case. If we can see plainly by the Act to be construed that the intention was otherwise, Lord Romilly's Act does not affect the construction; and surely, if it had intended to make such an alteration as is now contended for, the legislature clearly would have expressed itself otherwise. On referring to sections 56. and 59, it appears that 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. and 2 Will. 4. c. 45. are to be construed together, and the law, as far as not altered by the later Act, is to remain the same, and as we are referred back to the first Act, Lord Romilly's Act does not apply, otherwise we could not have the same construction put on the two Acts, as the one would be construed by the light of Lord Romilly's Act, the other not. And if women were to be allowed to vote under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, whilst only men can vote under 2 Will. 4. c. 45, inconsistencies of qualification would arise which could not be intended. If the Court is convinced that the word "man" was used in 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. as distinguished from woman and child, it must give it that construction notwithstanding Lord Romilly's Act. There are a multitude of Acts which have been passed to which Lord Romilly's clearly could not apply. Thus the annual Mutiny Act gives power to raise so many "men," and this certainly was not intended to apply to women. Even if "man" means "every person," still were not women incapable of the franchise. All the early statutes are, no doubt, general, yet in practice women have not voted for 40*s*. freeholds. Why was this? Because they were incapable. It is not said that idiots, &c. cannot vote, but they cannot, because they are under a legal incapacity. Now, are the authorities cited sufficient to shew that what has been held to be law for centuries is wrong? The utmost that can be said of the Statute of Marlbridge, c. 10, is that women at one time attended the sheriff's tourn, but the election is, according to 7 Hen. 4. c. 15, to be by the suitors or others present at the County Court, and the suitors there were the Judges, and no authority has been adduced to shew that women sat as Judges. By 1 Hen. 5. c. 1. the knights, esquires and others are to elect members, which does not seem to point to women. The registers which have been cited only shew a few cases where women have signed the indentures, but where they did they were generally the patrons, and possibly the returning officers, and all these indentures were signed with others, except in one case, and in that they were set aside. As to Olive v. Ingram (7 Mod. 263), the judgment of the majority of the Court was against the right. And, lastly, there is a recent decision of the Court of Session in Scotland directly in point against the right of women to vote.

Coleridge, in reply.—The common law of Scotland depends on the civil law, and the decision mentioned on the other side is therefore no authority. As to what has been said of the indentures, it may be remarked, that putting the seal to the indenture by statute is proof of taking part in the election. In King Ethelred's reign four abbesses were summoned and sat in the Witenagemot; and Selden states that, in 5 Edw. 1, and for twenty-nine years after, peeresses were summoned to and sat in parliament.

Cur. adv. vult.

On November 9 their Lordships delivered their judgments as follows:

BOVILL, C.J.—It is quite unnecessary to consider the general question of whether it is desirable that women should possess the franchise of voting at the election of members of parliament. What we have to determine is, whether by law they now possess that right. In the present case it is agreed that the right of the claimant to be inserted on the list of voters for the borough of Manchester must depend on the construction to be placed upon the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," and under that statute two questions arise: one, whether women are included under the words "every man"; and the other, whether women are "subject to legal incapacity." If women are not included in the terms of the Act, or are so incapacitated, then our judgment must be in favour of the respondent.

Upon the question of whether they are incapacitated, Mr. Coleridge, on the part of the appellant, contended that women had a right to the franchise at common law, that nothing had taken it away from them, and that they were, therefore, not incapacitated from voting. Indeed, in the first instance, I rather understood him to contend that women were now entitled to the franchise as a common law right, and he fully argued that question. The appellant has failed to produce before us the reported decision of any Court in favour of the right of women to exercise the franchise of voting for members of parliament, with the exception of the notes of cases which were referred to in the 7th volume of Modern Reports, and Mr. Coleridge was obliged to admit that for several hundred years no instance is to be found of the exercise by women of any such right. This alone is sufficient to raise a very strong presumption against the existence of the right in point of law. It is quite true that a few instances have been brought before us where in ancient times, viz., in the reigns of Henry the Fourth, Henry the Fifth and Edward the Sixth, women appear to have been parties to returns of members to parliament, and possibly other instances may be found in early times not only of women having voted, but also of their having assisted in the deliberations of the legislature. Indeed, it is mentioned by Selden, in his England's Epinomis, c. 2. s. 19, that they did so. But these instances are of comparatively little weight as opposed to uninterrupted usage to the contrary for several centuries, and what has been commonly received and acquiesced in as the law, raises a strong presumption of what the law is, and at least throws upon those who question it, the burthen of proving that it is not what it has been so understood to be. The statute 52 Hen. 3. c. 10, relieving women from attending at the sheriff's tourn, and the fact of their being included in the books of the borough of Lyme Regis under the head of "liberi homines" and "liberi burgenses," or "liberi tenentes," by no means prove that they were entitled to or did vote at the elections. The records which were produced of the time of Philip and Mary shew that Dame Elizabeth Copley was a party to an indenture as returning officer, and this may possibly be the explanation of the previous return from Gatton in the reign of Edward the Sixth. The same observation applies to the instance of Lady Packington joining in a return from Aylesbury, as appears from 7 Mod. at page 268, for the precept was directed to her as lady of the manor to return two members to parliament. With regard to the two cases mentioned in the report of Olive v. Ingram (7 Mod. 263), they appear to have been cited from a manuscript treatise by Mr. Hakewell; the statement of them varies in different parts of the report, and though the argument was several times adjourned, it does not appear that any satisfactory information could be discovered respecting them. They are not even mentioned in the report of the same case by Sir John Strange (2 Strange, 1114), and I think there is very little weight to be attached to them. If there were any such decisions—and one of the cases is said to have been decided in 14 Jac. 1.—it is difficult to understand why no further notice or trace of them is to be found, or why they should not have been acted upon. At this distance of time we have not the means of ascertaining accurately the particulars of those cases, or under what circumstances the returns which have been produced were made, or whether any question was ever raised respecting them. The decisions as to what offices women may hold, or whether they come within the description of particular statutes, do not materially assist us in this case. On the other hand Lord Coke, in 4 Inst. p. 5, treats it as clear law that in the time of James the First women were incapacitated from voting; and in the case of Olive v. Ingram (7 Mod. 263), 12 Geo. 2, the majority at least of the Judges, notwithstanding the two cases referred to, seem to have been of the same opinion. In the work of Mr. Serjeant Heywood, who was well acquainted with Election Law, published in 1812, women are classed amongst those who are incapacitated from voting (Heywood's County Elections, 225). The same view has been accepted by Mr. Hallam and others in modern times, and was to some extent recognized in the Act of 1832 by the legislature confining the franchise in boroughs to "male persons." There can be no doubt that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1867, the common understanding of both lawyers and laymen was, that women were incapacitated from voting; and the legislature must, I think, be assumed to have acted under that impression. The 56th section of the Act also expressly reserves all laws, customs and enactments then in force.

Mr. Coleridge has very forcibly contended that, if women were ever entitled to the franchise, nothing has occurred to take it away. But if no legislative enactment has taken it away, the fact of its not having been asserted or acted upon for many centuries raises a strong presumption against its having legally existed, and considering that no reported decisions or authority can be produced in favour of the right, that there are the opinions against it to which I have referred, and that there has been so long and uninterrupted a usage to the contrary, I come to the conclusion that there is no such right, and that women are legally incapacitated from voting within the meaning of the 3rd section of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867."

Assuming, however, that the claimant was not legally incapacitated within the meaning of the late statute, the question would then arise, whether the franchise has been conferred upon women by that Act, and by force of the provisions of Lord Romilly's Act. This depends upon the proper construction to be placed upon the language of the legislature in the 3rd section of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," which enacts that every "man," possessing certain qualifications, shall be entitled to the franchise. In the Act of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. s. 4. it is enacted, that in all Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females, and the singular to include the plural, and the plural the singular, unless the contrary as to the gender or number is expressly provided. In construing the 3rd section of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," regard must be had to the whole of the enactment, with a view to ascertain whether the word "man" is there used in the sense of "person," or as equivalent to the expression "male person." By the 56th section of the Act it is provided that "The franchises conferred by this Act shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any existing franchises. . . . . And subject to the provisions of this Act, all laws, customs and enactments now in force conferring any right to vote, or otherwise relating to the representation of the people in England and Wales, and the registration of persons entitled to vote, shall remain in full force, and shall apply, as nearly as circumstances admit, to any person hereby authorized to vote, and shall also apply to any constituency hereby authorized to return a member or members to parliament as if it had heretofore returned such members to parliament, and to the franchises hereby conferred, and to the registers of voters hereby required to be formed." By the 59th section it is enacted, that "This Act, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, shall be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people, and with the Registration Acts; and in construing the provisions of sections 24. and 25, of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45, the expressions 'the provisions hereinafter contained' and 'as aforesaid,' shall be deemed to refer to the provisions of this Act conferring rights to vote as well as to the provisions of the said Act."

Now, by the Reform Act of 1832, the occupation franchise in boroughs is expressly given to "male persons" who shall be qualified as therein mentioned. By the 33rd section it is enacted, that no other person is to be entitled to vote for a borough except in respect of some right conferred by that Act, "or as a burgess or freeman, or as a freeman and liveryman, or in the case of a city or town, being a county of itself, as a freeholder or burgage tenant, as hereinbefore (section 31.) mentioned." It is perfectly clear, therefore, that women would not be entitled to the franchise under that Act, and as the two Acts are to be construed as one, we should endeavour, as far as possible, to put such a construction upon the later Act as will make it consistent with the provisions of the former statute.

There is no doubt that in many statutes "man" may properly be held to include women, whilst in others it would be ridiculous to suppose that the word was used in any other sense than as designating the male sex, and we must look at the subject-matter as well as to the general scope and language of the provisions of the later Act in order to ascertain the meaning of the legislature. I do not collect from the language of this Act that there was any intention to alter the descriptions of the persons who were to vote, but rather conclude that the object was to deal with their qualification, and if so important an alteration in the personal qualification was intended to be made as to extend the franchise to women, who did not then enjoy it, and were in fact excluded from it by the terms of the former Act, I can hardly suppose that the legislature would have made it by using the term "man." Indeed, in the very next Act in the Statute Book (30 & 31 Vict. c. 103), where it was intended to extend the Factory Acts to them, "women" and "females" are expressly mentioned.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the legislature used the word "man" in the Act of 1867 in the same sense as "male person" in the former Act, and that this word was intentionally used in order to designate expressly the male sex, and that it amounts to an express enactment and provision that every man as distinguished from women possessing the qualification is to have the franchise. In that view, Lord Romilly's Act does not apply to the present case, and does not extend the meaning of the word "man" so as to include women. Upon this part of the case the decision of the Court of Session in Scotland is also in point, and in that decision I entirely concur.

Upon both grounds, therefore,—first, that women are legally incapacitated from voting for members of parliament, and, secondly, that section 3. of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," is limited to men, and does not extend to women,—I think that women are not entitled to the franchise, and that the decision of the Revising Barristers in this and the other cases which depend upon it must be affirmed. It is not, however, a case in which costs should be given.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The application of the Act called Romilly's Act contended for by the appellant is a strained one. It is not easy to conceive that the framer of that Act, when he used the word "expressly," meant to suggest that what is necessarily or properly implied by language is not expressed by such language. It is quite clear that whatever the language used necessarily or even naturally implies is expressed thereby. Still less did the framer of the Act intend to exclude the rule alike of good sense and grammar and law, that general words are to be restrained to the subject-matter with which the speaker or writer is dealing. Apply these conclusions and remember that the Act to be construed is not only to be interpreted according to these general rules, but that it expressly enacts (sections 56. and 59), that it is to be construed together with the previous Acts on the same subject, and especially the great Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. What is the result? It is that the legislature, up to the passing of the Act of 1867, was unquestionably dealing with qualifications to vote of men in the sense of male persons, and was providing what should entitle such individuals of mankind to vote at parliamentary elections; and, without going through the Act of 1867, I may say that there is nothing, unless it be the section now in question, to shew that the attention of the legislature ever was diverted from the question, what should be the qualifications entitling male persons to vote, to the question whether the personal incapacity of other persons to vote should be removed. The Act throughout is dealing, not with the capacity of individuals, but with their qualification. Assuming, therefore, that women would have had a right to vote by the common law, apart from the statute, it would require something further to establish that more modern legislation has done away with the restriction (if it was a restriction) imposed by the Reform Act, which in terms confines the right of voting in the new constituencies to male persons. It further appears to me that the Lord Chief Justice is right in holding that, assuming Romilly's Act to apply, it would not have worked the change that is desired in favour of women, because the Act of 1867 does, "expressly," in every sense, exclude persons under a legal incapacity, and women are under a legal incapacity to vote at elections. What was the cause, it is not necessary to go into, but admitting that fickleness of judgment and liability to influence have sometimes been suggested as the ground of exclusion, I must protest against its being supposed to arise in this country from any underrating of the sex, either in intellect or worth. That would be quite inconsistent with one of the glories of our civilization, the respect and honour in which women are held. This is not a mere fancy of my own, but will be found in Selden, De Synedriis Veterum Ebræorum, in the discussion of the origin of the exclusion of women from judicial and like public functions, where the author gives preference to this reason, that the exemption was founded upon notions of decorum, and was a privilege of the sex (honestatis privilegium)—vol. 1. tom. 2. Selden's Works, p. 1083. Selden refers to many systems of law in which this exclusion prevailed, including the Civil Law and the Canon Law, which latter, as we know, excludes women from public functions in some remarkable instances. With respect to the Civil Law, I may add a reference to the learned and original work of Sir Patrick Colquhoun, on the Roman Civil Law, vol. 1. p. 580, where he compares the Roman system with ours, and states that a woman "cannot vote for members of parliament nor sit in the House of Lords or Commons." As to this country in particular, there is the passage referred to by the Lord Chief Justice from England's Epinomis, 3 Selden's Works, p. 10, which has reference to the ancient Britons, whose custom was that women "had prerogative in Deliberative Sessions touching either peace, government or martial affairs." But this is stated as a peculiarity of the Britons; and coming down to the time of the Saxons, p. 13, of whom no such custom is recorded, it appears that women cannot have been admitted to their councils, where no one took part unless entitled to bear arms, and invested with them in the public assembly, which sort of investiture Tacitus likened to the assumption of the toga virilis, and Selden to being knighted. It is true that abroad the order of knighthood was sometimes conferred upon women, but this does not appear ever to have been the case in England, for Littleton, s. 96, and Co. Litt. 70 b, shew that a woman could not perform knight's service in person; and when land held by military tenure came to her by descent, she had to perform the duties by deputy. And here I may observe that in the cases of constable and sheriff, which latter is the highest authority produced by the appellant for the exercise of public functions by a woman, the reason given in the authority referred to as to the constable was that she could appoint a deputy (2 Hawk. c. 10. s. 37), which a voter or member of the House of Commons could not do; and in the solitary and exceptional case of the shrievalty of Westmoreland, Anne, Countess of Pembroke, took by descent pursuant to the grant to her ancestor De Vipont and his heirs general, an office which could have been, and usually is, discharged by deputy, although the Countess, being a person of unusual gifts, both of body and mind, thought fit to discharge the duty in person. Mr. Kemble in his Saxons in England, in which work he had the assistance of the invaluable labours of the Record Commissioners, at pages 185 to 196, and 198 of the second volume, discusses the Constitution of the Witenagemot in Anglo-Saxon times, and in page 198 he refers to "one or two charters," somewhat analogous to the returns referred to by Mr. Coleridge, signed by the Queen and other women, always, as Mr. Kemble believed, "ecclesiastics of rank and wealth," but he by no means draws the conclusion that women could regularly take part in the public councils of the Anglo-Saxons, and he considers that the abbesses who signed, if present at the Gemot, were so for the purpose of watching matters affecting the interests of their convents, and attesting its acts in such matters, without forming part of the regular body; just, it may be observed, as the Judges have at present a right to be in the House of Lords in order to advise but not to vote. And as to other women of distinction present, he suggests the probability of their names being put in by way of compliment, an explanation not unlikely, if, as I believe, it has not been uncommon in modern times—(I know of one instance in which it was done)—for persons who happened to be present when the indentures of returns were being signed to be asked to sign, even though they were not electors, and indeed it has been questioned whether indentures so signed were good, and decided that they were, if properly signed by the Returning Officer. Coming now to a more recent period, it is said that women might be suitors of the County Court, and must, therefore, have been among the voters for the election of knights of the shire; but even supposing that women could be present, could they act as suitors, who were in fact the judges of the questions that came before the Court? Apparently not, for we know, from authority as well as experience, that, except matrons in the case of a writ de ventre inspiciendo, or of an inquiry as to pregnancy, upon a plea in stay of execution by a woman capitally convicted, women could not sit on juries—Lambard, Eirenarcha, 397; and they could not be Judges—2 Inst. 119. It seems, therefore, that women, even when suitors, were excluded, or rather excused, by the common law from exercising the public functions of suitors, in which capacity it was suggested that they must have had the right of voting. The Lord Chief Justice has gone through the authorities against the alleged right, to which must be added that, on the other hand, no authority, within those limits to which we ought to confine ourselves as lawyers, has ever laid down the contrary, because in the course of the discussion of Olive v. Ingram (7 Mod. 263), Lee, C.J., appears to have at last satisfied himself that women could not vote for members of parliament.

And now let us see if no light can be thrown on the question from a neighbouring quarter. We have been dealing with the question whether women can be represented in the House of Commons, but take the case of a peeress in her own right, who, if of the other sex, would have a seat and voice in the House of Lords, can she appear and take her seat there? No, it is unquestionable that she can neither sit herself nor vote by proxy. She has most of the other privileges of her peerage, but what is her case with respect to her being represented in parliament?

It appears to have been supposed at one time that she could appoint a proxy, but this soon died out, and until still later times it was thought that if married she could be represented by her husband, who should be a peer in her right. Co. Lit., 29 b, refers to a record favouring that opinion, and adds that readers must form their own judgment whether the law is so or not. Lord Hale's note to that passage shews that he thought that after issue born the husband would or might have the right. However, that was questioned in a note of Mr. Hargreave, Co. Lit., 29 b.; and in a note of Mr. Butler, Co. Lit., 326 a., it is shewn that though, both in this country and also in France, it was once thought that there could have been such a right of representation, yet, to use Mr. Butler's expression, the right must now be considered as " extinct," or, perhaps, inasmuch as in our system there is no negative prescription against a law, it may be more correct to say that the right never existed. Can there be any difference in the case of women whose right to take part in the public councils, if it ever existed, would, in modern times, of necessity, have taken the form of choosing some one to represent them there? Can there be any more reason why a woman, not a peeress, should have a right to choose her representative in the House of Commons, than why a peeress should have a right to be represented in the other house, where the power of voting by proxy might even suggest a favourable distinction? It is clear that a woman has no such right in either case, and that the absence of such right is referable to the fact that in this country, in modern times, chiefly out of respect to women and a sense of decorum, and not from their want of intellect or their being for any other such reason unfit to take part in the government of the country, they have been excused from taking any share in this department of public affairs. In either point of view, therefore, whether looking at the true construction of the system of Acts founded upon 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, or construing the Act of 1867 by itself, excluding, as it does, persons under a legal incapacity, and therefore, unaffected by Romilly's Act, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that this appeal ought not to prevail.

Byles, J.—I am of opinion that the Revising Barrister was right in expunging this lady's name from the list. I arrive at that conclusion in several ways: I think it clear from the words of the Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, that the word " man " in section 3. does not include a woman, but is confined to a man in the ordinary and popular signification of that word. No doubt the word " man " in a scientific treatise on zoology, or fossil organic remains, would include men, women and children as constituting the highest order of vertebrate animals. It is also used in an abstract and general sense in philosophical or religious disquisitions. But, in almost every other connexion the word " man " is used in contradistinction to " woman." Certainly this restricted sense is its ordinary and popular sense. Now, it is a well-known rule in the construction of statutes, that as they are framed for the guidance of the people, their language is to be construed in its ordinary and popular sense. But all doubt is removed by reference to the Reform Act, 1832, 2 Will. 4. c. 45, where, in a similar connexion, instead of the word " man " we find the expression " male person," for another rule of construction is, that Acts in pari materia are to be construed together, and to receive the like construction. And this is not only the general rule of construction, but is by section 59. of this Act expressly applied to the two Acts now under consideration; for section 59. expressly enacts that this Act shall be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people. And though we are not at liberty to construe an Act of Parliament by reference to the debates upon it in the legislature, yet it is impossible to suppose that parliament, while dealing with qualification, and qualification only, by the variation of a phrase (which, at least, may convey the same meaning as its predecessor in the Reform Act), intended to admit to the poll another half of the population. The consequence of such a construction would be that women would, in many cases, be admitted to the newly-created franchises, but not the old ones, without any reason for the distinction. Independently, therefore, of what is called Lord Romilly's Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 21), it is plain that the word " man " does not in the recent Reform Act comprehend woman. But the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 21, commonly called Lord Romilly's Act, does not, as it appears to me, create any insuperable difficulty. It enacts, in section 4, that in all Acts of Parliament words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed to include females, unless the contrary be expressly provided. This statute, on the appellant's construction, would have created the same difficulty if the expression " male person " had been continued to be used. The difficulty, if any, is created by the use of the word " expressly." But that word does not necessarily mean " expressly excluded by words." On of a city or town, unless the extended meaning is expressly excluded by words. And, accordingly, it is so excluded by section 61. of the last Reform Act. The word "expressly" often means no more than plainly, clearly, or the like, as will appear on reference to any English dictionary. And, reading the first Reform Act with the last Reform Act,—as by the last Reform Act itself (section 59.) we are directed to do,—I think it does appear very clearly, and therefore "expressly," that, by the word "man" in the last Reform Act, is meant a male person only. But, supposing that to be otherwise, and that the word "man" in section 3. comprehends both sexes, still the statute excludes in terms all infants, and all who are subject to any legal incapacity. I agree in what has been already said by my Lord and my Brother Willes on this subject, in whose observations I concur. Women for centuries have always been considered legally incapable of voting for members of parliament; as much so as of being themselves elected to serve as members. The expression "legal incapacity" in the statute cannot be confined to total incapacity to do any legal act whatever, but must comprehend legal incapacity to do this particular act of voting, though there may be a capacity to do some legal acts; otherwise, an alien might vote for a member of parliament. In addition to all which we have the unanimous decision of the Scotch Judges. And I trust their unanimous decision and our unanimous decision will for ever exorcise and lay this ghost of a doubt, which ought never to have made its appearance.

KEATING, J.—Mary Abbott claimed to vote for members of parliament for the city of Manchester in respect of one of the franchises conferred by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3. The claim was disallowed by the Revising Barrister, on the ground that, being a woman, she was not entitled to be placed on the registers of voters; and the present appeal is from that decision. The question depends upon the construction of the 3rd section of the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," which provides that "every man" of full age, "not subject to any legal incapacity," shall (upon compliance with certain conditions) be entitled to be registered as a voter; and it has been contended for the appellant, that, when the legislature enacted that "every man" should vote, they intended thereby to confer the franchise upon women also. Considering that there is no evidence of women ever having voted for members of parliament in cities or boroughs, and that they have been deemed for centuries to be legally incapable of so doing, one would have expected that the legislature, if desirous of making an alteration so important and extensive as to admit them to the franchise, would have said so plainly and distinctly; whereas, in the present case, they have used expressions never before supposed to include women when found in previous Acts of Parliament of a similar character, and have incorporated the Act in which they are now found, with other Acts in pari materia which confessedly exclude them. But it is said that the word "man" in the present Act must be construed to include "woman," because, by the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. s. 4, it is enacted that "in all Acts words importing the masculine gender shall be deemed and taken to include females, unless the contrary is expressly provided." Now, all that section 4. of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21. could have meant by the enactment referred to was, that, in future Acts, words importing the masculine gender should be taken to include females where a contrary intention should not appear. To do more would be exceeding the competency of parliament with reference to future legislation. But, in the present statute, it seems to me the legislature has clearly expressed the intention not to extend the franchise to women, not only by the absence of express words so extending it, but by the 56th and 59th sections, which place the new franchises as additional, and as far as possible upon the same footing as those created by the 2 Will. 4. c. 45, with which Act it is incorporated, and which in terms excludes females. Again, the 3rd section of the Act in question expressly applies only to persons "not subject to any legal incapacity" to vote. But it was contended on the part of the appellant, that women were not under any such incapacity as in ancient times they had voted for knights of the shire, and their right to do so had been recognized by authority. To make good this position, we were referred to two or three indentures of return for knights of the shire for the county of York, temp. Hen. 5, Hen. 7. and Edw. 6, which appeared to have been sealed by one or two females, by themselves or attorney. It is, however, not very difficult to suppose that, in those ancient times, when such proceedings were probably not very regular, a few seals should have been affixed without the legal right of women to vote being recognized; whereas, it is absolutely inconceivable that women should ever have possessed the parliamentary franchise, and yet should have ceased from its exercise for so long a time, without a trace being found of any Act to deprive them from their right of voting, or a suggestion in history or elsewhere of any cause why they should have been disfranchised, or of the fact that they ever had been disfranchised. We were also referred to the report in 7 Mod. 263, of the case of Olive v. Ingram, in which it was supposed that there were dicta favourable to the notion that in ancient times women voted for members of parliament. That case, however, when examined, is an authority the other way. It was a question as to whether a woman could vote in the election of a sexton; and Lord Chief Justice Lee, who is said to have referred to a manuscript case of Hakewell's, as shewing that a feme sole freeholder could vote for a member of parliament, afterwards, at one of the many adjournments of the case, distinctly wished it should not be understood that such was his own opinion; and the case was ultimately decided upon the ground that, " a sexton's duty being in the nature of a private trust," a woman might vote at the election. According to the report of the case in Strange, 1115, the ground of the decision is stated to have been that the office of sexton " did not concern the public "; and the Judges expressly guarded themselves from creating any precedent or authority for women having a right to vote in matters concerning the public. On the other hand, the opinion of Lord Coke, who clearly considered the law to be that women were disqualified at common law, would, under any circumstances, be of great authority; but when it is supported by centuries of usage, quite in accordance with his statement, the authority becomes such as it would be impossible for this Court to disregard. Mr. Coleridge, who ably argued the case for the appellant, made an eloquent appeal as to the injustice of excluding females from the exercise of the franchise. This, however, is not a matter within our province. It is for the legislature to consider whether the existing incapacity ought to be removed. But, should parliament in its wisdom determine to do so, doubtless it will be done by the use of language very different from anything that is to be found in the present Act of Parliament. I think the Revising Barrister was right, and that his decision ought to be affirmed.

Decision affirmed.

In this case, stated on appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Salford, it appeared that, acting under 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 13, the overseers had placed the name of Martha Wilson (who was the appellant) on the list of voters for the said borough. Martha Wilson was not objected to; but the case on appeal stated, that " the Revising Barrister held that the overseers had mistaken their duty in placing the name of Martha Wilson on the list of voters, as she was disqualified on account of her sex, and her name was expunged from the list."

J. A. Russell (R. G. Williams with him), for the appellant, contended that, assuming Martha Wilson to be primâ facie a woman, and therefore disqualified according to the decision of the Court in Chorlton v. Lings (38 L. J. C.P. 25), still notice of objection ought to have been given, since the person, though bearing the name of a woman, might be a man and duly qualified, and that, without objection having been previously made, the Revising Barrister had no power to expunge the name from the list.—[As, however, the case was met by the respondent and disposed of by the Court on a very different ground, it is unnecessary to state fully the argument in support of the appeal.]

Manisty (Crompton with him), for the respondent.—The appellant, being a woman, is incapable of appealing. The power of appeal from the Revising Barrister's decision is given by section 42. of 6 Vict. c. 18. That section enacts, that it shall be lawful for any person, whose name shall have been expunged from any list, and who shall be aggrieved, &c., "either himself, or by some person on his behalf, to give to the Revising Barrister in Court" . . . . "a notice in writing that he is desirous to appeal, and in such notice shall shortly state the decision against which he desires to appeal." Martha Wilson is not within that section.

[BOVILL, C.J.—This enactment was before 13 Vict. c. 21.]

Yes; and it has never been held that that Act has a retrospective operation. Moreover, it has now been decided that notwithstanding that Act, the words in the Representation of the People Act, 1867, importing the masculine gender do not include females.

J. A. Russell, in reply.—This is an objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, and ought to have been made in the first instance.

[BOVILL, C.J.—If we have no jurisdiction how can we hear this appeal?]

The 60th section of 6 Vict. c. 18. states that all appeals from the decision of any Revising Barrister "shall be prosecuted, heard and determined in and by Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, at Westminster, according to the ordinary rules and practice of that Court with respect to special cases," or in such manner as that Court shall direct. By not making the objection in the first instance, the respondent has acquiesced in the power to appeal, and cannot be allowed now to object that there is no such power.

BOVILL, C.J.—On this 42nd section the present appellant clearly has no locus standi. We have already decided that females have no right of voting for members of parliament, and from the statement of the case on appeal there is no doubt that the present appellant is a female, and therefore disqualified. The appeal must be dismissed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to give any opinion on the nature of the proceedings before the Revising Barrister. It is clear now from the case that Martha Wilson is a woman, and therefore she has no power of appealing.

KEATING, J.—I also think that this objection, which has been made by Mr. Manisty, is fatal, and that Martha Wilson has here no locus standi. In so deciding, I wish it to be understood that it is not, therefore, to be taken that I think an objection was necessary to have been made in order to have enabled the Revising Barrister to have done what he did.

Appeal dismissed.

CHORLTON, appellant; JOHNSON, respondent; BUNTING'S CASE.

38 L. J. C.P. 37; L. R. 4 C.P. 426; 19 L. T. 560; 17 W. R. 141; 1 Hop. & C. 49.

Parliament—County Vote—Leaseholder—2 Will. 4. c. 45. ss. 20, 25.—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102.

ELECTION LAW. A.—A person entitled under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20. to a county franchise in respect of his leasehold interest in a house in a borough which, before 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, conferred no vote for the borough, loses his right to such franchise upon his tenant acquiring, under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, a borough vote in respect of such house.

At a Court held for the revision of the list of voters for the township of Ardwick, in the south-eastern division of the county of Lancaster, by the barrister appointed to revise the said list, Henry Bunting—described on the list of voters for the said township as follows:

Christian Name and Surname of each Voter at Full Length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane or other like Place in this Parish or Township and Number of House (if any) where the Property is situate, or Name of the Property, if known by any, or Name of the Occupying Tenant, or if the Qualification consists of a Rentcharge, then the Names of the Owners of the Property out of which such Rent is issuing, or some of them, and the situation of the Property.
Bunting, Henry	18, Ashton Road, Ardwick.	Leasehold Houses. Term over 60 years.	Nos. 33 and 35, Hyde Street.

—was duly objected to by Thomas Webster.

It was admitted that the said Henry Bunting was a lessee for a term of 999 years of the messuages or dwelling-houses described in the fourth column of the said list of voters, viz., at Nos. 33 and 35, Hyde Street.

The property, in respect of which the name of the said Henry Bunting was upon the register for the township of Ardwick, is situate within the borough of Manchester, but inasmuch as the clear yearly value of each of the said dwelling-houses did not amount to 10*l.*, it was admitted that the said Henry Bunting was, before the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, entitled to be on the register of voters for the said township of Ardwick in the southern division of the said county. It was also admitted that since the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, the said Henry Bunting would not be entitled to be put on the list of voters for the south-eastern division of the said county (which, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 46, became a separate division of the said county) in respect of a new claim for such qualification, inasmuch as by the Representation of the People Act, 1867, mere occupation and payment of rates, irrespective of any amount in value of the house occupied, gives a vote for the borough.

It was objected that, by the 25th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45, the said Henry Bunting was not entitled to have his name retained on the said list of voters for the township of Ardwick, each of the said dwelling-houses referred to in the said fourth column being now sufficient according to the provisions of the said 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, to confer on the tenant or occupier thereof the right of voting for the said borough of Manchester.

On behalf of the said Henry Bunting it was contended that, inasmuch as his name was upon the register of voters for the said southern division of Lancashire at the time of the passing of the said Representation of the People Act, 1867, the right of the said Henry Bunting to have his name retained on such list of voters for the township of Ardwick, in respect of his county vote, was reserved by the said Representation of the People Act, 1867 (see section 56), and that the operation of the said statute was limited, and applied only to leaseholders claiming to be placed upon the register after the passing of the said Act.

The Revising Barrister held and decided that the said Henry Bunting was not entitled to have his name retained on the list of voters for the said township of Ardwick, and the name of the said Henry Bunting was therefore erased from the said list of voters for the said township of Ardwick.

Mellish (Hopwood with him), for the appellant.—Before the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), Henry Bunting had a right to vote for the county in respect of the leasehold premises mentioned in the case; and the question is whether his name is to be taken off the register because his tenants have, by virtue of the 3rd section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, acquired a right to be borough voters in respect of the same premises. The 20th section of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. gave this franchise to leaseholders of a term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years; but the 25th section of that Act enacted that, notwithstanding anything thereinbefore contained, no person should be entitled to vote for the county in respect of his interest as such lessee or assignee of a house where such house would, "according to the provisions hereinafter contained," confer on him or on any other person the right of voting for any borough. The effect of that section was not to disfranchise anyone, but to prevent any person from acquiring a county franchise in respect of leaseholds which would confer on his tenants a right to a borough vote. As a general rule, the old Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45.) preserved the rights of all then existing voters. Now, section 5. of the late Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, has altered the right to a county franchise in respect of leases for a term of sixty years and upwards by reducing the annual value of the premises from 10*l*. to 5*l*. The material sections are, however, the 56th and 59th. By the 59th section it is enacted that in construing the provision of the 25th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45, the expression "the provisions hereinafter contained," is to be deemed to refer to the provisions of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, conferring rights to vote as well as to the provisions of the Act of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. But, on behalf of the appellant, reliance is placed on the words of the 56th section as impliedly shewing that all rights existing at the time of the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, were to be reserved, and that there is therefore, for the purpose of the present case, a distinction between leaseholders who were entitled to the county franchise before the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and those who have since become so entitled. The 56th section says, "The franchises conferred by this Act shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for any existing franchises, but so that no person shall be entitled to vote for the same place in respect of more than one qualification."

Quain appeared for the respondent, but was not called upon.

BOVILL, C.J.—Reading the two Acts together, it is impossible to draw the distinction which Mr. Mellish has contended for. We are all of opinion that the Revising Barrister was right.

The other JUDGES[1] concurred.

Decision affirmed.

At a Court held for the revision of the lists of voters for the township of Moss Side, in the south-eastern division of the county of Lancaster, by one of the barristers appointed to revise the said lists, Herman Philip Ree was described on the register of voters as follows:

Christian Name and Surname of each Voter at Full Length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane or other like Place in this Parish or Township, and Number of House (if any) where the Property is situate, or Name of the Property, if known by any, or Name of the Occupying Tenant; or if the Qualification consists of a Rentcharge, then the Names of the Owners of the Property out of which such Rent is issuing, or some of them, and the Situation of the Property.
Ree, Herman Philip	Whalley Range, Moss Side.	Freehold House and Land.	The Holme, Whalley Range.

—and was objected to by Thomas Webster.

It appeared that there were the following lists for the said township of Moss Side:—

1. A list of persons entitled to vote in respect of the franchises conferred by or existing previously to the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. (being the list upon which the name of the said Herman Philip Ree appeared), prepared according to the provisions of the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18.

2. A list of persons claiming to vote in respect of the franchises conferred by or existing previously to the said statute 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, and made out pursuant to 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 5, and form No. 3, in Schedule A.

3. A list of persons entitled to vote under and by virtue of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and the Parliamentary Electors Registration Act, 1868, in respect of the occupation of lands and tenements within the said township of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards.

4. A list of persons omitted by the overseers from such list of occupiers, and who claimed a vote in respect of occupation of lands and tenements within the said township of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards, and made out pursuant to the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and the Parliamentary Electors Registration Act, 1868, s. 17.

A copy of each of the above lists was annexed to and formed part of this case.

The name of the said Herman Philip Ree appeared only on the list No. 1 above referred to.

The notice of objection given by the said Thomas Webster to the overseers of the said township of Moss Side, against the name of the said Herman Philip Ree was in the following form:—

"NOTICE OF OBJECTION.—To the Overseers of the Township of Moss Side, in the South-Eastern Division of the County of Lancaster.—I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of the person mentioned and described below being retained on the list of voters for the south-eastern division of the county of Lancaster:—

"CHRISTIAN NAME AND SURNAME OF THE VOTER OBJECTED TO, AS DESCRIBED IN THE LIST OR REGISTER: Ree, Herman Philip.

"PLACE OF ABODE AS DESCRIBED: Whalley Range, Moss Side.

"NATURE OF QUALIFICATION AS DESCRIBED: Freehold house and land.

"STREET, LANE OR OTHER LIKE PLACE WHERE THE QUALIFYING PROPERTY IS SITUATE, &C., AS DESCRIBED IN THE LIST OR REGISTER: The Holme, Whalley Range.

"Dated this 18th day of August, in the year 1868.

(Signed) "THOMAS WEBSTER,

of No. 41, Vine Street, Hulme, in the city of Manchester, on the register of voters for the township of Crumpsall."

And the notice to the persons objected to was in the form following:—

"Notice of Objection.—To Mr. Herman Philip Ree, of Whalley Range, Moss Side.—Take notice, that I object to your name being retained in the Moss Side list of voters for the south-eastern division of the county of Lancaster.

"And I ground my objection on the third column of the register.

"And the objection, so far as grounded on the third column, relates to the nature of your interest in the qualifying property; and to the value of the qualifying property.

"Dated this 18th day of August, in the year 1868.

of No. 41, Vine Street, Hulme, in the city of Manchester, on the register of voters for the township of Crumpsall."

It was contended on behalf of the said Herman Philip Ree, the person objected to, that the notice to the overseers and the notice to the said Herman Philip Ree were respectively invalid for the following reasons: That inasmuch as there were two separate and distinct lists of persons entitled to vote for the said division of the county of Lancaster—viz., the lists above referred to as Nos. 1. and 3. respectively, and also two separate and distinct lists of persons claiming to vote, viz., the lists above referred to as Nos. 2. and 4. respectively —the notice to the overseers and the notice to the person objected to respectively ought to specify the list to which the objections refer, as directed in the note to form No. 10. in Schedule B. of 6 Vict. c. 18, and in the Representation of the People Act, 1867, ss. 59 and 61, and Parliamentary Electors Registration Act, 1868, s. 19.

It was contended on behalf of the objector, Thomas Webster, that it was not necessary to specify the list to which the objection referred, and that the said notices of objection respectively were valid, they being respectively in accordance with the forms given in the Schedule A. to the 6 Vict. c. 18, forms Nos. 4. and 5, and the Schedule to the 28 Vict. c. 36; the objections being to a county vote.

The Revising Barrister decided that both notices were valid, and as the said Herman Philip Ree was duly called and did not appear, his name was erased from the said list No. 1.

Mellish (A. Wills with him), for the appellant.—The question is whether a notice of objection to a county voter ought not to state the list in which his name appears? Formerly there was only one list of county voters, but now, since the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), there are two lists, and it is therefore submitted that the notice should specify the list on which the voter's name is to be found, as in the case of a notice of objection to a borough voter given to the overseers according to form 10, Schedule B, in 6 Vict. c. 18, in which case it has been held that the list should be mentioned where there are more than one list in the borough—Barton v. Ashley (2 Com. B. Rep. 4; 15 L. J. C.P. 36). The notices which were given in the present case followed, as regards the notice to overseers, the form No. 4. in Schedule A. to 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 7, and as regards the notice to the voter himself, the form No. 2. given in Schedule A. to 28 Vict. c. 36. s. 6. These forms do not specify any particular list, because at neither of the times when they were enacted was there more than one list for county voters. But by section 30. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, the overseers are to make out a list of persons on whom a right to vote for a county is conferred, by that Act, in respect of occupation, "in the same manner, and subject to the same regulations, as nearly as circumstances admit, in and subject to which the overseers" . . . . "are required by the Registration Acts to make out, or cause to be made out, a list of all persons entitled to vote for a member or members for a borough," &c. The 19th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. declares that the names of the county voters having a qualification in respect of occupation "shall appear in a separate list after the list of voters in the parish," and that "such separate list shall be deemed to be part of the lists of county voters of such parish." By sections 56. and 59. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, the Registration Acts are to apply to the franchises conferred by that Act, and to the registers of voters thereby required to be formed, and that Act is to be construed as one of the Registration Acts. When, therefore, the Registration Acts require, in the case of objection to a borough voter, that the list on which his name appears should be stated if there be several lists in the borough, it is submitted by analogy that in like manner the objection to a county voter should now specify the list, as separate lists in the county are required to be made, especially as the Representation of the People Act, 1867, directs that the regulations of the Registration Acts as to borough voters should apply as nearly as circumstances admit to county voters.

Quain (Hopwood with him), for the respondent.—There is nothing in any of the Acts requiring, or any reason why the forms of notices of objection to borough voters should be applied to county voters. Even as to borough voters there are different forms of notices, and the necessity for specifying the particular list is limited to notices to the overseers; so that the real question which is raised by the appellant is whether the form in Schedule B, No. 10, to 6 Vict. c. 18, which the 17th section gives for the case of borough voters only, is to be substituted for that in Schedule A, No. 4, of that Act, which section 7. gives for the notices to overseers of objections to county voters. It is said that there are now required by the late statutes separate lists for county voters, and that, therefore, the same reason for specifying the list to which the objection relates applies now to objections to county voters as well as to borough voters. It is true section 19. of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. says, that the 12*l*. occupiers are to appear in a separate list, but it says, also, that "such separate list shall be deemed to be part of the lists of county voters," so that one would rather consider the whole, in point of law, formed but one list of voters for a county. However, be that as it may, there is a marked difference between the form in Schedule A, No. 4, to section 7. of 6 Vict. c. 18, and the form in Schedule B, No. 10, to section 17. of that Act. In the latter of these forms, which applies to the borough voter, only the name of the voter is mentioned, but in the former, which applies to the county voter, the nature of his qualification as described on the register is required to be stated, so that ample information is given to the overseers or party objected to of the list on which the voter may be found. In the present case the description of qualification, " freehold house and land," would indicate that the voter was on the list of persons entitled, according to the old Reform Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, and certainly that his name was not to be found among the 12*l.* occupiers on whom a franchise had been conferred by the Representation of the People Act, 1867.

[KEATING, J.—If the voter's name is on both lists, and the objector desires to object to his name being on any of them, what is he to do in his notice?]

Describe both qualifications of the voter. But that case would hardly arise; for by section 19. of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, the Revising Barrister is to erase from the separate list of occupiers all persons who appear to be entitled to vote in respect of some other qualification. There is nothing in either the Representation of the People Act, 1867, or the Registration Act of 1868, to repeal section 7. of 6 Vict. c. 18, or the form in Schedule A, No. 4, there given, and which has been followed in the present case. Section 30. of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, on which the other side rely, has nothing to do with notices of objection, but only with the lists to be made out by the overseers, and there is nothing in sections 56. and 59. to compel the application of forms of objections to borough voters to objections to county voters.

Wills, in reply.—The Registration Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 58.) treats the lists as separate lists. Section 19. has the words " part of the lists of county voters of such parish," using the plural word " lists." Then, the 17th section of that Act shews, that section 30. of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. goes far beyond mere regulations to overseers, and is not to be limited in the way suggested by the respondent. That 17th section, after reciting the 30th and 59th sections of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and that doubts had been entertained, notwithstanding those provisions, whether section 15. of 6 Vict. c. 18. relating to claimants of borough votes, applies (with necessary variations) to the rectification of the lists of county voters, declares that such 15th section shall apply to the new county occupation voters.

BOVILL, C.J.—Throughout the Reform Act of 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45), and the Registration of Voters Act of 1843 (6 Vict. c. 18), a marked distinction is always made between borough and county voters. In the Reform Act of 1832, not only are the enactments different, but in the schedule the forms are different with reference to borough and county voters; and as regards notices of objections the forms applicable to boroughs are extremely general. The 6 Vict. c. 18. preserves the same distinction, and has distinct and different forms of notices of objection to the county, to those which it has for borough voters. Again, the Act of 28 Vict. c. 36, which makes further provision for registration, has reference only to county voters, and that Act makes no difference in the form of notice to the overseers which previously existed. It is true there are now required separate lists to be made out in a county, as formerly was the case with the borough only, but there is nothing in the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which makes it necessary or right to mix up the enactments and forms applicable to borough voters with those which have reference to county voters, and if this was attempted to be done it would lead, I think, to inextricable confusion. In the Registration Act of 6 Vict. c. 18. the forms which are given as to county and borough voters are essentially different. In the case of a county voter the party objecting is obliged, in his notice, to give the nature of the qualification as described on the register. With reference to a borough voter that was not required; but then if there was more than one list, as explained by the note to form No. 10. in Schedule B. to the 17th section, the notice of objection to the overseers was required to specify the list to which the objection referred. It is quite clear that the notice to the overseers of objection to county voters, by mentioning the nature of the qualification as described on the register, gives them full information of the list in which the voter's name is to be found; and in the present case, in which the nature of the qualification is described as being " freehold house and land," it is impossible to suppose that the overseers could have been in any doubt as to the list in which to look for the voter's name. Certainly they must have known that the name would not be found in the list of 12*l.* occupiers, and they could not, I think, have been misled by the notice. It is not, however, necessary to decide this case on that point, and I only refer to it to shew that the legislature thought that the information given by the notice of objection in Form No. 4, Schedule A. to 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 7. was sufficient. It is enough now to say, that the notice to the overseers here was in the form, and the only form, prescribed by the Act, and that there is no necessity for mixing up the different forms applicable to borough and county voters. I, therefore, think that the decision of the Revising Barrister was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. A separate list of the persons entitled to the 12*l.* occupation franchise is to be made, which is to form part of the county list of voters for the parish. Why the legislature required such separate list of these I do not know; probably for facility of reference; but, however that may be, there is nothing in the face of there being separate lists to shew that the old form of notice of objection to county voters was not to be still applicable.

KEATING, J.—If the introduction of the old form would tend to mislead, and would not give sufficient information to the overseers where to look for the name of the voter objected to, then I think the words of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. are sufficiently large to cause the necessary alteration to be made; but I think that Mr. Quain has sufficiently pointed out that no better information could be given than that which is mentioned in the form No. 4. in Schedule A. to section 7. of the 6 Vict. c. 18; and if that be so, it would be impossible to use the incorporation of the Registration Acts with the Act of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. in order to defeat the object of the legislature. Form No. 4, by giving the nature of the qualification, gives sufficient information of the list in which to find the voter's name. I therefore think that the notice to the overseers was amply sufficient, and that the decision of the Revising Barrister ought to be affirmed; and as the objection was quite beside the merits, with costs.

BRETT, J.—I have not heard the whole of the argument, but I have heard sufficient to induce me to agree with the decision of the Court. I think the 17th section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, so far from being for is against the appellant in this case. In making out the list of voters for a county, the overseers formerly acted only ministerially, but that was not so as to borough voters, where they had to exercise a discretion, and if any person was omitted from the borough list, such person had to send in a claim. Now, under the new law, since the Representation of the People Act, 1867, the overseers are to exercise the same discretion with reference to making out the county list of the 12*l.* occupiers as was the case with reference to borough voters. Under these circumstances, it was only just that the persons so omitted from the county list should be allowed to send in their claims as in the case of boroughs, but there was a doubt whether the statute made this applicable to counties, and this is recited in the 17th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. Therefore the attention of the legislature was called to the matter; and that statute declares that the provisions of the 6 Vict. c. 18. as to the mode of claiming was to apply to the new county franchise, but it leaves the mode of objecting as it previously stood. Now, before that time, there were two ways of objecting: one applicable to county voters, and the other to borough voters. These are, therefore, left as before, and for the very good reason that the form applicable to the county voter points out the nature of his qualification, and gives therefore all the information that can be required.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—County Vote—Description of Qualification.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The voter's qualification was described in the list as "leasehold house and garden." The voter held the property under a lease to him for life, and if he died within sixty years, then for the remainder of sixty years:—Held, that the description was sufficient.

This was a case stated by the Revising Barrister for the county of Merioneth.

CASE.

At the Court held at Penrhyn, in the county of Merioneth, on September 18, 1868, to revise the list of voters for several parishes, John Humphrey Jones duly objected to the name of John Jones being retained in the list of voters for the said county.

The name and qualification of John Jones appeared on the said list as follow:

Christian Name and Surname, &c.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, &c.
Jones, John	Caerffynon.	Leasehold House and Garden.	Caerffynon, Self Tenant.

The objector contended that the description of the qualification in the third column was not correct. The said John Jones, in support of his claim, produced a lease of the qualifying property, dated November 7, 1865, granted to him by Hugh Beaver Roberts. The following is a copy of the habendum in the said lease: "To hold the said premises hereby demised unto the said lessee, his executors, administrators and assigns, from the 29th day of September last past, for and during the term of the natural life of the said lessee; but, in the event of his dying within sixty years from the 29th day of September last, then for and during the remainder of a term of sixty years, to be computed from the 29th day of September, 1865, at the yearly rent of 10*s.*" The objector contended that the said John Jones (for whose life the qualifying property had been demised) had a present freehold interest in the premises, and that the interest in the term of years did not accrue till the death of the lessee. I decided that the said John Jones had, under the said lease, a sufficient present interest in the term of years to entitle him to a vote in respect thereof, and therefore I retained his name in the said list of voters.

If the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that my decision as to the interest of the said John Jones in the premises under the said lease was wrong, the name of the said John Jones should be expunged from the register of voters for the county of Merioneth.

Dowdeswell, for the appellant.—Before the 2 Will. 4. c. 45, there was a right of voting in respect of 40*s.* freeholds; that statute, by section 18, put certain restrictions on this right as respected estates for lives; and, by section 20, conferred the right of voting on certain lessees for years, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. simply making an alteration in value. A man, therefore, might have a vote either as a freeholder or a leaseholder; and in the present case the respondent was clearly a freeholder, being seised of an estate for life, and should have been described accordingly.

R. E. Turner, for the respondent.—In Coke upon Littleton, 546, it is said, " If a man letteth lands to another for life, the remainder to him for twenty-one years, he hath both estates in him so distinctly that he may grant away either of them "; and in Williams on Executors, 6th edit. 662, it is said, " On the whole, the difference seems to be this: that, if a lease be made for life or years, with a remainder to the executors of the lessee, it shall be a vested interest in the lessee; . . . . but if there be a lease for ninety-nine years, if the lessee live so long, with a proviso that if he die within the term that it should be to his executors for forty years, this last term shall not vest in the lessee." The respondent, therefore, had a term for years as well as a freehold.

[BOVILL, C.J.—The term for years was not in possession.]

At all events there was power to amend under 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 40.

Dowdeswell, in reply.—The forms contained in Schedule H. to 2 Will. 4. c. 45, shew that the description is bad; the value in cases of freeholds and terms for years is different, and they should be distinguished; and if there be any ambiguity, this description is bad.

[BOVILL, C.J.—Does not the case fall within the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 101?]

That section does not apply.

BOVILL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister was correct. The objection is, that the respondent had a present freehold interest, and that the interest in the term of years did not accrue till the lessee's death. Now the respondent had a present interest for life, with a term of years afterwards, and the description is " leasehold house and garden." Most persons would think that a lease for life was a lease, though by law it is a freehold; and the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 101. provides, " that no misnomer or inaccurate description of any . . . . thing named or described in . . . . any list or register of voters . . . . shall in anywise prevent or abridge the operation of this Act with respect to such . . . . thing, provided that such . . . . thing shall be so denominated in such . . . . list or register . . . . as to be commonly understood "; and in Flounders v. Donner (1 Lutw. 371; 15 L. J. C.P. 81) Tindal, C.J., says: " I think the words ' commonly understood ' mean some clumsy description which, nevertheless, might point out the particular qualification relied on." This was a popular description, and was sufficient.

BYLES, J.—It would be dangerous to require that the description should be unexceptionably correct; but here the description is right. The respondent's interest is described as " leasehold." Now there are leases for lives or years, and unless a man were a lawyer he could not know that the former were in law freeholds. And it seems to me that the description is strictly legal.

KEATING, J., concurred.

BRETT, J.—Assuming the interest to be freehold, yet it was created by a lease; and therefore possibly the description is strictly applicable; but if not strictly so, then it is within section 101.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Notice of Objection served on the Overseers —6 Vict. c. 18. s. 17, Schedule B, No. 10, and s. 101.

ELECTION LAW. A.—A notice of objection to a borough voter, served on the overseers of the only parish in such borough, objected to the voter " being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough." There were two lists published by such overseers, one of persons entitled to the occupation franchise, and on which list was the voter's name, and the other of persons entitled in respect of reserved ancient rights, and on which last list there was the name of only one person, viz., that of the objector. It was proved on the part of the overseers that they were not misled by the notice, but that they knew perfectly well that the objection was intended to apply to the list of persons entitled to the occupation franchise and not to the other list, and they accordingly so acted thereon, and duly published the name of the voter in the list of persons objected to:—Held, that, under these peculiar circumstances, there was enough to warrant the Revising Barrister coming to the conclusion that the notice did sufficiently specify the list on which the voter's name appeared, and the Revising Barrister having in substance found that the description was such as would be commonly understood to apply to the list of occupiers, the Court could not say that he was wrong on these facts, or hold as a matter of law that the notice was bad.

At a Court holden by the Revising Barrister for the revision of the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament for the borough of Horsham, Pilford Medwin objected to the name of John Aldridge being retained on such list.

There was only one parish within the said borough, namely, the parish of Horsham. The objector gave in evidence and duly proved the serving on the said John Aldridge of a notice of objection according to the Form No. 10. in Schedule B. of the statute 6 Vict. c. 18; and he also gave in evidence and duly proved the service on the overseers of the said parish of a notice of objection to the name of the said John Aldridge being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of member for the said borough. The notice served on the said overseers was in the following words:

"To the Overseers of the Parish of Horsham.

"I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of John Aldridge being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Horsham.

"Dated this 25th day of August, 1868.

of Horsham, on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Horsham in respect of property occupied within the parish of Horsham."

In the borough of Horsham the overseers make out and publish two separate lists of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough, viz., one of persons entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of property within the said parish of Horsham, and the other of persons entitled to vote in respect of reserved ancient rights.

The name of the said John Aldridge appeared only in the first-mentioned list, his qualification being there stated under the third column to be "buildings and land." At the time the two lists were made out and published there was and for some time previously there had been only one person entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough in respect of such reserved ancient rights, viz., the said Pilford Medwin, and the list made out and published by the overseers of the persons entitled to vote in respect of such reserved ancient rights contained the name of the said Pilford Medwin only. The overseers duly published in the usual form the list of persons objected to as not being entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Horsham, and in that list there was the name of the said John Aldridge, with his place of abode and qualification, as they appeared in the said occupation of property list.

It was objected, on the part of the said John Aldridge, that the said notice of objection served on the said overseers was informal and insufficient, inasmuch as it did not specify the particular list to which the objection referred, pursuant to the directions given in Schedule B, No. 10, of the 6 Vict. c. 18, and that the said John Aldridge ought not to be called on to prove his title to vote. It was proved on the part of the overseers that they knew perfectly well that the objection was intended to apply only to the list of persons entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of property, and not to the said list of persons entitled to vote in respect of such reserved ancient rights as aforesaid, and that they the said overseers were not in any manner misled by the said notice.

The Revising Barrister held, upon the facts proved, that the notice of objection served on the said overseers was sufficient, and he called upon the said John Aldridge to prove his title to vote in respect of the occupation of property within the said parish, which he failed to do, and therefore his name was expunged from the list of such occupiers.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether upon the facts stated the said notice of objection served on the said overseers was or was not sufficient in law to call upon the said John Aldridge to prove his title to have his name retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough of Horsham in respect of property occupied within the said parish of Horsham.

Pickering, for the appellant.—The notice of objection was bad for not specifying on which of the lists the name of the person objected to was to be found. The 17th section of 6 Vict. c. 18. requires the notice to the overseers to be according to Form No. 10 in Schedule B, and in the note appended to that form it is stated that "if more than one list of voters, the notice of objection should specify the list to which the objection refers." The case of Barton v. Ashley (2 Com. B. Rep. 4; 15 L. J. C.P. 36) expressly decides that where there is more than one list the notice of objection to the overseers under this 17th section must specify the particular list to which the objection refers. Does it make any difference that there is only one name on one of the lists? If so, where is the line to be drawn? It is no answer to say that the overseers were not in fact misled. In Barton v. Ashley (2 Com. B. Rep. 4; 15 L. J. C.P. 36) Tindal, C.J., said, "All that can be said is, that the omission to specify the particular list did not in fact create any confusion or difficulty. But I think it is much more convenient that the overseer should have his attention distinctly called to the list, and that it is safer to adhere to the words of the Act, and to hold that the notice must be in strict conformity with it in this respect."

Keane (Lumley Smith with him), for the respondent.—If the overseers are satisfied with the notice they have received, what is it to the voter that the notice is somewhat imperfect, and may therefore have occasioned the overseers some additional trouble?

[BYLES, J.—That argument might be carried to the extent of no notice at all being given to the overseers, provided they did not object.]

In Huggett v. Lewis (15 Com. B. Rep. 249; 24 L. J. C.P. 38) the notice to the overseers was held to be sufficient although, instead of distinctly specifying in which list was the voter's name, it merely described the list as "the list of persons entitled under the Reform Act to vote."

[KEATING, J.—There the notice did sufficiently indicate the list, namely, that of the 10*l*. occupiers.]

No doubt; but Maule, J., considered that if the overseers were satisfied, it was not the business of the voter to take the objection. If the overseers were not misled by the notice, but acted upon it, as they did in the present case, any irregularity as to its sufficiency may be waived. It is not necessary that the form given by the Act should be strictly complied with. The 17th section says according to Form 10 or to the like effect. The notice is given for the purpose only of giving information to the overseers. It is sufficient if it has given the information required, so that the overseers have been able to act and have acted on it Godsell v. Innous (15 Com. B. Rep. 295; s.c. nom. Godsell v. Innons, 25 L J. C.P. 79) and Jones v. Innous (15 Com. B. Rep. 290; s.c. nom. Jones v. Innons, 25 L. J. C.P. 78). Next, this is a case within section 101 of the 6 Vict. c. 18, which says "that no inaccurate description of any person, place or thing named or described" . . . "in any notice required by this Act shall in anywise prevent or abridge the operation of this Act," &c., " provided that such person, place or thing shall be so denominated in such notice as to be commonly understood." The finding in this case shews in effect that it was commonly understood to which list the notice of objection referred, and where that is the case, the inaccuracy is cured by this 101st section—Lambert v. the Overseers of St. Thomas, New Sarum (2 Lutw. 222; 12 Com. B. Rep. 643; 22 L. J. C.P. 31).

Pickering, in reply.—In Tudbull v. the Town Clerk of Bristol (5 Man. & G. 5; 13 L. J. C.P. 49) and Bright v. Devenish (36 L. J. C.P. 71; 2 L. R. C.P. 102) the notice of objection, though it followed the Form in the Schedule B., to the 6 Vict. c. 18, was held to be insufficient in not properly describing the list on which the objector's name was, and it was never suggested, in either of those cases, that this could be cured by section 101. There were not two lists in Lambert v. the Overseers of St. Thomas, New Sarum (2 Lutw. 222; 12 Com. B. Rep. 643; 22 L. J. C.P. 31), and the only question was, whether the notice to the voter was sufficient to inform him that his county vote was objected to. The present case is not one of inaccurate description, but of no description at all, and therefore it is not within the 101st section.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was delivered, on November 17, by—

BOVILL, C.J.—The question in this case was, whether a notice of objection to the overseers which did not specify the list upon which the voter's name appeared was good. The statute, no doubt, directs that the list shall be specified, namely, by a note to Form No. 10 in the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18. It was decided in this Court, in the case of Barton v. Ashley (2 Com. B. Rep. 4; 15 L. J. C.P. 36), that it was necessary the notice should specify the list. The same rule was laid down by the Court in respect of a description of the objector in the case of Crowther v. Bradney (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 536; 33 L. J. C.P. 70). By the 6 Vict. c. 18, section 101, an inaccurate description will not vitiate the notice if the description is such as to be commonly understood. The circumstances of this case were very peculiar, there being a list of voters properly so called entitled to the occupation franchise, and there being also a paper which, in one sense, may be called a list of voters entitled to vote in respect of reserved rights. This paper did only contain the name of one person, that person being the objector, Mr. Medwin. This circumstance, according to the statement in the case, had existed for some time previously, and it was found, on the part of the overseers, that they knew perfectly well that the objection was intended to apply only to the list of occupiers, and not to the paper containing the name of Mr. Medwin alone. We feel some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that this notice did sufficiently specify the list; but under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, and looking to the evidence on the part of the overseers, we cannot say there was not sufficient to warrant the Revising Barrister coming to the conclusion that the notice did sufficiently specify the list on which the voter's name appeared; and he having in substance found that the description was such as would be commonly understood to apply to the list of occupiers, we cannot say he was wrong on these facts, or hold as a matter of law that the notice was bad. The decision of the Revising Barrister, therefore, must be affirmed, but without costs, for the case is a very peculiar one, and it certainly is not to be considered as forming a precedent for any other.

Affirmed, without costs.

MASON, appellant; BENNETT AND OTHERS, respondents.

Parliament — Borough Vote — Occupier — Composition of Poor-Rate— 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99. s. 4.—Liability of Owner—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The owner of premises, the occupier of which claimed to be entitled to a borough vote in respect of such occupation, under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, had, prior to that Act, entered into an agreement, under the Small Tenements Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 99. s. 4), for a year, from March, 1867, to March, 1868, to pay a composition instead of the full ordinary poor-rate in respect of such premises, whether occupied or not:—Held, that the liability of such owner to be rated instead of the occupier did not cease on August 15, 1867, the date of the passing of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, but continued to September 29, 1867, inasmuch as such agreement to pay such composition was a "composition" within the meaning of proviso (1) to section 7 of that Act.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the borough of Whitehaven. John Mason, on the list of voters for the said borough, objected to the names of John Bennett and others, whose names appeared in the schedule annexed to the case, being retained on the list of voters for the said borough.

The following facts appeared by the CASE: The respondents were inserted in the said list of voters in respect of their occupation of dwelling-houses within the said borough. The Small Tenements Acts (59 Geo. 3. c. 12. and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99.) have for many years been applied to this borough; and, under section 4. of the latter Act, the owner of the premises in question entered into an agreement in 1867, which was to remain in force from March 25, 1867, until March 25, 1868, to pay a composition instead of the full ordinary rate in respect of these premises, whether they were occupied or not. Two rates for the relief of the poor were made in 1867, viz., on March 13 and September 5, and the names of the respondents appeared upon the rate-books as occupiers in respect of both these rates. It further appeared from the rate-books that the owner paid in one gross sum a composition in respect of these premises as soon as it became due, under each of the said rates. In part consideration of their services as workmen, the respondents (who were all employed as colliers by the owner of the premises they occupied) paid no rent for such premises; but the compounded rates which were paid by the owner, under the said rates of March 13 and September 5, 1867, were on each occasion deducted from the wages of the respondents which became due next after such payment by the owner. The said rate made upon September 5, 1867, was the rate for the time being, and remained in force until superseded by another made on February 13, 1868. In respect of the last-mentioned rate, the names of the respondents appear on the rate-books rated as ordinary occupiers in respect of the premises; and many of them have, in fact, paid the full rates payable by them on that rate.

On behalf of the said John Mason it was contended: first, that the respondents were not entitled to vote, inasmuch as they had not complied with the conditions prescribed by section 3 of the said Act; secondly, that under section 7 of the said Act, the liability of the owner to be rated instead of the occupier ceased on and after the passing of the said Act; thirdly, that they had not brought themselves within section 8 of the said Act, inasmuch as they had not been duly rated as ordinary occupiers to all poor-rates in respect of the premises after the liability of the owner to be rated had ceased; nor had they paid all poor-rates payable by them as ordinary occupiers in respect of the premises up to the preceding January 5. On the other hand, it was contended in support of these votes: first, that, by virtue of proviso (1) in section 7 of the said Act, the liability of the owner to be rated to the poor-rate did not cease until September 29, 1867, and therefore that the compounded rates paid in respect of the rate made on September 5, 1867, were properly paid; secondly, that the respondents were entitled to be registered under section 8 of the said Act.

The Revising Barrister decided that, under proviso (1) of section 7 of the said Act, the liability of the owner to be rated did not cease until September 29, and that the respondents were entitled to be registered under section 8 of the said Act. He therefore disallowed the objections and retained the names of the respondents upon the list.

Keane, for the appellant.—The question is, whether the liability of the owner to be rated instead of the occupiers, in respect of the dwelling-houses mentioned in the case, did or did not cease on August 15, 1867, the date of the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102). It is submitted that it ceased on that day; and, as the respondents were not assessed as ordinary occupiers to the September rate, they were not entitled to be registered as voters. The 7th section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. enacts, that "Where the owner is rated at the time of the passing of this Act to the poor-rate in respect of a dwelling-house," &c., "instead of the occupier, his liability to be rated in any future poor-rate shall cease, and the following enactments shall take effect with respect to rating in all boroughs: 1. After the passing of this Act, no owner of any dwelling-house or other tenement, situate in a parish either wholly or partly within a borough, shall be rated to the poor-rate instead of the occupier, except as hereinafter mentioned. 2. The full rateable value," &c., "and the name of the occupier shall be entered in the rate-book. Where the dwelling-house or tenement shall be wholly let out in apartments or lodgings not separately rated, the owner of such dwelling-house or tenement shall be rated in respect thereof to the poor-rate. Provided as follows: (1.) That nothing in this Act contained shall affect any composition existing at the time of the passing of this Act, so nevertheless, that no such composition shall remain in force beyond September 29 next. (2.) That nothing herein contained shall affect any rate made previously to the passing of this Act, and the powers conferred by any subsisting Act for the purpose of collecting and recovering a poor-rate shall remain and continue in force for the collection and recovery of any such rate or composition." Previously to this enactment, the overseers would, by virtue of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99. s. 4, have rated the owner, and not the occupiers, in such a case as the present. So that, when the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. was passed, the owner, and not the occupier, was the person liable to be rated. Then the 7th section of the last Act expressly states when such liability of the owner is to cease; namely, the time when the Act passed. The only exception to this, and to which the words "except as hereinafter mentioned" refer, is where the tenement is wholly let out in apartments or lodgings. In that case the owner, and not the occupier, is to be rated, as was decided in the recent case of Stamper v. the Churchwardens of Sunderland-near-the-Sea (37 L. J. M.C. 137; 3 L. R. C.P. 388). The respondents rely on proviso (1) in the 7th section; and the question is, what does the word "composition" there mean. If it means an agreement for a composition, then it would be existing when the September rate in question was made, and that rate would be good; but if it means, as on behalf of the appellant it is contended it does, "a rate compounded for," the September rate, which was made after the passing of the Act, would be bad. It cannot mean an agreement for a composition, because, by proviso (2), it is declared that the powers of collecting and recovering a poor-rate shall remain for the collection of any such rate or composition, which evidently shews the rate compounded is the composition which is here contemplated; for who ever heard of recovering an agreement for a composition? Then the 8th section, which enables the occupier to be registered, though the owner had been rated at the time of passing the Act, requires him to have fulfilled, inter alia, this condition—"that he has been duly rated as an ordinary occupier to all poor-rates in respect of the premises after the liability of the owner to be rated to the poor-rate has ceased under the provisions of this Act." It does not say "after the composition or agreement for a composition has ceased," but "after the liability of the owner to be rated," &c., has ceased; it follows the words of the earlier part of section 7, where it is enacted that such liability shall cease at the time of the passing of the Act. The true principle of the Act is, that (except in the case where the tenement is wholly let out in apartments) the owner shall not be rated after the passing of the Act; but where there was a composition then existing, the moneys to be collected under it shall continue to be recoverable up to September 29, but not afterwards. If the construction were such as the respondents contend for, it would be possible, between the passing of the Act and September 29, to make a rate on the owner for another year, and so continue the composition in force even beyond September 29, quite contrary to the intention of the legislature.

Manisty (Kemplay with him) appeared for the respondents, but was not called on by the Court.

BOVILL, C.J.—I think this a very clear case. Mr. Keane has argued the case for the appellant very ingeniously, but he has failed to raise any doubt in my mind. The object of the enactment was to prevent the owner from being rated to the poor-rate, instead of the occupier, after the passing of the statute. That was the general principle, and with regard to some cases it is said distinctly that after the passing of the Act the owner shall not be rated. In the class of cases, however, in which the tenement is wholly let out in apartments or lodgings the Act says that the owner shall still continue to be rated. There is another case, namely, where there has been a composition entered into by the owner, with the overseers, under the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99. s. 4, in respect of tenements occupied or unoccupied, and which, according to that Act, would continue for a year ending March 25. The case of tenements wholly let out in apartments is dealt with by the concluding part of the 7th section; then proviso (1) which follows, and which overrides all the previous part of the section, states "that nothing in this Act contained shall affect any composition existing at the time of the passing of this Act, so, nevertheless, that no such composition shall remain in force beyond September 29 next." Mr. Keane has argued that that proviso means, that nothing shall affect any rate made under a composition and existing at the time of the passing of the Act. If that were so, proviso (2) states "that nothing herein contained shall affect any rate made previously to the passing of the Act," and expressly continues the powers of recovering any such rate, and shews, therefore, that proviso (1) was intended to apply to something different from a rate under a composition. It indicates to my mind that the statement in proviso (1), "that no such composition shall remain in force beyond September 29 next," refers to the agreement for a composition, and not to the payment under it. The word "composition" has often different meanings, as is illustrated when it is used in its popular sense of a composition with creditors." Sometimes it is used to describe the agreement, and sometimes the money paid under it. Here, in the first proviso to the 7th section, I think "composition" means the agreement, and that it is not to be affected by the Act except that it is not to continue after September 29, 1867. This view of it, I think, is confirmed by the language of the 8th section, which relates to where the occupier has not, but the owner has, been rated, and enacts that "such occupier shall, notwithstanding he may not have been rated prior to September 29, 1867, as an ordinary occupier be entitled," subject to certain conditions, to be registered as a voter. That clearly points to a period other than the passing of the Act, and has reference to September 29, 1867, and the first condition for carrying out this enactment in the 8th section, instead of stating that such occupier must be rated "after the passing of the Act," as it would if the contention of Mr. Keane were the right one, states that the occupier must be rated "after the liability of the owner to be rated to the poor-rate has ceased under the provisions of this Act." That embraces both the case of an owner who has been rated against his will and whose liability is to cease on the passing of the Act, and the case of an owner who has entered into a composition which exists after the passing of the Act, but is to cease on September 29, 1867. I have failed to find any ground for holding that the present case does not fall within proviso (1) to the 7th section. There was here a composition which had been entered into, which was existing at the time of the passing of the Act, and which would have remained in force until March, 1868, but for the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and by that Act it was not to remain in force beyond September 29, 1867. I therefore think that the decision of the Revising Barrister was right.

BYLES, J.—I also am of opinion that the Revising Barrister was right, and I rest my decision on proviso (1) to section 7 of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. The disqualifying enactments of that section do not apply to this case.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have been unable to discover where there is any doubt. The facts seem to me to bring the case distinctly within the terms of the first proviso of section 7, and therefore I think the Revising Barrister was right.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Rating of Owner instead of Occupier—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The word "composition" in 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7. proviso (1) applies not only to the case of an owner paying less than the full amount of the poor-rates by agreement, but also to the case where he pays a less amount, simply by order of the vestry under the Small Tenements Act.

TROTTER v. TREVOR.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the borough of Northallerton. The name of William Alderson on the register of voters for the said borough was duly objected to.

The facts of this CASE were as follows:

The said William Alderson was on the last day of July, 1868, and during the whole of the preceding twelve calendar months, an inhabitant occupier, as tenant, of a dwelling-house, in the township of Brompton, within the said borough of Northallerton, of a net yearly rateable value of less than 6*l*.

The Small Tenements Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 99), had been duly adopted in the township of Brompton, and was in force in that township at the time of the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and the owner of the premises occupied by the said William Alderson was assessed to the rates for the relief of the poor, and to all other rates and assessments in respect of which the owner of such premises was rateable, pursuant to the provisions of that Act and the 3rd section of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 39.

It was customary in the township of Brompton to make all poor-rates prospectively, to meet the future expenditure. The first rate for the relief of the poor within the township of Brompton, made after the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, was duly made and allowed by two Justices on September 4, 1867, and in that rate the said William Alderson's name was inserted in the column headed "Name of occupier," and the owner's name was inserted in the column headed "Name of owner," and the owner was assessed, as he previously had been, in pursuance of the Small Tenements

Act, at three-fourths of the amount at which the said William Alderson would have been rateable had the Small Tenements Act not been adopted within the township of Brompton. The amount so assessed was paid by the owner. The owner of the premises occupied by the said William Alderson had not at any time availed himself of the provisions contained in the latter part of the 4th section of the Small Tenements Act.

The said William Alderson had not claimed to be rated instead of the owner in respect of the rate of September 4, 1867. No other rate for the relief of the poor was made for the said township before January 5, 1868.

The next subsequent poor-rates made in the year ending on July 31, 1868, were respectively made on February 14 and May 21, and in both those rates the said William Alderson was rated as an ordinary occupier, and paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers.

It was contended, on behalf of the objector, that the said William Alderson had not during the whole of the twelve calendar months preceding the last day of July, 1868, been rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises occupied by him to all rates made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises, and had not on or before July 20, 1868, paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers, in respect of the same premises, up to the preceding January 5, according to the provisions of the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. That the liability of the owner to be rated or assessed to any subsequent rate for the relief of the poor ceased on the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, under the provisions of section 7 of that Act. That this liability was in nowise affected by the first proviso to the last-mentioned section, as the word "composition," in such proviso, related only to cases where the owner had, under the provisions of the latter part of the 4th section of the Small Tenements Act, compounded for the rates for a year, in respect of all his tenements occupied or unoccupied within the township, of a rateable value of not more than 6*l.*, and to special local Acts.

It was contended, on behalf of the said William Alderson, that the rate made on September 4, 1867, was not payable by him in respect of the premises then occupied by him, but by the owner thereof; and that therefore the fourth paragraph of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, was not applicable. That a composition within the meaning of that word in the first proviso to section 7 of the Act existed in the township at the time of the passing of the Act; and that, as the rate was made before September 29, 1867, and as the said William Alderson had actually been rated as an ordinary occupier in all subsequent rates, he must be taken to have been sufficiently rated under the 7th and 8th sections of the Act for the purposes of being on the register.

Upon the above facts the Revising Barrister decided that the said William Alderson was entitled to have his name retained on the register.

Manisty (Lovesey with him), for the appellant.—The present case differs from that of Mason v. Bennett (38 L. J. C.P. 48), as there was not here, as in that case, an agreement between the owner and the parish for the owner being assessed at the reduced rate in respect of the premises, whether occupied or unoccupied; but the owner, without his consent, was here assessed instead of the occupier, under the Small Tenements Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 99); and the question is, whether such last-mentioned assessment is a composition within the meaning of proviso (1) to section 7 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102). It is submitted that it cannot be a composition within the meaning of such proviso except it be by agreement. If the vestry determine to apply the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, and make accordingly the order for rating the owner instead of the occupier of the small tenement, it is compulsory on the overseers, by sections 3 and 4 of that Act, to rate the owner at three-fourths of what would otherwise be the full rate. That cannot be a composition; indeed, the word "composition" is not used in the Small Tenements Act.

[Gray, for the respondent, referred to section 3 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, where the word "composition" is used.]

The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14. s. 3, which enables the occupier, when claiming to be rated, to tender only what is payable under the composition with the landlord, must have reference to the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45, which, by section 30, gives power to the occupier to be rated in order to qualify for the franchise.

[BRETT, J.—The question is whether section 3 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14 does not apply to a composition of both kinds namely, where it is compulsory as well as where it is by agreement.]

It is submitted it only applies to a composition to which the landlord is an assenting party. Then, the general principle of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, is, that the borough voter should be rated to and pay the rates for the parish equally with the other occupiers. That is the effect of section 3 of that Act. Then section 7 has provided that, where the owner instead of the occupier was rated at the time of the passing of that Act—that is to say, where the Small Tenements Act applied—the owner's liability to be so rated shall cease, except as thereinafter mentioned. One of those excepted cases is where the tenement has been wholly let out in apartments, as in Stamper v. Churchwardens of Sunderland-near-the-Sea (37 L. J. M.C. 137); the other is the case within proviso (1), which has been decided in Mason v. Bennett (38 L. J. C.P. 48) to apply, where there was a composition by agreement existing at the time of the passing of the Act. It is submitted that it is limited to such, and that the composition which is continued until September 29, 1867, can only mean one by agreement, and cannot mean a compulsory assessment on the owner under the Small Tenements Act. This alone makes intelligible proviso (2) to section 7, which contiunes the power of collecting and recovering "any such rate or composition," where the rate has been made previously to the passing of the Act.

Gray (Cave with him), for the respondent.—It is submitted that the word "composition" in proviso (1) to section 7, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, applies to any case where the owner, and not the occupier, was rated, and where the rate which the owner had to pay was less than that of the other occupiers in the parish.

[BOVILL, C.J.—Can you suggest any other class in which an owner was so rated instead of the occupier, except where it was so done by consent, or by the overseers under the Small Tenements Act or some local Act?]

No; but there may have been cases where the owner was rated instead of the occupier without its being so done under any Act of Parliament. The words "composition" and "compound householder" do not appear in the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99; but they acquired their meaning after that Act, and it is necessary to see what was the meaning they had so acquired. That is shewn by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, which was passed to do away with the necessity of renewing the claim to be rated and tendering the rate. The title to that Act refers to "compound householders" as a well-known expression; and section 3 expressly alludes to composition with the landlord for a less sum than the full rate, and enables the tenant to be qualified if he pays or tenders only the amount payable under such composition. That clause clearly was not necessarily restricted to a composition by agreement. There is no reason, then, why September 29, should be mentioned in proviso (1) to section 7 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, as applicable to only one kind of composition. It meant, it is submitted, to apply to both descriptions; that is to say, to all cases where there was existing the class of compound householders, and the owner paid an abated rate to the parish.

Manisty replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

HANKS v. JONES.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Malmesbury.

This CASE stated facts raising the same question as in Trotter v. Trevor,

Digitized by Google

the Barrister's decision, however, being in favour of the objection to the voter being retained on the list. The Court desired that this case also should be argued.

Macnamara (the Attorney-General and Keane with him), for the appellant. —It is submitted that in the present case it was right to put the owner on the rate; it has been decided that this is so where the owner pays one-half the rate by agreement, and there is no reason for distinguishing between cases where one-half and three-quarters are paid, as in both cases it is done by order of the vestry, and less than the full amount is paid. By Sturges Bourne's Act, 59 Geo. 3. c. 12, the owner might be rated at one-half; and then came 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, which was intended to include that Act.

[BOVILL, C.J.—No; 59 Geo. 3. c. 12, excepts parliamentary boroughs.]

But section 30 of 2 Will. 4. c. 45, is recited in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, and that section applies to both kinds of composition; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 39, is equally general.

[BRETT, J.—It must not be forgotten that 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, is a Registration Act. BOVILL, C.J.—There are differences between the two cases: in the one the arrangement is general over the parish, and continuing; in the other, it applies only to owners who give notice. The amounts may be different, and it exists only for a period.]

No doubt that is so; but still there is no reason why, for the purposes of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, there should be any distinction between the two cases, and the word " composition " not apply to both.

[BOVILL, C.J.—It would be well to refer to some of the local Acts as to rating, and see what are the provisions inserted in them.]

Mellish (Dowdeswell and G. T. Howard with him), for the respondent.— The question turns on the meaning of the word " composition " in proviso (1), in the 7th section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and on whether or not it applies not only where there is an agreement with the owner, but also where there is none. It is submitted that it only applies in the former case, where there is an agreement. The word " composition " means naturally an agreement, by which a composition for a less sum is made, and is not referable to a general law. According to the other construction, in no case would the owner's liability cease at the passing of the Act, and the proviso would nullify the principal enactment. Where the Small Tenements Act is adopted the vestry could make an end of it as to future rates where there was no agreement, and the Act, therefore, did only what the parish could do, which was fair; but where there was an agreement for a year the parish could not, and therefore the legislature thought it would be unjust to put an end to such agreement. Again, the word " rate " is used in the one place, " composition " in the other, which points to the difference between the one case, where there is a rating, though to a smaller amount, and the other, where there is no rating but an agreement, whereby even unrateable property is to be paid for. The 14 and 15 Vict. c. 14, draws a distinction between the two cases. Section 1 would apply to the case of owners rated at three-fourths, and would not apply to a composition by agreement, which is not a rate, because it is in respect of unoccupied (and therefore unrateable) property as well as occupied, whilst section 3 speaks of a " composition with the landlord," which can only relate to an agreement; and no possible doubt could have arisen if the words " with the landlord " had been in the present Act.

[BRETT, J.—By 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30, the occupier may claim to be rated; then, by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14. s. 1, he need only claim once; and then, by section 3, to prevent any doubt, it is provided that he need only tender the lesser amount, and it applies to both cases.

The Walsall Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. clxi., which may be taken as a sample of the local Acts, provides, by section 53, that owners in certain cases may be rated instead of occupiers at the full amount, and by section 56, that owners in certain cases may give notice of their intention to compound by paying a reduced rate, whether the premises be occupied or not, and then pay two-thirds of the full amount. But this does not affect the present argument.

[KEATING, J.—If the owner may be rated for the occupier to the full amount we get a case which would satisfy the principal enactment and yet not fall within the proviso.]

It is submitted that the Act now in question only applies to pure cases of composition with particular landlords, not to general enactments.

Macnamara, in reply.—September 29 is mentioned because it is a quarter-day, and therefore a convenient time as respects the arrangements of landlord and tenant, and applies equally to both cases. A composition does not necessarily infer an agreement, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, recites 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30, which applies to both cases.

BOVILL, C.J.—The question in this case and in the case of Trotter v. Trevor is the same, and entirely depends on what is the construction of the words, "composition existing at the time of the passing of this Act," in 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7 (proviso (1), which enacts, "that nothing in this Act contained shall affect any composition existing at the time of the passing of this Act, so nevertheless that no such composition shall remain in force beyond the 29th day of September next." If the proviso included every case within the principal enactment in section 7, the difficulty would present itself of the one stultifying the other, and my great difficulty was to see what case there was which being within the principal enactment was not also within the proviso. Towards the close of the argument, however, we were referred to various local Acts, which provide that the owners of tenements below a certain rateable value, or let in a particular way, shall be rated and pay rates instead of the occupiers, and also that such owners may give notice of their intention to compound by paying a reduced rate, whether the premises are occupied or not, in which latter case they are to pay only two-thirds. And thus it seems that the system adopted in some cases was that the owners were assessed for the occupiers, although there was no diminution in the amount of the rates, and that there was also power given for making a composition with a landlord by which a less sum was to be paid by him, and paid irrespective of whether the premises were occupied or not. This system was in existence in various places when the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, was passed, which authorized the vestry of a parish to order that owners of tenements of a yearly rateable value, not exceeding 6*l*., should be rated instead of the occupiers, and rated at only three-fourths of the ordinary assessment, such order to continue in force for at least three years, but be determinable in a particular way at that or any future date. The Act also authorized the landlords of such tenements to agree to pay for one year, and be assessed at a sum not less than one half the usual assessment, whether the premises were occupied or not. Consequently, under that Act, there were two cases: the first where all the owners of such tenements paid a less sum instead of the occupiers, the second where particular owners undertook to pay a less sum whether the premises were occupied or not; and under various local Acts the owners paid the full amount or paid by agreement less than the full amount in place of the occupier. Then came the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14; but this statute, as has been pointed out, is a Registration Act, and seems to have no operation on 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, for when 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, was passed the occupation franchise was in respect of a 10*l*. annual value, and therefore that Act could have no application to tenements not exceeding 6*l*. value. This Act would not apply to Sturges Bourne's Act, 59 Geo. 3. c. 12, because the latter (section 23.) is not to apply to parliamentary boroughs, and it could not apply to the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, because the Small Tenements Act applied only to 6*l*. tenements. Therefore, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, must apply to the local Acts, under which the owner might, according to circumstances, pay either the full amount of or a less amount than the ordinary assessment—a conclusion which is fortified by reference to sections 1 and 3 of the Act, for section 1 speaks of a person tendering the "full amount of the rate or rates (if any) due," which seems to refer to the case where by a local Act the owner pays the full amount, and section 3 refers to "cases where, by any composition with the landlord, a less sum shall be payable than the full amount of the rate": so that the distinction is made between the payment of the full and a less amount. The 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7. enacts that "where the owner is rated at the time of the passing of this Act to the poor-rate in respect of a dwelling-house or other tenement situate in a parish wholly or partly in a borough instead of the occupier, his liability to be rated in any future poor-rate shall cease, and the following enactments shall take effect with respect to rating in all boroughs: 1. After the passing of this Act, no owner of any dwelling-house or other tenement situate in a parish either wholly or partly within a borough shall be rated to the poor-rate instead of the occupier except as hereinafter mentioned," words which would apply to every case but for the exception. Then, by proviso (1), it was provided "that nothing in this Act contained shall affect any composition existing at the time of the passing of this Act, so nevertheless that no such composition shall remain in force beyond the 29th day of September next." Now, if "composition" is there used for the purpose of designating where less than the full amount is paid, there is no difficulty in the construction of the Act, and though, as I pointed out during the argument, the two cases under the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, differ in various respects, for instance, the one applying universally, the other to particular cases, the one coming into force without, the other with the agreement of the owner, and the one remaining in force for one period, the other for another period, I have yet failed to discover any reason why the legislature should make the then existing state of things come to an end in the one case on August 15, and in the other on September 29, 1867. It has been said that the reason is that September 29 is a quarter-day, and was fixed with a view to the convenience of arrangements between landlords and tenants, but as far as I can see there is equal reason as respects landlords and tenants for fixing on this day in the one case as in the other, and it is difficult to see why there should be a difference of six weeks in the two cases. In the particular case before us, it is true that as more than three years had elapsed from the original order, the vestry could put an end to the arrangement when they pleased; but there might be cases in which this was not so, and no argument can therefore be founded upon it. Looking, then, to the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, and seeing the distinction there taken between the payment of the full and a less amount, I conclude that the legislature meant the word "composition" in 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7. (proviso (1) to apply to cases where a less sum was paid. We have already held in Mason v. Bennett (38 L. J. C.P. 48) that the case where less than the full amount is paid by agreement, is clearly within the proviso, there is no reason why the case where a less sum is paid without agreement should not equally be within it, and I think the proviso applies to all cases where less than the whole amount is to be paid by the owner. Section 8 is quite consistent with our decision, the result of which is that the rating of an owner to the full amount is to cease on the passing of the Act, and where the landlord is rated to a less amount, such rating is to cease on September 29. I am of opinion, on the whole, that the rating of the owner (though there be no agreement) at a smaller sum than the ordinary and full assessment, is a "composition" within the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 7. proviso (1), and therefore that the decision of the Revising Barrister must be reversed in the one case and affirmed in the other.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, as there is no reason for any distinction between the cases of the owner being rated at a smaller sum by agreement and without it.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two cases where the owner is rated at a less sum, the one where it is by agreement, the other where it is not. Each case is popularly known as a "composition." I can see no reason, and no satisfactory reason has been suggested, why there should be a difference between the cases, and if the legislature had intended to exclude one of them, one would expect that language would have been used which would expressly shew that intention.

BRETT, J., concurred.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Malmesbury.

CASE.

At a Court held, on September 22, 1868, by me, the Barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the borough of Malmesbury, William Stephens Jones, a person on the list of voters for the borough, duly objected to the name of William Bubb being retained upon the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough, in respect of his occupation of a dwelling-house, in the parish of Somerford Magna, within the said borough. The ground of objection was that the respondent had not been duly rated. A rate made for the relief of the poor of the said parish was produced by the overseers. By the "heading" thereof this rate purported to have been made by the overseers on July 18, 1867, and on each page thereof, in the usual form there were the words, "Rate made the 18th day of July, 1867." The rate was duly allowed on September 4, 1867, and that date appeared in the entry of such allowance as the date thereof. The rate was duly published on September 8, 1867. The respondent was not rated to the said rate. The appellant contended that this was a rate made during the twelve calendar months preceding July 31, 1868; that the date in the heading of the rate was not the time when it was "made" within the meaning of the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and that the said rate was not so "made" until the day of the allowance thereof, or until the day of the publication thereof, and that not being rated therein, the said respondent was not entitled to be registered under the said 3rd section of that Act. Apart from the question raised by this objection, the respondent's qualification was proved to my satisfaction. I decided that although a rate is of no force until it has been allowed and published, yet that, after allowance and publication, it is to be deemed to have been made on the day on which it purports to have been made by the overseers, upon whom the duty of making it devolves; that the word "made" in the 3rd section of the said Act is to be thus construed, and as such day in respect of the rate in question was prior to the qualifying twelve months' occupation of the respondent, I disallowed the objection and retained his name on the said list.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the said rate was a rate " made " during the twelve calendar months preceding the last day of July, 1868, within the meaning of the 3rd section of the Act aforesaid; and if the Court should be of opinion that it was, the name of William Bubb is to be expunged from the said list.

Dowdeswell (G. T. Howard with him), on behalf of the appellant, contended that the rate was not " made " till it was allowed by the Justices.

Macnamara, on behalf of the respondent, contended that the rate was " made " when signed by the overseers.

But in consequence of the decision the Court ultimately came to, it is unnecessary to set forth the arguments.

BOVILL, C.J.—This case has been most ably argued on both sides, but in the view that we take of it we do not think it necessary to take time to consider our judgment. There is no doubt that in various Acts of Parliament the making and allowance of a rate have been treated as distinct matters, but whatever may be the effect of the word " made " in the Poor Law Acts, we have to consider what is its meaning in the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, sub-section 3. On the one side it has been contended, that a rate is made when signed by the overseers; on the other, that it is not made till allowed by the Justices; and extreme cases may be, and have been put which present difficulties in either construction, and, indeed, in the construction at which the Court has arrived. It is impossible, however, for the Court to deal with extreme cases, and we must assume that the legislature acted on the assumption that what ought to be done would be done. After the very full discussion which has taken place, I have come to the conclusion that neither contention is correct, but that when the legislature used the language " has during the time of such occupation been rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises," it meant rates completely made within the year of occupation, that is to say, made by a signing by the overseers and an allowance by the Justices, both of which are within that period. This being so, it becomes unnecessary to determine what is a making of a rate within the statutes relating to the relief of the poor, and the decision of the Revising Barrister must be confirmed.

BYLES, J., and KEATING, J., concurred.

BRETT, J.—I have had great difficulty in coming to a decision in this case, but looking at the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, and comparing it with the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, I agree that the only safe way is to construe " made " in the former to mean " entirely made," that is to say, to mean that every step should be taken within the year.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Poor-Rate "made" within 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3.—Ratification of Act of Landlord in getting Tenant's Name put on the Rate.

ELECTION LAW. A.—A rate for the relief of the poor, in order to be "made" within 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, must be entirely made within the year of occupation, and it is so entirely made if the signing of the overseers, allowance by the Justices and publication be within that year, and it is immaterial that the steps previous to such signing were taken before the commencement of the year.

A landlord, who paid the poor-rates, and by arrangement with his tenant, charged a higher rent in consequence, got the overseers to put his tenant on the rate instead of himself without communicating with his tenant, who, however, appeared before the Revising Barrister to claim a vote in respect of the premises: —Held, that, even if this act of the landlord could by ratification be made a claim by the tenant to be rated, the ratification must be within the year of occupation; and that, therefore, the tenant's appearance before the Barrister after the end of such year could not be a ratification.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Burnley.

CASE.

At a Court held by me to revise the list of voters for the borough of Burnley, Harry Creeke duly objected to the name of Thomas Ainsworth being retained on the list of voters for the township of Habergham Eaves, in the said borough, whereupon the qualification of the said Thomas Ainsworth was proved in every respect, except as regarded rating and payment of rates. With respect to these two points, the facts as established by the evidence were as follows: A rate for the relief of the poor in the township of Habergham Eaves, in the borough of Burnley, was signed and allowed by two Justices on August 16, 1867, and was published on the Sunday following, viz., on August 18, 1867. At the head of this rate in the rate-book were the following words: "An assessment for the relief of the poor of the township of Habergham Eaves, in the county of Lancaster, and for other purposes, chargeable thereon according to law, made this 18th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1867, after the rate of 1*s.* 8*d.* in the pound." Then followed a form of declaration, to be copied and signed by the parish officers, at the end of the rate, as follows:

"We, , do declare the several particulars in the respective columns of the above rate to be true and correct, so far as we have been able to ascertain them, to which end we have used our best endeavours.

"We do also declare that the above rate amounts in the whole to the sum of pounds shillings pence.

The heading at the top of each page of the rate-book was in these words and figures: "Township of Habergham Eaves.—Poor-rate made the day of ,186 ." At the end of the names in the rate-book was this declaration by the overseers:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby declare that one of us, or some person on our behalf, has examined and compared the several particulars in the respective columns of the within rate, with the valuation list made under the authority of the Union Assessment Committee Act of 1862, in force in this township; and the several hereditaments are, to the best of our belief, rated according to the value appearing in such valuation list.

"We do also declare that the within rate amounts in the whole to the sum of 4,835*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*

"JAMES DUGDALE, jun.,
"GEORGE SLATER,
"JOHN MAGERISON, } Overseers."

This declaration was not dated, but it was signed within a week before the signature and allowance of the rate by the Justices, which immediately followed it in the rate-book, and of which the following is a copy:

"Lancashire, to wit. } We, the undersigned, being two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the said county (one whereof is of the quorum), do hereby consent unto the foregoing rate or assessment.

"Dated this 16th day of August, 1867.

"JAMES FOLDS, jun.
"JOHN HEELIS."

Two days after the rate was thus signed and allowed, viz., on Sunday, August 18, in the same year, it was duly published according to law. The rate-book containing this rate was put in evidence for the purpose of proving that the said Thomas Ainsworth was duly rated to it, in respect of premises occupied by him in Low Water Street, in the said township, during the twelve months immediately preceding the last day of July, 1868; and in respect of which premises, so far as rating and payment of rates were concerned, his qualification was in dispute. Upon examining the rate-book I found the name of Thomas Ainsworth in the column headed "Arrears," and the name of John Holmes in the column headed "Name of Occupier." The latter name had been struck through with a pen, but was still legible as under:

Number. 1.	Arrears. 2.	3.	Name of Occupier. 4.	Name of Owner. 5.	Description of Property rated. 6.	Name or Situation of Property. 7.

* This name had been struck through.

The rate-book thus disclosing an ambiguity on the face of it, I instituted an inquiry into the circumstances under which the name of John Holmes had been struck through and the name of Thomas Ainsworth inserted. In the course of that inquiry the following facts were established by the evidence: Thomas Ainsworth was a tenant of John Dugdale & Brothers, a firm carrying on business in the borough of Burnley (one member of this firm, viz., Mr. James Dugdale, jun., had signed the rate in question as overseer), and had occupied as such tenant for more than twelve months previous to July 31, 1868, the premises,

No. 14, Low Water Street, which appeared in the rate-book on the same line with his name and the name of John Holmes, as shewn above. Some time after August 18, 1867, the day on which the above-mentioned rate was published, Mr. Shaw, a partner of the said firm of John Dugdale & Brothers (who had at the time been invited to stand as a candidate for the representation of the borough of Burnley in Parliament, but who had not then accepted the invitation), without mentioning the name of Thomas Ainsworth, and without in any way communicating with him, or with any other of the tenants of the said firm on the subject, requested the assistant overseer for the township of Habergham Eaves in general terms to insert the names of the tenants of John Dugdale & Brothers in the rate-book containing the said rate of August 16, 1867. The assistant overseer, anticipating some difficulty in ascertaining the names of the said tenants, acted upon a suggestion made by Mr. Shaw, and sent the rate-book above mentioned to the office of John Dugdale & Brothers. The names of Thomas Ainsworth and other tenants of Messrs. Dugdale were inserted in pencil in the said rate-book, whilst it thus remained in the office of the said firm, by one of their clerks, and when that had been done the rate-book was returned to the assistant overseer. The name of Thomas Ainsworth and the names of the other tenants, which had been written in as above stated in pencil, were then written in ink at the assistant overseer's office by his clerks, and the names of John Holmes and others, which stood in the occupiers' column in the rate-book when the said rate was signed, allowed and published, were struck through with a pen after the manner shewn above. On December 10, 1867, the rate due in respect of the premises occupied as before mentioned by Thomas Ainsworth, and also the rates due in respect of the other tenants of John Dugdale & Brothers, were demanded by the overseer, and paid by Mr. Shaw by a cheque, in the name of the firm, for the sum of 350*l*. In return for the above cheque receipts were handed over to the firm made out in the name of each tenant separately, and amongst them one in the name of Thomas Ainsworth. Messrs. Dugdale had paid their tenants' rates in a similar manner in full and without any composition for nearly forty years past, and there was a clear understanding between the tenants when they entered into occupation and the firm, that the rates were included in the rent; and the tenants had to pay an additional rent in consideration of the firm undertaking to pay the rates. The overseer, thus looking to the Messrs. Dugdale for payment, had been indifferent as to what names appeared in the rate-book as occupiers of the several premises belonging to the firm.

Upon this state of facts it was contended, on behalf of the objector, first, that the rate signed and allowed by the Justices on August 16, 1867, and published on Sunday, August 18 in the same year, was "made" when it was signed, allowed and published, and not before, and that consequently it was a rate "made" during the twelve months immediately preceding July 31, 1868, and that it was necessary that the name of Thomas Ainsworth should have been inserted in it before it was signed, allowed and published as aforesaid as having been rated in respect of the qualifying premises, 14, Low Water Street, so occupied by him during the twelve months immediately preceding the last day of July, 1868, in order to entitle him (in the absence of any sufficient claim and payment or tender of rates due) to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the said township in the said borough on the said last day of July, 1868; secondly, that the request of Mr. Shaw to the assistant overseer to insert the names of his tenants in the rate-book, made as it was in general terms and without any communication with Thomas Ainsworth, was not a sufficient claim to be rated on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30; thirdly, that, even if it were a sufficient claim to be rated on behalf of the said Thomas Ainsworth within the meaning of the said section of the said Act, nevertheless the subsequent payment of the rates on December 10, 1867, in a gross sum by Mr. Shaw as above stated, was not an actual payment, or a sufficient payment, within the meaning of the said section last above mentioned to render such claim to be rated valid.

It was, on the other hand, contended, amongst other matters, on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth, that the rate in question was "made" (within 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3. subdivision 3.) on April 18, 1867, and not when it was signed, allowed and published as aforesaid, in the month of August as aforesaid. That three Acts are necessary in order to the complete "making" of a rate: first, the assessment of such a rate at so much in the pound; secondly, the signatures by the overseers and the signatures and allowance by the Justices; and thirdly, the publication in due course according to law. That two only of the above three requisite Acts for the making of a rate were done after July 31, 1867, and within the twelve months immediately preceding the last day of July, 1868, and that the other requisite Act, viz., the assessment at so much in the pound, having been done before July 31, 1867, the rate in question was not altogether and entirely "made" within the twelve months aforesaid. That the signatures of the overseers and Justices in the month of August, 1867, must be taken as relating back to the date of the assessment, viz., April 18, 1867, and that consequently it was not necessary that Thomas Ainsworth should have been rated to the rate in question at all, or should have paid any rates in respect of it. Secondly, that, supposing the rate in question was a rate to which Thomas Ainsworth ought to have been rated, that then the request of Mr. Shaw to the assistant overseer to insert the names of Messrs. Dugdale's tenants in the rate-book was, under the circumstances, a sufficient claim to be rated on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth, and that no rates being payable until they became due on the said December 10, 1867, no payment or tender was necessary until that day. Thirdly, that, supposing the rates became due on publication of the rate in August, and not on demand, the subsequent payment of the tenants' rates as made on December 10 aforesaid by Mr. Shaw was a sufficient payment by Thomas Ainsworth, within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30, to render the said claim to be rated a valid claim, and to justify the overseers in putting the name of Thomas Ainsworth on the said rate.

I decided that the rate in question was made when it was signed, allowed and published in the month of August, 1867, and not on April 18 in the said year, as was contended on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth; that therefore it was a rate made during the twelve months immediately preceding July 31, 1868, and that Thomas Ainsworth ought to have been rated to it in respect of the premises No. 14, Low Water Street, so occupied by him as aforesaid, before the said rate was signed, allowed and published, in order to entitle him (in the absence of a sufficient claim to be rated, and an actual payment or tender there and then of the rates due) to have his name inserted in the said list of voters on the said last-mentioned day of July.

Secondly, that the request of Mr. Shaw to the assistant overseer to insert the names of the tenants of John Dugdale & Brothers in the rate-book was not, under the circumstances, as stated above, a sufficient claim to be rated on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth.

Thirdly, that the rate became due on the publication thereof, and before demand by the overseer; and that even if the request of Mr. Shaw to the overseer to insert the names of John Dugdale & Brothers' tenants in the rate-book amounted in law to a sufficient claim to be rated, that, nevertheless the subsequent payment of the tenants' rates by Mr. Shaw, by cheque, on December 10 aforesaid, was not, under all the circumstances, a sufficient payment within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30. to render such claim to be rated a valid claim, and I expunged the name of Thomas Ainsworth from the said list. Due notice of appeal from my decision was given.

If the Court should be of opinion that my decision on the first point was wrong, and that the rate in question was made on April 18, 1867, and not when it was allowed, signed and published, in the month of August in the same year, then the register is to be amended by retaining the name of Thomas Ainsworth on the said list of voters, and there will remain no further question for the Court to decide. If the Court, on the other hand, should be of opinion that my decision on the above point was right, then the opinion of the Court is further requested, first, whether under the circumstances as stated, there was any sufficient claim on behalf of Thomas Ainsworth to be rated to the said rate of August 16, 1867, within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30; secondly, whether the payment by Mr. Shaw of the tenants' rates, and of the rates of Thomas Ainsworth amongst the number, was, under the circumstances stated above, a sufficient payment within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. 45. s. 30, to render such claim to be rated valid. If the Court should be of opinion that my decision was wrong on both the above points, then the register is to be amended by retaining the name of Thomas Ainsworth on the said list of voters.

Quain (Shield with him), for the appellant.—First, the rate was made before the year of occupation. It is said on the other side that the signing of the declaration by the overseers constitutes the making: but this is not so. Before the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. there was no necessity for any declaration, and at that time the making must clearly have been the drawing up of the rate. Then, by that statute, a certain Act was superadded to the making of the rate, and the words of the statute and form of declaration treat the making of the rate as something which had taken place before the signing of the declaration, for the Act says it shall be before "the rate" is allowed, and the form speaks of "the above rate" being correct. The Queen v. Barrat (2 Dougl. 465) and Lorant v. Scadding (13 Q.B. Rep. 687; 3 H.L. C. 418; 16 L. J. M.C. 163; 19 L. J. M.C. 5) fortify this view, the former shewing it was thought that the rate might be altered till allowed, and the latter also shewing that the signature related back. If reliance be put on the provision in 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96, that if not signed the rate is to be a nullity, the answer is that 17 Geo. 2. c. 3. contains similar words as to the publication, without which a rate has been decided to be a nullity—Sibbald v. Roderick (11 Ad. & E. 38; 9 L. J. M.C. 76); Fox v. Davis (6 Com. B. Rep. 11; 18 L. J. C.P. 48; 2 Lutw. 97); and yet it cannot be contended that the publication is the making of the rate. Again, if the signature of the declaration does not relate back to the drawing up of the rate great difficulties will be presented in cases where people leave their houses between the investigation of the overseers and the signing, which may be long afterwards, for no time or date is prescribed, and 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. will not get over these difficulties. For these reasons, the signature should be taken to relate back to the actual making, which must be taken to be at the date at the head of the rate. At all events, the drawing up of the rate is part of the making, and therefore, as it has been decided in Jones v. Bubb (38 L. J. C.P. 57) that the rate must be entirely made within the year, this rate was not made within the year according to the construction already given to the Representation of the People Act, 1867. Secondly, by the arrangements between landlord and tenant, the landlord was to pay the rates and charge a higher rent, and it has been decided that this is a payment by the tenant. This being so, the landlord had authority to claim for the tenant to have his name put on, at all events at the time of payment, if not before; and even if this be not so, the landlord's act was ratified by the tenant appearing and claiming his vote.

Manisty (who was desired only to address himself to the second point), for the respondent.—It never was the intention of the legislature that the landlord should put the tenant on the rate against his will and without communication with him; and the ratification was ineffectual as too late, even if there were one, which, it is submitted, there was not.—(He was then stopped.)

Bovill, C.J.—The first question is, whether the appellant has during the qualifying year of occupation "been rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor, in respect of such premises." This depends on whether a rate professing to be made before that year, but signed by the overseers, allowed by the Justices and published within the year, was a rate made within the year. It is said that it is not, because on its face it professes to be made on April 18, 1867, and that it must be deemed to have been made at that date. We have already decided, in Jones v. Bubb (38 L. J. C.P. 57), that a rate must be completely made as respects the signing by the overseers, and the allowance by the Justices within the year; but a new point is now raised, and it is said that the rate must be assumed to be made by the overseers before it is signed, and must be taken to be made by them at the date put in the heading. It is difficult to say when it is made by them, unless when it is signed. If it be not, when can it be said to be made by the overseers? Is it when they commence putting down the names, or when they have completed a few columns? Or, supposing they believe they have completed, and discovering afterwards that they must alter it, do so, is it then? Whatever may have been the difficulty before the year 1836, the matter is put at rest by the Parochial Assessment Act, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96, passed in that year, because section 2 of that Act enacts, that the churchwardens and overseers "shall, before the rate is allowed by the Justices, sign the declaration given at the foot of the said form, and otherwise the said rate shall be of no force or validity"; and in The Queen v. Fordham (11 Ad. & E. 73; 9 L. J. M.C. 3) it was held that though the precise form given by the Act need not be followed, yet if the declaration be omitted the rate is a nullity. And looking to the statute and various laws relating to this matter, I think that a rate is not made within the Representation of the People Act, 1867, till it is signed. Then as to the date on its face, primâ facie that may be the date of the making, but if the date be wrong this may be shewn, and if this rate was not made till August, then the heading is not sufficient to make it a rate made on the day there mentioned; and therefore this rate was made within the qualifying year. The cases of Lorant v. Scadding (13 Q.B. Rep. 687; 3 H.L. C. 418; 16 L. J. M.C. 163; 19 L. J. M.C. 5) and The Queen v. Barrat (2 Dougl. 465) have no application.

The next question is, whether, if the rate were made within the qualifying year, the appellant has been rated and paid the rate. His name was not originally on the rate, and therefore he cannot be considered to have been rated in the ordinary sense; but by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30. a tenant is allowed, on claiming to be rated and tendering or paying the rate, to be put on the rate; and it is said that the appellant has complied with this section, and therefore is in the same position as if he had originally been on. No doubt one of his landlords, in a sense, claimed that the appellant should be put on, and his name was inserted in the manner described in the case, on or before December 10, 1867. According to the arrangements between the landlords and the tenant, they had been in the habit of paying the rates and charging a higher rent, and it was a matter of indifference who was on the rate; but the landlord, without any communication with the tenant, had his name inserted in the rate, and had no authority from him to do so. It is, hoever, said, that there was a ratification of the landlord's act by the tenant appearing before the Revising Barrister, and that this ratification had a retrospective effect. Assume, however, that the claim by the landlord was on behalf of the tenant, Bird v. Brown (4 Ex. Rep. 786; 19 L. J. Ex. 154) shews that a ratification, to be of any effect, must take place at a time and under circumstances when the ratifying party might himself have lawfully done the act which he ratifies; and if this be so, the ratification was not sufficient in this case, as there was none until the qualifying year had expired. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister was right, and should be affirmed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the rate was void till signed, and though there may possibly be cases where the signing has a retrospective effect, as to which I will offer no opinion, for the purposes of this case it has not. As respects the ratification, I also agree with what has already been said, and will only add that by 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 40. the duty of the Revising Barrister is thus laid down: "Every such Barrister shall then require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding, to have his name inserted in the list of voters," so that the question for the Barrister to decide is whether rebus sic stantibus, the person was then entitled.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the rate was, for the purposes of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, not made before August, when it was first authenticated by the signatures of the overseers. Looking to the form given in 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. my opinion is, that it was the intention of the legislature that the date of the rate and the signing by the overseers should be contemporaneous; but it is not necessary to decide this. Cases of inconvenience, which may arise from dating the rate far back, have been put during the argument, and it is to be hoped that after this decision overseers may be more particular in making the declaration and the date as nearly contemporaneous as possible, and in getting the rate allowed and published as soon after as may be. I also agree that there was no claim within 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30; the legislature provides most clearly that the claim to be rated should be, by an act of the will of the party, for it provides that the omitted person is to claim; and it is not necessary to say whether there was a ratification or not, as it is sufficient to say that if the ratification be after the qualifying year has expired the claim is not sufficient. No doubt the arrangements here between landlord and tenant would have enabled the claimant to acquire the franchise if it was wished; but the course pointed out by section 30. has not been pursued, and therefore it has not been acquired.

BRETT, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister was right. I think it is plain that within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, the rate was made within the year of occupation; and that there is no pretence for saying there was a claim to be rated by appearance before the Barrister, and equally no pretence for saying there was a ratification. Whether or not a ratification can be sufficient, here, at all events, it is quite clear that the ratification, not being till after the year of occupation, was insufficient, as a man cannot ratify at a time when he cannot do the original act.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—County Vote—Notice of Objection to 12l. Occupier.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The notice of objection to an occupier of a tenement of the rateable value of 12l., put on the list of voters by the overseers, must state the grounds of objection.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the South-West Division of South Lancashire.

CASE.

One John Alderson was inserted in the list, published by the overseers of the township of Bootle-cum-Linacre, in the said Division, of persons entitled to vote, as the occupier, as owner or tenant, of lands or tenements within the said Division of the county, of the rateable value of 12*l.* or upwards, in respect of a house occupied by him in Derby Road, in the said township.

Richard Bennett, the appellant, objected to the name of the said John Alderson being retained on such list.

The facts were these: A notice of objection against the name of the said John Alderson being so retained, had been duly served upon the overseers of the said township by the appellant, but the notice of objection, which was also duly served upon the said John Alderson, by the said appellant, was as follows:

"Derby Road.

"To Mr. John Alderson.

"I hereby give you notice that I object to your name being retained in the list of voters for the South-West Division of the County of Lancaster.

"Dated this 17th day of August, 1868.

Signed) "RICHARD BENNETT, of No. 18, Upper Beau Street, in the township of Everton, in the county of Lancaster, on the Register of Voters for the parish of Liverpool."

It was objected on behalf of the said John Alderson, that such notice of objection was bad in law, because the ground or grounds of objection were not specifically stated therein, by naming the column or columns of the list on which the objector grounded his objection, pursuant to the 6th section of The County Voters' Registration Act, 1865.

On the other hand, it was contended by the appellant that the form of notice of objection given in No. 2, Schedule A. of The County Voters' Registration Act, 1865, clearly pointed out that the notices wherein the grounds of objection were required to be specifically stated were only those to be given to parties already on the register, and that although the list of 12*l.* occupiers might not strictly be a "list of claimants," it was in the nature of a list of claimants, whilst it was most certainly not "the register"; and that, therefore, a general notice of objection given to such occupier, in the form directed by the 7th section of the principal Act (6 Vict. c. 18.) was a valid notice of objection.

I decided that the said John Alderson was not a claimant within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and the Registration Acts therein referred to, and that therefore the said general notice of objection was bad; and I retained the name of the said John Alderson upon the list of voters.

If the Court of Common Pleas should be of that opinion, the list is to stand without amendment; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the list is to be amended by expunging the name of the said John Alderson from the said list.

M'Intyre (W. T. Charley with him), for the appellant.—The provision in the 6th section of 28 Vict. c. 36, which requires the notice of objection to a county voter to state the nature of the objection, applies only to a notice of objection given to persons whose names are on the register of voters for the county, and does not apply to the new 12*l.* occupation franchise conferred by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, because the person claiming such new franchise are in the nature of claimants, and therefore a general notice of objection to them is sufficient. There is no reason why a general objection should not suffice in this case, as well as in that of a claimant under the old system, or rather the case is an à fortiori one, for the claimant under the old system has to prove several matters, whereas here only one thing in reality is to be proved. There are two classes of persons, those who have established their rights and those who have not; and the intention is that the former must have a specific objection, but not the others, who are to be prepared to prove everything; and the new 12*l.* occupiers fall within this latter class: they have never been on before, and are only put on for a year. This new franchise is given by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 6, and by section 30 of that Act, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. s. 17, it is provided that the new voters are to be put on the list by the same process as that which applied to 10*l.* occupiers in boroughs. This procedure is given by 6 Vict. c. 18, which, in section 13, provides for the overseers making out a list of persons entitled to vote, and in section 17 says that the notice of objection to such persons shall be according to Form 11. in Schedule B, which is general and not specific; whilst sections 37, 38 and 39 provide for persons omitted coming and proving their qualification and being opposed by an objector. And as respects 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. s. 6, Form 2 in the Schedule, is altogether inapplicable.

C. Crompton, for the respondent.—By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 56, the existing regulations are to apply; by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 56. s. 6, a special notice is to be given, except in the case of a claimant, and Alderson was not a claimant, but a person put on the list by the overseers.—(He was then stopped.)

BOVILL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister was right, and that the notice was insufficient, because the ground of objection was not specifically stated. The express object of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. was to require specific objections in every case but that of a person described as a "claimant," and looking to the legislation as to lists of voters, I think that Alderson was not a claimant. If this had been the case of a borough voter, he certainly would not have been a claimant, but a person placed on the list by the overseers, who are in a position to be likely to know who are entitled to the franchise; and by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. the same machinery that was provided for forming the register of occupiers in boroughs is to apply to the case of 12*l.* occupiers in counties. That being so, there are also express enactments as to what is to be the list of voters for counties. According to the early Acts, it was the copy of the old register and the list of voters who sent in their claims. The 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. added a new class, viz., the 12*l.* occupiers, and, by section 17 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, express provision was made that persons omitted by the overseers might claim to be inserted, like persons omitted from a borough list; and by section 19 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. it is enacted that there is to be a separate list of the county voters qualified by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, which is to be deemed part of the list of voters. When this Act had passed, the list of county voters consisted of the copy of the old register and the list of claimants prepared by the overseers from the claims sent to them, with the addition of the 12*l.* occupiers; but it is not said that the list of persons claiming to be placed on the 12*l.* list is to be part of the list of voters, and the very fact that this express enactment as to the list made out by the overseers being part of the list of voters is entirely silent as to persons who send in claims shews that the latter are only claimants. Again, as respects persons strictly claimants, the objection in boroughs was not for the purpose of compelling them to prove their qualification (for they were obliged to do so), but in order to let in the objector, and therefore a general notice was allowed; whether there be an objection or not, the claim in either case in a borough is to be proved. That being so, the object of the statute is, to put the making of the list of 12*l.* occupiers in counties on the same footing as that of 10*l.* occupiers in boroughs. By section 59 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, that Act, so far as is consistent with it, is to be construed as one with the Registration Acts, and we must endeavour to put a consistent interpretation on the whole. The question in this particular case arises on section 6. of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, which provides, that "any notice of objection to any person on the list of claimants . . . may be given according to the provisions of the 7th section of the principal Act; but, with that exception, no notice of objection given under the provisions of the said 7th section, other than a notice to the overseers, shall be valid unless the ground or grounds of objection be specifically stated therein." We ought to give effect to this useful section if we can; and, in my opinion, it is applicable to this case. I think Alderson was not a claimant, and that a specific objection was required. It is true that the words used in the section for shewing what is sufficient in stating the grounds are not applicable, but we ought not to reject what is applicable because another part of the section does not apply, especially as "no notice of objection" (unless within the exceptions) is to be valid unless the grounds are specifically stated. It has also been contended that Form 2 in the Schedule A to 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. is to control section 6 of the Act; but I think it has not that effect. I am therefore of opinion that Alderson was not a claimant, and that the Revising Barrister was right.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question entirely depends on section 6 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. Alderson was put on the list by the overseers, and did not himself claim. If he was a claimant the exception would apply, but not being one he was not within the exception, and was therefore within the requirement that a special notice is necessary. Form 2 in the schedule, to which reference has been made, is not repugnant, and section 6 is imperative.

KEATING, J.—I also agree that the decision of the Revising Barrister should be confirmed. I have had considerable and still have some doubt whether Alderson was not a claimant within the section, but the rest of the Court are clear that he was not and my doubts are not sufficiently strong to induce me to differ, especially as the rule now laid down seems to me to be according to the spirit of the statutes.

BRETT, J.—The question may be divided into three: first, what was the law before the statutes 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58? secondly, has that law been altered by those statutes? thirdly, if not, how is the old law to be applied to the present case? The first question depends on 6 Vict. c. 18. and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. By these statutes notices of objection may be given to anyone on a list of voters for the county, those on the old register to have a special objection, those who have claimed and who are put on the list of claimants to have only a general one; and as at this time these were the only lists of voters, the form in the schedule was framed accordingly. This seems to me to be the true construction of section 6 of 28 ' 29 Vict. c. 36. Secondly, this being the law, was it altered by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58? It is said that it was altered by section 17 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, but I do not think that it was, for this section applies to the mode of making up the lists, not to the mode of giving notices of objection. And in my opinion section 19, which was relied on, alters the law no more than section 17; nor does section 30 alter it. Therefore I am of opinion that the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. did not alter the then existing law as to notices of objection in counties, and that the legislature declined to deal with that part of the case. Then, thirdly, how are we to apply the old forms of the law to this case? Now, it seems to me clear that Alderson was not a claimant, for he has not claimed, but the overseer has acted on his own motion; yet there are to be claims, for those omitted by the overseers may claim—31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. s. 17. How is this state of things to be met? Section 59 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. says that the old Registration Acts are to apply; and by section 6 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. claimants are to have only a general objection, and those not claiming, that is, all others, are entitled to a specific objection. And as we are told to adapt the old regulations to the new state of things, the specific notice is to be given as nearly as may be in the old specific form. It appears to me, therefore, that the Revising Barrister was right.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—County Vote—Notice of Objection—Description of Abode of Objector.

ELECTION LAW. A.—In a notice of objection the abode of the objector was simply put as "Bronygraig." Evidence was tendered to shew that the person objected to, on going to C., the town and parish where the property qualifying the objector was, could easily have found the objector by inquiry, and that Bronygraig was well known there, and could easily be found. The Revising Barrister decided that the notice was bad in law on its face, and could not be affected by such evidence, or by the fact that, under the particular circumstances, the notice gave the requisite information:—Held, that the sufficiency of the description of the objector's place of abode was matter of evidence, and that the decision was wrong.

This was a case stated by the Revising Barrister for the county of Merioneth.

CASE.

At a Court, held at Corwen, in the county of Merioneth, on September 14, 1868, to revise the list of voters for the several parishes in the county of Merioneth, Walter Butler Clough Jones objected to the name of Thomas Pritchard being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in respect of property situate within the parish of Llandrillo.

The name of Thomas Pritchard appeared on the register of voters thus:

Christian Name and Surname, &c.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, &c.
Pritchard, Thomas	Plassdinam.	Rateable Value above 12*l.*	Plassdinam.

The notice of objection was duly served, and was in the following form:

"To Mr. Thomas Pritchard.

"Take notice that I object to your name being retained in the Llandrillo list of voters for the county of Merioneth.—Dated the 18th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1868.

(Signed) "WALTER BUTLER CLOUGH JONES,
of Bronygraig,
On the register of voters for the parish of Corwen."

The notice of objection to the overseers was duly served and published, and was in the following form:

"To the Overseers of the Parish of Llandrillo.

"I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of the person mentioned and described below being retained on the list of voters for the county of Merioneth.

"Dated the 18th day of August, in the year 1868.

(Signed) "WALTER BUTLER CLOUGH JONES,
(Place of abode) "Bronygraig."

Christian and Surname of the Voter objected to as described in the List.	Place of Abode as described.	Nature of Qualification as described.	Street, Lane or other like Place where the Qualifying Property is situate, as described in the List.
Pritchard, Thomas	Plassdinam.	Rateable value above 12*l.*	Plassdinam.

The said Walter Butler Clough Jones is described on the register as residing at Plasyndre, Corwen, but he has left that house, and for some months past he has resided at Bronygraig, distant about one mile from the town of Corwen.

It was argued on the part of the said Thomas Pritchard that the description of the place of abode of the objector was insufficient on its face, and could not be deemed in point of law a good description of the place of abode without adding Corwen, the nearest town to the place called Bronygraig, Corwen being also the name of the parish.

On the part of the objector it was argued that evidence was admissible to shew that the notice gave reasonable information to the person objected to. It was accordingly proved, and admitted, that if Thomas Pritchard went to Corwen, the town and parish in which the qualifying property of the objector is situated, the objector would be easily found on inquiry there, and that Bronygraig is well known there, and could be found without any difficulty.

I decided that the notice was bad in law on its face, and could not be affected by such evidence or by the fact that, under the particular circumstances, the notice gave the requisite information.

The qualifications of the said Thomas Pritchard were inquired into, and if I had been of opinion that the notices of objection were valid his name would have been expunged from the list of voters in which it appears.

If the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that my decision as to the insufficiency in law of the description of the place of abode of the objector was wrong, the name of the said Thomas Pritchard should be expunged from the register of voters for the county of Merioneth.

Dowdeswell, on behalf of the appellant, cited Thackway v. Pilcher (36 L. J. C.P. 73).

R. E. Turner, on behalf of the respondent, cited Woollett v. Davis (4 Com. B. Rep. 115; 1 Lutw. 607; 16 L. J. C.P. 185).

BOVILL, C.J.—The decision of the Revising Barrister was "that the notice was bad in law on its face, and could not be affected by such evidence or by the fact that, under the particular circumstances, the notice gave the requisite information." We must take it that the notice gave the requisite information, and there is no authority for saying it is bad on its face. If it be doubtful whether it gave the requisite information, that is matter of evidence. The description might or might not give such information, and we cannot say whether it is bad or not, and therefore it cannot be said to be bad on its face.

BYLES, J.—According to this decision, even if the description had been Alton Towers or Blenheim it would be bad, and no evidence could cure it. The decision is wrong.

KEATING, J., and BRETT, J., concurred.

Decision reversed.

Parliament—County Vote—Notice of Objection—Description of Objector's Abode.

ELECTION LAW. A.—If an objector to prove service of his notice of objection, produce a duplicate stamped at the post-office, and the person objected to then produce the notice actually served to prove the duplicate incorrect, the objector may rely on this notice actually served.

In a notice of objection the abode of the objector was described thus—"(Place of abode as described on the register), 22, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.; (present place of abode), 110, Guilford Street, Russell Street, W.C."; the Revising Barrister decided this case misleading: First, because it did not state in what city, town or place Guilford Street, Russell Street, W.C., was situate; secondly, because in the W.C. district there was only one Russell Street, viz., Russell Street, Covent Garden, a long distance from Guilford Street, and another street called Great Russell Street, also a long distance therefrom:—Held, that as the reasons were given the Court would review the decision, and that, as there was only one Guilford Street in the W.C.

district, and a person taking the whole notice together would conclude the present direction was London, W.C., the decision was wrong.

This was a case stated by the Revising Barrister for the Eastern Division of the County of Kent.

CASE.

At the Court holden at Deal, on September 26 last, for the revision of the lists of voters for the parish of Deal, in the polling district of Deal, the names of Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst appeared in the official list of persons objected to by third parties, as not entitled to be registered or to vote. On the motion of the agent for the said Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst, I called upon the objector, Frederic Norris, to prove due service of his notices of objection upon the said Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst, whereupon the said objector produced in proof thereof documents purporting to be duplicates of notices sent by him, by post, to each of the said Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst, under and subject to the regulations of the 100th and 101st sections of 6 Vict. c. 18, stamped by the postmaster at Charing Cross as being such duplicates, which alleged duplicates were regular in all respects; and wherein the place of the abode of the said objector, as stated on the register, and his true then present place of abode, were described thus: "(Signed) Frederic Norris; (place of abode as described on the register), 22, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.; (present place of abode), 110, Guilford Street, Russell Square, W.C." Whereupon, in disproof of such service, the agent for Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst, the persons objected to, produced the original documents or notices which had been actually received by each of them (so received within due time and by post), which corresponded in all respects with the alleged duplicates thereof produced in evidence by the said objector, except as follows: In the notices so received by Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst, the place of abode of the objector on the register, and his true then present place of abode were described thus: "(Signed) Frederic Norris; (place of abode described on the register), 22, Southampton Street, Bloomsbury, London, W.C.; (present place of abode), 110, Guilford Street, Russell Street, W.C."

I decided that due service of the notices of objection upon Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst had not been proved, inasmuch as the stamped documents produced by the objector in proof of such service were not duplicates of the original notices, as required by the same 100th and 101st sections of 6 Vict. c. 18, but differed therefrom in an essential particular, namely, the true then present place of abode of the said objector—held necessary to be stated therein by the Court of Common Pleas, in the cases of Melbourne v. Greenfield (K. & G. 261; 29 L. J. C.P. 81) and Courtis v. Blight (K. & G. 475; 31 L. J. C.P. 48), and that consequently the objector had not complied with the regulations prescribed by the said statute for the service through the post-office of such notices; such regulations requiring that the notice sent to the person objected to, and the stamped document produced by the objector to prove due service thereof, should be duplicates.

Upon such decision being given, the objector claimed to take up the notice so produced by the agent for Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst (in disproof of due service of notices of objection upon them), and to make them evidence on his the objector's behalf, that a proper formal notice of objection had been duly served upon and received by each of the said Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst from him the said Frederic Norris, contending that the words "Russell Street" were surplusage, and that there was no other No. 110 in Guilford Street in London.

Upon such contention I decided—first, that the last-mentioned original document or notice, although so produced by or on behalf of the persons objected to, for the particular purpose of disproof before mentioned, could not, under the circumstances, be made evidence to prove due service of a notice of objection upon either of them. Because the objector having elected to adopt the particular mode of service of notices by post, pointed out and regulated by the said 100th section of 6 Vict. c. 18, and having failed in proving the same, had no longer any locus standi in the Court of Revision. And because no mode of service of any notice of objection by post is provided by the said statute, except in conformity with and subject to the regulations prescribed by the 100th and 101st sections thereof, which in these instances had not been complied with. Secondly, I further decided that the last-mentioned notices themselves were upon the merits informal and invalid, inasmuch as the description therein of the objector's then true present place of abode was incorrect, defective, misleading, and not set forth so as commonly to be understood, especially by persons resident at a distance from London. Because the same do not state in what city, town or place Guilford Street, Russell Street, W.C., is situate. Because, in fact, there is (in ordinary parlance) no such street within the western central postal district of London as Guilford Street, Russell Street, there being only one Russell Street simpliciter therein, namely, Russell Street, Covent Garden, which is a long distance from Guildford Street, and has no connexion therewith, and another street called Great Russell Street, which is also a considerable distance from Guilford Street, and does not adjoin thereto, and is in another parish.

On these grounds I decided that the said notices of objections were wholly invalid; and I retained the names of Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst on the list of voters for the parish of Deal.

If the Court should be of the contrary opinion, the names of Edward Appleton and Thomas Wilmhurst ought to be struck out of the same list of voters.

Manisty (Lumley Smith with him), for the appellant.—As respects the first point, it is impossible to conceive how the decision can be supported.

[The COURT expressed a decided opinion that this was so.]

And as to the second, the case is decided by Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34), for the voter would clearly see that the direction was London, and could have no difficulty in finding Guilford Street, and as there does not appear to be more than one in the W.C. district; and the Court can see from the notice that this is so, and that the reasons for the decision are wrong, and will reverse it.

Tindal Atkinson, Serjeant, for the respondent.—As the Court seems clearly of opinion that the decision on the first point is wrong, it will not be pressed. As respects the second, there is nothing to shew that the objector was living in London. The old direction cannot be looked to in aid of the new one; nor, even if it can, does it follow that the new one is in London. There was a Russell Street in the district which would mislead, and the Barrister has decided as a fact that the direction was insufficient and calculated to mislead; and as this is the case of a vote for the county of Kent, Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34) does not apply, because there it was a borough vote, and so the direction was taken to be in the borough.—[He referred to Knowles v. Brooking (2 Com. B. Rep. 226; 15 L. J. C.P. 197), Melbourne v. Greenfield (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 1; 29 L. J. C.P. 81) and Woollett v. Davis (4 Com. B. Rep. 115; 16 L. J. C.P. 185).]

Manisty, in reply.—Putting merely a district may be sufficient—Thackway v. Pilcher (36 L. J. C.P. 73).

BOVILL, C.J.—As a general rule the Revising Barrister is to decide a matter of fact; and though in some cases it is difficult to distinguish whether a matter is one of law or fact, and it may be a mixed question of law and fact, yet where the matter is one of fact, the Court, as a general rule, will not interfere. But in the present case the Revising Barrister has given his reasons for his decision, referred to us the question whether they are sufficient, and decided that if they be not we are to reverse his decision; and this being so the Court will entertain the question. In my opinion, neither of the grounds on which the Revising Barrister decided the notice of objection to be bad is to be supported. We must construe the notice by the words used on its face; and I think that any person reading the notice would conclude that the present abode was in London, W.C., as well as the one on the register, and that the case is, as respects this point, not distinguishable from Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34). And as respects the words "Russell Street" being used, there was but one 110, Guildford Street in the W.C. district; and I think the use of Russell Street by mistake for Russell Square was not such a misdescription as vitiates the notice. Both the grounds on which the Revising Barrister decided being bad, and the Court being unable to find any other ground on which the decision can be supported, we think it should be reversed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34) Coltman, J., said, "It is not necessary for the Barrister to give his reasons, but if we saw enough on the face of the document to shew that the statement was not reasonably sufficient, we should say as a matter of law that his decision was wrong." Here the Barrister has given his reasons, and asks our opinion thereon, and I think that they are invalid, and that the decision should be reversed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the notice had not contained the former direction I should have felt considerable difficulty, but the whole notice is to be looked to in order to decide whether practically the voter would understand where the objector lived; and I agree that the words "London, W.C.," may, without straining, be connected with the description of the present abode, in the absence of evidence of the voter having been actually misled. The general rule is, that the Revising Barrister is the judge of matters of fact; but here his reasons are given with the intention that we should decide as to their propriety; and we differ from him, and therefore his decision should be reversed. As to the other point, it has hardly even been argued that the Barrister was right, and it is unnecessary to notice it.

BRETT, J.—In Woollett v. Davis (4 Com. B. Rep. 115; 16 L. J. C.P. 185) it was decided that the register could not be coupled with the notice to make the latter good; but in Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34) the direction "Sherborne Street" was aided by the word "Cheltenham" in another part of the notice, and it was held that if, taking the whole notice, the voter would understand where the objector lived, it was sufficient; and it was further held, that though the sufficiency was matter of fact, yet, if the Court can see that the direction is sufficient, it will hold it so, whatever be the finding of the Barrister. And I think that here it is sufficient on the face of the notice, and that this case is within Sheldon v. Flatcher (5 Com. B. Rep. 14; 17 L. J. C.P. 34).

Parliament—Consolidated Appeals—6 Vict. c. 18. s. 44.—Practice.

ELECTION LAW. A.—If appeals have been consolidated by the Revising Barrister which do not depend upon the same point of law, the Court will dismiss the consolidated appeal.

This was a consolidated appeal, raising the question as to the validity of certain notices of objection for not stating therein the grounds of objection. It appeared that some of the persons objected to were women, but whose names had been retained by the Revising Barrister on the list of voters, whilst the other persons objected to were men. The Revising Barrister, considering the objections depended on the same point of law, had consolidated the appeals.

Mellish, for the appellant, admitted that there was a difficulty in hearing this case, as the Court had decided that women were not entitled to vote, and the rights of the parties to the present consolidated appeal were therefore different. The appeals ought not to have been consolidated under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 4.—Prior v. Waring (5 Com. B. Rep. 56; 17 L. J. C.P. 73) and Robson v. Brown (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 34; 26 L. J. C.P. 81).

Manisty (W. T. Charley with him) appeared for the respondent.

BOVILL, C.J.—Since those cases of Prior v. Waring (5 Com. B. Rep. 56; 17 L. J. C.P. 73) and Robson v. Brown (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 34; 26 L. J. C.P. 81) the practice has been to dismiss appeals improperly consolidated which do not depend on the same point of law. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. When either the facts or points of law are different, the practice has been to dismiss the consolidated appeal, and the cases which have been cited seem to shew that it is on the ground of there being no jurisdiction to hear it.

KEATING, J.—It is impossible to distinguish this case from those which have been cited, and which shew we have no jurisdiction to hear such an appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Marine Insurance—Perils of the Sea—Negligence of Crew.

MARINE INSURANCE. D.—By a policy in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, in which the perils insured against were "of the seas," &c., "and all other perils, losses," &c., goods were insured at and from any port in Jamaica in a certain steamer. Shortly after the goods were put on board, and whilst the vessel was in port, sea water penetrated into the hold of the vessel and damaged the goods. The water, to the height of several feet, remained there for about six hours, and the pumps failing to reduce it were discontinued for a short time, when survey having been made of the vessel without discovering any leakage the pumps were resumed, and the water began immediately to reduce rapidly, and ultimately the vessel became free of water. The report made on such survey was that the vessel was seaworthy, and the conclusion come to by the surveyors was that the main discharge-pipe from the engine-room becoming below the water level, when the goods had been put on board, the water could have found its way beneath the valve in such discharge-pipe and through the valves of the air-pump, bucket, &c., when if any cocks or valves had been inadvertently left open the water would have found its way into the ship, and so the accident would be accounted for:—Held, that the injury to the goods by the water so getting into the vessel by the negligence of the crew in leaving cocks or valves open as suggested was a loss caused by the perils insured against.

This was an action brought to recover an average loss upon three policies of insurance, which were declared to follow and succeed one another, for 5,000*l.* each, upon coffee, sugar, pimento, and other produce, at and from Jamaica to New York, in the vessel "Montezuma."

The cause came on for trial, before Bovill, C.J., at the London Sittings

after Hilary Term, 1868, when, by consent, a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a SPECIAL CASE, and the following are the material facts which were stated therein:

The plaintiffs, who were merchants, at Kingston, in Jamaica, under the firm of Davidson, Colthirst & Co., effected with the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, the three policies of insurance on which this action was brought, and copies of which were annexed to and formed part of the case. The policies were upon coffee, sugar, pimento, and other produce at and from any port or place in Jamaica to New York, in the ship the "Montezuma." Each was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, in which the risks which the assurers were contented to bear were stated as in the ordinary printed form to be "of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of marc and countermarc, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people, of what nation, condition or quality soever; barratry of the master and mariners, and all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall come, to the hurt, detriment or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof."

On February 5, 1866, certain goods within the meaning of the policy were shipped by the plaintiffs on board the said vessel the "Montezuma," at Kingston, a port in Jamaica within the meaning of the said policy.

On the following morning it was discovered that sea-water had penetrated into the hold of the said vessel, and the goods so loaded were greatly damaged thereby.

The vessel and cargo were then surveyed, and, by agreement between the parties, the following report of the survey, and also the protest of the master of the "Montezuma," were to be read and received as evidence of the facts set forth therein, and as if the several parties by whom the said documents respectively purport to have been signed had deposed to the statements in the said documents respectively made, and the facts stated therein were for the purposes of this case admitted to be true:

"Report of Survey.

"Kingston, Jamaica, February 8, 1866.

"We, the undersigned, having been called on by Messrs. Davidson, Colthirst & Co., consignees, and Joseph Hamshaw, master, of the steamship "Montezuma," now lying alongside the wharf in the port of Kingston, to survey that vessel in consequence of the discovery, 6 a.m. this morning, that there was a large quantity of water in the vessel, we proceeded on board at noon, and found her there with 8 feet 4 inches of water in the after compartment and 5 feet 6 inches of water in the foremost one, seven pumps (including two powerful fire-engines which had been procured from the shore as speedily as possible) were at work, having been found impossible to get up steam in consequence of the water being above the furnaces, but they did not reduce the height of water from that time up to 12.30. Pumping was then discontinued by our directions until 2.10, when, upon examination of the several compartments, it was found that the water had not risen. Upon measuring the difference of the level of the water on the outside and inside of the ship, it was found to be 13 feet 3 inches, the vessel's keel being at this time at least 2 feet in the soft mud; this was done to ascertain if there were any defects in the top sides. On our arrival on board we found that the cargo was being rapidly discharged, and we recommended that this should be continued, so as, if possible, to discover any leak in the vessel's bilge. Upon going to the engine-room the chief engineer, Mr. Charters, assured us that all cocks and valves leading from his department to the sea were closed, and that he had himself paid especial attention to them on the previous evening before leaving the engine-room, and that he had also looked into the engine-room and stoke-hole at 11.30 p.m., and found all right. Failing to discover any leak or appearance of a leak in the vessel and finding that the height of water in the hold remained stationary, the pumps were again set to work at 2.10 p.m., and immediately the water began to reduce rapidly, which continued up to the time of our departure at 5.40 p.m. We think it right to state that prior to our arrival Captain Hamshaw had procured the services of three divers to thoroughly examine the bottom of the ship, and as a precaution had the water-closet pipes plugged up, which pipes have since been carefully examined by us, the plugs being out, and found intact.

"Feb. 7.—Upon proceeding on board this morning at 9.30, we found that the vessel was free of water except in the after compartment, which had not been pumped out below 22 inches. Captain Hamshaw informed us that the pumps had not been at work since 5 a.m. On a thorough examination of the vessel we see no reason to suppose that she leaks to any injurious extent whatever, but that she is a sound and strongly-built vessel and thoroughly seaworthy. It appears that the bulkheads are not sufficiently water-tight, from the fact of the water having found its level throughout the ship.

"The only conclusion, after mature consideration, at which we can arrive is, that as the draft of the vessel increased in consequence of the cargo she was taking on board up to 12.30 a.m. of the 6th inst., the main discharge-pipe from the engine-room became below the water level; the water could thus find its way beneath the india-rubber valve in the discharge-pipe, and through the valves of the air-pump, bucket, &c., filling the condensers and cylinders, when if any cocks or valves, such for instance as pet cocks on cylinders and swifting valves on condensers, had been inadvertently left open the water would find its way into the ship and account for the whole accident. Such, we are of opinion, has been the case in the present instance. We recommend that a rod with a flat weight attached should be suspended through the stop of the discharge-pipe in the engine-room, so that it could be lowered and rest upon the india-rubber valve whenever the vessel is in harbour, and thus prevent any ingress of water through that pipe in future. We also recommend that the logwood in the fore and after holds be removed in order that all the loose coffee may be taken out to prevent the pumps from being choked.

(Signed) "John Simons, staff commander H.M.S. 'Aboukir.'
"Joseph D. Ellis, chief engineer H.M.S. 'Constance.'
"Thos. J. Rowe, master Brit. barque 'Clarendon.'"

The case then set out the master's protest, the facts stated in which did not differ from the facts mentioned in the above report of the survey.

At the trial the following evidence was given by Thomas Scott, a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs:

"I am an engineer and ship surveyor, and was for eleven years managing engineer to Messrs. Rennie & Co., the well-known engineers, and for twelve years at sea in the service of the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company; after that I was manager of the Humber Ironworks. I have had considerable experience in building ships and in the construction of marine-engines. I have read the report signed by Captain Simons and the others, and assuming the facts stated in the survey to be correct, in my judgment I should think the effects referred to would be likely to occur in the way mentioned, and in none more likely. Assuming the facts to be correct, there might be another mode of accounting for them: the water might get in through the bilge pumps, that is, through the pipe; by the vessel going down in the water, the leakage would take place; at least the water would get into the vessel. I say this would be quite consistent with the vessel being sound and seaworthy.—Q. "In your judgment, that vessel was seaworthy, notwithstanding what you read in the report." A. "Yes, according to what I read there. If a splinter got into the valve it would account for what I see in the report, because as the cargo went into the vessel and the aperture for the discharge got lower, there would be a sufficient passage for the water to get in."—Being cross-examined, the witness further said: "I say what occurred was quite consistent with the vessel being seaworthy. There might be nothing wrong with the construction of the valve, or there might be something wrong. I cannot answer for the construction. If the valve were broken or out of order it would be the same. A splinter might do it." On re-examination the witness further stated: "I see no trace in the survey of a broken valve, or anything of that sort. The state of the valve is a matter of no consequence when the vessel is under way. If I found the leak ceased while she was lying in the harbour, that would enable me to form an opinion as to whether it was a temporary obstruction, or anything floating in the valve. It would be possible to take a staff of any description which might touch the valve in such a way as to knock the splinter out and then become tight at the same time. If the leak ceased in the harbour, I should form the opinion that it was from a temporary accidental cause."

The declaration was in the common form upon the said policies of insurance; and the material pleas were, first, that the loss was not caused by the perils insured against; and, secondly, that the ship was unseaworthy.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether the evidence given at the trial as above mentioned was evidence which ought properly to have been left to the jury upon which they might reasonably find a verdict for the plaintiffs upon the issue joined on the plea, that the said goods were not, nor was any part thereof, lost by the perils insured against; and, secondly, whether or not the said evidence at the trial was evidence which ought properly to have been left to the jury upon which they might reasonably find a verdict for the plaintiffs on the issue joined on the plea that the said ship at the time of the commencement of the risk was not seaworthy.

Sir G. Honyman (Watkin Williams with him), for the plaintiffs.—There was evidence to go to the jury that the goods were lost by the perils insured against. They were damaged by sea-water getting into the hold of the vessel. The report of the survey shews that this arose from some temporary accidental opening of the valve in the discharge-pipe.—(He was then stopped by the Court).

Mathew (Lodge with him), for the defendant.—It is submitted that there was no evidence that the loss was brought about by any peril of the sea.

[WILLES, J.—The question is, whether it comes within the words of the policy, "and all other perils, losses," &c., which follow the enumerated perils.]

They must be perils ejusdem generis with those mentioned previously. The plaintiffs must shew a loss from a peril within the meaning of the policy. The underwriter by this policy does not insure against damage by sea-water. The burthen of proof is on the plaintiffs to shew that the loss was one within the meaning of the policy. They do not prove this by suggesting various theories for accounting for the accident. The evidence given points as much to the loss having arisen from negligence of the crew, or from some defect in the valve, as from a mere accidental cause. The recommendation in the survey to have a rod suspended through the top of the discharge-pipe, shews that the pipe or valve was considered defective in its construction. It is submitted that if the water got in through some cocks having been carelessly left open, and so did the damage to the goods, that would not be a damage by perils of the sea or perils ejusdem generis. In Pothier, Traité du Contrat d'Assurance, chap. 1. par. 49, it is said "L'assureur se charge par le contrat d'assurance des risques de tous les cas fortuits qui peuvent survenir par force majeure durant le voyage, et causer à l'assuré une perte dans les choses assurées, ou par rapport aux dites choses." A loss from rats entering holes in the ship's bottom, or from the ship being destroyed by worms, is not within the perils insured against by the common form of a policy—Hunter v. Potts (4 Campb. 203) and Rhol v. Parr (1 Esp. 446). The case of Manus v. Buttemer (11 Com. B. Rep. 876; 21 L. J. C.P. 119) also shews that the underwriter is not liable as for a loss from perils of the sea where the vessel was injured by straining in consequence of taking the ground when the tide was low whilst she was moored in harbour. In Thompson v. Whitmore (3 Taunt. 227) the ship, whilst hove down on the beach within the tideway for repair was thereby damaged, and it was held that that was not a loss occasioned by the perils of the sea.

[WILLES, J.—That was one of those unfortunate cases, in which the plaintiff was nonsuited on account of a variance of the evidence with the allegation in the pleadings. It would otherwise be inconsistent with Phillips v. Barber (5 B. & Ald. 161).]

It is submitted that Thompson v. Whitmore (3 Taunt. 227) belongs to that class of cases in which the assured has been held not entitled to recover, because the accident did not arise from any "force majeure." It was not suggested in that case that the plaintiff was rightly nonsuited by reason of any variance.

[BRETT, J.—It is treated as a case of variance in Phillips v. Barber (5 B. & Ald. 161), where Lord Tenterden says, the plaintiff there "has not entangled himself by any particular allegation, but has shewn fully the manner, time and place of the loss."]

The case of Paterson v. Harris (1 Best & S. 336; 30 L. J. Q.B. 354) also supports what is now contended for, that this was not a loss from perils of the sea. The subject of that action was a policy of insurance on the Atlantic Electric Telegraph Cable, and a loss by the ordinary action of the sea-water upon the cable was held not to be caused by perils of the sea within the meaning of the policy.

[BRETT, J.—That case would be in your favour, if the damage here was not caused by any of the cocks or valves having been negligently left open.]

It is submitted the underwriter would not be liable for a damage arising from the negligence of the crew, unless there was also a peril insured against which caused the loss. In Dixon v. Sadler (5 Mee. & W. 405; 9 L. J. Ex. 48) there was clearly the intervention of the perils of the sea as well as the conduct of the crew.

[WILLES, J.—That case shews that the negligence of the crew of the vessel insured does not stand on a different footing from the negligence of strangers. What, then, do you say to a loss from a collision with another vessel? The subject is discussed by Emérigon (See 1 Emérigon, Traité des Assurances, chap. xii. sec. 14).]

Negligence alone will not, it is submitted, render the underwriter liable—Philpot v. Swann (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 270; 30 L. J. C.P. 358). Then, as to the question whether the vessel was seaworthy when the cargo was put on board. The result of the evidence, which proved the getting in of the water without any apparent cause whilst the vessel was in port, shifted the onus of proving whether the vessel was seaworthy or not from the defendant to the plaintiffs. The statement in the evidence that she was seaworthy meant only when the vessel was on the sea; but it is quite consistent with that that when the vessel was in the port she was unfit to receive cargo—1 Parson's Maritime Law, 387.

WILLES, J.—Notwithstanding the able argument of Mr. Mathew, I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiffs. The only question is, whether there was evidence for a jury such as might reasonably have induced them to have found a verdict for the plaintiffs. So far as regards the question of seaworthiness, that is disposed of by the statement of the case and the evidence of competent persons that the ship was seaworthy; and it seems, therefore, after that, impossible for us to say that in our judgment the vessel was unseaworthy. Although the onus of proving unseaworthiness is on the underwriters, yet I agree that, if a vessel were shewn to be lost by leaking as soon as she left the port, the onus of proving her capacity for the sea would be shifted. But that does not apply here, for the owners gave an explanation in this case, and no answer was made to it by the other side. Then, assuming the vessel to have been seaworthy, the question is, whether the loss occurred by perils of the sea, or by some peril analogous thereto. If it were necessary to determine with grammatical precision whether this was a loss by perils of the sea it might—remembering the case of Thompson v. Whitmore (3 Taunt. 227)—be arguable that this was properly not a loss occasioned by the perils of the sea. The reason given in Thompson v. Whitmore (3 Taunt. 227) why the loss was not considered as occasioned by the perils of the sea was because the vessel was ashore when the damage happened to her; and the question would be, whether that would be an authority for saying that an injury from should, if necessary, have amended it, but it is not necessary to consider this, because the declaration is drawn alleging generally a loss by the perils insured against, and so raises the question considered in Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), as to what is the loss which comes within the general words of the policy, "all other perils, losses," &c. The question therefore is, not whether the loss here was strictly one occasioned by the perils of the sea, but whether it was such other loss within the policy which, of course, must be a loss of the same or a similar kind to one happening from the perils of the sea. Now, a loss from perils of the sea would include the case of a loss from another vessel coming in collision with and making a hole in the vessel, the subject of the policy, of the same capacity as that through which the water must have got into this vessel, the "Montezuma"; and whether that accident happened in port or not, in smooth water or in rough water, the underwriter would be equally liable under the policy. Then, unless some distinction can be made between a loss from an accident happening through the negligence of the crew of another vessel and a loss from an accident happening either in the way it has been suggested it did in the present case, from a splinter getting into the valve, or from such negligence of the crew, as was suggested in the report of the survey, the loss would be a loss occasioned by the perils of the sea. As to there being any such distinction between a loss caused by the negligence of the crew of the vessel insured and one caused by the negligence of the crew of another vessel, all such distinction has been swept away by the judgment of Lord Wensleydale, as I understand it, in the case of Dixon v. Sadler (12 Mee. & W. 405; 9 L. J. Ex. 48). On the whole, it is not necessary, I think, to say whether these goods were damaged by perils of the sea, as the damage to them was clearly caused by perils of the sea or the like within the words of the policy. I wish to add, that my judgment adopts the report of the survey itself as to the accident probably arising from a negligence referable to leaving cocks and valves open rather than the evidence suggesting that the accident might have happened by a splinter getting into the valve, and I only referred to that last by way of illustration.

KEATING, J.—I also am of opinion that there was clearly evidence to go to the jury which was sufficient for them to find the defendant liable in this action. There was evidence that the injury occurred not from the construction of the valve, but from a temporary accident. It seems to me that that is what may be inferred from the report of the survey. The accident was caused by a flow of sea-water which got in during the course of six hours, and the only way suggested by which it could have got in was clearly by the valve in the discharge-pipe. The pumps at first produced no effect ultimately they succeeded, and the ship became free of water. Nothing, however, had been done in the meantime, and therefore there was strong evidence that the cause of the accident was only temporary, and not the original construction of the valve. If that be so, it is clear that the loss was from a peril sufficiently akin to perils of the sea to be within the policy. As to the question of seaworthiness, there was certainly evidence sufficient to go to the jury of the vessel being seaworthy.

BRETT, J.—The underwriter declined at the trial to call any evidence, and he said then, and now contends, that there was no evidence on which the jury ought to find either that the loss was caused by the perils insured against, or that the ship was seaworthy. The question is whether there was any evidence of either of these. I agree that we ought not to take the suggestion of the witness as to a splinter getting into the valve and so causing the accident, because it is not an opinion founded on a fact proved, but a mere suggestion: but that witness agrees with the report on the survey, and that report, which is to be taken as if those who made it had given evidence on the trial and on which this case must mainly rest, explains how probably the accident happened: namely, that by reason of some cock being left open in the discharge-pipe the water got into the ship and so damaged the cargo. If that was so, the water got in, not by the happening of any ordinary occurrence in the ordinary course of a voyage, but by the accidental circumstance of some cock having been left open by the negligence of the crew. That is, in my opinion, sufficient to make the underwriter liable. The question is the same as it would have been if by the falling of a mast through the vessel, or other negligent act of the crew, the vessel had sunk in deep water; and I think the loss sufficiently comes within the doctrine of one happening by a vis major, and is within the meaning of the policy, a loss caused by the perils insured against. With reference to whether the vessel was seaworthy, I hardly think that the burthen of proof was shifted: but even if it was, I think that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that the ship was seaworthy and fit to receive the cargo.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

KNOCK v. THE METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

38 L. J. C.P. 78; L. R. 4 C.P. 131; 19 L. T. 239; 17 W. R. 10.

Railway Clauses Act — Compensation — Premises injuriously affected — Damage to Goods.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The occupier of a house and premises injuriously affected by the execution of the works of a railway company in exercise of the powers given to them by their Act of Parliament, is entitled, under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. ss. 6 and 16, to compensation for damage done to his goods in such house by reason of the exercise of such powers.

This was an action on an award made by a surveyor under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. The award contained, inter alia, the following recitals:

"Whereas George Knock, of, &c., claims and contends that in and by the execution of the works authorized by and in exercise of the powers contained in the Metropolitan Railway (Notting Hill and Brompton Extension) Act, 1864, and the several Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith, the Metropolitan Railway Company had injuriously affected the house, land and premises 27, Alfred Terrace, Queen's Road, Bayswater, in the county of Middlesex, belonging to the said George Knock; and that he, George Knock, has sustained, and would sustain, damage by reason of the injurious affecting of the said house, land and premises by the execution and use of the works so authorized as aforesaid. And whereas, by a notice in writing under the hand of the said George Knock, bearing date May 8, 1867, he, the said George Knock, gave the said company notice that he was possessed of and interested in the said house, land and premises under and by virtue of a lease, &c.; and further gave the said company notice that he required them to pay him compensation for the injurious affecting of the said house, land and premises; and that the amount of compensation claimed by him by reason of the premises was 1,650*l.*, and further gave the said company notice that, unless they were willing to pay him the said sum, and should enter into a written agreement with him for that purpose, within twenty-one days after the receipt by them of that notice, then he desired to have the amount of such compensation settled by arbitration, according to the provisions of the Act or Acts of Parliament in that behalf; and whereas the said George Knock, by an instrument, &c., did in pursuance of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in that behalf nominate and appoint me, the said W.M., to be an arbitrator on the part and behalf of him the said George Knock, to settle and determine the compensation to be paid by the said company to him the said George Knock for the damage sustained and to be sustained by him by reason of the execution by the said company of the works authorized by the first-mentioned Act, and the exercise by the said company of the powers of the said Act and the several Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith."

The award by the arbitrator on the matters so referred to him, was in the following words:

"1. I find, award, and determine that the said house, land and premises before mentioned, and the said interest of the said George Knock therein were injuriously affected by the execution of the works authorized by and in the exercise of the powers contained in the said several Acts of Parliament, and that the said George Knock has sustained and will sustain damage by reason of the injurious affecting of the said house, land and premises by the execution and use of the said works.

"2. I find, award and determine that the amount of compensation to be paid by the said company to the said George Knock, for and in respect of such injurious affecting, and of the damage so sustained, and to be sustained by him as aforesaid, is as follows:

(1) For structural damage to the said house and premises the sum of	£200	0	0
(2) For damage and injury occasioned to goods of the said George Knock therein	486	0	0
(3) For depreciation in the value of the said leasehold interest of the said George Knock in the said house, land and premises	340	0	0
Amounting in the whole to the sum of	£1,026	0	0

The action was tried, before Bovill, C.J., at the Middlesex Sittings, after last Trinity Term, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

Day now moved, pursuant to leave reserved, at the trial, for a rule nisi to set such verdict aside and to enter a verdict instead for the defendant, or to reduce the damages by 486*l*., on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover compensation for injury done to the goods upon the premises, and that the award was therefore bad in respect of its having given compensation for such injury.—The remedy for settling the claim for compensation by award is given by the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, but the right to compensation depends on the construction of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. ss. 6. and 16. Section 6 states that "in exercising the power given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions" contained in that Act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, "and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in any lands taken or used for the purpose of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the land so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company." It is submitted that this section points only to damage sustained in respect of land, and does not extend to damage in respect of goods on such land. Then, the 16th section, which gives various powers to a railway company for the purpose of constructing the railway, contains this proviso: "Provided always, that in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein and in the special Act and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." That section, it is submitted, must be read with the 6th, to which it impliedly refers, and by which it must be considered as controlled. The 68th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, which provides the remedy, is limited to cases where a person is entitled to compensation in respect of lands, or of any interest therein.

[BOVILL, C.J.—That 68th section is not the only section which provides a remedy for obtaining compensation from companies.]

No; it is admitted there are earlier sections in that Act where provisions are made for proceedings before the Justices or a jury, but the 68th section shews that in all these cases the legislature intended the compensation to be limited to injuries with respect to land, and not to mere chattels.

[KEATING, J.—If the injury has been done to the goods in the exercise of powers conferred on the company by Act of Parliament, so that the right of action has been taken away, the plaintiff is remediless if he is not entitled to compensation under the Railways Clauses Act.]

That may be so in one sense, but he has the remedy of removing the goods from the premises and so preventing their being injured, and such removal might prevent his beneficially occupying the house, and entitle him to claim for loss of such occupation; but if he is remediless that is no reason for saying the company are liable under this Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, on which alone the rights of the plaintiff are based.

BOVILL, C.J.—Mr. Day has not produced any authority in favour of the proposition for which he contends. He relies upon the meaning of the Act of Parliament. According to my experience, extending over a considerable period, no doubt has ever been suggested in a case of this description that a claimant would be entitled to compensation for damage done to property in premises where the premises have been injuriously affected by the execution of the works of a railway company. What was referred to the arbitrator? The claim was for compensation for damage "by reason of the injuriously affecting of the house, land and premises of the plaintiff, by the execution of the works so authorized as aforesaid." The appointment of the arbitrator was for the purpose of determining the amount of compensation to be paid by the company to Mr. Knock "for the damage sustained by him by reason of the execution by the company of the works authorized by the Act, and the exercise by the company of the powers of their Act and several Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith." It seems to me that this sufficiently follows the Act of Parliament in terms and in substance, and that the arbitrator was perfectly authorized to enter upon the whole question of the damage sustained by reason of the execution of the powers of the Act. The award is, that the house, land and premises, and the interest of Mr. Knock therein, were injuriously affected by the execution of the works authorized by, and in the exercise of the powers contained in, the several Acts of Parliament; and that Mr. Knock has sustained, and will sustain damage by reason of the injurious affecting of the said house, land and premises by the execution of the said works. Then the award proceeds to find and award that the amount of compensation to be paid by the company to Mr. Knock, for and in respect of such injurious affecting, and of the damage sustained and to be sustained by him, is as follows. Then follow three heads of damage; but those are all with reference to the previous terms and finding of the award. The first was for structural damage to the house, 200*l*., which is not disputed. The third is for diminution in value of the leasehold interest, which is also not disputed. Mr. Day contends that, although the claimant is entitled for injury to his house in respect of depreciation of his leasehold interest, he is not entitled to any compensation whatever for the injury that has been done to the goods which were in the house, which injury was caused by the execution of the works aforesaid, in the exercise by the company of the powers contained in their Act. Now it seems to me that the case is one distinctly within the provisions of the Act of Parliament. It is not necessary to go further than the 16th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, the Railways Clauses Act, which contains this proviso at the end, to which all the rest of the section is subject: "Provided always that, in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein, and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." This is a damage sustained by reason of the execution of such powers. Now I find no such limitation as Mr. Day suggests in that clause of the Act of Parliament, and the practice, as I said before, has been, I believe, universally to include such matters within the compensation. I think that principle has been properly adopted, and therefore there is no ground for a rule in this case.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that this is a case which falls within the very words of the 6th section of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, which section provides, first, for compensation for the value of the land where the land is taken; secondly, for compensation for the injuriously affecting the land where the land is injuriously affected and not taken; and then, further, it goes on to provide for compensation for "all damage sustained by such owners," &c., which must mean all other damage sustained by such owners, &c., since compensation for damage in respect of lands taken, or of lands injuriously affected, had already been provided for. If the damage to this personal property were such that it would not have arisen if the personal property had been removed, that is a subject for the consideration of the arbitrator; but he has found that it was damage caused by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Acts of Parliament; and therefore it seems to me that what he has done is justified by the power conferred upon him by the said 6th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.

KEATING, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. We are to take it upon this award, that the arbitrator was satisfied that the damage done to the goods in question was done in exercise of the powers conferred upon the railway company by their Acts of Parliament; and if they were, why then the remedy by action would be taken away, and, according to Mr. Day's argument, a party who had been so injured would be without remedy if compensation for such damage did not fall within the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. That is a conclusion which we would be slow to arrive at. It seems, however, to me that the case is strictly within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, because the 6th section provides, not only for the party receiving compensation for the land taken or injuriously affected, but also "for all damage sustained" by reason of the exercise of the powers given to the company by their own or such Act of Parliament; and the arbitrator finds that this damage was sustained by the exercise of such powers.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons given by my Brother Byles.

Rule refused.

Cathedral Church of St. Paul—Members of Chapter—Canons—Non-residentiary Prebendaries—Stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The non-residentiary prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul are entitled to vote at a meeting of the Chapter on the occasion of an election of a proctor to represent the Chapter in Convocation, such right being reserved by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, reported 36 L. J. C.P. 28.

The question was whether the non-residentiary prebends of the cathedral church of St. Paul were entitled to vote at a meeting of the Chapter on the occasion of an election of a proctor to represent the Chapter in Convocation, and it turned on the construction of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113.

The Court of Common Pleas had decided the question in the negative.

The facts will be found fully stated in the report of the case in the Court below.

Sir R. Palmer (J. D. Coleridge with him), for the appellants.—It is a principle of law that rights vested in any person or persons are not to be taken away except by express words, and that saving clauses are to be construed beneficially, and in favour of such rights. In the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, the statute to be construed, there are two saving clauses, one of which includes the right now in question, and there is nothing in the Act to exclude it. Section 51, after taking away certain property and emoluments, provides that "All other rights and privileges whatsoever now by law belonging to any of such dignities, offices or prebends . . . . shall continue to belong thereto, except so far as any of such rights or privileges may be controlled or affected by any of the provisions of this Act respecting the right of election now exercised by any chapter." Now, it is clear that the non-residentiaries of St. Paul's had this right of voting. What provisions then are there as to the rights of election then vested in them? There are none which affect this right of voting for a proctor. By sections 24, 25, 26, an alteration is made in certain elections, but they do not touch the present matter; and sections 22, 41, 75 are simply immaterial, and the statute may be searched in vain to find any provisions taking away this right so reserved. What, then, is there in the Act which is to have a counter effect? It is said that the combined effect of section 1 and the interpretation clause, section 93, gets rid of the reservation. But the whole effect of section 1 is to call non-residentiaries canons, and it is a mere clause of style, and section 93 does not apply, and cannot apply, to it, but applies to enacting clauses. If the words "residentiary member of chapter," used in section 93, be put for "canon" in section 1 they make nonsense; and taking the substance and not the form it is equally obvious the Court below were wrong in depending on this combined effect. To confirm their conclusion section 44 was referred to by the Court, and it is said that a distinction is there taken between non-residentiaries and members of chapter, and that this fortifies such conclusion. But that section has no bearing on the matter. It relates to patronage, and for purposes of patronage, property, election and other matters, the Chapter may be differently constituted, persons who may be members in one case not being so necessarily in another. How an interpretation clause is to take away rights is incomprehensible, and yet the Court below has given such a clause that effect. Where the legislature intended exclusion, as in section 23, express words are used to exclude. If the interpretation clause applies to section 1, it simply confines it to residentaries, if not, then the non-residentiaries are canons, that is all; and in either case the section is innocuous to the present right. In truth, an interpretation clause cannot apply to a clause of style. It certainly could never have been intended that whether resident or non-resident the rights of prebends were to be affected according as they happened to be called canons previously or not, and yet that would be the result of the interpretation put on this statute by the Court of Common Pleas. The fallacy of the decision has been to mistake the effects of a clause of style and an interpretation clause, and to make them take away vested rights.

Mellish (Lindley, with him), for the respondents.—The mandate shews that the proctor is to be appointed by the Chapter, and that only members of Chapter are to vote, and the question is then, are non-residentiaries still members of Chapter? The Act was a scheme of uniformity; thus there being in old foundations many non-residentiary prebends, and in the new only canons residentiary, the Act whilst it made these non-residentiaries mere honorary members, created (section 23) honorary members where they did not exist before. And the question is, is not the intention of the statute to confine the Chapter to residentiaries? And it will be found that throughout the Act "Chapter" always means residentiaries. Sections 1, 2, 93 must be taken together, and their effect is this: members of Chapter are to be called canons, the canons of St. Paul's are to be four, and canons are to be resident, and therefore the Chapter is to consist of four. The Court below, in effect, says that looking to the whole Act the words " styled canon " mean " be canon," and it is submitted that this is correct. Throughout the Act " canon " is used to mean a resident, and " Chapter " to mean resident members, and it was never meant that a non-resident was to be called a canon. Sections 3, 47, 68 shew this, and in section 44 non-residential prebends are distinguished from members of Chapter. One would have expected some definition of the respective rights of residents and non-residents if the other construction were the true one. The Court of Common Pleas decided that section 51 reserved individual rights, not rights belonging to a person simply as a member of Chapter; and it is submitted that the meaning of the Act is, that if before the Act any right existed in a canon or prebend, as a member of Chapter, such right is to be excepted from the reservation in section 51.

Sir Roundell Palmer, in reply.—The statute contains no definition of the word " Chapter," and the then existing statutes are recognized, and this word is left to be interpreted by the various statutes then in force in various places. The effect of the interpretation clause is to confine the operative part of the Act to residents, and section 2, referred to on the other side, in truth recognizes the existence of a canon non-residentiary. As to the other clauses relied on by the respondents, they only assume that there are members of Chapter who are canons within the interpretation clause, and nothing more. As has been already pointed out, the words used in section 44 were used because persons may be members of Chapters for some purposes and not others, and in the case of patronage only residents might be entitled to a voice, and a non-resident might or might not be a member. As respects the contention that only individual rights, and not rights as mere members of Chapter, were intended to be reserved, in section 51 we find that the exception to the proviso only relates to rights of election, which are not individual rights but rights of Chapter, which shews to what the proviso pointed, and that it did not mean to deal with only individual rights, for otherwise the exception would be needless.

KELLY, C.B.—The question submitted to us is whether the residentiary prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul are, as well since the passing of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113. as before that Act, entitled to vote in Chapter at the election of proctors to represent the Chapter in Convocation.

The Chapter, no doubt, formerly consisted of thirty prebendaries, of whom (at all events at the time of the passing of this Act) four only were resident and twenty-six were non-resident. Now, this order of men, consisting of high officers of the church, has existed for many centuries, and during that length of time has possessed, and enjoyed, and has exercised many rights and privileges; they were entitled to considerable property and emoluments, and were entitled also to an amount of patronage which may be called considerable, and also they were entitled to have the privilege of voting in Chapter, among other occasions, upon the occasion of an election of proctors to represent the Chapter in Convocation.

It may be observed, however, that they were not for all purposes, strictly speaking, to be deemed members of the Chapter; they were not entitled to a seat in Chapter except upon certain particular occasions specified, and distinctly and expressly enumerated in the case now before us; and the question is whether, under the provisions of this Act of Parliament, the privilege is still continued or preserved to them, of voting at these elections in Chapter.

Now, it will be remembered that the order of men or officers itself still continues, and still is in existence, and is still preserved; and for many purposes it still continues not only to exist, but to be entitled to certain rights and privileges; and upon the question whether the right or privilege of voting in Chapter on the election of proctors to serve in Convocation is preserved or not, we must interpret the 51st section of the Act of Parliament.

Now, we agree entirely on the rule or principle of law which was enunciated

at the outset by Sir Roundell Palmer, viz., that the rights and privileges existing in any men, or any order of men, are not to be taken away or deemed to be extinguished unless by force of express words in the statute, or by necessary intendment or implication. And it will be found on reference to the statute in question not only that there is no express extinguishment of these rights, and no necessary intendment or implication to that effect, but that these rights and privileges come directly within the terms of the section of the Act of Parliament to which I shall refer; and by the express words of that section are preserved and continued to the non-resident prebendaries.

Now the Act makes, no doubt, many alterations in the constitution of these Chapters, and in the rights and powers of future officers of cathedral churches, and the church in question; but when we come to the 51st section, after various provisions, no doubt equally affecting the future rights and enjoyment of property and patronage by non-resident prebendaries, we find this provision: "That all lands, tithes and other hereditaments, except any right of patronage, and all other emoluments and endowments whatsoever belonging to the deaneries of Wolverhampton, Middleham, Heytesbury and Brecon, and to the dignity and office of the sub-dean, chancellor of the church, vice-chancellor, treasurer, provost, precentor, or succentor, and to any prebend not residentiary in any cathedral or collegiate church in England, or in the cathedral churches of St. David's and Llandaff, or in the collegiate church of Brecon, or enjoyed by the holder of any such deanery, dignity, office or prebend, as such holder, shall as to all such of the said deaneries, dignities, offices and prebends respectively as may be vacant at the passing of this Act, immediately upon its so passing, and as to all others immediately upon the vacancies thereof respectively, without any conveyance or assurance in the law other than the provisions of this Act, accrue to and be vested absolutely in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England and their successors for the purposes of the Act." By this provision, in substance, "property and emoluments" attached to this office of non-residential prebendary are for ever and entirely taken away. Then follows this provision: "Provided always, that all other rights and privileges whatsoever now by law belonging to any of such dignities, offices or prebends, except the last-named deaneries, shall continue to belong thereto, except so far as any of such rights or privileges may be controlled or affected by any of the provisions of this Act, respecting the right of election now exercised by any Chapter."

In the first place, is there or not "a right or privilege now by law belonging" (that is, at the time of the Act of Parliament passing) to the prebendal office to choose a proctor? It is not to be doubted there is.

Mr. Mellish has endeavoured to raise a distinction between a right or privilege belonging to the prebend as prebend, and a right or privilege belonging to a prebend as a member of the Chapter. But if they are to be taken for this, or any or all purposes to be members of the Chapter, it is as prebends residentiary or non-residentiary that they are members of the Chapter, and therefore there is a right or privilege clearly and directly belonging to that prebendal office, or to those non-residentiary prebends in the cathedral church in question, and therefore being a right or privilege belonging to them as non-resident prebends, it is here by the express terms of the Act of Parliament preserved to them, unless it be found to come within the exception; and there is this exception, "except so far as any of such rights or privileges may be controlled or affected by any of the provisions of this Act respecting the rights of elections now exercised by any Chapter."

The question is, whether this right or privilege—the right of voting in Chapter at the election of a proctor—is controlled or affected by any of the provisions of this Act respecting the right of election now exercised by any Chapter? We have looked in vain through the Act for any provisions at all concerning any election, which touches the right of these non-resident prebendaries to vote at the election of proctors to serve in Convocation. We do find several provisions concerning (and I need not repeat the terms of the statute), controlling and affecting the right of election exercised by Chapters. We find in the 24th section of the Act an enactment, that the dean of the cathedral and three canons of St. Paul's are, after the passing of the Act, to be appointed by the Crown, instead of by the Chapter, who before appointed them. There are other provisions, into the particulars of which I need not enter. There are the 25th and 26th and several other sections of the Act of Parliament directly and expressly controlling or otherwise affecting the rights of election in Chapter. But we find no provision at all, no words which can bear any such interpretation throughout the statute, as to taking away, or in any manner whatsoever affecting the rights of these non-resident prebendaries, to vote in the chapter on any election to the office of proctor in Convocation. If the case rested there, therefore, it would clearly appear that inasmuch as this is a right or privilege belonging to an office which itself is expressly within the Act of Parliament, the right or privilege in question is expressly preserved. But it is said that there are two or three sections of the Act of Parliament which in express terms, or otherwise, put an end to the right to vote at these elections on the part of the non-residentiary prebendaries. However, before I refer to these sections I will turn for a moment to the 75th section. It appears that whereas, under the 51st section, all the property and interest or emoluments of these non-resident prebendaries are taken away with respect to the vacancies which may occur after the passing of the Act of Parliament; by the 75th section it is provided "that nothing in this Act contained respecting the division of corporate property, the diminution of the income of any deanery or canonry, the severance of separate property, or the limitation of the exercise of patronage possessed in right of separate property, shall affect any dean, canon, prebendary, dignitary or officer in possession at the passing of this Act, except as hereinbefore expressly enacted; but every dean, canon, prebendary, dignitary and officer hereafter appointed shall be subject to such regulations as shall be made in pursuance of this Act." We find here no provision whatever for continuing to existing prebendaries the right to vote, and some other privileges which may hereafter come in question appertaining to them by virtue of their office. Now, how is it possible to suppose it was not the intention of the legislature that all property and emoluments, patronage, rights and privileges of existing prebends shall be preserved to them, yet we find in the 75th section no notice is taken of the rights or privileges of voting, while the emolument attached to the office and the patronage attached to the office are expressly preserved to existing prebendaries, so that such rights and privileges would not be preserved unless by the proviso to which I have already referred; those rights and privileges, including the right and privilege of voting at such elections in Chapter, are preserved already, not only to existing prebendaries, but to all future prebendaries, by the provision in the 51st section to which I have already referred. It appears, therefore, perfectly natural, and it is the manifest intention, and it is the express language of, the Act of Parliament to preserve to existing prebendaries not only the rights and privileges, but also the property, enjoyment and emoluments, and certainly to preserve also to the prebendaries both present and to come whatever rights and privileges they possessed at the time of the Act attaching to prebendal offices.

But the judgment of the Court below and the argument before us to-day, in favour of the defendants, proceeds on two, or it may be on three sections of the Act of Parliament, the 1st, 2nd and 93rd.

Now, by the 1st section we find "that from henceforth all members of Chapter except the dean," and so forth, "shall be styled canons," and then we find in the 93rd section, "that in the construction of this Act the term 'canon' shall be construed to mean only every residentiary member of Chapter, except the dean, heretofore styled either prebendary, canon, canon residentiary, or residentiary," and so forth, and then follows an exposition of the term "minor canon." Now it is argued that because every member of the Chapter is, at the time of the passing of the Act, to be named or styled a canon, and because in the construction of the word "canon" we find in the Act that we are to take them to be canons residentiary and canons residentiary only; that this, by some implied principle of construction, amounts to an enactment that all members of Chapters shall thereafter be confined to canons, and that means canons residentiary, and canons residentiary only. In the first place, it is only necessary to read this first section (as it seems not unreasonable to read it) as if it had been in these terms—that all the members of the Chapter except the dean, and so forth, and whether canons resident or non-resident—whether prebendary residentiary or prebendary non-residentiary, shall be styled canons; and then we have a real express enactment of something which is at least reasonable, or which we cannot think altogether unreasonable. And when we look at another section of the Act of Parliament, which, for another purpose, has been relied on by Mr. Mellish, we find, with respect to the cathedrals of the new foundation that a new order of men is to come into existence who, in effect, are to be non-resident prebendaries in the churches upon these new foundations, and we find this new order corresponding for many purposes—not indeed for all—with the non-resident prebendary already in existence, and which has existed for centuries; and we find the statute itself confers on them the style or title of honorary canons. Why then are we to say there is anything unreasonable or contradictory to a provision which would apply to non-resident prebendaries already in existence the title of canon, when we find a corresponding body of men brought into existence for the first time and the term honorary canon expressly applied to them by the provision itself? And when we look to the 93rd section, it falls short altogether of the effect which has been contended for on the part of the defendants. The words are only that the word "canon"—that is, in the construction of this Act, "the term 'canon' shall be construed to mean only every residentiary member of the Chapter," that only means that when we find in the operative or enacting provisions of this Act of Parliament that the term canon is used, then the term canon is to be construed canon residentiary; and beginning with the 2nd section and going on throughout the Act of Parliament down to the 93rd section, there is no one instance to be found in which the word canon is introduced and is made the subject of any enactment at all, but that it may legally receive the construction put upon it by the 93rd section, and be applied to canon residentiary, and canon residentiary alone. Whereas, when we turn to the 1st section, we find it is not an enactment on the subject of canons, but is concerning that class of persons, whosoever they may be, or however composed, who are called members of the Chapter, and that it says that they may be styled canons. We do not feel ourselves called upon to put a construction on the word "Chapter" as it is to be found in various sections of the Act of Parliament. The legislature has not thought fit to do so itself. There is an interpretation clause applied to the term "canon," and the other term, "minor canon"; but there is no such provision as applied to the word "Chapter," and we must therefore take the word wherever we find it with reference to the context and according as we may think the real meaning may be, and the construction a proper one and a just one. It may have one construction for one purpose and another construction for another, with reference to those prebendaries who are constituted a part and portion of the Chapter itself. The non-resident prebendaries, whose rights are now in question, though constituting an integral portion of the chapter itself, had not for all purposes a seat in the Chapter—they were not summoned to attend, and they were not entitled to attend on all occasions, as members of the Chapter would be; they were merely summoned on particular occasions, and among others, in the election of officers, and whether they are to be termed for all purposes members of the Chapter or not, is a question that does not arise in this case, and we are not called upon to determine it.

Looking, therefore, at the principle of the law, that we are not to take away rights that have been held and enjoyed for centuries by an order of men, members of the Church, unless we find they are taken away expressly or by necessary implication, and finding that so far from these rights and privileges being taken away by any express or necessarily implied provision of the Act of Parliament, they, as it appears to us, have expressly and in direct terms been preserved to this order of officers in the Church, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas must be reversed, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Company—Notice to take Tenements—Special Act—Lands Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 18.—Obligation of the Company—Action for Mandamus—Damages.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—The special Act of a railway company enacted, that before the company entered upon or took any tenement under the powers of the Act, they should give to the occupier thereof six months' previous notice of their intention to take; and incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18):—Held, first, that a six months' notice of the company's intention to take certain premises given to the occupier thereof in pursuance of that enactment, was a good notice, binding the company to proceed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18); secondly, that such occupier was entitled to maintain an action of mandamus to compel the company to serve a notice to treat under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict c. 18), and take all steps necessary to assess compensation; thirdly, that in such action the plaintiff might recover more than nominal damages.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas (reported 37 L. J. C.P. 265), upon a special case.

The case is fully set forth in the report below, and the following statement will be found sufficient for the purposes of the present report.

By the Metropolitan Railway (Tower Hill Extension) Act, 1864, s. 13, the defendants were directed to give six months' notice before they entered upon and took any tenement. The said Act also incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The defendants having given a notice under the said section 13 of their special Act, refused to take the premises or take steps to assess compensation, and the plaintiff (who had acted on the notice and removed) thereupon brought this action, in which he claimed damages and a mandamus calling on the defendants to issue their warrant to the sheriff, to serve a notice to treat, and to take all steps necessary to assess compensation.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: First, was the plaintiff entitled to an action of mandamus to compel the defendants to issue their warrant to the sheriff; secondly, if not, whether he was entitled to an action of mandamus to compel them to serve a notice to treat; thirdly, whether, under the circumstances he was entitled to more than nominal damages.

The Court of Common Pleas had decided the first and second questions in the affirmative.

Horace Lloyd (Keane with him), for the appellants.—This case is very like Fotherby v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. C.P. 88), and one question will be whether that case is good law to its full extent. The defendants were acting under an Extension Act passed in the year 1864, which contained (section 13) a section (similar to sections contained in all the Metropolitan Railway Acts of that year) which provides that before entry the company must give six months' notice. This section was intended merely to prevent the company from taking compulsorily without giving the occupier a reasonable time to get a new house, and not to alter the course of procedure under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. A notice under section 13 was given by the company, and no other notice to treat has been given; and the question is, whether the company can be compelled to proceed by an action of mandamus. It is said that they can, because this was a notice to treat, or, even if it be not, that the company at least have exercised an option, and cannot recede, but must give a notice to treat. It is submitted, however, that this contention is erroneous, that this notice is merely a further step, and is only intended to prevent the company from taking for six months after they are bound by a notice to treat to take the premises, and that nothing equivalent to a notice to treat has been given. First, then, is this a notice to treat? Under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, ss. 16, 17, and 18, the company is enabled to give all persons entitled to property, which the Act of the company entitles them to take, a notice that the company is willing to treat as to its price. This notice can never be withdrawn, and the owner on the one hand must not increase the value of the land afterwards, and on the other hand he can force the company on, and make them buy. Everything hangs on the notice, and if it be given within time, all the other steps may be taken after the compulsory powers have ceased to exist. Now, the notice given here does not contain what is required under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but is expressly under section 13 of the company's Extension Act. By sections 84 and 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act the company could have taken immediately by paying the purchase-money or giving security, but as this would be a hardship on an occupier, especially in the metropolis, in every Metropolitan Railway Act of the year 1864 there was introduced a section like section 13, which means that although the company has given notice to treat, it must give six months' previous notice before it can enter, and it was intended that the company should still previously give notice to treat under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

[HANNEN, J., referred to The King v. the Commissioners for Improving Market Street, Manchester (4 B. & Ad. 333 n.). KELLY, C.B., referred to The King v. the Hungerford Market Company (4 B. & Ad. 3).]

It may be there was an election, but yet this may not be a notice to put the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in motion. Secondly, assume this notice is an election which cannot be retracted, yet this action of mandamus does not lie. The decision in Fotherby v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. C.P. 88) was wrong. There cannot be such a right, unless there be a right of action, and no action lies here. Benson v. Paul (6 El. & B. 273; 25 L. J. Q.B. 274) even decides that a person cannot have an action of mandamus to compel the performance of a contract. It is submitted that there is no right to a mandamus, or, at least, no right to an action of mandamus. The real test is whether or not there is a right of action. The intention was merely to simplify procedure, and obviate the necessity of a person being driven into equity as well as law. In Marriage v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (27 L. J. Ex. 185; (House of Lords) 31 L. J. Ex. 73) the plaintiff had a right of action. The fact that replevin and ejectment are expected in section 68 of the Common Law Procedure Act shews it was intended that there should be a right of action to which the mandamus might be an adjunct.

Sir G. Honyman (W. G. Harrison with him) was not called on.

KELLY, C.B.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in this case must be affirmed. It appears that the defendants, under the Extension Act which they have obtained in respect of their railway, were entitled to take the premises in question belonging to or in the occupation of the plaintiff, and that under that Act of Parliament, by the 13th section, they from the date of that notice, which was November 17, 1865. It appears that they have since taken no other step whatever; and when we come to look to their Act of Parliament we find, besides this 13th section, which renders it compulsory upon them to give the notice six months before they shall take possession of any premises under their Extension Act, that the Lands Clauses Act is incorporated, and that consequently they are bound under the 18th section of that Act of Parliament to take other steps before, on the one hand, they are enabled to call for particulars of the premises first, and then proof of title, and, on the other hand, the claimant, the owner or occupier of the premises, is enabled to obtain in due course of law the amount of compensation to which he may be entitled. Now, as far as I can see, by this 18th section of the Lands Clauses Act, upon which it was necessary that the defendants should proceed, they must, in the first place, give a notice to treat. That confers certain advantages upon both parties: it entitles the railway company to require particulars of the premises, and it entitles the owner or occupier of the premises to be taken to give those particulars, and also enables him to proceed afterwards to obtain compensation either by arbitration, if the claim be within a particular amount, or by proceeding before a jury, if that shall be the course which the Act shall authorize. It appears that no notice of that kind was given; that the six months elapsed; that the plaintiff, who quitted his premises, gave notice that he had done so, and was about to take or had taken others, and some time after the expiration of the six months, actually did obtain and take possession of other premises, incurred other expenses and resorted to other measures; and that at last, after some very long lapse of time, he commenced this action.

Now, two points are made on behalf of the defendants. In the first place it is contended that the action does not lie at all; that it is an action for damages and also for a mandamus, and that the Common Law Procedure Act, which gives an action for mandamus, and enables in fact the mandamus to be so obtained, does not authorize such action under these circumstances. But upon looking to the case of Fotherby v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. C.P. 88), we find that it is expressly laid down, in a case which is undistinguishable in principle from the case now before the Court, that where a notice to take premises has been given and the premises have not been taken, and the railway company fail to resort to those proceedings and to take those steps which are necessary in order to enable both parties, the owner of the premises to be taken and the railway company who are to take the premises, to bring the matter to a conclusion, for compensation to be made to the claimant, and for the possession of the premises, with a good title, to be delivered to the railway company,—that in a case of that nature, where the defendants have failed to take the steps which were necessary to bring the matter to a conclusion, such action under the Common Law Procedure Act is maintainable. Lord Chief Justice Erle, in delivering his opinion in that case, after adverting to the facts, which are really quite undistinguishable from those which are now before the Court, observes that, in former times persons in the position of the plaintiff have had recourse to the writ of mandamus issued by the Court of Queen's Bench to enforce their right, but this remedy was fraught with the disadvantages and vexations so concisely and forcibly set out in the Report of the Commissioners upon which the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was framed. "The question," he says, "for us to determine is, whether the plaintiff can now avail himself of the remedy of action for a mandamus given in that statute. I am with Mr. Harrison on both the points that he has made. I think that the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, entitles the plaintiff to bring an action for a mandamus against the defendants for not issuing a warrant when he can shew that he has a right to have the warrant issued, and is personally interested in it, whether he is entitled to any damages for its non-issue or not." Now in this case, in consequence of the notice that has been given, the plaintiff is undoubtedly entitled to call, not for the issuing of a warrant, but to call for the first step, whatever it may be, to be taken in order to bring the matter to such a termination, or to such a conclusion as will enable him to obtain compensation and the railway company to obtain possession of the property. And it appears upon the statement of the case that that step is the issuing of a notice to treat, in confirmity with the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and that notice not having been issued, we are of opinion that this action for mandamus is maintainable.

A question has arisen as to what is the time at which the notice to treat ought to be issued. It is quite unnecessary for us to determine whether the plaintiff would be entitled to call for it before the expiration of the six months. It has been contended that he is not entitled to call for it until the time for exercising the compulsory powers of the Act shall have expired. But there is here no particular clause limiting the time for the exercise of the compulsory powers of the Act; therefore, if no other step had been taken on the part of the company, he would probably have had such time as was necessary to complete the railway works, or as is allowed by the Act of Parliament for the completion of those works, and that probably would be between four and five years.

It is said that, notwithstanding the notice the company have served, they are not bound to take the premises, and that, at all events, it is optional during the whole time before the powers of the Act of Parliament have expired, to issue the notice to treat or not at their pleasure.

But we are of opinion that they are bound to issue the notice to treat, in point of time, at latest, within a reasonable time after the expiration of the six months; otherwise the plaintiff, who is apprised by the notice that his premises will be taken away from him, and knows that if proper steps are taken on the part of the company they might be taken at the expiration of six months, would be reduced to the alternative of either being turned out of house and home, having no premises wherein to dwell or wherein to carry on his business at the expiration of the six months, or he must proceed to take premises before the expiration of that period. Under these circumstances it is quite clear that, if the company are bound by this notice at all, it is competent to the plaintiff to call upon them to issue their precept if that be the first step, but as the first step to be taken appears to me to be to serve and deliver the notice to treat, they are bound to deliver such notice, and so put the matter in further course of inquiry within a reasonable time after the expiration of the six months.

Then comes the question whether this notice is obligatory upon them at all. Now, ever since the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of The King v. the Hungerford Market Company (4 B. & Ad. 327), it has been held, that, where a railway company, or any other public joint-stock company, are entitled under the compulsory powers contained in their Act to purchase and take possession of premises, if they give a notice of their intention to take those premises they agree to take them, and the notice, in fact, operates as a contract between them and the owners or occupiers of the premises,—an undertaking from them to the owner or occupier of the premises to become the purchaser of the premises in question. That case, which was decided as long ago as the year 1832, has never yet been questioned, and the result is that, considering its effect upon the case now before this Court, the company having given this notice, in November, 1865, of their intention to take the premises at the end of six months, they have agreed to become the purchasers of the premises, and as, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which is incorporated into their own Act, a number of different steps are to be taken in succession in order to enable the occupier of the premises to obtain compensation, and to enable the company to take possession of the premises which they have thus bound themselves to purchase, they are equally bound, within a reasonable time, to proceed to take all such steps as may be necessary for that purpose; and the case of The King v. the Hungerford Market Company (4 B. & Ad. 327) having decided that a notice of this kind is obligatory upon a public company, and the case of Fotherby v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. J. C.P. 88; L. R. 2 C.P. 188) having decided that an action lies for a breach of that duty or obligation, we are of opinion that this action is maintainable, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages by reason of the defendant's not proceeding to take those steps which were necessary to entitle him to compensation and enable him to obtain compensation by force of law, and likewise that he is entitled to a mandamus in the terms prayed.

The particular form of mandamus it is unnecessary to enter upon; but if, as I have observed more than once, the first step to be taken is to be taken by the company, and that first step is the service of a notice to treat in conformity with the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the mandamus should be for the delivery and issuing of that notice, and to take all other steps which may be necessary in order to enable the plaintiff to obtain the compensation to which, under the Act of Parliament, he shall turn out to be entitled.

A further question is raised by the appeal which is now before us, and that is whether the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages only, or to more than nominal damages.

With the amount of damages we have nothing to do; but we are all of opinion that in a case of this nature it may well be that the claimant has sustained much beyond nominal damages, therefore he is entitled to recover in this action whatever damages he may have sustained in addition to the remedy which he prays by the writ of mandamus.

Therefore, the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is affirmed.

Lease—Lease for Whole of Lessor's Interest operating as Assignment.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—A demise for a term of years, if it be by deed, and for the whole term which the lessor has in the premises, operates as an assignment.

Pollock v. Stacey (9 Q.B. Rep. 1033; 16 L. J. Q.B. 132) commented on.

Action for non-repair by the plaintiff, as administrator of the reversioner, against the defendant, as assignee of the lessee.

Plea, inter alia, denying that the demised premises came to the defendant by assignment. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Byles, J., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1868, when it was shewn in evidence that one William Beardmore had, by a lease made on October 8, 1804, demised the premises for the non-repair of which the action was brought, to one Robert Foot, for a term of sixty-one years, from June 24, 1804, and which therefore expired on June 24, 1865, with the usual covenant to repair on the part of the lessee and his assigns. The said William Beardmore died in 1809, having previously bequeathed his reversion in the said demised premises to one Joseph Beardmore, the legal personal representative of whom was the plaintiff.

In October, 1805, the said R. Foot, the lessee, assigned the premises for the residue of the said term of sixty-one years to one Thorn, and ultimately, in 1829, the said premises and term were vested in the two executors of the will of one Richard Lea,—namely, Joseph Wilson of Highbury and Joseph

Wilson of Clapham. The defendant was the executrix of the will of the survivor of these two Joseph Wilsons, and, as such, was sought to be made liable as assignee of the term. For the defence, a deed was given in evidence, which was dated May 8, 1829, by which the said J. Wilson of Highbury and J. Wilson of Clapham, as such executors, and at the request of Sarah Bousfield, daughter of the said Richard Lea, demised and leased the said premises, which were the subject of the action, to one Thomas Satchwell for thirty-seven years, from June 24, 1828, and which therefore expired on June 24, 1865, being the same time when the said lease to Foot expired. Consequently, it was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that this deed, though purporting to be a lease, operated in law as an assignment; and that, therefore, there was no term in the surviving Wilson when he died. The learned Judge, being of that opinion, directed a verdict to be entered for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move to set it aside and to enter it for him; it being agreed that, if the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict, the amount of damages should be referred to a Master.

C. Pollock now moved accordingly for a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiff.—The question is whether the deed of May 8, 1829, being a lease for the whole of the term, operated as an assignment. The question is discussed in the notes to Spencer's case (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 6th edit. 86), as to whether the relation of landlord and tenant can be created between assignor and assignee upon a conveyance of the entire residue of a term without any reversion, either in fact or by estoppel. It is treated there as an open question, and one which had been revived by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Pollock v. Stacey (9 Q.B. Rep. 1033; 16 L. J. Q.B. 132), where it was held that a demise for the whole of a term will not be deemed an assignment against the intention of the parties, though nothing be left in the party demising. That case is, no doubt, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in Barrett v. Ralph (14 Mee. & W. 348; 14 L. J. Ex. 308); but there, as observed by the Court in giving judgment in Pollock v. Stacey (9 Q.B. Rep. 1033; 16 L. J. Q.B. 132), there was no decision on the point, as the case was compromised; and also there the parties probably intended an assignment, and not a lease. It is submitted that, in these days, the Court will not treat the deed as operating against the intention of the parties.

Bovill, C.J.—In Parmenter v. Webber (8 Taunt. 593) it was decided by this Court that an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant (who was the lessee of two farms), by which "the plaintiff was to have the two farms during the leases of the same, the plaintiff to remain tenant to the defendant during the leases," operated as an absolute assignment of the defendant's interest in the two farms. That was considered to be settled law. And, moreover, in Sheppard's Touchstone, 266, note a, it is stated, "If a lessee should intend to make an under-lease, but should demise the premises for as long or a longer term than he had in them, the instrument, though on the face of it purporting to be a demise, would in reality be an assignment." Also in Wollaston v. Hakewill (3 Man. & G. 297; 10 L. J. C.P. 303), in the year 1841, the same question arose and was carefully argued, and in delivering the judgment of the Court, after time had been taken for its consideration, Chief Justice Tindal, said "The only question is whether if lessee for ninety-nine years demises for a longer term, such demise operates in law as an assignment; and we entertain no doubt but that for a very long period the law has been held that it has such operation and may be so treated in pleading. The resolution of the Court in Hicks v. Downing (1 Ld. Raym. 99) is in point. So, if lessee for three years assigns his term for four years, or demises the house for four years, he does not by this gain any tortious reversion, and it does but amount to an assignment of his interest." I should, therefore, have thought that the matter was as clearly settled as it could be, and that such a demise as that by the deed of 1829 would amount to an assignment. It is true that the question was sought to be raised again in Pollock v. Stacey (9 Q.B. Rep. 1033; 16 L. J. Q.B. 132), but in that case it was not necessary for the decision that there should have been any actual assignment or demise, for the action was brought there for use and occupation.

Digitized by Google

It was contended in that case for the defendant that a parol letting for the whole of the landlord's interest amounted to an assignment, but there was nothing there which could operate by way of an assignment; and accordingly Lord Denman, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "The parties intended to contract the relation of landlord and tenant, and to pass the right of possession by parol lease. This they were at liberty to do by law, and we therefore carry their lawful intention into effect. If we were to decide that the transaction was an assignment we should at the same time decide that it was no assignment, being by parol only, and we should construe that which was expressed and intended to be a lease to be an assignment merely ut res pereat, which is against a known salutary maxim." There the letting could not have operated as an assignment, and if it had been construed as amounting to an assignment it would have passed no right. That case was decided upon the special circumstances attending it, and upon the plaintiff's right to sue for use and occupation; but if it is to be supposed to controvert the old rule of law as settled by the cases of Parmenter v. Webber (8 Taunt. 593) and Wollaston v. Hakewill (3 Man. & G. 297; 10 L. J. C.P. 303) this Court is not prepared to assent to that as law. I therefore think that there is no ground for granting any rule.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. A lease of all the lessor's interest operates as an assignment, at least where it can.

KEATING, J.—I also think that there should be no rule. The case of Pollock v. Stacey (9 Q.B. Rep. 1033; 16 L. J. Q.B. 132) rests on the peculiar circumstances of that case. There are some expressions in the judgment which appear, it is true, to militate against the previous authorities, but, as has already been pointed out by my Lord, it is not necessary to overrule that case for the decision of the present, since it is capable of being distinguished; but if it were necessary I think we ought to do so.

BRETT, J., concurred.

Rule refused.

Shipping—Freight—Bill of Lading—Freight Payable before Delivery of Goods—Readiness to Deliver.

SHIPPING. B.—*The defendants shipped a quantity of Portland cement on the plaintiffs' ship to be carried from London to Sydney, under a bill of lading by which "freight was to be paid within three days after the arrival of the ship, and before the delivery of any portion of the goods." After the arrival of the ship at Sydney, and before the expiration of such three days, the ship was obliged to be sunk in order to extinguish an accidental fire which had occurred in her hold. by the consent of the parties and a Judge's order, a CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court, of which the following are the material facts:—

The plaintiffs in this action are owners of the ship called the "John Duthie," the plaintiff Phillips being her commander. The defendants are cement-manufacturers carrying on business in London.

In September, 1866, the defendants shipped on board the "John Duthie," then in the East India Docks, 300 casks of Portland cement, to be forwarded to Sydney, under a bill of lading, of which the following is a copy:—

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by C. J. Hilton & Co., in and upon the good ship 'John Duthie,' whereof is master for this present voyage, J. D. Phillips, and now riding at anchor in the river Thames, and bound for Sydney, to say, 300 casks Portland cement, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Sydney, New South Wales (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto Messrs. Rabone, Feez & Co., merchants, of Sydney, or to their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, 86*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, as per indorsement, with primage and average accustomed. In witness thereof I, the said master of the said ship, have affirmed to four bills of lading all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, all the others to stand void.

"Dated in London, September 5, 1866.

"JNO. D. PHILLIPS.

"Weight and contents unknown, and not accountable for leakage, breakage, rust or destruction by vermin. Freight to be paid within three days after arrival of ship, and before the delivery of any portion of the goods specified in this bill of lading."

There was no charter-party or other document signed by any of the parties in addition to the above bill of lading.

The "John Duthie" sailed from the Port of London on or about September 10, 1866, and arrived at Sydney and anchored there in the harbour on or about December 19, 1866. On the night of the said December 19, and after her arrival in Sydney, a fire was discovered to be raging in the hold. Every endeavour was made by the captain and the crew to arrest the progress of the fire, but without avail. By the advice of Lloyd's agent, and several commanders of other vessels, who had come on board to render assistance, and of the harbour-master, the plaintiff Phillips ordered the ship to be scuttled and sunk, as the only means of extinguishing the fire, and for the purpose of afterwards raising, and thereby saving the ship and cargo. The ship was accordingly scuttled. She was raised on December 24, 1866, and what remained of the cargo was afterwards discharged at Sydney, and the ship was repaired. The fire was accidental.

The defendants' goods were raised in the vessel, but were found to have been rendered useless. The cement no longer existed as cement, it having been hardened into solid masses by the action of the water, a circumstance which also involved the destruction of the casks. On application being made to the consignees, they refused to accept the goods or pay the freight, and the goods were brought back to England by the plaintiffs, in whose possession they remained.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the circumstances, the defendants ought to pay the plaintiffs the amount of the freight, or otherwise pay to them remuneration for the conveyance of the goods.

Mellish (Macnamara with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to be paid the freight. The arrival of the ship with the goods at Sydney, and not the delivery of the goods, was made by the bill of lading the only condition precedent to the freight being payable. No doubt, freight is usually only payable on the safe delivery as well as on the arrival of the goods at their port of destination, but this may always be altered by the terms of the bill of lading—Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C. 361). In the present case, what is expressly stipulated for in the bill of lading is, that the freight "be paid within three days after arrival of the ship, and before the delivery of any portion of the goods."

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Suppose within the three days after the arrival of the ship the shipowners had refused to deliver the goods.]

The defendants perhaps would have had a right of action, but that would not have discharged their liability to pay freight. In Dakin v. Oxley (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 646; 33 L. J. C.P. 115) it was decided that a charterer whose cargo had been damaged by the fault of the master and crew so as upon arrival at the port of discharge to be worth less than the freight, was not entitled to excuse himself from payment of freight by abandoning the cargo to the shipowner.

[BRETT, J.—If this had been the case of an ordinary bill of lading, I suppose you would hardly have contended that the plaintiffs would have been entitled to freight.]

Perhaps not. It is difficult to say when for this purpose the article may be said to cease to exist in specie. In Garratt v. Melhuish (4 Jur. N.S. 943) the bricks had turned into dust, and yet Vice-Chancellor Stuart decided that the shipper could not resist payment of freight, and that his remedy was only by a cross-action. In 2 Parson's Maritime Law, p. 381, the question as to the meaning of the word "specie" is discussed, and several instances are cited by way of illustration.

[BRETT, J.—In the present case the loss under a policy of insurance on the goods would have been a total loss.]

The point here depends entirely on the construction of the bill of lading, and it is submitted that the freight became payable on the arrival at Sydney, though the goods afterwards ceased to exist in specie.

Manisty (Butt with him), for the defendants.—There must have been a readiness and willingness on the part of the plaintiffs to deliver the goods to entitle them to be paid the freight; at all events, during the three days during which the freight was payable the plaintiffs were bound to be in a condition to deliver. What was meant by the stipulation in the bill of lading about payment of freight was this, that the defendants, if they did not take, as they might and were entitled to do, the goods within three days after the arrival of the vessel, were still obliged to pay the freight all the same. That did not relieve the plaintiffs from the obligation of being ready and willing during such three days to deliver the goods. Freight is the reward for carriage and delivery, and it cannot be earned where there is a failure in either of these. Suppose the plaintiffs had sold the goods, could it be contended that they might still have sued for their freight, leaving the defendants to the remedy of a cross-action? The contract between the parties was for the carriage and delivery of the goods; and three days were allowed for such delivery, during which time at least the plaintiffs were bound to be ready and willing to deliver.

Mellish, in reply.—The plaintiffs were not bound to be ready and willing to deliver within such three days. The arrival mentioned in the bill of lading means arrival at the port, and not when the goods are ready for delivery.

KEATING, J.—I think the defendants in this case are entitled to our judgment. The case turns on the terms of the bill of lading. Under an ordinary bill of lading the freight would be payable only on the delivery of the goods, which would be within a reasonable time for that purpose. In the present case the parties do not, I think, intend to dispense with a delivery by the shipowner, but they assume it would take three days to deliver, and accordingly three days for that purpose is substituted for a reasonable time. During that time of three days the shipowners must be ready to deliver the goods; but it is clear the plaintiffs were not, as the goods had then become destroyed, and they must be taken to be non-existing. Under these circumstances, therefore, I think the plaintiffs are not entitled to freight.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Freight is generally payable only on the right delivery of the cargo. The bill of lading in this case has provided three days for the delivery of the goods. By an accident the goods, which consisted of cement, had before the expiration of that time ceased to exist as cement. I agree that the intention of the parties was that payment of freight was to have taken place at the end of three days after arrival, but that was provided the contract had been fulfilled to the extent of the goods having been carried and ready for delivery during those three days, should the consignees have chosen to have had them then.

BRETT, J.—I think that the bill of lading, though containing unusual terms, ought to be construed according to what would have been the case had it been in the ordinary form, in order to see how far the parties have altered it. Now, ordinarily the shipowner must be ready and willing to deliver the goods before he can demand freight, and he cannot be deemed to be ready and willing to deliver without he is able to do so. We have now to determine how far this has been altered by this bill of lading. It seems to me that during the three days after the arrival of the ship the ordinary contract was existing. If during such three days the consignees tendered the freight, they would be entitled to have the goods, and the shipowners could not during such three days have sued for freight without being ready and willing to deliver the goods; but after that time the ordinary state of things was changed, and the shipowners under this bill of lading would have been entitled to have sued without shewing that they were then ready to deliver the goods. During, however, those three days it was necessary for them to have been ready and willing to deliver, and as they were not so, in this case, they cannot, I think, recover freight.

Principal and Agent—Factors Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39—Agent intrusted—Revocation of Authority.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT. I.—A person, who has been intrusted with goods, or the documents or title thereto, as agent for sale, is not, after his authority as agent has been revoked, "an agent intrusted" within the meaning of the Factors Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. s. 1, so as to protect a pledge by him to an innocent pledgee.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, reported 37 L. J. C.P. 137.

It was an interpleader issue to try the question whether certain casks of sherry were the property of the plaintiffs, as against the defendants, under the following circumstances. The plaintiffs consigned the casks, from Spain, to one De Ponte, in London, as their agent, for sale, but afterwards demanded them of him, and required him to deliver them up. De Ponte, however, refused to deliver them up unless the accounts between them were settled (such refusal being improper, and nothing in fact being due to him), and afterwards pledged the wine as his own to the defendants, who bonâ fide advanced money on the security of dock warrants given them by De Ponte, and had no knowledge of De Ponte having no right or authority to pledge the casks of wine.

The Court of Common Pleas had decided that, as De Ponte's authority had been revoked, he was not "an agent intrusted" within the meaning of the Factors Act, and could confer no title on the defendants, and that the plaintiffs therefore were entitled to the wine.

C. Pollock (Archibald with him), for the appellants.—The question depends on the Factors Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, and is whether, where a factor who has at one time been authorized to act as factor and been intrusted with goods pledges them to a bonâ fide pledgee, this transaction can be got rid of by the principal alleging that he had revoked the authority by a demand of the goods, and a wrongful detainer by the factor, who had refused to deliver till certain accounts were settled; such detainer, it may be observed, not presenting the case of a man acting in pure wrong, which might be a denial of his character as factor, although it is admitted that the accounts would not shew a good answer to the principal. Best, C.J., in Williams v. Barton (3 Bing. 139), Mr. Story in his Treatise on Agency, s. 113, n., and Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, 628, point out the evil which existed in our common law, which allowed a concealed person who had intrusted another with property or its documents of title to recover it from an innocent transferee of the person who thus appeared to be the true owner, and protest against its injustice. It was to remedy this evil that the Factors Acts were passed, and if the construction adopted in the Court below be adopted, the Acts have not remedied it. The Court of Common Pleas held that De Ponte had ceased to be agent, and therefore had no power under these Acts. Now, 4 Geo. 4. c. 83. contains no mention of agency, nor does 6 Geo. 4. c. 94, in which Act the word "intrusted" must mean "has been" not "is" intrusted, for it would be mere casuistry to allow a man to evade its provisions by saying that the authority had been revoked, for it would practically become useless. In consequence of certain defects in these Acts pointed out in Phillips v. Huth (6 Mee. & W. 572; 9 L. J. Ex. 326), Hatfield v. Phillips (9 Mee. & W. 647; 11 L. J. Ex. 425; 14 Mee. & W. 666), and other cases, the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. (on which the appellants rely) was passed, in order to extend the protection afforded by statute. In the 1st section of that Act no doubt the word "agent" is used, but that must mean not merely a person who at the very time of the transaction is agent, but who has been agent, and has obtained the goods or documents as agent, or the statute would really be ineffectual to remedy the evils contemplated; and this is fortified by the use of the words "having been" in the 4th section. The other construction would put a limitation on the Act which does not exist in the common law, which does not allow a person to avail himself of a secret revocation when he has held out another as having authority, of which doctrine Trueman v. Loder (11 Ad. & E. 589; 9 L. J. Q.B. 165) may be taken as an example. But then it may be said that there was no holding out of authority in the present case; the answer, however, to this is, that the object of the Act was to make the documents of title equivalent to such a holding out of authority. For these reasons, it is submitted that the words "agent who shall be intrusted" mean "person who has been intrusted."

Sir G. Honyman (Channell with him), for the respondents, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It appears clear to us[1] that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas ought to be affirmed. The appellants have admitted that but for the last Factors Act they would have no locus standi. By the common law a person could only transfer such property as he had himself; but the Act

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Kelly, C.B., Channell, B., Pigott, B., and Hayes, J.

Digitized by Google

excepts the case of an agent who is intrusted with goods or the documents of title thereto. The result of the appellants' contention is, that when a man is no longer agent he is yet to be taken to be an agent within the Act, and when his trust is at an end he is yet to be taken to be intrusted within the Act. It seems to us that the legislature would have put the past tense if this had been the intention, and that it did not contemplate the present case; but however this may be, we must take the words as we find them, and we cannot read them in the sense suggested by the appellants.

Judgment affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Notice of Objection—Description of Objector —6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 17, Schedule B. No. 11.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The parliamentary borough of Penryn and Falmouth consists of six places, viz., the old borough of Penryn, the town of Falmouth and four parishes; and each of these six places has separate overseers, and a separate list. In a notice of objection given to a voter for the borough, the objector, whose name appeared on the said borough list, was described as "on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn":—Held, that the notice was good, as it sufficiently pointed out the list on which the objector's name would be found.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Penryn and Falmouth.

Notice of objection to the respondent William Andrew was given by the appellant Charles Moon, in the following form:

"To Mr. William Andrew, of Jorhan Street, in the town of Falmouth.

"I hereby give you notice that I object to your name being retained on the list for the town of Falmouth of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Penryn.

"Dated August 24, 1868.

"CHARLES MOON, of St. Thomas Street, Penryn, on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn."

The borough of Penryn and Falmouth, for parliamentary purposes, consists of six several places having separate overseers and rates and separate lists, namely, the borough of Penryn, the parish of St. Gluvias, the parish of Mylor, the town of Falmouth, the parish of Falmouth, and the parish of Budock. In the first of these places there were two separate lists published by the overseers of the poor, one containing the scot and lot voters, and the other the 10*l.* householders and the inhabitant occupiers; the latter list included all the names on the scot and lot list.

The name of Charles Moon, the objector, appeared on both these lists, and his residence also appeared thereon, as mentioned in the notice.

The Revising Barrister held that the description of the objector Charles Moon as being of St. Thomas Street, Penryn, on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn, did not sufficiently describe on which of the six lists of the parliamentary borough of Penryn Charles Moon's name was to be found.

The Revising Barrister therefore decided that the notice was bad, and retained on the list the name of the person objected to.

O'Malley (Horne Payne with him), for the appellant.—In the Boundary

Act of 1832, viz., 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 64, Schedule O, and the Boundary Act of 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 46, Schedule the First, the parliamentary borough is described as the borough of Penryn and Falmouth, and that is in fact the proper name of the borough, and it comprises inter alia the old borough of Penryn. The objector's name not being on any of the parish lists within the parliamentary borough, form No. 11. in Schedule B., 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 17, could not be strictly followed—Tudball v. the Town Clerk of Bristol (5 Man. & G. 57; 13 L. J. C.P. 49); Bright v. Devenish (36 L. J. C.P. 71; L. R. 2 C.P. 102). The description sufficiently indicates the list. In Gadsby v. Warburton (7 Man. & G. 11; 14 L. J. C.P. 41) it was held to be sufficient for the objector to state in the notice that he was "on the register of voters for the township of Manchester."

[BOVILL, C.J.—"The list of voters for the borough of Penryn" cannot mean the list of voters for the parliamentary borough, because there is no such list.]

No, it can only refer to the old borough list.

The COURT then called on

Atkinson, Serjeant (Lumley Smith with him), for the respondent.—The borough of Penryn is treated generally as meaning the parliamentary borough of Penryn and Falmouth; and a voter receiving this notice would understand the expression "Borough of Penryn" as having that meaning, and would therefore not be sufficiently informed on which of the six lists in the parliamentary borough the objector's name would be found. In Crowther v. Bradney (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 563; 33 L. J. C.P. 70), the objector described himself as "on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Kidderminster, in respect of property occupied in the parish of Kidderminster"; and as there were two lists for the borough, one in respect of property occupied within the borough, and the other in respect of property occupied within the foreign of the parish, the objection was held to be bad for not specifying the list on which the objector's name would be found.

[BOVILL, C.J.—There was nothing there to describe the list, and it was impossible to see from the notice on which list the objector's name was.]

It is submitted that the present notice equally fails to describe the list. Moreover, it appears from the case that, in the old borough of Penryn, there are two lists, and the notice does not indicate on which of them the objector's name is.

[BYLES, J.—That is not the point raised on this appeal. The objection to the notice was, that it did not sufficiently describe on which of the six lists of the parliamentary borough the objector's name was to be found.]

O'Malley was not called on to reply.

BOVILL, C.J.—It seems to me that the notice is sufficient. It appears very clearly that when the expression "the borough of Penryn" is used it is sometimes in one sense and sometimes in another. In the early part of the notice the objector objects to the voter's name being "on the list for the town of Falmouth of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Penryn," and it is plain that, in that part, the expression "the borough of Penryn" is used in the sense of the parliamentary borough of Penryn and Falmouth. Afterwards the objector, at the end of the notice, describes himself as "on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn." Now, in the first place, there is no list for the parliamentary borough, but there is one for the old borough of Penryn; and finding how, in the early part of the notice, the objector speaks of the voter's name being on the list for the town of Falmouth, I should have understood by the description "on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn" that the objector was describing the list for the old borough of Penryn, and not the parliamentary borough. Manifestly the expression "the borough of Penryn" is used in this notice in two senses; and I think it is used at the end of the notice in the sense of meaning the old borough, and in that sense the description is abundantly sufficient; and therefore the decision of the Revising Barrister must be reversed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the description "borough of Penryn," at the end of the notice, means the old borough, and is the description which the statute requires.

Parliament—Borough Vote—House—Building—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27—Room in a Set of Chambers.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The voter occupied as tenant a room in a set of chambers, which, though severed from and having no direct communication with the other room of the set, communicated with a vestibule common to both rooms. The door of the vestibule opened on the landing of a public staircase, and the voter had a right of way over the vestibule, and in common with his landlord, who occupied the other room of the said set, had control over the door communicating with the said landing:—Held, that the subject of the voter's occupation was not a house or building within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, and therefore the voter was not entitled to the borough franchise in respect of such occupation.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the city of London.

The appellant duly objected to the name of the respondent being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote for the city of London, in respect of the occupation of chambers in the Inner Temple.

The material facts, as stated in the case, were as follows: The landlord of the respondent rented a set of chambers in the Inner Temple. This set of chambers formed part of one of the floors of the building in the Temple, which part was so structurally severed from the rest of the buildings as to be of itself a house. This set of chambers consists of two rooms and a vestibule; each room is severed from the others, there being no direct communication between the two. Each communicates by its own door with the vestibule, which communicates with the landing on a public staircase by a door. The subject of the respondent's occupation was one of these rooms. The respondent had occupied for the statutory period, exclusively and as sole tenant, this room, over the door of which, communicating into the vestibule, he had exclusive control. Under or by virtue of his tenancy he had a right of way over the vestibule and in common with his landlord, who occupied the other room, perfect control over the door communicating with the landing, so as at all times to command free ingress and egress to and from the room which he occupied as aforesaid from and to the said landing. The respondent was a barrister-at-law; and he occupied the said room for the sole purpose of transacting the business which came to him in his pursuit of the profession of a barrister, and not for a dwelling-house.

It was objected that, having regard to the above facts, the subject of occupation of the respondent was not sufficient in kind to qualify him as tenant within any of the qualifications enumerated in the 27th section of the Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 45.

Digitized by Google

The Revising Barrister held, upon the above facts, that the respondent occupied as tenant a sufficient tenement to entitle him, if duly registered, to vote in the election of members for the City of London within the meaning of the 27th section of the said Act.

Prentice appeared for the appellant, but the COURT called on—

Underdown, for the respondent, to support the decision of the Revising Barrister.—It is submitted that the respondent was entitled to be registered as occupying as tenant "a building" within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. He had the exclusive occupation of the room in question, and exclusive control of its door, which opened upon the common vestibule. A room in a factory, approached by a common staircase leading from the entrance to the factory, or by a separate outside staircase, or by a door opening into the yard, has been held to be a building within the meaning of the Act—Wright v. the Town Clerk of Stockport (5 Man. & G. 33; 13 L. J. C.P. 50)—and chambers in the Inns of Court are recognized as separate buildings in Henrette v. Booth (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 500; 33 L. J. C.P. 61). That case and Bryan Kearney's case (Alcock's Registry Cases, 22) shew that a room may be a house for the purpose of conferring the franchise where there is a sufficient severance of it from the rest of the building. It is submitted that the voter in the present case occupied a separate tenement, and not merely an apartment or lodging in the house of another, as was the case of the claimant in Wilson v. Roberts (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 50; 31 L. J. C.P. 78).

BOVILL, C.J.—No case has been cited which goes at all near to establish that a room like this in a set of chambers is a house. It does not come within the principle of those cases which have decided that chambers with one outer door, and structurally used as a separate dwelling, may be considered a house within the meaning of the Act of Parliament; but it seems to me that the very description of the room in the present case, as being part of a set of chambers, shews that it is essentially part of a house only, and not a house or building within the meaning of the statute.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BRETT, J.—This room is not a house within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, nor is it a part of a house separately rated so as to come within the Representation of the People Act, 1867.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the Northern Division of the county of Durham.

CASE.

At a Court for the revision of the list of voters for knights of the shire, held on September 15, 1868, at Jarrow, in and for the northern division of the county of Durham, and by adjournment on October 7, 1868, at the city of Durham, in and for the said northern division, before me, one of the Barristers appointed to revise the list of voters for the said division. George Stillman duly objected to the name of Robert Anderson being retained in the list of voters for the township of Hedworth Monkton and Jarrow, in the said northern division of the county of Durham.

The name and qualification of the said Robert Anderson appeared on the list of claimants published by the overseers of the said township in the subjoined form:

Christian Name and Surname, &c.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, &c.
Anderson, Robert.	16, Clayton Street, Jarrow.	Leasehold House.	16, Clayton Street, Jarrow.

The following facts were established by the evidence: By memorandum of agreement, dated May 1, 1863, and made between Sir Walter Charles James, Bart., and Dame Sarah Caroline his wife of the first part; John M'Intyre, George Sharp, Robert Armstrong and William Bell of the second part, and John Clayton of the third part; and which said memorandum is to be taken as part of this case, after stating that certain parcels of ground part of the Jarrow Grange estate, over which the said Dame Sarah Caroline James had an absolute power of appointment, had been laid out as sites for 100 workmen's dwelling-houses, and that it was intended that the said 100 dwelling-houses should be built by means of the monthly contributions of 100 workmen, who should be selected by the said parties thereto of the second part, and that in the mean-time, until such contributions should have been fully paid up, such sum and sums of money, not exceeding in the whole 7,000*l.*, as should be required for the completion of the said dwelling-houses over and above the contributions from time to time accruing, should be advanced by the said John Clayton, and should be repaid to him, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum out of such contributions. And that a lease for ninety-nine years from that day, at the rent of 9*s.* 6*d.* per annum, should be granted to each of such workmen of the site of each such dwelling-house when and so soon as the said John Clayton, with the consent in writing of the said parties thereto of the second part, should require the same to be granted. It was declared and agreed that in the meantime and until such leases should be granted, the said parcels of land and the houses and buildings which should from time to time be erected thereon, should be a security to the said John Clayton for so much and such part of the sum and sums of money which should be advanced by him from time to time as aforesaid as should from time to time remain due and unpaid, with interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and that such further instruments necessary to give effect to such security should be executed on the request of the said John Clayton. dwelling-houses, collect the contributions of the workmen for whom the same were intended to be built, and pay the amount monthly to the said John Clayton until the amount of his advances should be repaid, with interest after the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum.

Leases of six or seven of the said sites, with dwelling-houses erected thereon, had actually been granted to workmen who had fully paid to the said parties of the second part the sums agreed on between them as the price of such sites and houses respectively, which sums had been handed over by the said parties of the second part to the said John Clayton, in part payment of his said loan and interest. The remainder of the sites had been sold by the said parties of the second part to workmen, under agreements in the form and of the tenor and effect of the agreement between the said parties of the second part and the said claimant, Robert Anderson, as next hereafter mentioned; but leases of the same have not yet been actually granted. At the date of these agreements respectively the houses were in some cases not built, and in other cases only partially so. Where not actually built they were subsequently completed by the respective purchasers, the cost being defrayed out of money which was part of the 7,000*l*. hereinbefore mentioned, and agreed to be advanced by the said John Clayton, and which said sum has been partly repaid by the contributions aforesaid.

By memorandum of agreement, dated July 18, 1864, and made between the said John M'Intyre, William Bell, George Sharp and Robert Armstrong, therein described as trustees to the Jarrow Building Company (and who and their successors are thereinafter referred to as "the said trustees"), of the one part, and the said claimant, Robert Anderson (thereinafter referred to as "the said purchaser") of the other part (and which said memorandum is to be taken as part of the case), the said trustees agreed to sell and the said purchaser agreed to purchase the leasehold piece of ground, dwelling-house and premises situated in No. 16, Clayton Street, on the Jarrow Grange estate aforesaid, and more particularly described by the plans and specifications already agreed to by the said purchaser to be held for a term of ninety-nine years, subject to an annual ground-rent of 9*s*. 6*d*., to be paid thereout to the said Sir Walter Charles James, or his agents, at or for the price or sum of 74*l*. And it was agreed that the said purchase-money of 74*l*. should be paid by fortnightly instalments of 5*s*. 6*d*., being after the rate of 10*l*. per cent. per annum on the contract price of each house, 5*l*. per cent. per annum to be deducted therefrom for interest on the debt standing against the said purchaser at the commencement of each twelve months, the remainder to be applied to the reduction of the debt standing against the said purchaser at the commencement of each succeeding twelve months. And if the purchaser should neglect or refuse to make any of the said fortnightly payments when the same respectively should become due, he should forfeit and pay to the said trustees as and for liquidated damages the sum of 3*d*. for the first neglect or default, 6*d*. for the second, 1*s*. for the third, and so on, the sums increasing in the same ratio for each succeeding neglect or default until such sums should be equal to the amount the said purchaser had paid to the said trustees as regular subscriptions. And that, if at any time such should be the case, the said trustees should have full power to enter on the said ground, house and premises, and hold the same as if the now reciting agreement had not been made, and forcibly to expel the said purchaser without any ejectment or other legal process, and to plead the now reciting agreement as conclusive evidence of leave and licence. And it was also agreed that the said purchaser should have possession of the said premises from and after the signing of the now reciting agreement, and should pay all ground-rent, taxes, rates, cesses and outgoings in respect thereof. And that the said purchaser, his heirs and assigns, should keep and maintain the said dwelling-house and premises in good condition and repair. And that until all moneys which might be due or payable to the said trustees, or their successors, under the now reciting agreement, or the rules of the Jarrow Building Company aforesaid, should have been duly satisfied, the said trustees should have full power to insure the said dwelling-house and premises against loss or damage by fire, in such name and for such sums as they might think necessary; and all moneys which the said trustees should pay in so doing should be repaid by the said purchaser on demand, and should until and in default of payment thereof be a charge on the said premises. And that the said purchaser should not sell or transfer his interest in the said house and premises to any person or persons whomsoever without the consent or approval of the said trustees. And that within three months after all the moneys due or payable under the now reciting agreement, and the rules of the Jarrow Building Company aforesaid had been duly satisfied, and provided the said purchaser should have observed and performed all and every the conditions and agreements therein contained, and also all and every the rules and regulations for the time being of the said company, and on his part to be observed and performed, the said trustees, or their successors, should at the request and costs of the said purchaser give him a proper conveyance in duplicate of the said leasehold premises, subject to the said annual ground-rent and the powers for raising the same. Upon the execution of this agreement the claimant was let into possession of the said dwelling-house and premises therein comprised. Since the making of the contract he has duly paid all instalments according to the contract, and has observed all the rules and regulations of the said building company. All the houses referred to in the firstly-recited agreement had been erected on the said land by the said trustees, money having been advanced from time to time for that purpose by the said John Clayton to the amount of 7,000*l*., which amount, together with the monthly contributions of the said workmen from time to time made, covered the whole cost to the trustees of the erection of the said houses. Since the said houses were built the agreed ground-rent of 9*s*. 6*d*. has been yearly paid by each individual purchaser to Sir Walter James in respect of each house.

Out of the monthly payments of the persons for whom the dwelling-houses were built, the interest upon the said sum of 7,000*l*., together with part of the principal, has been repaid, so that only the sum of 5,000*l*. was, on July 31, 1867, due to the said John Clayton for principal and interest on account of his said loan. Since that date the amount due to him had at no time exceeded that sum, and on July 31, 1868, and at the time of the revision, was less. The part of the said parcels of ground mentioned in the said agreement of May 1, 1863, and the houses built thereon not included in the leases already granted, were, on July 31, 1867, and have since continued, a sufficient security for the amount due to Mr. Clayton for principal and interest. The aggregate amount of the respective balances of purchase-money and interest due and unpaid from the respective purchasers to the said trustees for sites and houses not yet actually leased has always exceeded the said amount due at any time to Mr. Clayton. With respect to many of the said sites and the houses thereon, the annual value of the same, after deducting interest at 5*l*. per cent. on the unpaid balance of purchase-money, the ground-rent of 9*s*. 6*d*. and insurance, appeared to be less than 5*l*., and I accordingly disallowed the claims of the purchasers of such sites and houses to be registered. With respect to others of the said sites, the houses thereon, after being built by the trustees, had been added to and improved by the expenditure of capital and labour thereon by the respective purchasers thereof, among whom was the claimant, Robert Anderson. House property in the neighbourhood had also generally increased in value; and I found as a fact that, after deducting from the annual value of the said claimant's house interest at 5*l*. per cent. upon the balance of purchase-money due on July 31, 1867, to the trustees, the agreed ground-rent of 9*s*. 6*d*., the cost of repairs and premium for fire insurance, there remained 5*l*. clear. If the whole of the fortnightly instalments of 5*s*. 6*d*. was to be considered as an annual charge upon the said house, then its clear yearly value was less than 5*l*. If the yearly value of the claimant's estate and interest is to be measured by and consist of only a fair rate of interest (having regard to the nature of the property) upon so much of the instalments of price as consist of principal paid to the trustees, plus any increased value by reason of improvements made by the purchaser and any general rise in the value of house property, but excluding the difference between the contract price and the amount thereof actually paid, then the clear annual value would be less than 5*l*.

Upon these facts it was contended on behalf of the objector, first, that the claimant was not entitled either as lessee or assignee to the said house for the unexpired residue of any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years, so as to entitle him to be placed on the register; secondly, that the clear value of the claimant's interest (if any) in the said house was less than 5*l*. over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same.

On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the claimant, first, that although no term had been actually created at law, yet there was a valid and binding contract partly performed between Sir Walter and Lady James, their mortgagee, Mr. Clayton, and the trustees of the building company for the granting of leases to their nominees of sites and houses thereon for ninety-nine years from May 1, 1863, and that he (the claimant) having contracted with the trustees that he should be named as one of such lessees, and having paid part of the purchase-money and been let into possession of the premises to be demised to him, was entitled in equity to have the lease granted to him on Mr. Clayton's debt being paid off, and was therefore cestui que trust in actual possession, and had a sufficient equitable estate as lessee for an unexpired term of not less than sixty years. Secondly, that Mr. Clayton's mortgage-debt must be treated as apportioned upon and borne by the various unleased sites and the houses thereon in proportion to the balance of price remaining due and unpaid for the same, and that a Court of equity would so apportion such debt. Thirdly, that, deducting together with ground-rent, fire insurance and cost of repairs, interest at 5*l*. per cent. upon such unpaid balance of price, the yearly value of the claimant's estate and interest in the house in question was not less than 5*l*. I was of opinion that the arguments on behalf of the claimant were sound, and allowed his name to remain on the register.

The questions for the Court are, first, whether the claimant had such an estate or interest in the house and premises in his possession as to entitle him to be registered? Secondly, whether the annual charge upon his premises in respect of the balance of price unpaid to the trustees of the building company, or in respect of Mr. Clayton's mortgage-debt, was properly held not to exceed 5*l*. per cent. upon such unpaid balance of price. Thirdly, is the yearly value of the claimant's equitable leasehold estate and interest (if any) in the site and the house thereon to be estimated as consisting only of interest upon the part of the price paid on July 31, 1867, to the trustees plus any increased value of the premises owing to the improvements made by the claimant and any general rise in the value of house property, but excluding the balance of the principal of the purchase-money constituting the difference between the contract price and the portion thereof paid? Fourthly, or is the yearly value of the claimant's said estate and interest to be estimated at the whole present yearly value of the premises subject to the agreed ground-rent and fire insurance, upon whatever facts such value depends, less interest at 5*l*. per cent. on the unpaid balance of the agreed purchase-money?

If the Court should be of opinion that the first, second and fourth of these questions should be answered in the affirmative, and the third in the negative, then the name of the claimant is to remain upon the register. But if the Court decide any one or more of these first, second and fourth questions in the negative, or the third in the affirmative, then the name of the claimant is to be erased from the register.

entitled as lessee or assignee for the unexpired residue of any term originally created for not less than sixty years, of a clear yearly value not less than 5*l.* over and above all rents and charges payable in respect thereof. It is submitted, first, that the claimant has no such estate legal or equitable as is required by the section, but has at most an inchoate right by contract, which right may or may not become a perfect one on a contingency; secondly, that even if there be such a term as is required, yet the claimant is not the lessee or assignee of that term; and, thirdly, that the value is not sufficient. And as respects the first point, it is contended, first, that there must be a legal interest; secondly, that if an equitable interest is enough, still there must be a legal term created as a foundation for it; thirdly, that even if an ability to get a lease in equity would be sufficient, yet here the claimant could not get one, and indeed may never be in such a position, for till he has paid off the 74*l.*, which would take years, and fulfilled the rules, he is not to have a lease; and, in truth, not even then, for the whole sum advanced must be paid off before Clayton could be compelled to require Sir W. and Lady James to grant a lease.

[Joshua Williams.—The contention on behalf of the claimant will be that he is mortgagor in possession, and therefore entitled under the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 74.]

It will be observed that in the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 5. the franchise is given to persons "seised at law or in equity" of freeholds, &c., but that nothing is said as to equitable rights in leaseholds. That difference in the words as to freeholds and leaseholds shews that an inchoate interest giving neither a legal nor an equitable interest is not sufficient. The words of the Irish Reform Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 88. s. 5, are nearly identical with those of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. ss. 19, 20, which correspond with the new Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 5, and in Brohan's case (Carlow Election) (K. & Omb. 411) the House of Commons held that no person is entitled until a lease be bonâ fide executed and delivered to the voter.

[KEATING, J.—In Gainsford v. Freeman (35 L. J. C.P. 92) it seems to have been assumed that an equitable interest would do.]

That was a cause of a cestui que trust. In The King v. Geddington (2 B. & C. 129), decided under the 9 Geo. 1. c. 7. s. 5, one of the Poor Law Settlement Acts, where a man bought an estate, the price payable by two instalments, the conveyance to be made on payment of both, but possession to be given on payment of the first, and he paid the first and was let into possession, it was held that he had not acquired any equitable estate; and in The King v. Llantillio Grossenny (5 B. & C. 461), the Court gave a similar decision, the only difference between the two cases being that in the latter case there was only a parol agreement and the whole money was paid afterwards.—(He was then stopped.)

Joshua Williams (of the Chancery bar), for the respondent.—When a contract of purchase is signed, in equity the estate becomes the estate of the vendee, and the vendor has only a lien for the amount of purchase-money not paid. In Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, 146, 13th edit., it is laid down that, "Equity looks upon things agreed to be done as actually performed, consequently when a contract is made for sale of an estate equity considers the vendor as trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the purchaser as a trustee of the purchase-money for the vendor"; and it is said in a note, "A lessee insured his house, the lease expired, and he contracted for a new lease. Then the house was burnt; and the office insisted that at the time of burning equity of any lands or tenements of freehold, copyhold, or any other tenure whatever, for his own life, or for the life of another, or for any lives whatsoever, or for any larger estate, of the clear yearly value of not less than 5*l.* over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same, or who is entitled, either as lessee or assignee, to any lands or tenements of freehold or of any other tenure whatever, for the unexpired residue, whatever it may be, of any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years (whether determinable on a life or lives or not), of the clear yearly value of not less than 5*l.* over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same:

it was not the plaintiff's house: but it was held otherwise.—Printed Cases, D.P. 1730. Neither a contract, nor even a mere conveyance while the seller remains in possession, will give a right of voting"—Audry v. Lewis (2 Jur. N.S. C.P. 164).

[BOVILL, C.J.—That was an insurance case, and the only question was whether there was an insurable interest, not whether there was an estate.]

In Paine v. Meller (6 Ves. 349), where it was held that a purchaser was bound to complete though the premises were burnt, the Lord Chancellor says, "If the party by the contract has become in equity the owner of the premises, they are his to all intents and purposes. They are vendible as his, chargeable as his, capable of being incumbered as his; they may be devised as his, they may be assets, and they would descend to his heir."

[BOVILL, C.J., and BYLES, J.—There the estate existed which was contracted to be sold.]

In Seton v. Slade (7 Ves. 273), the Lord Chancellor says, "But there is another circumstance. The effect of a contract for purchase is very different at law and in equity. At law the estate remains the estate of the vendor; and the money that of the vendee. It is not so here. The estate from the sealing of the contract is the real property of the vendee. It descends to his heirs, it is devisable by his will, and the question whose it is, is not to be discussed merely between the vendor and vendee, but may be to be discussed between the representatives of the vendee." Lord St. Leonards does not cite in his book the cases cited by the other side, because perhaps he thought that they depended on the words of the statute 9 Geo. 1. c. 7. The claimant's possession has the protection of the Courts of equity, though he cannot call for the lease till the money is paid; and as he has a contract but has not paid, he is a mortgagor in possession, or a cestui que trust. In Holroyd v. Marshall (10 H.L. C. 209; 33 L. J. Ch. 193) it was held by the House of Lords that a contract to substitute future-acquired machinery in equity transfers the property therein when acquired; and the Lord Chancellor, in delivering judgment, says, "The question was, whether as to the machinery added and substituted since the date of the mortgage, the title of the mortgagees or that of the judgment creditor ought to prevail. It was admitted that the judgment creditor had no title as to the machinery originally comprised in the bill of sale, but it was contended that the mortgagees had no specific estate or interest in the future machinery. It was also admitted that if the mortgagees had an equitable estate in the added machinery, the same could not be taken in execution by the judgment creditor. The question might be easily decided by the application of a few elementary principles long settled in Courts of equity. In equity it is not necessary for the alienation of property that there should be a formal deed of conveyance. A contract for valuable consideration by which it was agreed to make a present transfer of property, passed at once the beneficial interest, provided the contract was one of which a Court of equity would decree specific performance. In the language of Lord Hardwicke, the vendor became a trustee for the vendee, subject of course to the contract being one to be specifically performed. And this was true, not only of contracts relating to real estate, but also of contracts relating to personal property, provided that the latter were such as a Court of equity would direct to be specifically performed. A contract for the sale of goods, as, for example, of 500 chests of tea, was not a contract which would be specifically performed, because it did not relate to any chest of tea in particular; but a contract to sell the 500 chests of a particular kind of tea which 'are now in my warehouses in Gloucester,' was a contract relating to a specific property, and which would be specifically performed. The buyer might maintain a suit in equity for the delivery of a specific chattel, when it was the subject of a contract, and for an injunction (if necessary) to restrain the seller from delivering it to any other person. The effect in equity of a mere contract, as amounting to an alienation, might be illustrated by the law relating to the revocation of wills. If the owner of an estate devised it by will, and afterwards contracted to sell it to a purchaser, but died before the contract was performed, the will was revoked as to the beneficial or equitable interest in the estate, for the contract converted the testator into a trustee for the purchaser; and, in like manner, if the purchaser died intestate before performance of the contract, the equitable estate descended to his heir-at-law, who might require the personal representative to pay the purchase-money." It is laid down in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, 161, 3rd edit., that, "from the time of the owner of an estate having entered into a binding agreement for its sale, he holds the same in trust for the purchaser, subject to payment of the purchase-money; and if the agreement be binding on the purchaser, he, on the other hand, is, as a general rule, under a personal equitable as well as legal liability to the vendor for payment of the purchase-money. And the agreement equally binds the estate, although the vendor be a trustee or a mere donee of a power of sale instead of absolute owner." And here the trustees are donees of a power. A contract to give a fee passes the fee; the same is the case of a contract to give a term; in each case if the vendee enters subject to payment of money, he is mortgagor in possession.

[BOVILL, C.J.—In this case the subject-matter is not created. Again, the conditions are not simply as to payment of money; and further, the claimant is not to have a lease till Clayton asks for it, and he is not paid off.]

The amount may be apportioned for registration purposes—Moore v. Carisbrook (12 Com. B. Rep. 661; 22 L. J. C.P. 64). In the present case the other conditions are merely subsidiary to the payment of the money; and if the matter be substantially a mortgage it is considered one in the Courts of equity. Clayton's interest is that of mortgagee, and the claimant is mortgagor in possession. Clayton is bound to cause a lease to be granted when he is paid off, and as the condition is a money one, the equitable estate as mortgagor in possession of the term passed to the claimant. In Nunn v. Fabian (35 L. J. Ch. 140) there was a parol agreement to grant a lease. The intended lessee entered and paid rent, and it was held that he was entitled to specific performance. Here, if the claimant paid 74*l*. he would have a right to a lease, and this being so, he has an estate in equity subject to be determined in certain events. The trustees have a right to 74*l*. Clayton has a right to 7,000*l*. The rest of the estate consists of a legal estate in the Jameses subject to the equitable estate of the claimant. In Reddin v. Jarman (16 L. T. 449) there was a condition as to building, not merely as to payment of money. A person who enters into a contract of sale with the owner of an estate, even if he is not to have a conveyance till payment, still has an equitable estate, and the vendor has only a lien; and if the vendor has only a lien the other must have an equitable interest.

BOVILL, C.J.—The question is whether the claimant is entitled to vote under section 5. of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which gives the county franchise to every person of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, "who is entitled either as lessee or assignee . . . . for the unexpired residue . . . . of any term originally created for a period of not less then sixty years" of a certain yearly value. The statute draws a distinction in the first place between the case of a person seised for life or lives or any greater estate and the case of a person entitled to a term of years, the words in the first part of the section relating to the first case, being "seised at law or in equity," whereas in the latter part of the section, relating to terms of years, nothing is said as to equitable estates. But, giving a liberal construction to the section, and assuming that an equitable interest in a term of years of the requisite length and value will do, the question is, does this case come within the words of the section? Mr. Williams has contended that there is an equitable estate in the claimant, and has cited various propositions of equity to the effect that where there is an agreement for the sale of an estate equity considers that the estate has passed to the vendee, and no doubt he has an equitable estate in such a case, but this case is without those principles. Here the freehold was vested in Sir Walter and Lady James, who for the purposes of this case may be said to appear as freeholders, and any other interests must spring from them; but they have not agreed with the claimant, who is no party to the agreement with them, and they are only bound to the trustees of the society and Clayton. By this the first agreement Clayton is to advance 7,000*l.*, and the Jameses create a charge on the property to that extent, and Clayton to that extent is mortgagee. The money so advanced is to be spent in certain houses built according to approved plans, of which houses the Jameses agree to grant leases on the request of Clayton, with the consent in writing of trustees. By the second agreement, made between the trustees and the claimant, the trustees agree in substance for the creation of a term of ninety-nine years; but before the claimant is entitled to have a lease he must have paid all money due and observed the conditions of the agreement and the rules of the society. At this time his position is this: the money is not paid, and even assuming (though there is nothing to shew it) that the rules have been observed, still Clayton has not asked for nor have the trustees given their consent to a lease to the claimant, and therefore no term has been created or is in existence. It is not indeed disputed that there is no legal term in existence, but it is said that there is an equitable one. I am quite at a loss to see how this can be when the time has not arrived for the granting of the lease to the claimant, and when there are various conditions to be performed before he can be entitled to one. He is in possession, no doubt, but he is not in possession for a term of ninety-nine years. It seems to me that the cases cited by Mr. Manisty are in point, and that no estate in equity has been created, but only an inchoate right to have a lease, only an equity to have a lease at a future time, but no equitable estate. Mr. Williams founded his argument on various passages in the books, which lay down that as between a vendor and a purchaser who has partly paid the purchase-money and been let into possession, the purchaser is deemed in equity to have the estate; but as respects those cases the Master of the Rolls, in Wall v. Bright (1 Jac. & W. 501), says, "Before it is known whether the agreement will be performed, he is not even in the situation of a constructive trustee; he is only a trustee sub modo, and provided nothing happens to prevent it. It may turn out that the title is not good, or the purchaser may be unable to pay; he may become bankrupt, then the contract is not performed, and the vendor again becomes the absolute owner; here he differs from a naked trustee, who can never be beneficially entitled. We must not therefore pursue the analogy between them too far. The agreement is not for all purposes considered to be completed. Thus the purchaser is not entitled to possession unless stipulated for; and if he should take possession it would be a waiver of any of the objections to the title. The vendor has a right to retain the estate in the meantime, liable to account if the purchase is completed, but not otherwise. Till then, it is uncertain whether he may not again become sole owner; the ownership of the purchaser is inchoate and imperfect; it is in the way to pass but it has not yet passed." And although there are many expressions as to the effect of agreements between vendors and purchasers they are all far short of shewing that here there is a creation of an estate as distinguished from an equitable right. I think that if we follow the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench the right rule will be laid down. I am therefore of opinion that, although perhaps when there is nothing to pay the time may come, still, whilst the matter is encumbered with the stipulations of the agreements, there is no term at law or in equity for sixty years; and that consequently the decision of the Revising Barrister should be reversed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have no doubt about the matter. The words of the statute are "unexpired residue . . . . of any term originally created" for a certain period. Therefore there must have been a created term, and here there is none, either legal or equitable. And, further, the claimant should have power at least to call for it: but he cannot, for he cannot without Clayton be a party, and he may refuse.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think the claimant is not within the statute. The Reform Act of 1832 first gave the qualification now in question, and the present Act extends it to terms of years of a less value, in words which, no doubt, admit of an argument as to whether an equitable interest in a lease for years is enough—a point as to which I should have had doubt, if it had not been decided by an Irish Judge that an equitable interest in an ascertained lease would satisfy the corresponding section in the Irish Act: after which decision I hold clearly that an equitable interest in an ascertained legal lease is enough. Whether a mere equitable lease would do I still doubt, but it is unnecessary to decide this point, because I agree with the rest of the Court that even if an equitable right to a lease under an agreement were sufficient, the circumstances of the case do not bring the claimant within the Act, for I agree that where a person has only a contract for the future acquirement of a lease, which he cannot get at present because certain acts remain to be done in order to entitle him to it, such contract gives him no right under this section of the late statute.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that the claimant is not entitled as "lessee or assignee . . . for the unexpired residue . . . . of any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years." It seems to me necessary to establish, under section 5, that a term has been created of which the claimant is lessee or assignee; it is said that an equitable term will do; but, however that may be, here, if the claimant has anything, it must be as lessee, and I think it cannot be said that he is lessee of any term. There is no dispute as to the elementary rules of equity, and it may be that where there is an agreement to grant a lease on the payment of money simply there may be an equitable term, but that could only exist where the transaction is of such a nature that there is merely a debt on one side, and a lien on the other; but where there are other future conditions to be fulfilled we cannot say that there is even in equity a term. There may be a right, but not a term: at all events not a term within the meaning of the Act. Here the lease cannot be obtained unless the two agreements are performed, and Clayton has asked for one, and he is not bound to do so till all his money is paid, and the other claimants also have performed the stipulations of the agreements. Suppose an agreement to grant a lease to A.B. if he paid certain rent and performed certain covenants, and if, further, C.D. took the next adjoining land, and paid certain rent and performed certain covenants; though such an agreement may result in a lease, we cannot say that there is a term, even though A.B. fulfilled the matters he had to perform; and the present complicated arrangement results in much the same case. Under these circumstances, therefore, I agree that the claimant is not entitled under section 5, and that the decision of the Revising Barrister should be reversed.

Decision reversed.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the City of London.

The respondent occupied exclusively and as sole tenant for his dwelling certain rooms in a house, No. 2, St. James's Place, in the parish of St. James Garlick Hithe, in the City of London. Such rooms were not so structurally severed from the rest of the building as to constitute of themselves a house. The respondent had the exclusive control over the adjoining passage, and he had under or by virtue of his tenancy a right of way over the passage from his room to the house-door, and, in common with the other occupiers resident in the house, perfect control over the house-door, so as at all hours to command free ingress and egress from and to the street. The respondent had in due time served upon the overseers of the parish of St. James Garlick Hithe a claim to be rated in respect of the said premises in the following form:

"To the overseers of the parish of St. James Garlick Hithe.—I hereby give you notice, that I occupy a part of a house at No. 2, in St. James's Place, in your parish, in successive occupation from , and I claim to be duly rated for the same to the rates made for the relief of the poor in your parish, pursuant to the English Reform and Parliamentary Registration Acts.

(Signed) "JAMES HAINS.

"Residing at No. 2, St. James's Place."

In pursuance of such claim, the overseers of the said parish had entered the name of the respondent in the occupier's column of the rate-book for the said parish, bracketed jointly with the other occupiers of the said house, and the names, the rental, rateable value and rate in the pound of the whole house alone appeared. No separate rating or assessment was carried out opposite the name of or with reference to the said respondent. In all other respects the respondent was proved to be qualified to be registered.

It was objected that, having regard to the above facts, the subject of the respondent's occupation was not a part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling and separately rated to the relief of the poor within the meaning of the 61st section of the Representation of the People Act, 1867.

The Revising Barrister held upon these facts, that the respondent had, by his occupation of the said premises in manner aforesaid, occupied part of a house as a separate dwelling, and that the same must be deemed to have been and had been separately rated to the relief of the poor, and that therefore he had been an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the said Act; and the said barrister accordingly retained the respondent's name on the list.

Prentice, for the appellant.—The decision of the Revising Barrister was wrong. The respondent was only a lodger in the rooms he occupied, for they were not so structurally separated as to constitute of themselves a house or building within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. It does not appear from the case what was the value of these rooms. Therefore, if the respondent should be entitled to vote, any lodger might equally be so entitled whatever might be the annual value of his lodgings. The respondent has endeavoured to bring himself within the meaning of section 61. of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, which declares that the term "dwelling-house" "shall include any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling and separately rated to the relief of the poor," and he claimed accordingly to be rated for part of a house, but he did not say for what part; neither was he separately rated, nor did he tender, or could he do so, payment of any rate.

Underdown, for the respondent.—The statute 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30. puts a person who has claimed to be rated in the same position as if he had been rated. It says "upon such occupier so claiming and actually paying or tendering the full amount of the rate or rates, if any, then due in respect of such premises, the overseers of the parish or township in which such premises are situate are hereby required to put the name of such occupier upon the rate for the time being; and in case such overseers shall neglect or refuse so to do, such occupier shall nevertheless, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have been rated to the relief of the poor in respect of such premises from the period at which the rate shall have been made in respect of which he shall have so claimed to be rated as aforesaid."

[KEATING, J.—The respondent never paid nor tendered the rate, as required by that Act. He could not have done so, because there was no separate rate made in respect of part of the house.]

It is submitted that it is not for the Court now to inquire whether the respondent paid or tendered the rate, as it must be assumed that the overseers, who have inserted his name on the rate together with those of the other occupiers, did their duty.

BOVILL, C.J.—The decision must be reversed. It is clear that we have no materials before us to shew that the part of the house which the respondent occupied was separately rated at all. I by no means express any opinion whether the occupier of part of a house separately rated may not be entitled to the franchise.

KEATING, J., and BRETT, J., concurred.

Decision reversed.

Bankruptcy—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 171—Mutual Credit—Deposit of Bills of Exchange as Collateral Security for Advances—Authority to Receive.

BANKRUPTCY. H.—The defendants accepted certain bills for J. & Co., who undertook to provide funds before maturity, and, as collateral security, deposited with the defendants goods and bills, which bills were indorsed by J. & Co. to the defendants, and became due on the same day as the said acceptances of the defendants. Before that day J. & Co. were adjudged bankrupts, having previously given their assent to the sale of the goods and to the defendants receiving the proceeds. The bills which had been deposited as such collateral security were paid at maturity, and these, together with the proceeds of the sale of the goods, left a balance after providing for the said acceptances of the defendants for securing which the deposit had been so made. In an action for such balance by the plaintiffs who were assignees in bankruptcy of J. & Co.: Held, that, as regards the proceeds of the sale of the goods, the bankrupts had given credit to the defendants within the meaning of the mutual credit clause of the Bankrupt Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 171, but that as regards the money received from the bills which had been so deposited as collateral security, no such credit had been given, and that therefore the defendants were not entitled to retain such last-mentioned money against a sum due to them from the estate of the bankrupts.

This was an action brought to recover a sum of 1,816*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, as money received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs as assignees in bankruptcy of Charles Joyce & Co.

By a Judge's order the following case was stated for the opinion of the Court.

CASE.

The plaintiffs are the assignees of the estate of Charles Joyce & Co., merchants, of London, who were adjudicated bankrupts on May 19, 1865.

The defendants for many years, up to August, 1865, carried on business in partnership as money-dealers and bill-brokers under the firm of Overend, Gurney & Co.

According to the evidence of William Bors, who was for many years managing clerk to Overend, Gurney & Co., the business of Overend, Gurney & Co. embraced money dealings of all sorts—discounting bills, advancing on securities, advancing credits, receiving money on deposit, holding securities for customers and receiving dividends and holding money at call against which the customers drew. Where the securities were bills of lading or bills of exchange they were indorsed by the customer and handed to Overend, Gurney & Co. In the ordinary course the customer would repay the sum advanced and then realize the securities. If the customers wished to realize they gave Overend, Gurney & Co. a borrowing ticket, who then allowed the customer to have the securities for the purpose of realizing and paying the proceeds to Overend, Gurney & Co.

Charles Joyce & Co. had for upwards of five years before their bankruptcy been customers of Overend, Gurney & Co.

On March 30, 1865, Overend, Gurney & Co. received from Charles Joyce & Co. the following letter:

"60, Moorgate Street, London,

The goods mentioned in the above letter were parcels of cotton and coffee then shortly expected to arrive, which had been shipped from Alexandria, consigned to Charles Joyce & Co., and for which they held the bills of lading. In accordance with the terms of the letter, Overend, Gurney & Co. accepted the drafts for 5,000*l.* and received the bills of lading, all of which were indorsed to them by Charles Joyce & Co.

On April 5, 1865, Overend, Gurney & Co. received from Charles Joyce & Co. the following letter:

"CHARLES JOYCE & Co."

The goods mentioned in this letter were also parcels of cotton shortly expected to arrive, of which Charles Joyce & Co. were the consignees, and for which they held the bills of lading.

In accordance with the terms of this letter, Overend, Gurney & Co. accepted drafts for the further sum of 5,000*l.*, and received the bills of lading and bills of exchange mentioned in the letter, which were respectively indorsed to them by Charles Joyce & Co.

At the dates of these letters Charles Joyce & Co. were already liable to Overend, Gurney & Co. upon their acceptances of bills discounted by Overend, Gurney & Co. to a very large amount, and exceeding the sum claimed in this action; these acceptances were dishonoured at maturity, and are now debts provable by Overend, Gurney & Co. against the estate of Charles Joyce & Co.

Charles Joyce & Co., before their bankruptcy, gave their assent to the sale by Overend, Gurney & Co. of the cotton and coffee mentioned in the above letters, and to their receiving the proceeds.[1] All the cotton was sold before the bankruptcy of Charles Joyce & Co. and the net proceeds thereof, except 59*l.*, were handed to Overend, Gurney & Co. before the said bankruptcy. The coffee arrived after the bankruptcy of Charles Joyce & Co., and was after its arrival sold by the brokers in the ordinary course. The coffee realized 1,721*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* This sum and the above 59*l.*, part of the proceeds of the cotton, were afterwards paid over by the brokers to Overend, Gurney & Co. The bills of exchange mentioned in the letter of April 5 were shortly after April 28 re-discounted by Overend, Gurney & Co., and were paid by the acceptors at maturity.

The goods described in the letter of March 30, 1865, realized 5,176*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, and the securities described in the letter of April 5, 1865, realized 6,640*l.*, leaving, after providing for the acceptances mentioned in the letter which Overend, Gurney & Co. were compelled to pay at maturity, the sum of 1,806*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, sought to be recovered in this action.

There is now due from the estate of Charles Joyce & Co. to Overend, Gurney & Co. 20,116*l.*, or thereabouts.

The plaintiffs, as assignees, seek to recover the said sum of 1,816*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, as the amount of surplus proceeds of the securities lodged with Overend, Gurney & Co., for, as the plaintiffs contend, the special purpose of protecting the above-mentioned acceptances. Overend, Gurney & Co. claim to retain this sum against the general balance due to them from Charles Joyce & Co. at the time of their bankruptcy, and allege that there was a mutual credit and mutual debts between them and Charles Joyce & Co., in respect of which they are entitled to retain the above sum against the much larger amount due to them from the estate of Charles Joyce & Co.

(1) The case was amended during the argument by adding the above words in italics.

It is agreed that the Court shall draw such inferences or conclusions as the jury ought to draw.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the defendants are entitled to retain the above amount against the balance of account due to them from Charles Joyce & Co. at the date of the bankruptcy, and provable against the estate.

Field (Lord with him), for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have no right to retain the sum claimed in this action against the general balance due to them from the bankrupts. It is not a case of mutual credit. There were two transactions; in the first there was a deposit of coffee and cotton, and in the second, a deposit of cotton and bills, each deposit being as collateral security for Joyce & Co. providing funds to meet the defendants' acceptances of the bills for 5,000*l.* and 5,000*l.*; the first set of 5,000*l.* bills being due on June 23, 1865, and the other set of 5,000*l.* bills being due on June 30, 1865. The bankruptcy occurred on May 19. The cotton was sold before the bankruptcy, and the proceeds, moreover, with the exception of 59*l.*, were received by the defendants before the bankruptcy, but the coffee arrived and was sold after the bankruptcy, and this, with the 59*l.*, would alone give the plaintiffs a verdict for nearly the amount claimed. But by the terms of the original deposit, until Joyce & Co. failed to meet the bills which the defendants had accepted from them, the defendants would have had no right to have dealt with the goods deposited with them; therefore there was no credit given by the bankrupts which would in its nature terminate in a debt. Indeed, so far from ending in a debt, as there was a balance of upwards of 1,800*l.* in favour of Joyce & Co., after satisfying the acceptances for which the securities were deposited, it is more than probable that Joyce & Co. would have redeemed the securities in due time. It is within the principle laid down in Buchanan v. Findlay (9 B. & C. 738); Hill v. Smith (12 Mee. & W. 618; 13 L. J. Ex. 243); and Alder v. Keighley (15 Mee. & W. 117; 15 L. J. Ex. 100). The question came before this Court in the recent case of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455), from which this case is distinguishable.

[Bovill, C.J.—It is stated in the present case that Charles Joyce & Co., before their bankruptcy, gave their assent to the sale by the defendants of the cotton and coffee, but it does not state the terms, whether they were to receive the proceeds, or what they were to do with them. The case had better be amended as to this.[2]]

After the amendment it is difficult, no doubt, to distinguish this case, so far as relates to the goods deposited, from that of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455); but as regards the deposit of the bills, mentioned in the letter of April 5, 1865, the terms on which they were deposited were never afterwards altered. Three of these bills, amounting in the aggregate to 2,000*l.*, were not due until June 30, which was after the bankruptcy, and as that amount exceeds the surplus proceeds of the securities, after providing for the acceptances of the defendants, it is sufficient if the plaintiffs succeed as to these bills. It is submitted that it was always competent for Joyce & Co., before June 30, to have paid the defendants the amount of the 5,000*l.* and have taken back these bills, which had been deposited only as security for such payment. The case is not distinguishable from that of Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150). The case of Rose v. Hart (8 Taunt. 499; 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 267, 6th edit.) disposed of several of the previous cases, and the decision there is in favour of the plaintiffs. Parke, B., in Alsager v. Currie (12 Mee. & W. 751; 13 L. J. Ex. 203), points out Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150) as a case to be supported.

Mathew, for the defendants.—It is submitted that, notwithstanding the case of Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150), credit was given to the defendants at the time of the original deposit of these bills. They were

(2) By agreement the amendment was then made by adding the words "and to their receiving the proceeds," as mentioned ante, in note (1).

Digitized by Google

indorsed by Joyce & Co. to the defendants, and it is submitted that the terms of their deposit were in effect to authorize the defendants to realize them, and receive the proceeds, if the 5,000*l.* advanced by the defendant's acceptance were not paid at maturity. That was a giving of credit within the meaning of the statute. The case of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455) shews that such credit would be held to be given if in any event the defendants could have received the proceeds of these bills. It was there argued that the authority to receive the moneys on the bills which had been given to the bank for collection was revocable, and that, therefore, there was no giving of credit which would end in a debt; but the Court said that this did not prevent such credit arising, as the bank would receive the money unless something was done to stop it. Here the bills were indorsed to the defendants, and that empowered the defendants to negotiate them.

[BOVILL, C.J.—Not if they were deposited only as collateral security. The case is only brought by you within that of Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150), where, in default of payment, there was an authority given to the bank to sell the paper, in order to reimburse the amount advanced.]

If that decision is to stand an authority, it is difficult to say more on this part of the case for the defendants.

[BOVILL, C.J.—We never intended to overrule it in the case of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455); on the contrary, we expressly distinguished it from that last case.]

Then, as to the cotton and coffee, there was clearly an authority given to realize, so as to bring it within the case of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455).

[BOVILL, C.J.—The plaintiffs are now willing to give you the benefit of that.]

BOVILL, C.J.—With regard to the proceeds of the sale of the cotton and coffee, it is quite clear from the case as now amended that the money so received was, by agreement before the baukruptcy, to be received in the ordinary course of things by Overend, Gurney & Co., and the case, therefore, in this respect is not distinguishable from that of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455). With regard to the bills of exchange, I think the case is equally not distinguishable from that of Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150). In that case it was only in default of repayment of the advance that the Bank of Bengal were to be allowed to sell the company's paper deposited with them; so here, it was only in case of default by Charles Joyce that the amount of the three bills, amounting in the aggregate to 2,000*l.*, was to be received. This Court, in the case of Naoroji v. the Chartered Bank of India (37 L. J. C.P. 221; L. R. 3 C.P. 455), did not mean to interfere with the decision of the Privy Council in Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150); on the contrary, this Court distinguished it from the case in the Privy Council on the ground on which the present case is not distinguishable from the case in the Privy Council, namely, that the money here would be receivable only in the event of default by Charles Joyce & Co. Here, as in Young v. the Bank of Bengal (1 Moore P.C. 150), it never was any part of the bargain that the bills should be applied differently from their original appropriation, which was as a security for the repayment of the advance, and the observation of Parke, B., in Alsager v. Currie (12 Mee. & W. 751; 13 L. J. Ex. 203) is very applicable to this case, that the bills were deposited for a particular purpose and nothing else. If there had been here no bankruptcy, Charles Joyce & Co. would probably have redeemed the bills, and in the event of bankruptcy it was the duty of their assignees to have redeemed them. No credit was given for the surplus, and under these circumstances the plaintiffs are, I think, entitled to our judgment.

KEATING, J., concurred.

Interrogatories—Libel—Tendency to criminate the Party interrogated—Discretion of the Court.

DISCOVERY. D.—In the exercise of its discretion the Court refused, in an action for libel, to allow interrogatories to be administered to the defendant where the direct tendency of them was to make the defendant criminate himself, and there were no special circumstances for allowing them to be put.

This was a motion for a rule to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to administer interrogatories to the defendant under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

The action was for certain alleged libels, and the only plea was, not guilty. The plaintiff had been clerk to the Commissioners of Patents, and in 1864 the defendant was appointed, together with the late Mr. Hindmarch, by the Commissioners of Patents to make inquiries into the management of the Patent Office, and also, amongst other things, to inquire into charges which had been made against the plaintiff, and to report thereon to the said Commissioners. The defendant and Mr. Hindmarch investigated the matters into which they were so appointed to inquire, and afterwards they made and sent in certain reports on the subject to the Commissioners of Patents, and the defendant wrote a letter to the Lord Chancellor, in which he commented on a statement the plaintiff had made during such inquiry. The libels complained of were alleged to be contained in this letter and in these reports.

The rule was moved for on an affidavit which set out the letter from the Commissioners appointing the defendant and Mr. Hindmarch to make the inquiry, and the other matters above detailed, and stated that, with reference to the second and final reports, the defendant admitted, in answer to certain questions in a suit of The Attorney-General v. Edmunds, that such reports had been lithographed by the direction of Mr. Hindmarch, with the concurrence of the defendant, and that no explanation was given as to the purposes for which such reports were so lithographed, and that the plaintiff had been informed by the Queen's printers, and believed that a large number of copies of the said reports so lithographed were printed by them. The plaintiff also stated in such affidavit that the charges made against him in the said reports were wholly untrue.

The interrogatories which it was sought to administer to the defendant were twenty-nine in number, and were directed chiefly to prove the publication of the libels, and that they were not privileged. The following specimens will serve

If so, by and to whom? 12. Was the said letter or any part thereof in your handwriting? If not, in whose handwriting was the same? Was the same drawn up under your superintendence, or with your sanction or knowledge?"

A similar application to the present had been made to Martin, B., at chambers, but had been refused by that learned Judge.

Digby Seymour (with him Macnamara and T. Atkinson).—It is submitted that although some of these interrogatories are for the purpose of obtaining answers which might make the defendant criminate himself, the plaintiff is entitled to have them put, leaving the defendant to refuse to answer them on that or any other ground on which he may be privileged from answering them. The interrogatories are put bonâ fide, and are material to support the plaintiff's case at the trial, where one of the questions will be as to the nature and scope of authority given to the defendant by the said letter of the Commissioners appointing him to make the inquiry, the plaintiff's case being that the defendant exceeded such authority. Besides, upon the issue raised under not guilty, the plaintiff will have to shew the publication of the libel, that they were not privileged, and also the existence of malice. It was considered in Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230) to be no objection to interrogatories that they tender to charge the person to whom they were delivered with an indictable offence, but that the party interrogated was placed in the same position as a witness at the trial, and that he must pledge his oath that the interrogatories would tend to criminate him, and on that account object to to answer them.

[BYLES, J.—In Chancery it is otherwise; but I am aware that there has been a difference between the practice in Chancery in respect of bills of discovery and at common law under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. KEATING, J.—I think this Court in later cases has somewhat retraced its steps to what existed prior to Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230).]

No doubt in Stern v. Sevastopulo (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 737; 32 L. J. C.P. 268) the Court of Common Pleas qualified their decision in Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230), and, following Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222), exercised a discretion as to allowing interrogatories, and in so doing they refused in that case to allow the defendants to be interrogated as to whether they had spoken the slander imputed; but in Atkinson v. Fosbroke (35 L. J. Q.B. 182; L. R. 1 Q.B. 628) the Court of Queen's Bench allowed the defendant, in an action for slander, to be interrogated as to the words uttered.

[BYLES, J.—In all these cases it is a matter in the discretion of the Court or Judge to allow the interrogatories. BOVILL, C.J.—You have to satisfy us that my Brother Martin exercised a wrong discretion in the matter. If the Court sees that the nature of the interrogatories is necessarily to lead to one or other of these results, either that the communication was a privileged one or that the answer would criminate the party interrogated, the question is whether the Court should then allow the interrogatories.]

In Zychlinski v. Maltby (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 838), where the action was for a malicious prosecution, the Court allowed the defendant to interrogate the plaintiff upon matters relevant to the issue, just as if he had been a witness at the trial. That case was followed by Stewart v. Smith (2 Notes of Cases, 41), where the same principle was adopted; and in M'Fadzen v. the Corporation of Liverpool (37 L. J. Ex. 193; L. R. 3 Ex. 279) the Court of Exchequer allowed interrogatories in a similar action, and held that any objection to answering them on the ground of subjecting the party interrogated to any criminal liability must be made by such party upon his oath.

Cur adv. vult.

BOVILL, C.J. (November 21), delivered the following judgment of the Court.[1]—This was an application for leave to administer certain interrogatories to the defendant under section 51. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. The action was for alleged libels contained in the reports made by Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Hindmarch to the Commissioners of Patents on the occasion of a certain inquiry relating to the Patent Office and in a letter to the Lord Chancellor; and the avowed object of the interrogatories was for the purpose of shewing, first, that Mr. Greenwood had exceeded his authority; secondly, that he had circulated the reports to persons not privileged: and thirdly, that he had acted from malicious motives. The direct tendency, therefore, of these interrogatories was to make the defendant criminate himself, and to render him liable afterwards to criminal proceedings. An application had been made to my Brother Martin at chambers to allow these interrogatories, but he had refused the application, and the case comes to us by way of appeal from his decision. In all the decided cases upon the subject it has been considered that the Judge at chambers is to use his discretion as to what interrogatories shall be allowed to be administered, and that the Court will not interfere unless they are of opinion that such discretion has been improperly exercised. Now, in many cases interrogatories have been allowed which have tended to make the party interrogated incriminate himself, leaving it to him to refuse to answer the same, upon the ground that his answer might have that effect; for instance, in cases of malicious prosecution, where—in Zychlinski v. Markby (10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 838) and Stewart v. Smith (2 Notes of Cases, 41)—the interrogatories were so allowed; and in cases of fraud they were allowed in Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230) and Osborn v. the London Docks Company (10 Ex. Rep. 698; 24 L. J. Ex. 140). But in an action for libel the Court of Exchequer, in Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222), refused to allow interrogatories to be put to the defendants with the view of proving the authority of publication, and my Brother Martin in delivering the judgment of the Court said: "We are all of opinion that, in the exercise of the authority and discretion given to us by the 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, such interrogatories ought not to be allowed. It was scarcely contended that the defendants were bound to answer them; but it was urged that the interrogatories ought to be administered, leaving the defendants to refuse to answer if they thought fit.

Without laying down any general rule on the subject, we think that in cases of this kind it would be unfair to submit questions which a party is clearly not bound to answer, the object being either to compel him to answer when not bound, or to refuse, and so create a prejudice against him. We therefore think that these interrogatories ought not to be allowed." This Court in the case of Stern v. Sevastopulo (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 737; 32 L. J. C.P. 268) acted again on the same principle. That was an action for verbal slander, and the Court refused to allow interrogatories to be put to the defendant as to the speaking of the words. That case is a strong one, because an order allowing the interrogatories had been made there by a Judge at Chambers, and the Court set aside that order. The cases which were relied upon by Mr. Seymour in moving for this rule were all cited and relied on in that case; and in dealing with that case Erle, C.J., says: " It appears to me that this is an attempt to extend the rule to a degree that might lead to most pernicious consequences; an extent to which, if there be no authority to warrant it, I for one should decline to become responsible for carrying it. In Mr. Day's excellent book on the Common Law Procedure Acts, 2nd edit., pp. 235, 236, Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222) is referred to to shew that the Courts have a general discretion in the matter of allowing interrogatories; and Moor v. Roberts (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 671; 26 L. J. C.P. 246), to shew that such interrogatories as are merely of a fishing character are not to be allowed. The unprecedented nature of these interrogatories, the nature of the action, and the action of any special circumstances to warrant them, seem to me to afford abundantly sufficient grounds for holding that they overstep the boundary line. I do not mean to say that in no case will the Court allow interrogatories in an action of slander. But before I will consent to allow them I must be satisfied that there are very peculiar circumstances of grievance and oppression to justify so novel a proceeding." The rest of the Court concurred in the judgment. A similar question arose in the case of Atkinson v. Fosbroke (35 L. J. Q.B. 182; L. R. 1 Q.B. 628). The Court of Queen's Bench in that case agreeing on the general rule on which interrogatories are to be allowed, as stated in the case of Stern v. Sevastopulo (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 737; 32 L. J. C.P. 268), thought that under the very special and peculiar circumstances of that case, though it was an action of slander, the interrogatories might be allowed. In the present case we do not find that there are any such special circumstances as would take it out of the principle that was acted on by the Court of Exchequer in Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222), and this Court in Stern v. Sevastopulo (14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 737; 32 L. J. C.P. 268); in fact, every word of the judgments in each of those cases might be with propriety applied to the present case. The express and avowed object here is to put questions in order to compel the defendant to criminate himself. In the absence of any such special circumstances as would induce a Judge or the Court in the exercise of his or their discretion to allow such interrogatories to be put, we are of opinion that they ought not to be allowed. We are asked to say that my Brother Martin exercised his discretion wrongly. So far from thinking that he has done so, we think that he exercised his discretion very properly in not allowing these interrogatories, and that this application must therefore be refused.

Rule refused.

Landlord and Tenant—Tenancy determining on Death of Landlord—Emblements—14 & 15 Vict. c. 25. s. 1—Rights of Succeeding Landlord—Distress.

claiming emblements, is to continue to occupy until the expiration of the then current year of his tenancy, and the succeeding owner is to be entitled to recover and receive of the tenant, in the same manner as the tenant's lessor could have done if he had been living, a fair proportion of the rent from the death of such lessor to the time of the tenant so quitting.

The plaintiff occupied, as yearly tenant of A., who was tenant for life, a small labourer's cottage, with an acre of land, which was partly cultivated as a garden and partly sown with corn or planted with potatoes. The defendant became owner of the cottage and land on the death of A., and distrained for the proportion of rent due from the plaintiff in respect of such cottage and land between A.'s death and the expiration of the then current year of the plaintiff's tenancy up to which time the plaintiff remained in occupation.

The COURT, who were at liberty to draw inferences of fact, held that the plaintiff was tenant of lands in respect of which emblements might be claimed within the meaning of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25. s. 1, and that the defendant was entitled to recover such proportion of rent by distress.

This was an action of trespass for the recovery of damages for an alleged illegal distress. The declaration charged the defendants with having broken and entered plaintiff's cottage and close, and made a distress on his goods and chattels. The defendants pleaded to the action not guilty, by statute 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 21, Public Act, upon which plea issue was joined.

By consent of the parties, and by a Judge's order, the following CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court:

The plaintiff, at the date of the distress hereinafter stated, viz., October 12, 1866, was in occupation of a cottage and close at Holbeach, in the county of Lincoln, being the cottage and close mentioned in the declaration.

For several years the plaintiff, who married a daughter of one Ann Hitch, by her second husband, J. Harrison, had held the said cottage as a tenant of the said Ann Hitch from year to year from October 11, under a demise by the said Ann Hitch, at a yearly rent payable half-yearly, on April 6 and October 11.

Ann Hitch was tenant for life of the said cottage and close under a marriage settlement, the trusts of which were set out in the case.

The said Ann Hitch died in February, 1866, and upon her death the defendant Marriott became owner of the said cottage and close.

On October 12, 1866, the defendant Welch, as the broker of the defendant Marriott, made a distress upon the said cottage for the proportion of the said rent alleged to be due from the death of the said Ann Hitch up to October 11, 1866, and which had not been paid. The distress was sold.

The cottage is a small labourer's cottage standing upon a close containing more than an acre of land, which was partly cultivated as a garden, and partly sown with corn or planted with potatoes.

There never was any agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant Marriott as to the rent of the cottage after the death of Ann Hitch.

The Court was at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether, under the above circumstances, the defendants had any right to distrain.

Lanyon, for the plaintiff.—The question is, whether the defendant Marriott, who, under the trusts of the settlement became entitled to the cottage and close as owner on the death of the plaintiff's landlady Ann Hitch, had any right to distrain for the rent which accrued between the death of Ann Hitch and the end of the then current year of the plaintiff's tenancy. No relation of landlord and tenant between Marriott and the plaintiff had been created by the acts of the party, and his right to distrain, if at all, must rest on the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25. s. 1. That section, after reciting that " it is expedient to amend the law to prevent or lessen the evils of the right to emblements and the loss and injury arising therefrom, and also the law relating to growing crops seized under execution, and to agricultural fixtures," enacts, "that where the lease or tenancy of any farm or lands held by a tenant at a rack-rent shall determine by the death or cesser of the estate of any landlord entitled for his life or for any other uncertain interest, instead of claims to emblements, the tenant shall continue to hold and occupy such farm or lands until the expiration of the then current year of his tenancy, and shall then quit, upon the terms of his lease or holding, in the same manner as if such lease or tenancy were then determined by effluxion of time or other lawful means during the continuance of his landlord's estate; and the succeeding landlord or owner shall be entitled to recover and receive of the tenant, in the same manner as his predecessor or such tenant's lessor could have done if he had been living or had continued the landlord or lessor, a fair proportion of the rent for the period which may have elapsed from the day of the death or cesser of the estate of such predecessor or lessor to the time of the tenant so quitting; and the succeeding landlord or owner and the tenant respectively shall, as between themselves and as against each other, be entitled to all the benefits and advantages, and be subject to the terms, conditions and restrictions, to which the preceding landlord or lessor and such tenant respectively would have been entitled and subject in case the lease or tenancy had determined in manner aforesaid at the expiration of such current year: provided always, that no notice to quit shall be necessary or required by or from either party to determine any such holding and occupation as aforesaid." It is submitted that the enactment does not apply to this case, because there were not here emblements within the meaning of that clause. Here there was only about an acre of land attached to a labourer's cottage, partly cultivated as a garden and partly sown with corn or planted with potatoes. That does not comprise emblements of sufficient importance to have been within the contemplation of the legislature in passing this Act, the title of which is "An Act to improve the Law of Landlord and Tenant in relation to emblements, to growing crops seized in execution and to agricultural tenants' fixtures."

[WILLES, J.—The question here is, whether this cottage and close are "farm or lands," within the meaning of the statute.]

It is submitted that they are not, and the defendant's remedy is only by action.

[WILLES, J.—The Act applies to Ireland as well as to England, and in Ireland there are farms as small as this piece of land. You can hardly call it a cottage with a curtilage.]

It is submitted that the plaintiff does not come within the meaning of the term agricultural tenant, to which only the Act was intended to apply. Next, it is submitted that the words "recover and receive" in this section do not include a power to distrain, but only a right to recover by action. The defendant should have sued for use and occupation.

Beasley, for the defendant, was not called on.

WILLES, J.—There is at least no authority against the construction, which it appears to me is the proper one to put on this enactment, and in my opinion this case falls within the statute. There was here that in respect of which the tenant might have claimed emblements, and therefore might have had a right to come on the land after the tenancy and to have taken away the crops when ripe. The case therefore comes within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act, namely, the inconvenience arising from a person becoming entitled to land subject to the right of another to enter upon it for emblements, which would be very likely to create disputes. It is unnecessary to say whether the Act applies to all lands capable of having emblements, whether emblements were, in fact, there or not. It is within the Act unless the holding can be considered to be not a holding of farm or lands; but I agree with Mr. Lanyon that to be within the Act there must be that in respect of which emblements might be claimed. It is difficult to say that because the quantity of land is small, therefore it is not within the Act. Here the land was not necessary for minute matters in respect of which there could be no real emblements. As to the second point, namely, that there is no power given to distrain by the words "recover and receive," it is true, no doubt, that the word "recover" has a technical meaning in law, and that it technically means recover by action and by the judgment of the Court; and there are cases to be found in the books shewing that the word "recover" has received that limited construction, but there are others which may be found in which the word has been held to be used in the larger and more popular sense of recover by any legal means, which would include the right of distress, and I think that in that sense it is used in this enactment, especially when one finds in the company of what other words it is used, which is, that the owner is to be entitled "to recover" of the tenant in the same manner as "such tenant's lessor could have done if he had been living." The statute therefore applying, the defendants are entitled to our judgment.

KEATING, J., and BRETT, J., concurred.

Contract—Sale of Shares—Stock Exchange—Liability of Purchaser—Contract to Indemnify—Deed under Seal—Principal and Agent.

STOCK EXCHANGE.—The plaintiff sold on the Stock Exchange twenty shares in a joint-stock company to P. for the account day. The defendant, on a different day, and at a different price, but for the same account day as that for which the plaintiff had sold, bought of P. in like manner on the Stock Exchange, twenty shares in the same company. Before the account day the defendant gave the name of C. as the transferee of the shares he had bought, and a deed of transfer of the shares from the plaintiff to C. was duly made under seal, and executed by both the plaintiff and C., and the purchase-money paid to the plaintiff. The company being shortly afterwards in a course of winding-up, and the liquidators refusing to register the transfer of the plaintiff's shares, the plaintiff was put on the list of contributories in respect of such shares, and obliged to pay a call on them:—Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to be indemnified by the defendant against such call.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 102*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* and interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, in respect of a call made by the liquidators of the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, Lim., on certain shares in the said association, alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The cause came on to be tried, at the Sittings in Middlesex after Trinity Term, 1867, before Keating, J., when by consent of the parties a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the sum of 150*l.*, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a CASE of which the following are the material facts:—

The Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, Lim., was incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1862, and registered on June 24, 1864. The capital was 5,000,000*l.* sterling, divided into 100,000 shares of 50*l.* each, and the liability of the members was limited.

In the months of February and March, 1866, the plaintiff purchased and had transferred to him 120 shares in the said association, and he duly became the registered owner of such shares.

On May 10, 1866, the plaintiff, being desirous of disposing of his said shares, instructed his stockbrokers, Messrs. Lawrence, Son & Pearce, to sell them on the London Stock Exchange, in the ordinary way, at the current price of the day. Accordingly the brokers sold the plaintiff's shares on that day to different jobbers on the Stock Exchange, and the following is a copy of the sold-note handed to the plaintiff by his brokers:

"7, Angel Court, London, May 10, 1866.

"Sold for Right Hon. Viscount Torrington, 120 Imperial Mercantile Credit shares, 10*l.* paid, viz., twenty to L. Paine, fifty to J. Paine, fifty to W. Morris, for 15th inst., at 8¾ dis. 150*l.*

"LAWRENCE, SON & PEARCE."

Such sales were made in the ordinary course of business for the next settling-day, viz., May 15, as appears by the said note. The names of L. Paine, J. Paine and W. Morris in the said sold-note were the names of the jobbers above referred to.

On May 2 the defendant instructed his brokers, Messrs. Spencer & Norton, to purchase on the Stock Exchange for the same account, viz., May 15, twenty shares in the said association; and they did accordingly on that day purchase from the said L. Paine twenty shares, and forwarded to the defendant a bought-note, of which the following is a copy:

"22, Throgmorton Street, London, E.C., May 2, 1866.

"Bought for and on account of John Lowe, Esq.,

Twenty Imperial Mercantile Credit, at 5⅛ dis. 10*l.* paid	£97	10	0
Commission		15	0

"SPENCER & NORTON, Brokers. For 15th."

The defendant never had any transactions with the plaintiff except as appears by this case, nor was he aware at the time of the above purchase who was the real seller of the shares to him. The said Spencer & Norton, on the said May 2, purchased for the defendant and other persons in manner aforesaid, but from other jobbers, other shares in the said association for the same account, viz., May 15, 1866.

In the regular course of business, and according to the rules and established custom of the Stock Exchange, it would be the duty of the jobber on the Stock Exchange, some day before the settling-day, to settle accounts with his purchasing and selling brokers, and then the purchasing broker, on the day before the settling-day, gives to the selling broker, through the jobber, the name and description of the transferee to fill into the transfer; and accordingly Messrs. Spencer & Norton, on May 14, having ascertained then for the first time from the said L. Paine that Messrs. Lawrence, Son & Pearce were to supply twenty of the shares purchased by them, instructed L. Paine, the jobber, to give to Lawrence, Son & Pearce the name of one Charles Cotton as the transferee of twenty of the shares so purchased by them.

A transfer into the name of the said Charles Cotton was then prepared in pursuance of the aforesaid instructions in fulfilment of one of the contracts so entered into by Messrs. Spencer & Norton on behalf of the defendant, as before stated; but the fact of the plaintiff being a transferor of twenty shares in fulfilment of one of the said contracts was the act of the brokers and jobbers only, without the previous knowledge of either of the parties to the action, and was done in accordance with the established custom of the Stock Exchange.

The transfer was duly executed by both parties in the proper form prescribed by the articles of association, and the following is a copy of the transfer:

"I, the Right Honourable George Byng, Viscount Torrington, of 4, Warwick Square, Pimlico, S.W., in consideration of 50*l.* paid to me by Charles Cotton, of 36, Cumberland Street, Warwick Square, do hereby bargain, sell, assign and transfer to the said Charles Cotton, Nos. 59,336 to 59,345, and 12,161 to 12,170, of and in the undertaking called The Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, Lim., to hold unto the said Charles Cotton, his executors, administrators and assigns, subject to the several conditions on which I held the same immediately before the execution hereof. And I, the said Charles Cotton, do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid. As witness our hands and seals the 17th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1866."

In exchange for the certificates of the said twenty shares and the transfer thereof, which was duly executed by the plaintiff and Cotton, Messrs. Spencer & Norton paid to the plaintiff's brokers the price at which the shares had been sold by the plaintiff's brokers, who duly accounted to the plaintiff for the same. There was a rapid fall in the value of these shares between May 2 and 14. The price on May 14 was 10½*l.* to 9½*l.* discount.

The said Charles Cotton neither paid nor agreed to pay to the defendant any sum of money in respect of the said shares, and although there was no agreement or undertaking as to the terms on which the defendant was to make use of the name of the said Charles Cotton, yet the defendant had authority to have the shares transferred into the name of Cotton as the nominee of the defendant.

On May 12, 1866, a petition was presented to the Court of Chancery, praying that the said association might be wound up compulsorily. On May 14 another like petition was presented. On May 15 both these petitions were advertised in the London Gazette.

A third similar petition was presented on May 23, and on May 28 the association, by resolution duly confirmed at a meeting held on June 14, resolved to wind up voluntarily.

On June 25, Wood, V.C., made an order that the voluntary winding-up should be continued under the supervision of the Court, and such winding-up has since continued.

The transfer and certificates of the plaintiff's said twenty shares were duly carried by Messrs. Spencer & Norton, on June 22, 1866, into the office of the association, where they still remain. The liquidators declined to register the transfer, and consequently the plaintiff's name was included in the list of contributories in respect of the said twenty shares. Thereupon the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the said Charles Cotton, informing him that they would endeavour to put him on the list of contributories in the place of the plaintiff in respect of these shares. When this was written neither the plaintiff nor his solicitors had any knowledge of the defendant.

The plaintiff, failing to have the name of Charles Cotton substituted for his own, was finally settled upon the list of contributories in respect of the said shares, and became liable to pay such calls as were made thereon.

On August 31, 1866, the liquidators made a call of 5*l.* per share on each of the said twenty shares; and the plaintiff, on December 10, 1866, paid 100*l.*, the amount of the said call, and 2*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* for interest thereon, according to the articles of association.

The said Charles Cotton has not repaid the plaintiff the said call or interest, and the defendant has refused to pay the said amount or any part thereof, or to indemnify the plaintiff against the same.

The pleadings were not appended to the case, as the parties agreed that the Court should decide the question of liability and might draw inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether, on the above state of facts, the plaintiff was entitled to be indemnified by the defendant against the amount of the said call and interest so paid by him as aforesaid.

Philbrick (Sir John Karslake with him), for the plaintiff.—It is submitted that the defendant was really the buyer of twenty of the shares sold by the plaintiff, and that Cotton, whose name was given as the transferee of such shares, was in fact the defendant's agent for that purpose.

[BOVILL, C.J.—How do you establish a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant?]

By the defendant's agreeing on May 14 to take twenty of the shares, which the plaintiff had previously sold, and by his then giving instructions for such shares to be transferred into the name of Cotton, the defendant became substantially the purchaser of these shares.

[BRETT, J.—There was a transfer of these shares from the plaintiff to Cotton executed under seal. Can you charge the defendant as an undisclosed principal where the contract is under seal?]

It is submitted that the defendant as principal can be made liable, notwithstanding his agent Cotton may be also liable under the deed which he executed. It comes within the principle propounded by Lord Wensleydale in Higgins v. Senior (8 Mee. & W. 834; 11 L. J. Ex. 199).

[Arundel Rogers, for the defendant, referred to Story on Agency, s. 450, where it is said, "Where a contract is made under seal between the agent in his own name and a third person, the principal cannot sue or be sued thereon, although it may be authorized by him."]

That only shews that the defendant cannot be sued on any covenant in the deed; but here the plaintiff is not seeking to sue on the deed, but on the contract or bargain made independently of such deed, and which, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant—Grissell v. Bristowe.[1] The case of Sheppard v. Murphy (Ir. R. 2 Eq. 544; 16 W. R. 948), before the Irish Chancery Court of Appeal, is very similar to the present, and that case shews that where shares have been sold and purchased through brokers on the London Stock Exchange, there is a privity of contract between the original seller and the person who has ultimately become the purchaser of such shares, and such original seller may proceed against such purchaser for an indemnity against subsequent calls.

[BOVILL, C.J.—To make the present case resemble that case, the defendant's name should have been given as that of the person who would take the transfer, whereas the name given her was that of Cotton.]

But the moment it is ascertained that the defendant, and not Cotton, was the real principal, it is submitted that the plaintiff has a right to go against the defendant. The deed contains statements which are clearly not true, both as to the amount of the consideration-money and as to its payment by Cotton to the plaintiff. Why, then, may not the plaintiff go behind the deed and get at the real transaction, by which it would appear that the defendant was as much the purchaser of the shares, and therefore as liable to the seller, as was Murphy in the above of Sheppard v. Murphy (Ir. R. 2 Eq. 544; 16 W. R. 948).

Arundel Rogers (M'Kellar with him), for the defendant.—This action cannot be maintained. There was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant; the days were different on which instructions were given to their respective brokers to buy and sell, and the prices were different at which they respectively bought and sold. There is nothing whatever to shew that the defendant made any contract with the plaintiff. Secondly, if there was any contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was performed when the name of Cotton was given and accepted as the transferee. That was all which according to the usage of the Stock Exchange the defendant as the buyer would have to do—Shaw v. Fisher (5 De Gex, M. & G. 596). After executing the deed of transfer to Cotton, the plaintiff cannot make the defendant liable in this action. If he has any remedy at all against the defendant, it must be in equity only. The effect of the execution of a transfer of shares to a sub-purchaser at the request of the first was considered in Cruse v. Paine (37 L. J. Ch. 711), where Cruse had sold to the defendants in that case in the same way as the present plaintiff had sold to Paine, and the defendants gave the name of Hutchinson, into whose name the shares had been transferred, and Giffard, V.C., said, "If there is a contract between Mr. Cruse and the defendants, the mere fact that he has executed at their instance a transfer (and nothing more was done) cannot alter the liabilities of the one or the other." His Honour then proceeds to shew that to do that there must be a new contract intended to be substituted for the first. Now here, by the execution of the transfer to Cotton, there never was intended to create a new contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, nor was any such created.

BOVILL, C.J.—The original contract which Lord Torrington made in this case was one made through his brokers on May 10, 1866, to sell to Paine, a stock-jobber, twenty shares. The purchase was to be completed on May 15, 1866, and the price was 8*l.* 15*s.* discount, which, at 10*l.*, the amount paid on each share, would be 1*l.* 5*s.* per share. The contract had to be performed by Paine, and he carried it out according to the usages of the Stock Exchange, which do not differ from other branches of commerce, where, if a man contracts to sell he delivers the article agreed to be supplied if he has it, or if not he gets it elsewhere, and so performs his contract. The practice of the Stock Exchange has not been found to produce inconvenience. The person who buys shares may sell them to another, and when the day for settling comes he may make his vendor transfer the shares to the person to whom he has so sold them. In this particular case there was another contract, by which Paine contracted to sell to the defendant, not the identical twenty shares which by the prior contract he had contracted to buy of the plaintiff, but any twenty shares in the Mercantile Credit Association which he could procure. This also was for May 15, the same settlement-day as in the other contract, but at a different price, namely, 5*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* discount, which was equal to 4*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per share. There were thus two separate and distinct contracts, but the only contract made by the plaintiff was that of May 10, and which was made with Paine, and if it had stood there Paine alone would have been responsible to the plaintiff for the purchase of the twenty shares; but Paine having contracted with the defendant for the sale of twenty shares to him, proposes to substitute the defendant or his purchaser for the performance of his contract with the plaintiff. The defendant, as well as Paine, was only bound to provide the name of a buyer, and he accordingly gave the name of Cotton, which, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was given in order to carry out the contract between the plaintiff and Paine. Now, it is not necessary to consider whether the plaintiff was bound to have accepted the name of Cotton or not, for he did accept that name, and he executed a deed of transfer of the shares to Cotton, whose name he had so accepted, and Cotton also executed the deed and took a transfer of the shares; and the whole of this, I think, was done in order to fulfil the contract between the plaintiff and Paine. It is plain, therefore, according to the authorities, that when this was done the plaintiff's remedy against Paine was at an end; but it is said that there was then a new contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. I think it is impossible to connect the two contracts together which the plaintiff and the defendant had respectively made with Paine. In what way then did the plaintiff enter into a new contract with the defendant? If the deed of transfer could amount to a new contract at all it would be a contract on that deed, and between the plaintiff and Cotton, and Cotton would be the person who would be liable to indemnify the plaintiff. It is said, however, that the plaintiff can go behind the deed, and charge the defendant as the undisclosed principal; but according to law the party who was a party to and signed the deed as principal would alone be liable, and no one else could be sued as an undisclosed principal. Moreover, how can the plaintiff, as regards any contract with the defendant, be in a better position than he would be as regards the contract with Paine? Paine's contract with the plaintiff at the utmost was only to give the name of a transferee, and when that was given and accepted he was discharged. How can the defendant's liability be more than Paine's? and when Paine was discharged by the giving of Cotton's name in fulfilment of the contract between Paine and the plaintiff, the defendant was equally discharged. I do not desire, however, to put the case on that footing. The deed of transfer created a liability on the part of Cotton, and, according to the rule of law, the defendant, who was no party to that deed, cannot be sued on it; and the case of Cox v. Bishop (26 L. J. Ch. 389) is a strong authority to shew that even in equity the defendant would not be liable. In that case it was sought to charge equitable assignees of a lease with the performance of the covenants in the original lease; but it was held by the Lords Justices, overruling a decision of the Master of the Rolls, that such assignees were not liable to the lessor for such covenants even for the time they were in possession of the property demised. The cases which were referred to by the learned counsel on behalf of the plaintiff are all distinguishable. The case which he most pressed upon us was Sheppard v. Murphy (Ir. Rep. 2 Eq. 544; 16 W. R. 948). That case was in substance this; Sheppard had sold certain shares to Kennedy on the Stock Exchange, and Kennedy had sold an equal number of such shares to Murphy on a different day and at a different price; and in that respect the circumstances were similar to the present. The name of Murphy was passed to Sheppard as that of the transferee, and Sheppard executed a deed of transfer of the shares to Murphy and was paid the price; but Murphy did not sign the deed, and in a suit by Sheppard for indemnity against calls in respect of such shares, Murphy was held liable, although he had not executed the deed. The ground on which he was held to be liable was this: that he had caused his own name to be handed in as the transferee, paid the price, and requested the transfer of the shares to be made out to him. If Murphy had executed the deed of transfer, there would have been no doubt as to his liability; and as he had agreed to accept the shares, and was bound to execute the deed, the Court of Chancery, acting on the well-known principle of equity, held him to be just as liable as he would have been if he had executed the deed. But what obligation was there on the defendant in this case to have executed the deed of transfer? All that was proposed was, that there should be a transfer to Cotton; and the only obligation, if any, on the defendant was, that Cotton should execute the deed, and that was performed. I have failed to discover any contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, either at common law or by the usage of the Stock Exchange, by which the defendant can be made responsible to the plaintiff. The defendant fulfilled every condition of the rules of the Stock Exchange, and our judgment therefore must be for him.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear, I think, that there was no contract even between the plaintiff and Paine which was not performed. Paine entered into a contract to provide a person who should take a transfer of the shares. He did so; Cotton was accepted by the plaintiff as such transferee; and both he and the plaintiff executed the deed. In every view of the case there was no remedy for the plaintiff against Paine after that had been done. But this is a stronger case than it would have been if the action had been against Paine; for here I can see no privity whatever between the plaintiff and the defendant. It is plain, therefore, that the judgment should be for the defendant.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that there was really no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. The original contract of sale was with Paine. Then, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, the name of Cotton was given as the transferee. It is unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff was bound to accept that name, because he did accept it, and he executed a deed under seal transferring the shares to Cotton, which Cotton also executed. The plaintiff's counsel felt the difficulty this created in the way of his case, and he sought to get rid of it, first, by endeavouring to shew that the defendant was liable as the real principal; but the contract being under seal he could not do so. Then he argued that Cotton was the agent of the defendant, and that the execution of the deed by Cotton was an execution of it by the defendant. But there is no ground for this; for Cotton never professed to execute the deed as the defendant's agent, but on the contrary he professed to execute it as a principal. The defendant never promised to execute any such deed, or to do more than to give the name of a transferee, which he accordingly did. I cannot help seeing that the result is oppressive to the plaintiff, who, supposing he had got rid of all liability in respect of these shares, finds that he is still liable, and that all he has done has been to execute a deed of transfer. However, there is, at all events, no contract between the plaintiff and the defendant on which the defendant can be made liable.

BRETT, J.—It seems to me that the only action which the plaintiff can bring is one of indemnity contained in the contract of bargain and sale. Therefore, the question is, with whom was such contract made? In the first place, the contract was with Paine. Now, by that contract, the plaintiff probably agreed to accept some name which was to be given as the transferee of the shares. The only name which was given here was that of Cotton. The next step for the plaintiff to prove, in order to fix the defendant with liability, would be that this name was given with the defendant's consent; but, however that may be, the contract which was eventually made was a contract in writing, and under the seals of both the plaintiff and Cotton. Therefore, the contract resulted in a contract which was nominally between the plaintiff and Cotton. Then the plaintiff undertakes to shew that though nominally with Cotton the contract was really with the defendant; and he attempts to do so by shewing that the defendant was the undisclosed principal. Now, by the law of England, he is not at liberty to do so; and, in the next place, I doubt whether the defendant was the principal of Cotton as a party to such a contract, because, by the contract which the defendant made with Paine, he, the defendant, undertook either to accept the shares himself or to give the name of another person. The defendant gave the name of Cotton; and when he did so, he did not intend to give the name of Cotton as his representative, but as a principal who, as such, was to be liable on the contract. I think, however, that the judgment of the Court must be founded on this, which is a rule of law, that, the contract being under seal, the plaintiff is not to be at liberty to shew who the other party to the contract was besides the parties to the deed.

Judgment for the defendant.

Church—Parish Clerk—Assignment of Office—Action for Marriage Fees—Local Act.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—The office of parish clerk cannot be assigned.

A. who, in the year 1818, had been appointed for life to the office of parish clerk of the cathedral and parish church of M., with power to nominate a deputy, executed a deed in 1833 by which he purported to assign such office to B., and after that time he ceased to act as such parish clerk. In 1850 an Act was passed for the division into districts of the parish of M., by the 6th section of which it was provided, that during the continuance in office of the chaplains or minor canons and clerks then holding office in the cathedral and parish church of M. the fees for marriages, &c. at such church were to be paid to the district rector, who was to pay them to the said chaplains or minor canons, to be by them paid to the persons entitled thereto:—Held, that the deed executed by A. in 1833 could not by law operate as an assignment of his office, and that therefore he still continued to be the parish clerk of the said church.

Held, also that A. had a right to sue the district rector for the marriage fees due to him as parish clerk, notwithstanding the said 6th section of the statute, and notwithstanding that the chaplains and minor canons, to whom the rector was by that section to pay such fees, had ceased to exist, inasmuch as such clause was only to provide a machinery for the distribution of the fees, and did not affect the rights of A.

Appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court of Manchester.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 2*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* for marriage fees claimed by the plaintiff, as payable to him as lay parish clerk of the parish of Manchester, and of the cathedral or collegiate and parish church of Manchester, for marriages solemnized at St. Peter's Church, Oldham Road, Manchester, between January 1, 1860, and December 31, 1866.

The fees claimed by the plaintiff were those alleged to be reserved and payable by the defendant to him, pursuant to the 6th section of the Manchester Rectory Division Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 41).[1]

In July, 1818, the plaintiff was appointed to the office of lay parish clerk of the parish of Manchester, and of the said cathedral or collegiate and parish church of Manchester, by a deed[2] made by the late Sir Thomas Joseph de Trafford, Baronet, then Mr. Trafford, in whose gift the office was, as stated in section 18 of the said Rectory Division Act.

By an indenture, dated November 14, 1835, the plaintiff, in consideration of 1,900*l.*, assigned to Mr. Thomas Davenport his office of parish clerk of the said parish and church, and the emoluments arising therefrom.

The plaintiff has not since 1835 acted as parish clerk or appointed any deputy to act in his stead, other than by the said indenture of November 14, 1835.

The said Manchester Rectory Division Act received the royal assent on July 29, 1850.

The chaplains or minor canons and the clerk in orders, holding office at the

(1) The following is section 6 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41 : "And in order that the setting out and declaring, or setting out, constituting, and annexing, any district or parish, under the provisions of this Act, to any church or chapel already consecrated or to be hereafter consecrated, may not prejudice the revenues of the chaplains or minor canons or of the clerks now holding office in the cathedral and parish church of Manchester, be it enacted, That there shall be paid to the rectors of such districts or parishes respectively, and their successors for the time being, for the performance of marriages, churchings, and burials, during the continuance in office of the said chaplains or minor canons and clerks, or any of them, the fees which are usually and of right ought to be paid for every such marriage and burial, and such offerings as are usually and of right made for every such churching at the said cathedral and parish church of Manchester; and that the said rectors and their respective successors shall from time to time receive such fees and offerings, and pay to the said chaplains or minor canons such proportion of the same as incumbents of chapelries and districts within the parish of Manchester have hitherto paid of fees and offerings respectively received by them in respect of marriages, churchings, and burials in their several churches and chapels, to be by the said chaplains or minor canons paid to the person or persons for the time being entitled thereto, and in such shares and proportions as the fees and offerings respectively now payable at the said last-mentioned church are divided, and that the said fees and offerings shall be paid by half-yearly payments on the Feast of the Nativity of our Saviour Christ and of St. John the Baptist in every year : Provided always, that on the death of any one or more of the present chaplains or minor canons and clerks, or on the ceasing of any one or more of them to hold his or their office or offices respectively, or being compensated in manner hereinafter provided, such proportion of the fees and offerings to be paid to the said chaplains or minor canons and clerks as would have belonged to the person or persons so dying or ceasing to hold office, or being compensated as aforesaid, shall cease and determine; and from and after the death or vacation of office of all the said present chaplains or minor canons and clerks such fees only shall be payable at any such church or chapel as aforesaid as shall be fixed by the bishop of the diocese under the provisions hereinafter contained : Provided also, that nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with the right of performing marriages within the parish of Manchester (as now existing) already enjoyed by the incumbents of the churches of Saint Mary and Saint John in Manchester, until the next avoidances of the said churches respectively, when the same shall cease and determine, except as to the districts or parishes then severally annexed or to be annexed to the said churches."

(2) The deed was a deed-poll, by which, after reciting the right and power of the said Mr. Trafford and his ancestors "of nominating and appointing one of the officiating clerks of the Collegiate Church, in Manchester," the said Mr. Trafford did "nominate, constitute and appoint the said Humphrey Nichols" (the plaintiff) "to the said office of clerk to the said church : to have, hold, exercise and enjoy the said office by himself, his deputy or deputies, and to receive and take the revenues," &c., "for and during the term of his natural life, in the same way and manner to all intents and purposes as his predecessors, clerks of the said church, have been used," &c.

time of the passing of the said Act, all ceased to hold their respective offices as chaplains, minor canons and clerk in orders before the commencement of the year 1855.

The defendant was the rector of St. Peter's Church, Oldham Road, Manchester, to which a parish, constituted out of the ancient parish of Manchester, had been annexed under the provisions of the above-mentioned Act.

The said church of St. Peter's was consecrated in January, 1860, and the defendant had been rector thereof since the time of its consecration.

From the time of such consecration up to December 31, 1866, there have been celebrated in St. Peter's church five marriages by licence and seventy by banns.

The fees payable for each marriage solemnized at the cathedral and parish church of Manchester were 4*s*. 6*d*. for each marriage by banns, and 10*s*. for each marriage by licence; and the fees which have been received by the defendant for each marriage solemnized at St. Peter's church have been 5*s*. 6*d*. for each marriage by banns, and 12*s*. for each marriage by licence.

Such fees as were payable to the cathedral and parish church of Manchester prior to the passing of the Manchester Rectory Division Act, 1850, in respect of marriages solemnized in district churches then existing in the parish, were received from the incumbents of such districts in one gross sum, by and on behalf of the then chaplains or minor canons and clerks of the said cathedral and parish church.

In the event of any fees being payable by the defendant to the parish clerk of the said cathedral and parish church in respect of marriages at St. Peter's, the County Court Judge found that such fees were 1*s*. for each marriage by licence, and 9*d*. for each marriage by banns, and the total amount of such fees at the said rates from January, 1860, to December, 1866, was 2*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*. The defendant had received for fees in respect of marriages so solemnized in St. Peter's church a sum larger in amount than the said sum of 2*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*.

The County Court Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the said sum of 2*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*., giving leave to appeal pursuant to 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142.

The question for the opinion of this Court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover by action in the said County Court the said sum or any part thereof.

Edwards, for the defendant (the appellant).—The plaintiff was not entitled to sue for these fees, for at the time of bringing the action he was not parish clerk. The plaintiff was appointed for life to the office of parish clerk of the said cathedral and parish church of Manchester by Sir Thomas J. De Trafford, in whom was vested, as recited by the 18th section of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41, the right to appoint one of the two parish clerks of such church, the other of such clerks being appointed by the dean and canons, and commonly called the clerk in orders. The plaintiff having, in 1835, assigned his said office of parish clerk to Mr. Davenport, it is submitted he was not at the time of the passing of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41. a clerk then "holding office in the cathedral and parish church of Manchester," within the meaning of the 6th section of that Act. It is true that an office of trust, as a general rule, cannot be assigned; but there is no authority to shew that the office of parish clerk may not be assigned. In the case of the Parish Clerk (13 Rep. 70) the office of parish clerk was held to be merely temporal, and in Com. Dig. tit. 'Officer' (C), it is said, "An office in fee granted by a subject generally may be assigned," "though it be an office of trust, for heirs includes assigns." Moreover, the plaintiff, having purported by deed to assign the office, has never since acted as parish clerk, or otherwise exercised any of the rights of his office. A question may therefore arise whether, if he could not legally assign, he has not lost his office by non-user.

[WILLES, J.—That question could only arise where the interests of third persons are concerned.]

Then, further, it is submitted that even if the plaintiff be still the parish clerk he has no power to sue for the fees, for by section 6 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41.

the rector was to pay the proportionate fees to the chaplains or minor canons, who were to pay and divide them amongst the persons entitled. Now, the chaplains and minor canons have all long ago ceased to hold those offices, and the plaintiff is neither a chaplain nor minor canon to whom the defendant was, by this 6th section, to pay such fees, if at all.

R. G. Williams appeared for the plaintiff, but was not called on.

WILLES, J.—Mr. Edwards has done all that it was possible for him to do, but he could not perform an impossibility. I am of opinion that the County Court Judge was right, and that none of the points which have been urged for the defendant ought to prevail. The first point was, that the plaintiff had ceased to be parish clerk. It could not be said that he was not parish clerk up to November, 1835, the date of the assignment, because it is expressly found that Sir Thomas J. De Trafford, who nominated him, had power to do so, and that relieves us from inquiring as to how he had such right; possibly it may have been by an Act of Parliament. Then, having such power, he nominated the plaintiff as parish clerk for life by a deed which as I read it, gave the plaintiff power to appoint a deputy. There is no mention of "assign" in that deed, and the appointment is to the office of a parish clerk in the ordinary way, with nothing to shew that the office differs from the ordinary office of a parish clerk. Then in November, 1835, the plaintiff professed by deed to assign his office to a Mr. Davenport, and the question is, whether such deed took the office out of the plaintiff, and vested it in Davenport, or whether it amounted to anything more than the appointment of a deputy. It would require some authority to shew that a parish clerk has power to assign his office of parish clerk, and to make it the subject of a bargain and sale. The only authority for this which has been referred to is a passage from Com. Dig. tit. 'Officer' (C), and the reason there given for the assignment of an office in fee is, that "heirs" includes assigns; but the Chief Baron goes on to say, "but an office of trust cannot be assigned without the assent of him who granted the office"; and further on, under the same title (D), he deals with those who make a deputy; and the first passage there, "every officer who may assign his office to another may make a deputy," shews that in the opinion of the Chief Baron the appointment of a deputy is a very different thing to the sale and assignment of an office out and out. Amongst the officers who may appoint a deputy he mentions a parish clerk, though with a doubt. It may be because if a sufficient deputy was appointed to the satisfaction of the clergyman, the clerk would not be proceeded against for the appointment; but if he appointed a dissolute or improper person, the clergyman might perhaps object. That statement of the power to appoint a deputy, however, excludes the notion of the clerk having the power to assign his office. The deed, therefore, cannot operate as an assignment, but, according to Roe v. Tranmarr (Willes, 682), it will operate as the law will allow it, and the plaintiff will probably be a trustee in equity for Mr. Davenport. As for the question of non-user, I do not deal with that, because it is not shewn to have been of a contumacious kind. There must be some proceeding shewing misconduct in order to deprive a person of an office by non-user. Then, assuming the plaintiff to be parish clerk, it was contended that section 6 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 41. does not preserve his rights. The key to that section is to be found in the introduction to it, which states the object of that section to be that the constituting and annexing any district or parish under the Act "may not prejudice the revenues of the chaplains or minor canons, or of the clerks." To satisfy the word "clerks," which is in the plural, it must be read to include "lay clerk," which the plaintiff was. Then the section goes on to provide that, "during the continuance in office of the said chaplains or minor canons and clerks, or any of them," the rector is to receive the fees and to pay them to the said chaplains or minor canons, who are to pay them to the persons entitled; that is, that in order to save the rector the trouble of distributing the fees, he is to hand them over for that purpose to the chaplains or minor canons. It is therefore a mere machinery to insure the parish clerk's fees getting to his hands, but does not affect his rights to them. If that mode of payment fails, by the chaplains or minor canons ceasing to hold office, the only effect of that is, that the rector must pay these fees to the clerk in the ordinary way that debts are paid. The judgment of the County Court must therefore be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I agree that the Judge of the County Court was right. I think that the plaintiff was parish clerk when he brought his action in that Court. He was appointed prior to 1833, by a person who had a right to appoint him, and in 1833 he executed a deed containing words which were large enough to operate as an assignment of his office, but, as has been pointed out by my Brother Willes, they could not so operate in law, and he therefore continued to remain parish clerk. It may be that the effect of such deed was to appoint a deputy, and that Mr. Davenport may, in equity, have a right to the emoluments. Then it is said that the plaintiff cannot bring an action for these fees, because the Act directs the fees to be paid by the rector to the chaplains or minor canons, and that as they have ceased to exist the rector cannot now pay them. But I agree that the interposition of the chaplains or minor canons, as the persons to receive the fees in the first instance, is a mere machinery for their getting to the parties ultimately entitled to them without unnecessary trouble to the rector. Then, although the machinery may fail, the plaintiff has a right to have what money he was formerly entitled to, and he can apply to the rector for it. The judgment of the County Court is therefore right.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points.

Judgment affirmed.

Costs—Commission to examine Witnesses Abroad—Legal Assistance to Commissioners.

EVIDENCE. K.—Where a commission, issued to take evidence abroad, authorizes questions beyond the written interrogatories, and the Commissioners appoint attorneys to put such questions, the allowance of the expenses occasioned thereby is a matter for the discretion of the Master.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the Master's taxation, as to the costs of legal assistance to Commissioners appointed to take evidence at Calcutta, should not be reviewed.

It appeared that a commission had been issued for taking evidence at Calcutta; that the Commissioners were to administer certain written interrogatories; that the plaintiffs and defendants were to be at liberty to put further questions; that the costs incidental to the commission were to be costs in the cause; and that the Commissioners had employed attorneys to put questions on behalf of the plaintiffs and defendants. The complaint now was that the Master had not allowed certain expenses incurred in such employment.

Sir G. Honyman shewed cause.—It is clear from Cornet v. Dempsey (1 Dowl. N.S. 422), Stewart v. Steele (4 Com B. Rep. N.S. 460), and other cases, that there is no positive rule of law obliging the Master to allow these costs. The Master has exercised his discretion; there is nothing in the affidavits to shew he is wrong; and the Court will not interfere.

Cohen, in support of the rule.—The defendant has a right to these costs.

Before arbitrators, counsel and attorney would be allowed; here the plaintiffs and defendants are to be at liberty to put further questions, and all costs incidental thereto are to be costs in the cause. This was a difficult question as to a death-blow to a ship causing a particular loss. The practice is to appoint merchants as Commissioners, who cannot be expected to know how to interrogate, and who, therefore, have a right to appoint proper professional persons. Bell v. Aitken (37 L. J. C.P. 168) shews that even if the Master has exercised his discretion, the Court will interfere.

BOVILL, C.J.—This application is made on two grounds. The first is, that the defendant is entitled as of right to have these costs allowed, but I repudiate the notion that there is any such rule. There is no such rule, but the allowance is a matter of discretion. Then, secondly, it is said that the Master has not exercised his discretion, or exercised it wrongly. But the Master has exercised it, and it must be shewn clearly that he is wrong before the Court will interfere. There may be many cases in which it may be desirable for Commissioners to have assistance, but the occasion for such assistance and the amount of it must be a matter of discretion for the Master, and here some has been allowed; shewing he has allowed what he thought necessary. If the Master had not used a discretion, the case might be different; but he has, and the facts before us are not sufficient to induce us to give (as a matter of discretion) a decision contrary to that of the Master.

Warranty and Misrepresentation of Authority to make Contract—Damages.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT. J.—The plaintiff was the holder of a nearly expired lease of certain premises for twenty-one years. The defendant, professing to act as the agent of the landlord, agreed with the plaintiff that the landlord should renew the lease. The plaintiff then assigned to B. the residue of the lease and all interest under this agreement. The landlord refused to grant the new lease because the defendant acted without authority, and B. had to leave. The plaintiff brought a suit in Chancery for specific performance, in which the landlord and the defendant swore there was no authority, and the bill was dismissed. B. then brought an action against the plaintiff, and recovered damages and costs, and the plaintiff afterwards brought the present action:— Held, first, that in the absence of its appearing that the defendant had not persisted in his representation and told the plaintiff not to bring the suit, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the costs of the Chancery suit; secondly, that the plaintiff was entitled to a sum arrived at by capitalizing the difference between the rent the plaintiff was to have paid and the actual annual value of the premises, as and for the value of the term; but, thirdly, that as in the particular case a re-sale was not in the contemplation of the parties, the plaintiff could not recover the damages and costs in B.'s action.

The declaration in this action contained three counts: first, for the defendant's breach of an agreement contained in a letter set forth in the following case; second, for his falsely and fraudulently representing that he had authority to enter into such agreement; and third, for his breach of a warranty that he had such authority.

At the trial, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 700*l.* subject to a CASE to be stated by the arbitrator.

CASE.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Harriet Spedding, on November 16, 1863, was in occupation of a house, shop, and premises, No. 23, Ebury Street, Pimlico, Mr. James Nevell, the defendant's brother, being the freeholder; the plaintiff was equitably entitled to or interested in the said premises for the residue of a term of twenty-one years, created by a lease granted by the said James Nevell to William Fuller, dated May 30, 1846, and expiring on March 25, 1867.

On February 18, 1867, the plaintiff became assignee by a legal assignment of the residue of the said term then unexpired.

The defendant had for several years previous to and during the year 1863 acted as the agent of his brother James Nevell in the receipt of the rents of the said house, shop and premises, and of other property of his said brother.

The plaintiff being desirous to obtain a renewal of the lease of the said premises applied to the defendant to obtain such renewal from his said brother; and afterwards, on November 16, 1863, the defendant, assuming to have his brother's authority, agreed on his behalf so to do, and made and signed an agreement, duly stamped as follows:

"5, Eccleston Street and 88, Ebury Street,
"Belgravia, London, Nov. 16, 1863.

"Madam,—I undertake on behalf of my brother, Mr. James Nevell, to renew to you the lease of house No. 23, Ebury Street, Pimlico, at the expiration of the term of twenty-one years from such period, at the rental of 70*l.* per annum, being an increase of 5*l.* per year, upon the following conditions, viz., that you modernize the house by putting in a new shop-front at your sole cost and expense; the terms of the present lease to be the terms of the renewed one, with this exception, that the words 'or wine, spirit and beer merchant' be added to the list of restrictive trades mentioned therein, to any of which it will be contrary to your agreement to let the shop or house during any part of your tenancy.—I am, Madam, yours truly,

"THOMAS NEVELL.

"Mrs. Harriet Spedding,
"10, Walton Place, S.W."

The defendant had no authority from his said brother, express or implied, to make any such agreement.

The plaintiff, shortly after the making of the said agreement of November 16, performed the said agreement by putting in a new shop-front, at an expense of 50*l.*, and she also expended a further sum of 10*l.* in permanently improving the said house, shop and premises.

On June 28, 1865, the following agreement was made between the plaintiff of the one part and George Budd of the other part: "Memorandum of an agreement made this 28th day of June, 1865, between Mrs. Harriet Spedding, of Walton Place, Brompton, widow, of the one part, and Mr. George Budd, of Hugh Street, Pimlico, messenger at a government office, of the other part.

"The said Harriet Spedding agrees to sell to the said George Budd all her, the said Harriet Spedding's, interest in all the term now to come and unexpired in a certain lease of the house and premises situate and being No. 23, Ebury Street, in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, dated May 30, 1846, and made between James Nevell and William Fuller, and which will expire on the 25th day of March, 1867; and also all her, the said Harriet Spedding's, interest in a lease proposed and promised to be granted to her, the said Harriet Spedding, from the said 25th day of March, 1867, for a term of twenty-one years, at the rent of 70*l.*, being an advance of 5*l.* per year, but otherwise on the same terms and conditions as the existing lease, with this exception, that the words " or wine, spirit and beer merchant " be added to the list of restricted trades mentioned therein, at and for the sum of 150*l*., payable as follows, viz., the sum of 30*l*. as a deposit and in part payment of the said sum of 150*l*. to be paid at the signing of this agreement, and the remaining sum of 120*l*. on the 11th of August next, up to which day the said Harriet Spedding agrees to pay all outgoings on the said house and premises. The said George Budd hereby agrees to purchase the said interest of the said Harriet Spedding for the said sum of 150*l*., and he also agrees to take, by valuation in the usual way, the shop fixtures and stock-in-trade of the said Harriet Spedding, the amount of such valuation to be paid by the said George Budd to the said Harriet Spedding, on the said 11th day of August, in the following manner: one third of the amount by a bill at six months, one third by a bill at twelve months, and the remaining third by a bill at eighteen months, all such bills to be drawn by the said Harriet Spedding and accepted by the said George Budd, and, for the further security of the said Harriet Spedding, to be indorsed by Mr. William Goodyear, of the Talbot Inn, Little Chester Street, Belgrave Square, and to bear interest from the said 11th day of August at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum. And inasmuch as the before-mentioned lease for twenty-one years from the 25th day of March is agreed to be granted to the said Harriet Spedding, she, the said Harriet Spedding, will use her best means and endeavours to obtain the said lease to be granted direct to the said George Budd; but on her superior landlord declining so to do will herself take up the lease and assign the same immediately to the said George Budd, his executors or assigns, all expenses of such lease and counterpart to be borne by the said George Budd, the said Harriet Spedding agreeing to pay the cost of the assignment in the event of such assignment becoming necessary. The said George Budd is hereby precluded from inquiring into the title of the said Harriet Spedding or her superior landlord. And it is agreed between the said parties that the title shall be taken to commence with the said proposed lease to the said Harriet Spedding. And lastly it is agreed between the said parties that in case the said George Budd shall fail to complete the purchase on the day above mentioned the deposit shall be absolutely forfeited to the said Harriet Spedding, and it shall not be necessary previously to tender an assignment. As witness the hands of the said parties the day and year first above written.

" Witness—Geo. Berry,
" 8A, Motcombe Street, S.W."

The said James Nevell refused to perform the said agreement on November 16, 1863; and on or about January 10, 1867, he gave notice by his solicitor that he should require possession of the said premises upon the expiration of the term created by the least of May 30, 1846.

No lease has been granted in pursuance of the said agreement of November 16, 1863, to the plaintiff or any other person.

The said George Budd was at the time of the expiration of the said lease of May 30, 1846, in the occupation of the premises, and carrying on a trade and business therein. The said James Nevell permitted the said George Budd to continue in such occupation until Christmas, 1867, when the said George Budd ceased to occupy the same. The said James Nevell took possession thereof, and shortly afterwards granted a lease of the said premises to one Thomas Perry, at a rent of 100*l*. per annum.

The said James Nevell having so refused to perform the said agreement of November 16, 1863, the plaintiff applied to the said George Budd to become a co-plaintiff jointly with her in a suit to be instituted in the High Court of Chancery, against the said James Nevell, for specific performance of the said agreement, and the said George Budd consented to become such co-plaintiff upon the plaintiff indemnifying him against all costs and expenses he might become liable to pay by reason of becoming such co-plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon signed a written indemnity, a copy of which is to be taken as part of this case.

A suit was afterwards instituted in the High Court of Chancery, in which the now plaintiff and the said George Budd were plaintiffs and the said James Nevell was defendant, the bill praying that the said James Nevell might be decreed to specifically perform the said agreement and grant to the plaintiff a proper lease of the said house and premises for the term of years, and at the yearly rent, and according to the terms mentioned in the said agreement, the now plaintiff in the said bill stating her readiness and willingness, and thereby offering to perform the agreement on her part, and on the execution and delivery of the said lease to her to execute and deliver to the defendant, the said James Nevell, a counterpart thereof.

The said James Nevell put in an answer to the said bill, alleging, amongst other things, that the now defendant never communicated with him on the subject of a renewal of the said lease, and had no authority to enter into the agreement of November 16, 1863, and the now defendant, Thomas Nevell, was called and examined upon oath as a witness on behalf of the plaintiffs in the said suit before one of the examiners of the said Court: he stated in substance that he never communicated with his said brother on the subject of renewing the lease to the now plaintiff, and that it was very wrong in him to sign the agreement of November 16, 1863; that he had no authority to sign it on behalf of his brother the said James Nevell, and that his said brother knew nothing about it.

The said George Budd commenced an action against the now plaintiff for petition of the plaintiffs therein, ordered to be dismissed out of Court as against the defendant therein, with costs to be taxed. The now plaintiff thereupon paid to the said James Nevell 28*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. for his taxed costs of the said suit, and the now plaintiff incurred costs of herself and her co-plaintiff in the said suit to the amount of 70*l*. (This last-mentioned sum, if recoverable in this action against the defendant, is to be subject to taxation.)

The said George Budd commenced an action against the now plaintiff for damages for breach of the agreement of June 28, 1865, and the said action was referred to the arbitration of Alfred Coxon, Esq., barrister-at-law, the costs of the said cause to abide the event thereof, and the said Alfred Coxon having heard both parties, awarded that the now plaintiff should pay to the said George Budd for damages the sum of 280*l*., together with the costs of the said reference and award. Mr. Coxon has been examined before me as a witness upon this reference, and I find that the said sum of 280*l*. so awarded was made up as follows: he found that the premises were of the annual value of 90*l*., and he capitalized the difference between that sum and 70*l*., the reserved rent on an 8*l*. per cent. table, making 205*l*.; he found that the plaintiff Budd had incurred a loss of 22*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*. on the re-sale of fixtures bought by him and put up on the premises: he found that the plaintiff Budd would sustain a loss in his business by removal therefrom, and incur expense by removal amounting to 35*l*., and that the plaintiff Budd had become liable to pay for solicitors' charges for advising him, and otherwise in and about the matters, the sum of 17*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*.; and throwing off the odd shillings and pence, Mr. Coxon awarded all those sums to the plaintiff Budd as damages, making in the aggregate the sum of 280*l*.

The now plaintiff has paid to the said George Budd the said sum of 280*l*. so awarded as damages as aforesaid, together with the sum of 66*l*. 5*s*., the taxed costs of the plaintiff Budd in the said action and in the said reference, and the now plaintiff has incurred costs to her attorney in defending the said action and attending the said reference to the amount of 80*l*. (but this last-mentioned sum is also to be subject to taxation).

Subject to the opinion of the Court, I award and direct that the verdict entered for the plaintiff do stand upon each and every count in the declaration, but that the amount thereof be reduced to the sum of 584*l*. 18*s*. 2*d*., made up as follows: 50*l*. costs of new shop-front; 10*l*. expended for permanent improvement of the premises; 28*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. for the costs of the defendant James Nevell in the said suit of Spedding and Budd v. Nevell, and 70*l*. for the plaintiff's costs incurred in the said suit, subject to taxation as aforesaid; 280*l*. the damages awarded and paid by the now plaintiff in the action of Budd v. Spedding; 66*l*. 5*s*. the plaintiff's costs in the last-mentioned action and of the said reference, and 80*l*. the defendant's costs of the said last-mentioned action and reference, subject to taxation as aforesaid. And I further award and direct, that the defendant do pay to the plaintiff her costs of and incidental to this reference and the costs of this award, and that the defendant do bear his own costs of the same.

The pleadings in this action are to be taken as and form part of this case.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the several sums, making together the sum of 584*l*. 18*s*. 2*d*., or any and which of them, or any part thereof respectively, are recoverable in this action on any count or counts in the declaration, and whether any and what deduction from the said sum of 584*l*. 18*s*. 2*d*. should be made in respect of the said sum of 150*l*. paid by the said George Budd to the now plaintiff as aforesaid; and the parties agree that the verdict shall stand for the said sum of 584*l*. 18*s*. 2*d*., or for any lesser sum as the Court may direct.

J. Brown (Bush Cooper with him), for the plaintiff.—First, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to the 50*l*. and 10*l*., as they were required to be expended under the agreement; but these items will not be pressed, because it is admitted that they are included in the value of the term, and she therefore cannot recover these items as well as the whole of the sum awarded in that behalf. Secondly, as respects the costs of the Chancery suit, the plaintiff was justified in thinking that the defendant had authority, and in bringing the suit; and therefore Collen v. Wright (7 El. & B. 301; 26 L. J. Q.B. 147; 8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215) is in point. Thirdly, the present case does not fall within the case of Flureau v. Thornhill (2 W. Black. 1078), but within the cases of Lock v. Furze (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 96; 35 L. J. C.P. 141); Robinson v. Harman (1 Ex. Rep. 850; 18 L. J. Ex. 202) and Engell v. Fitch (37 L. J. Q.B. 145); and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover, not merely the value of the term, but also in respect of the good bargain with Budd; and indeed is entitled to go further than this, and be recouped the special damages and costs in the action by Budd, for the plaintiff was entitled to have the damages assessed in an action, as it was a matter in respect of which parties might well differ.

[Quain, contra, referred to Williams v. Reynolds (6 Best & S. 495; 34 L. J. Q.B. 221).]

[Brett, J., referred to Collins v. Cave (4 Hurls. & N. 225; 28 L. J. Ex. 204).]

No notice of action was necessary—Duffield v. Scott (3 Term Rep. 374); Smith v. Compton (3 B. & Ad. 407); Wrightup v. Chamberlain (7 Sc. 598).

Quain, for the defendant.—In order that the plaintiff may recover the costs of the Chancery suit, it is necessary, according to Collen v. Wright (7 El. & B. 301; 26 L. J. Q.B. 147; 8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215), that the defendant should have persisted to the last in the false statement. The plaintiff should not have rushed into the suit without inquiry. And, as respects the claim for the value of the term, the sub-contract was without notice, and was not within the contemplation of the parties; and the plaintiff is only entitled to the sums of 50*l*. and 10*l*., and any expense she may have incurred in investigating the title. In order to recover more than this, there should be a wilful prevention by the defendant.

[Montague Smith, J., referred to Simons v. Patchett (7 El. & B. 568; 26 L. J. Q.B. 195).]

And à fortiori, she cannot recover the costs of Budd's action, when the sale was not contemplated by the parties, when there has been no persistence in the representation, and when nothing wilful has been done.

J. Brown, in reply.

Keating, J.—One of the counts of the declaration in this action is founded on a false representation of authority, and another on a warranty that the

for his brother James Nevell, at the expiration of the then running lease, to grant a further lease at a rent of 70*l*. The defendant had, in fact, no authority from his brother; but the plaintiff thought he had, and in 1865 disposed of her interest in the premises to Budd. When the time for granting the new lease came, James Nevell repudiated the defendant's authority, and insisted on having possession at the end of the old term. Budd, who was in possession, had to give it up, and the reversioner let the premises at a rent of 100*l*. a year to another person. The plaintiff and Budd thereupon commenced a suit in Chancery against James Nevell for specific performance, in which suit James Nevell was examined, and swore that he had given no authority to the defendant; and the defendant swore that he had no authority, that his brother knew nothing about the matter, and that he had done very wrong. This, as far as appears, was the first time the plaintiff knew that the defendant had falsely represented that he had authority; and though we have been pressed that it does not appear that the defendant had not previously disclosed it, still it does not appear that this was so, and we cannot infer it. Things being so, the bill was dismissed; and Budd brought an action against the plaintiff for breach of the agreement made with him, and recovered damages and costs; and the plaintiff now brings this action against the defendant who caused all this mischief. The plaintiff's claim may be divided under three heads: First, it is said she is entitled to recover the costs of the Chancery suit; and I am of opinion that she can recover them. It has been argued that the case does not fall within Collen v. Wright (7 El. & B. 301; 26 L. J. Q.B. 147; 8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215) and Randell v. Trimen (18 Com. B. Rep. 786; 25 L. J. C.P. 307), because there was no persistence by the defendant in the original false representation; but there is nothing to shew it was withdrawn till the evidence given in the Chancery suit, and therefore I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover these costs. Secondly, it is said that the plaintiff is entitled to be placed in the same position as she would have been if the contract had been made with James Nevell's authority, and therefore to recover the value of the term as if the defendant had authority; and I think she has a right to recover the value of the term. The value might be ascertained in various ways; here there has been a re-sale, and also the arbitrator in the action by Budd against the plaintiff has found the value to be 205*l*., in arriving at which amount he may have taken a low estimate, inasmuch as he capitalized the difference between 70*l*. and 90*l*. per annum, whilst the premises in fact let for 100*l*. I assume the present arbitrator found that sum to be the value; but if the defendant thinks otherwise, and desires to go back to him that he may say as between these parties, what is the value, he may; but, for the purposes of this judgment, I assume that he does not object to this as being the value; and this being so, I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover it as the value of the term. Thirdly, it is said the plaintiff is entitled to the costs and damages in the action by Budd; but I am of opinion that she cannot recover those, for it seems to me here, adopting the argument of Mr. Quain, that, when the agreement of 1865 was made, it cannot have been then in the contemplation of the parties in this particular case (for I do not lay down any general rule) that a re-sale should take place; and further, it was made without any communication to or inquiry of, and without the knowledge of the defendant and his brother; and, without laying down a general rule that communication is necessary, or that if made it would render the defendant liable, yet it is one circumstance which induces me to think a re-sale was not in the contemplation of the parties so as to make these damages a natural consequence of the breach of contract or the false representation. These three heads substantially include all the damages claimed; and, for the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the damages claimed under the first two heads, but not to those claimed under the third.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This action, as far as it is founded on contract, is on a warranty made by the defendant, when he assumed to contract as agent for his brother, that he was such agent. The plaintiff, relying on this warranty, made a contract with Budd for the sale of her interest under the agreement for a new lease. Afterwards the brother refused to grant the lease; then a suit in Chancery was instituted for specific performance; and after its failure an action was brought by Budd against the present plaintiff. It seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the costs incurred in the Chancery suit, which failed because the defendant had no authority. It is said that this case differs from Collen v. Wright (7 El. & B. 301; 26 L. J. Q.B. 147; 8 El. & B. 647; 27 L. J. Q.B. 215), because there it appeared that the defendant persisted in his representation up to the proceedings in Chancery; but it seems to me consistent with the facts stated in the present case that this was so here, for I do not find that there was any communication to the plaintiff that she was not to go on with the Chancery suit; and even if there had been, she might be warranted in going on, because it might be a fair question, looking to the contradictory assertions, which of them was true. The suit proceeding, it turned out, on the examination of the defendant and his brother, that he had no authority, and the bill was dismissed. The expenses of this suit flow naturally out of the breach of the warranty, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover them in this action. Secondly, as respects the value of the term, I think that in this case, though I do not say it would be so in all cases, the measure of damages is the same as if the action were against the principal, because if the defendant had had authority there would have been made a binding contract with James Nevell, who was able to perform it. If James had had no title or been insolvent the matter might have been different; but he was solvent and had title, and the proper measure is the loss the plaintiff sustained because there was no valid contract with James; and we have to see what that contract would have been worth, and what damages the plaintiff has sustained by not having the contract assumed to be made. Simons v. Patchett (7 El. & B. 568; 26 L. J. Q.B. 195) establishes that the measure of damages, so far as giving the value of the term, is right. That was an action on an agreement, whereby the defendant assumed to act as agent for another person in the purchase of a ship, but had no authority; the ship could not be re-sold for the price agreed to be given by the defendant, and was sold for less; and it was held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between the two prices. But Mr. Brown says, that as there was a re-sale to Budd, who has sued and recovered damages and costs, the plaintiff is further entitled to recover those damages and costs. I cannot, however, come to that conclusion. As my Brother Keating has already said, it would not be right to lay down a rule binding in all cases; and the question is, looking to the present agreement, was it fairly within the contemplation of the parties to it that there might be a re-sale so as to throw on the defendant the consequences arising therefrom? I find no sufficient reasons for holding that a re-sale was in the contemplation of the parties. I think that the true measure of damages is the value of the term enhanced by the contemplated expenditure, and that the loss upon and arising from the re-sale cannot be recovered. Mr. Coxon has found the value of the term to be 205*l.*, and has arrived at this amount by capitalizing the difference between the rent of 70*l.* and 90*l.*, which he finds to be the real annual value. It is true that the plaintiff sold to Budd for 150*l.* only; but we must either take Budd's agreement altogether or reject it altogether, and 150*l.* is not to be considered necessarily the real value, because he was also to buy at a valuation the fixtures and stock-in-trade, and in consideration of this the plaintiff may have taken a less sum for the term. Therefore we may fairly take 205*l.* as the proper sum. The defendant may, however, go back to the arbitrator if he be dissatisfied, but he must not forget that the premises were eventually let for 100*l.* per annum. It seems to me that this is all the plaintiff is entitled to recover. I think that the consequences of the breach of the agreement with Budd cannot fall on the defendant because they are too remote. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the costs of the suit in Chancery and the value of the term, but not the damages and costs in Budd's action.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

Judgment accordingly.

N.—An annuity deed provided, that if the annuitant refused, neglected, failed or became incapable to perform the stipulations contained in it, the annuity was to cease; that, among other things, the annuitant should use his best endeavours to preserve, extend and promote the success of a certain business, and not impede its success by any act, neglect, omission or default; that he should perform such services and duties as certain persons should reasonably require; that he should not carry on a certain business during a certain time and within a certain area; and that all disputes should be referred to arbitration:—Held, that such annuity was not capable of valuation under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 175, and therefore not barred by a deed of assignment made by the grantor for the benefit of his creditors.

This was an action brought for the recovery of 75*l.*, claimed to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff upon and by virtue of a certain deed, dated January 8, 1866, made between Charles Nolda of the first part, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, the defendant, of the second part, and Henry Brett, the plaintiff, of the third part, and by which deed the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson jointly and severally covenanted to pay to the plaintiff during his life the clear yearly sum of 150*l.*, by equal payments, on January 8, April 8, July 8, and October 8, if and so long as the plaintiff should perform and observe the stipulations on his, the plaintiff's, part covenanted to be performed by the said deed; and by the consent of the parties, and by the order of Byles, J., dated November 20, 1867, according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the following CASE has been stated for the opinion of the Court without pleadings:

In the year 1863 the plaintiff carried on the business of a woollen-warehouseman in the city of London, under the style or firm of Brett Brothers & Co., and in the same year he executed and perfected a deed of assignment of all his estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, under the provision contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The plaintiff's stock-in-trade and goodwill and his interest in the premises in which the business was carried on were sold and transferred by the plaintiff's said trustees to Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and the defendant.

On April 8, 1863, a deed of arrangement was made between the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, the defendant, of the one part, and Henry Brett, the plaintiff, of the other part, by which Messrs. Nolda, Beardsell and Jackson, in consideration of the services rendered and to be rendered by the plaintiff to them in the said business, and of the plaintiff's observing and performing the covenants and stipulations in the last-mentioned deed on his part to be observed and performed, agreed to pay him the sum of 600*l.* within twelve months, and also to pay him the sum of 150*l.* a year by quarterly payments as above mentioned. A copy of the said deed of April 8, 1863, is annexed to and is intended to form part of this case.

On December 20, 1865, Nolda retired from the said firm of Nolda, Beardsell and Jackson, and on January 8, 1866, the deed sued on in this action was made between Nolda, Beardsell, the defendant, and the plaintiff.

The following is a copy of the deed sued on: "This indenture, made the 8th day of January, 1866, between Charles Nolda, of 73 and 74, Wood Street, in the city of London, warehouseman, of the first part, Charles Beardsell, of the same place, warehouseman, and Harry Todd Jackson, of the same place, warehouseman, of the second part, and Henry Brett, of No. 8, Leighton Crescent, Kentish Town, gentleman, of the third part. Whereas, by an indenture, dated the 8th day of April, 1863, and expressed to be made between the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, therein described as all of Wood Street, Cheapside, in the city of London, woollen-warehousemen and copartners, of the one part, and the said Henry Brett, of the other part, it was covenanted, agreed and declared, amongst other things, that the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, thereinafter called or referred to as Messrs. Nolda & Co., should pay to the said Henry Brett during his life, if he should so long continue to perform, observe and abide by the stipulations on his part thereinafter contained, a clear yearly sum of 150*l*., to be considered as accruing from day to day, and to be paid by four equal quarterly payments on the days therein mentioned. And further, that he, the said Henry Brett, should use his best endeavours to preserve and extend the business of Messrs. Nolda & Co. in manner therein mentioned. And whereas it has recently been agreed that the said partnership so carried on by the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Henry Todd Jackson should be dissolved so far as relates to the said Charles Nolda as from the 20th day of December, 1865, and that the said business should thenceforth be carried on by the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson. And whereas upon the treaty for the said dissolution it was, amongst other things, agreed that the said Henry Brett should execute such release as is hereinafter contained, and that the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson and the said Henry Brett should enter into such further arrangements as are hereinafter contained. And whereas the said partnership has in pursuance of the agreement in that behalf been this day dissolved as from the said 20th day of December, 1865, now this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement in this behalf, and in consideration of the premises, he, the said Henry Brett, doth hereby release the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, and each of them, their and each of their executors and administrators, estates and effects, and the said Charles Nolda, Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson do, and each of them doth hereby release the said Henry Brett, his heirs, executors and administrators, estates and effects, from the covenants and agreements contained in the hereinbefore recited indenture, and from all actions, suits, accounts, claims and demands for or on account of the same indenture, or any clause or stipulation therein contained or otherwise relating to the premises. And this indenture also witnesseth, that in further pursuance of the agreement in this behalf, and in consideration of the premises, and of the mutual agreements and covenants hereinafter expressed and contained, it is hereby mutually agreed and declared, that the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, so far as the stipulations hereinafter contained are to be performed or observed by or bind them respectively, do hereby, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, and each of them doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, or administrators, covenant with the said Henry Brett, his executors and administrators, and the said Henry Brett, so far as the stipulations hereinafter contained are to be performed or observed by or bind him, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, their executors and administrators, and separately with each of them, his executors and administrators, in manner following, that is to say,

"1. The said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, or the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, shall pay to the said Henry Brett during his life, if he shall so long continue to perform, observe and abide by the stipulations on his part hereinafter contained, a clear yearly sum of 150*l.*, to be considered as accruing from day to day, and to be paid by four equal payments on the 8th day of January, the 8th day of April, the 8th day of July and the 8th day of October, the first of such payments to be made on the 8th day of April next.

"2. If the said Henry Brett shall refuse, neglect, fail or become incapable to perform, observe or abide by all or any of the stipulations on his part hereinafter contained, then and immediately thereupon the said annual sum shall cease and be no longer payable, but it is not intended that the same shall in any respect release the said Henry Brett from the obligations imposed on him by the 5th article of these presents or any of them.

"3. The said Henry Brett shall use his best endeavours with both the old and the present customers of the late firm of Brett Brothers & Co., or of the late firm of Nolda & Co., or of the present firm of Beardsell & Jackson, and with all other persons, to preserve and extend the said business, and to promote the success thereof, and to carry on the same to the profit and for the benefit of Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson; and shall not by any act, neglect, omission or default injure the same, or impede the success thereof.

"4. For the purposes of the 3rd article of these presents, the said Henry Brett shall perform such services and discharge such duties as Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson shall reasonably require, save that he is not to be called upon to give his personal attendance to the working of the business of Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson.

"5. The said Henry Brett shall not at any time hereafter, while Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson, or either of them, shall continue to carry on the said business or any branch thereof, carry on or be concerned in the business of a woollen-warehouseman, or a buyer, seller, or packer or shipper of woollen goods, or goods of a fabric containing wool, in the city of London, or within a radius of twenty miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, or that city, either alone or in partnership with or as agent for a clerk of or assistant to any other person or persons except Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson; and shall not select, accept or execute any order for buying, selling, furnishing, supplying, packing, shipping or dealing in any such goods, except for and on behalf and for the sole benefit of Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson; and he shall not allow, nor so far as he can prevent it, suffer any other persons or person to use his name, or the name of Brett Brothers & Co., or any imitation or modification thereof, in the business aforesaid, or any similar business.

"6. Messrs. Beardsell & Jackson shall be considered to represent exclusively the late firm of Brett Brothers & Co., and shall be at liberty to style themselves late Brett Brothers & Co.

"7. If any dispute shall arise between the parties hereto or any of them, or their respective representatives, touching these presents or any article thereof, or the rights, duties, powers or liabilities of the respective parties hereto, or their respective representatives in relation thereto, such disputes shall be referred to arbitration, and settled by two arbitrators or their umpire, agreeably to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

On August 25, 1866, the said Charles Beardsell and the defendant executed and perfected a deed of assignment of all their estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of their creditors, under and according to the provisions contained in the Bankrupt Act, 1861, of which the following is a copy: "This deed, made the 25th day of August, 1866, between Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, of 73 and 74, Wood Street, in the city of London, warehousemen, trading under the firm of Beardsell & Jackson, of the one part, and Henry Parker Webb, of Tunbridge Wells, manufacturer, Jonathan Lockwood, of Huddersfield, merchant, and Ben Hurst, of Dobcross, in Saddleworth, Yorkshire, manufacturer, hereinafter called the trustees, on behalf and with the assent of the creditors of the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson of the other part, Witnesseth, that the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson do, and each of them doth, hereby convey all their and his estates and effects to the said trustees absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, in like manner as if the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson had been at the date hereof duly adjudicated bankrupts; and in consideration of the premises, each of the creditors of the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson doth, by these presents, release the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson, and each of them, from his and their respective debts, in like manner as if the said Charles Beardsell and Harry Todd Jackson had obtained a discharge in bankruptcy; but nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of the creditors as against any surety or co-debtor. In witness whereof the said parties hereto have set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written."

The said last-mentioned deed was duly executed, attested, stamped and registered according to the requirements of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value, both of the joint and of the separate creditors of the said Charles Beardsell and the defendant, whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, assented thereto.

From the date of the registration of the last-mentioned deed up to the present time, the said Charles Beardsell and the defendant have wholly ceased to carry on the said business or any branch thereof, either together or separately.

The amount claimed by the plaintiff became due after the registration of the deed of assignment.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the deed of assignment, dated August 25, 1866, is or is not a bar to the plaintiff's claim. If the Court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment was to be entered up for the plaintiff for 75*l.*, together with interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the date of writ and costs of suit. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment of nol. pros. was to be entered up for the defendant with costs.

Lord, for the plaintiff.—First, this composition deed is bad. A composition deed is not binding which provides for only one class of creditors; as is shewn by Ex parte Glen (36 L. J. Bk. 51), where because the joint creditors were left out, and by Tomlin v. Dutton (37 L. J. Q.B. 153), where, because the separate creditors were left out, the deeds were held bad, and by Rixon v. Emary (37 L. J. C.P. 243), where the Court recognizes that doctrine; and in the present deed only the joint creditors are provided for. The European Central Railway Company v. Westall (35 L. J. Q.B. 9), where the wording was the same as in the present case, except that nothing was said about the separate estates, is in point. Secondly, even if the composition deed be good, the annuity is not barred. The annuity is subject to the performance of stipulations which prevent the annuity from being valued under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 175. If the annuitant refuse, neglect, fail or become incapable to perform the conditions, the deed is to be void; and, amongst other things, he is to promote the business, &c., to give such personal attendance as should be reasonably required, and is not to set up business for himself. As to Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont. & Ayr. 626; 1 Deac. 696), the marginal note is misleading, for on referring to the facts and the judgment of the Chief Judge, it appears the annuity was not contingent on the condition mentioned in the note.

Lanyon, for the defendant.—As to the first pont: no doubt a deed which does not allow both joint and separate creditors to sue is bad; but here "their and his" estate is assigned and is to be administered as in bankruptcy, which could only be by properly marshalling the separate and joint creditors against the separate and joint estates; and this distinguishes this case from those which have been cited. As to the second point, the Court cannot say that the annuity is incapable of valuation under section 175, which section alone applies. Formerly, perhaps, it would have been thought impossible to make a valuation in the present case, but now there are such various statistics, and the business and experience of actuaries are so various and extensive, that it is possible to value an annuity like the one now in question; and Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont. & Ayr. 626; 1 Deac. 696) is in favour of the present contention, for there the question of the annuity being dependent on a lease liable to forfeiture was discussed.

He also referred to The Encyclopædia Britannica, titles Friendly Society and Annuity; Ex parte Annandale (4 Deac. & C. 511; 2 Mont. & Ayr. 19); Ex parte Broadley (2 Mont. D. & D. 524; 11 L. J. Bk. 28); and Ex parte Van Heythuysen (2 Mont. & Ayr. 519; 1 Deac. 360; 5 L. J. Bk. 19).

Lord, in reply.—The lease was not before the Court in Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont. & Ayr. 626; 1 Deac. 696); and in Ex parte Davis (Mont. 121, 297), an annuity dependent on whether a widow married, and in Mudge v. Rowan (37 L. J. Ex. 79), an annuity dependant on whether a husband or wife cohabited again, were held incapable of valuation under section 175.

Byles, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The statute enacts that any annuity creditor "shall be entitled to prove for the value of such annuity, which value the Court shall ascertain, regard being had to the original price given for such annuity." It is therefore to be such an annuity as the Court can ascertain the value of, and therefore, primâ facie, must be one the value of which is capable of being ascertained by calculation. In the present case, however, if the annuitant "refuse, neglect, fail or become incapable to perform, observe or abide by all or any of the stipulations on his part" the annuity is to cease; and then follow a number of stipulations as to things which are to be done: thus he is "to use his best endeavours . . . . to preserve and extend the said business, and to promote the success thereof, and to carry on the same to the profit and for the benefit of Messrs. Beardsall & Jackson, and shall not, by any act, neglect, omission or default, injure the same or impede the success thereof," and fulfil various other indefinite stipulations; and then "if any dispute shall arise . . . . touching these presents, or any article thereof, or the rights, duties, powers or liabilities of the respective parties . . . . in relation thereto, such disputes shall be referred to arbitration." These contingencies are, as it seems to me, incapable of being ascertained in point of value, and even if they could, still they are to be submitted to arbitration, and are made dependent on the view the arbitrator might take. I should therefore say, even in the absence of authority, that the value of this annuity could not be calculated under section 175. As respects the authorities, the only case which at first sight seems to be in favour of the defendants is Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont. & Ayr. 626; 1 Dears. 696), but in that case there was no suspension—by which I mean no distinct provision for the suspension—of the annuity, and only a remote possibility with respect to the lease, and though one ground taken was the possibility of the lease being forfeited, the lease was not before the Court, and this matter was only speculative; whilst, on the other hand, Ex parte Davis (Mont. 121, 297) is the other way, it having been there decided that the chance of a woman remaining a widow was not calculable under section 175. And, as it appears to me, there are two cases in point, viz., Parker v. Ince (4 Hurls. & N. 59; 28 L. J. Ex. 189) and Mudge v. Rowan (10 L. J. Ex. 79). Under these circumstances, I think that the value of this annuity is not provable under section 175, and that our judgment should therefore be for the plaintiff.

Keating, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the cases have extended the provability of annuities beyond the ordinary meaning of the words of section 175, for the section seems to import that the annuity is one of easy calculation. The cases perhaps have gone beyond this, but none approximate to the best case. As respects Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont.& Ayr. 626; 1 Dears. 696), I agree that on examination it is not an authority, and that the facts and the judgment of the Chief Judge shew that the statement in the marginal note is not supported. And I agree that the stipulations here are most indefinite, and that this is not simply a case where an actuary can assume a probability as to what will occur, but a case where the annuity depends on matters as to which persons might well differ in opinion. Thus persons might legitimately differ as to what was a reasonable command. Again, the view which the arbitrator might take is mater of doubt; and again, a person might differ as to what were proper endeavours for advancing the business. All these matters are indefinite, and matters on which persons might disagree. I cannot believe that such contingencies were in the contemplation of the legislature, and therefore I think that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is conceded that this annuity is provable, if at all, under section 175, which in terms provides only for the case of an annuity which had an original price, its words being, "shall be entitled to prove for the value of such annuity, which value the Court shall ascertain, regard being had to the original price given for such annuity." The Act therefore seems to contemplate an annuity for which there is an original price as a datum of value; and a doubt was expressed when other cases were attempted to be proved, as to whether the section extended to such other cases; but it appears that annuities have been held to be within it where there were some definite data having some analogy to such a definite ground as the original price mentioned in the section. A matter which depends on calculation can be clearly ascertained, but here there are no definite materials on which a person can calculate. An opinion as to the value may possibly be formed, and a jury might have to form one in the event of an action on the agreement; but that is very different to the calculation which the statute means, for, where the annuitant proves, the Court is to calculate the value, which evidently points to a case where there is no difficulty in calculating, and a sum may be worked in figures from definite data. It is admitted that this case is one primæ impressionis, and that no similar case has been before the Courts; and the only decision cited in support of the defendant is Ex parte Parratt (2 Mont. & Ayr. 626; 1 Dears. 696). That case has, however, been so fully distinguished by my Brothers that it need not be further referred to; and it seems to me that the present case was decided in principle in the case of Ex parte Davis (Mont. 121, 297), where the Court expressed a clear opinion that the annuity was not capable of valuation, though it was there less difficult to calculate its value than in the present case, for whereas it there only depended on the chance of a widow marrying, here its duration depends on various acts to be done by the annuitant, on the neglect of and incapacity to perform which acts the annuity is to cease. It is impossible for the Court, or any person acting for the Court, to calculate the value of this annuity, and therefore it is not within section 175, and the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It is unnecessary to consider the validity of the composition deed, but I desire to express no doubt as to its validity.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

BEALE AND OTHERS v. SMITH.

38 L. J. C.P. 145; L. R. 4 C.P. 145; 19 L. T. 565; 17 W. R. 317.

Parliament—Form of Election Petition—Particulars—31 & 32 Vict. c. 125.

ELECTION LAW. A.—In a petition against the return of a member of Parliament it is sufficient to allege generally, that the respondent by himself and his agents has been guilty of bribery, &c.

Where, in such a petition, a Judge has ordered particulars to be given of the persons bribed, &c., but refused to order particulars to be given of those who have bribed, &c., the Court will not interfere, unless the Judge be manifestly wrong, as it is a matter of discretion.

This was a petition against the respondent, who had been returned as parliamentary representative for the borough of Westminster.

The petition alleged generally, that the respondent by himself and his agents had been guilty of bribery, &c.

The respondent had applied at chambers for particulars, and Willes, J., had ordered particulars of the persons bribed, &c. to be given three days before the trial, but had refused to order particulars of persons who had bribed, &c.

Hawkins, on behalf of the respondent, now moved for a rule calling on the petitioners to shew cause why the petition should not be taken off the file, because it did not state the facts relied on, and why particulars should not be given of the persons who bribed, treated, &c.—First, the petition is bad in form. By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. s. 20. an election petition is to be in such form and state such matters as may be prescribed; by section 3 "prescribed" is to mean "prescribed by the rules of Court"; rules 2, 3, 4, and 5 make provisions as to the form of the petition; and rule 5, which contains the form, says, that "the facts and grounds on which the petitioners rely" are to be stated. The petition should, therefore, not merely state the grounds, but also the facts supporting those grounds, and here only the grounds are stated. Secondly, at all events, particulars should be given of the persons who are to be charged with bribery, as well as of those to be charged with taking bribes. There is a total denial of the charges in the petition, and of any knowledge of how they can be supported; it is alleged that information is being obtained by the petitioners by means of treating and circulars, and it is impossible to be prepared to meet charges respecting an election in such a place as Westminster if information of those charges is postponed till the day of trial; and the old practice should not be followed, as it worked injustice, which should be obviated under the new procedure.

BOVILL, C.J.—In this case an order has been made by my Brother Willes calling on the petitioners to give certain particulars, and the respondent now desires to obtain further particulars. He frames his motion in two ways: first, he asks that the petition may be taken off the file as being bad in form, because it does not state the facts; and, secondly, he separately asks for further particulars. As respects the question of form, the petition follows the form given in the rules, and no injustice is worked by it, because by rule 6 ample powers are given for obtaining particulars; it was intended that the petition should not run to a great length; the facts and grounds are to be stated shortly; and then it is in the discretion of the Judge to grant an order for further particulars. As respects the question of further particulars, this matter has been before my Brother Willes, and the practice which has been adopted by him and the other learned Judges appointed to try these petitions is an improvement on the old practice, under which no previous information was obtainable. In one view, perhaps, further particulars may appear advantageous, in another inconvenient; certain particulars have been ordered to be given three days before trial; if there be any surprise, &c. the Judge may adjourn the trial, for where there is any abuse of the process of the Court he may prevent injustice; and we must be clearly satisfied that my Brother Willes exercised his discretion wrongly before we interfere. I am not so satisfied, and therefore think there should be no rule.

BYLES, J., and KEATING, J., concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. As respects the second point, it is sufficient to say that the learned Judge had discretion under rule 44, and we should not interfere unless he is manifestly wrong. It is competent for the Judge who has to try the petition to see if the particulars are sufficient, and if he finds larger particulars necessary the particulars may be extended by him.

Rule refused.

Interrogatories—Tendency to Criminate—Special Circumstances—Discretion of the Judge.

DISCOVERY. D.—Interrogatories, the answers to which might tend to criminate the party interrogated, will not be allowed to be delivered under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, on the common affidavit only, but some special circumstances must be laid before the Judge to induce him to order them, and it is in his discretion to determine whether the special circumstances are or are not sufficient for that purpose.

This was an application for a rule to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to deliver to the defendants certain interrogatories under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 51, which Martin B., had refused at chambers to allow.

The action was for damages for false representations contained in a prospectus of a joint-stock company.

The first count of the declaration alleged that the defendants were interested in a company called the Ovens Gold Quartz Mines Co., Lim., and were desirous of having the shares of the said company applied for and taken, and the amount of such shares paid up, and that thereupon the defendants, to induce the plaintiff to apply for and take certain shares in the aforesaid company, and pay up the amount of the said shares, falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that 2,500 shares in the aforesaid company had been applied for, whereas in truth, as the defendants then well knew, the number of shares that had been applied for was much smaller, and the defendants, by the said false and fraudulent representation induced the plaintiff to apply for and take certain shares, &c. The second count was similar, only alleging the false representation to be that 2,500*l.* had been paid up for shares in the said company.

The defendants separately pleaded not guilty.

Issues thereon.

The interrogatories which the plaintiff applied, before Martin, B., at chambers, for leave to deliver were eighteen in number. Of these the learned Judge allowed the first six, but refused to allow the following.

7. Were 2,500 shares of or in the said company ever, and when first, applied for?

8. Was 1*l.* per share paid upon any and what number of shares on or before the 30th day of May, 1867?

Digitized by Google

9. What is the total number of shares which have been applied for in the said company?

10. What is the total amount of money received by the said company on account of shares applied for; and how much thereof was received on and before the said 30th day of May, 1867?

11. Have any and what number of shares ever, and when, been allotted?

12. Were any allotments of shares cancelled, and if yea, how many, and of how many shares, and when and to whom had the same been allotted?

13. Were any deposits, and of what amounts, at any and what time or times, returned to any and what person, and why?

14. Were any certificates of shares in the said company issued at any and what times, to any and what persons, and in respect of what number of shares?

15. How many shares did you, at any and what time, apply for or hold in the said company?

16. Have you ever, and when, paid any and what moneys in respect of any shares applied for or held by you in the said company?

17. What minute-books, diaries, books of account, papers or documents, had the said company in its possession or under its control, and in whose custody or under whose control are such books, papers and documents?

18. What books, letters, papers or documents, relating to the promoting or getting up of the said company, or in any way to the conduct or management of the affairs thereof, or to the matters in dispute herein, have you in your possession or under your control? and do you object, for any and what reasons, to produce the same for inspection by the plaintiff and his attorney, and to allow copies thereof or extracts therefrom to be taken from them?

The present application was made on an affidavit by the plaintiff's attorney, which contained the following statements:

"This action is brought to recover damages from the defendants, who are named as three of the directors of the Ovens Gold Quartz Mines Co., Lim., in the prospectus of the said company," (a copy of which was annexed to the affidavit) "for the false and fraudulent representations contained in the said prospectus, that 2,500 shares in the said company had been applied and paid for, whereby the plaintiff was induced to apply and pay for 200 shares in the said company.

"An action has also been commenced by the above-named plaintiff against the said Ovens Gold Quartz Mines Co., Lim., to recover from the said company the amount so paid by the said plaintiff for the said shares, and in such action an order was made by Cleasby, B., on the 14th of December, 1868, for discovery of the documents in the possession of the said company relating to the matters in dispute in the said action, but the said company have failed to make such discovery in obedience to the said order.

"On the 23rd, and again by adjournment on the 24th of December, 1868, a summons in this cause for leave for the plaintiff to deliver interrogatories to the defendants was heard by Martin, B., when the several interrogatories hereunto annexed were submitted to him, and his Lordship allowed the interrogatories numbered 1 to 6, but disallowed the remainder.

"That previous to the commencement of this action, at an interview which I had with Mr. Luke Williams, the manager of the said Ovens Gold Quartz Mines Co., Lim., the said Luke Williams informed me that only three persons had applied and paid for shares in the said company, one of whom was the plaintiff, who had applied and paid for 200 shares, and the other of such persons had applied and paid for 300 shares and one share respectively, and the said Luke Williams produced for my inspection the bankers' pass-book of the said company which shewed the correctness of this statement.

"That being unable to obtain an inspection of the books and other documents of the said Ovens Gold Quartz Mines Co., Lim., pursuant to the order above mentioned, it is material and necessary for the plaintiff that the defendants should answer the whole of the said interrogatories, and I believe that the plaintiff will derive material benefit in this cause from the discovery which he seeks by the said interrogatories, and that the plaintiff has a good cause of action on the merits."

Day, in support of the present application.—The objection to allowing the interrogatories now sought to be put to these defendants is that the defendants might be compelled to admit that they had been parties to a fraud, and as there are several defendants this might subject them to an indictment for a conspiracy. The objection is one which could not have been made had the action been against one defendant only; and is the objection to prevail because the action is brought against several, the interrogatories being bonâ fide put for the purpose of obtaining evidence in support of this action? The case of M'Fadzen v. the Mayor and Corporation of Liverpool (37 L. J. Ex. 193; L. R. 3 Ex. 279) shews that if the interrogatories are material for the party's case who asks to administer them, and are put bonâ fide, the Court will admit them; and if the answers would disclose anything tending to make the party interrogated criminally liable, he must refuse to answer on that ground.

[KEATING, J., referred to Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115).]

That was a peculiar case, and the Court there, having regard to the nature of that action and the peculiar circumstances of that case, declined, in the exercise of their discretion, to interfere. In Bickford v. D'Arcy (35 L. J. Ex. 202; L. R. 1 Ex. 354) the interrogatories were held to be admissible although the answers of the defendant might have rendered him liable to a penalty under the Attorneys Act for having practised wrongfully as an attorney; and the Court of Exchequer distingushed that case from the case of Baker v. Lane (3 Hurls. & C. 544; 34 L. J. 1 Ex. 57), on the ground that the interrogatories in that last case were not considered by the Court to be put bonâ fide merely for getting answers in support of that action.

[KEATING, J.—Cannot the information asked for in the present interrogatories, particularly as to the number of shares applied for and paid up, be obtained in another way? Because if it can there would then appear to be some ulterior object in putting them beyond obtaining evidence of these facts.]

There is no such ulterior object. The questions are put only to obtain evidence in support of the action. It appears from the affidavit that the plaintiff has been unable to obtain an inspection of the books and papers of the company notwithstanding the order of Cleasby, B., and without such books there would be no means to get this information except by interrogating the parties. Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230) followed and adopted the case of Osborn v. the London Dock Company (10 Ex. Rep. 698; 24 L. J. Ex. 140), which has ever been considered the leading case on this subject; and those cases shew that the party interrogated is to be considered as placed in the same position as a witness at the trial, and that it is no objection to the questions of the party interrogating that the answers to them might tend to criminate. The party interrogating has a right to have the oath of the party interrogated that they would have that tendency. Those cases also establish that the administering of interrogatories under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, is not to be confined to the cases in which a Court of equity would grant a discovery. They have been always followed, except by the cases of Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222) and Baker v. Lane (3 Hurls. & C. 544; 34 L. J. 1 Ex. 57), and perhaps the recent case of Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115), in each of which the Court seems to have proceeded on the special circumstances of each case. Baker v. Lane (3 Hurls. & C. 544; 34 L. J. 1 Ex. 57) was afterwards explained in the case of Bickford v. D'Arcy (35 L. J. Ex. 202; L. R. 1 Ex. 354) by the Court of Exchequer, which had decided it; and in Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230) Willes, J., deals with Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222), and shews that it did not overrule Osborn v. the London Dock Company (10 Ex. Rep. 698; 24 L. J. Ex. 140). The authorities, therefore, are to the effect that it is only in exceptional cases that such interrogatories are not allowed.

Quain shewed cause in the first instance.—These interrogatories ought not to be allowed. The declaration in this action contains what in substance are counts for a conspiracy, and the object of these interrogatories is to get admissions from the defendants which might criminate them. It appears from the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney that he has got from Williams, the manager of the company, information as to the number of shares applied for and paid up, and that Williams shewed him the bankers' pass-book. Therefore the plaintiff has got the information which several of these interrogatories are said to seek. Consequently, they must be put for some other object than that of assisting the plaintiff in proving his case in this action. According to the decision of the Court in Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115), in a case like this, where the answers might criminate the party interrogated, it is for the party seeking to interrogate to shew the existence of such special circumstances as should induce the Court in the exercise of its discretion to allow them. It is not sufficient to rest the case on the common affidavit, but the party must shew at least that the information required, and which is necessary for the support of his case, cannot be obtained by any other means. Here, so far from doing that, the plaintiff has shewn that the circumstances, instead of being in favour of allowing the interrogatories, are the other way, for he has got, at all events, may get the evidence he wants from other sources. Moreover, this application is by way of an appeal from the decision of a Judge at chambers, upon a matter too which was in his discretion.

[KEATING, J.—Did my Brother Martin exercise his discretion on the circumstances of this case, or did he refuse to allow the interrogatories because he acted on a supposed rule that interrogatories which tend to criminate ought not to be allowed to be put?]

[Day.—The learned Judge would not allow interrogatories which tended to criminate the party interrogated.]

He had all the circumstances before him and did not consider the case a proper one in which such interrogatories as these should be allowed. The practice in Chancery is not now to put interrogatories in the bill; and therefore, where a defendant there wishes, in his answer, to raise the point as to his not being obliged to criminate himself, the matter does not come before the Court as it does at common law as to the propriety of allowing the interrogatories; consequently, the Chancery Court requires the person claiming to be privileged from answering the bill, on that ground that his answer might criminate him, to pledge his oath to his belief that it will have that effect. That was the case of Scott v. Miller (28 L. J. Ch. 584).

Day replied.

KEATING, J.—In this case an application was made at chambers on behalf of the plaintiff to Martin, B., to be allowed to administer certain interrogatories to the defendant, under section 51 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and my Brother Martin seems to have allowed some and disallowed others, considering that the answers to the latter might render the person interrogated liable to a criminal prosecution, and that the plaintiff had shewn no special circumstances entitling him to put such interrogatories. It is very difficult to reconcile the cases on this subject; but I think there seems to be no doubt that, in all cases where it is sought to administer interrogatories, the answers which might render the person interrogated criminally liable, if there is anything giving colour to the supposition that they are put for the purpose of the criminal prosecution, and not merely bonâ fide in aid of the civil action, they ought not to be allowed. No doubt the case which goes furthest in favour of the interrogatories is Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230); that case is somewhat in conflict with the case of Tupling v. Ward (6 Hurls. & N. 749; 30 L. J. Ex. 222); though Willes, J., in his judgment in the former, suggested that they may be reconciled on the ground that the Court of Exchequer in Tupling v. Ward proceeded on the special circumstances of the case. However that may be, I find no case which lays down that the plaintiff has the right to administer interrogatories of this character; it is a matter on which the Courts will exercise their discretion in each case. In Edmunds v.

Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115) all the cases underwent careful consideration, and the Court, after taking time to consider, there say: "In the absence of any such special circumstances as should, according to the general current of authorities, induce a Judge sitting at chambers, or the Court, in the exercise of their respective discretions, to allow interrogatories such as these to be put, we are of opinion that they ought not to be allowed in an action of this description;" from which it would appear that some special circumstances ought to be shewn rendering such interrogatories necessary before they are allowed. I rather think that the plaintiff's affidavit in this case was drawn with that view, since it refers to the order for inspection made in the action against the company apparently to shew that the information sought by these interrogatories cannot otherwise be obtained. If the statement is introduced for that purpose, it seems to me to fall very far short of what is required: the affidavit does not state in terms that the information cannot be obtained in any other manner; nor does it furnish particulars from which such should be inferred. The rule laid down in Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115) seems to be that, where there are no special circumstances, the interrogatories should not be allowed; and I cannot see any such circumstances in this case; certainly none which would justify us in setting aside the order of my Brother Martin, and so interfering with the discretion of the Judge at chambers. It is suggested that he acted on a hard and fast rule that such interrogatories ought never to be allowed, and did not exercise his discretion on the circumstances of the case. But we cannot assume this; and as I see no reason to depart from the rule stated by this Court in Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115), I am of opinion that these interrogatories should not be allowed.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—If I knew that my Brother Martin had acted upon the notion that, in all cases, he would not allow interrogatories to be put where the answers might have a tendency to criminate the party interrogated, and had not exercised his discretion on the circumstances of this case, I should be disposed to make this rule absolute; because I am not satisfied that there was here such an absence of special circumstances that the defendant ought not to be called upon to answer these interrogatories. But if my Brother Martin exercised his discretion in the matter in the circumstances of the particular case, then, upon the general ground that the Court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of a Judge at chambers, unless it clearly sees he is wrong, I should feel equally satisfied to discharge the rule. I am left in doubt in what way my Brother Martin disposed of this matter; but as I infer from the argument that the special circumstances were brought before him, I must, I think, presume that he took them into consideration and exercised his discretion thereon; and therefore, as my Brother Keating agrees with my Brother Martin in the exercise of such discretion, or at all events does not disagree with him, I do not dissent from this rule being discharged. The subject is not in a very satisfactory state. The question arose soon after the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, whether interrogatories were to be administered on the principle of discovery in equity, or whether they might be carried to a wider extent; and the question as to allowing such an inquiry as is here objected to, because it might tend to criminate the party interrogated, came early before the Court of Exchequer, in Osborn v. the London Docks Company (10 Ex. Rep. 698; 24 L. J. Ex. 140), when that Court held that the interrogatories might be put to the party on the same principle of inquiry as if he were in the witness-box to be examined, he having the privilege to refuse to answer them if he chose, on the ground that his answer would have a tendency to criminate him. That case was followed by this Court in Bartlett v. Lewis (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 249; 31 L. J. C.P. 230), and therefore the principle which ought to govern the allowing of such interrogatories was apparently settled by authority. Cases have arisen since that time which cannot, I think, be altogether reconciled with the earlier decisions. As far as I can see, the only intelligible rule to be deduced from the cases, including that of Edmunds v. Greenwood (38 L. J. C.P. 115), is, that when the interrogatories are bonâ fide put for the purpose of discovery, and are relevant to the matter in issue, they may be allowed, although the answers to them may tend to criminate the party answering (if answered in one way), leaving to such party the option of refusing to answer on that ground. But where such interrogatories are sought to be put, the Court and the Judge at chambers will require a stronger case to be made out for allowing them than is requisite in ordinary cases, and such interrogatories will not be allowed on the common affidavit only, but some special circumstances must be laid before the Judge, by affidavit or otherwise, to induce him to order them. As my Brother Keating has said, no hard and fast line can be laid down, and it must be left to the discretion of the Judge in each individual case to determine whether the special circumstances are or not sufficient for allowing such interrogatories.

Rule discharged without costs.

IN THE COMMON PLEAS. Feb. 12, 1869.

(County Court Appeal.)

COX v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers by Railway—Carriage of Cattle—Cattle-Plague Order—Cleansing Truck—Right to Charge for Cleansing.

CARRIERS. C.—By the Consolidated Cattle-Plague Order of August, 1867, made under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107, it was ordered that "every carriage truck required to be cleansed and disinfected should be cleansed and disinfected once in every twenty-four hours during the time when it is used for any animal" in a prescribed manner; and by a clause in their Railway Act a railway company were empowered to receive a certain rate as a maximum rate of carriage for the conveyance of animals, inclusive of every expense incidental to such conveyance, except for any extraordinary services performed by the company, in respect of which they might make a reasonable extra charge:—Held, that the railway company who had carried a cow on their railway for the owner had no right to charge him, in addition to the charge for carriage, with the cost of cleansing the truck, as such cleansing was not a service performed for the owner of the cow within the meaning of the said clause of their Railway Act.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court of Suffolk, holden at Ipswich.

The case stated that the action was brought to recover 20*l.* for the conversion of a cow belonging to the plaintiff, and that it was tried by a jury. The plaintiff was a cattle-salesman residing at Ipswich. The defendants were railway carriers, subject to the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and also governed by a private Act of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. ccxxiii.

On November 18, 1867, the defendants carried a cow from Diss to Ipswich for the plaintiff, and upon its arrival at Ipswich gave notice thereof and of their charge for the same by an order note, in which it was stated that the animal had arrived at the Ipswich station, and that the company's charges were, for the carriage of the animal 5*s.* 8*d.*, and for the cleansing the truck 1*s.*, making altogether 6*s.* 8*d.*

By the regulations of the Board of Trade, as set forth in the London Gazette of August 23, 1867, the truck-cleansing was required to be done and was done by the company, and it was to be taken that 1*s.* was a reasonable sum to charge for such cleansing.

The plaintiff objected to pay the 1*s.*, but tendered the 5*s.* 8*d.* to the company, who, however, refused it, and then detained and sold the cow under the 97th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Digitized by Google

Upon the above trial, the Judge of the County Court directed the jury to find a verdict for 18*l*., being of opinion that the defendants were not entitled to charge the plaintiff for cleansing the truck; or, if so entitled, that the defendants were not entitled to detain and sell the cow for the same, and gave leave to either party to appeal against such direction by virtue of the County Court Act, 1867, s. 13.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: first, whether the defendants had a right to charge the plaintiff with the cost of the cleansing? secondly, whether, the defendants having a right to charge the plaintiff such costs, they had a right to distrain?

Kemp, for the defendants (the appellants).—The cleansing of the truck was required to be done under rule 54 of the Consolidated Cattle-Plague Order of August 20, 1867, made under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107, as amended by the 29 Vict. c. 15. That 54th rule is as follows: "Every pen, carriage-truck, horse-box, vehicle, or boat required to be cleansed and disinfected, shall be cleansed and disinfected once in every twenty-four hours during the time when it is used for any animal in manner following: by sweeping out and effectually removing all dung, sawdust, litter or other matter from the pen, &c., and then by thoroughly washing," &c. This cleansing was a service which was beyond the ordinary duty of a carrier to perform, and was therefore an extraordinary service for which the railway company were entitled to make a reasonable extra charge by virtue of section 230 of their private Act—25 & 26 Vict. c. ccxxiii.[1]

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—It does not appear when the cleansing was done. If it was done after the truck had been used by the plaintiff's cow, how could that be for his benefit?]

It is submitted that it must be taken that the cleansing was before the cow was put into the truck. It could not be intended that the expense of this cleansing and disinfecting, which really was for the benefit of the owners of animals using the trucks, should fall entirely on the railway company. By the prior orders of 1866 the railway company or persons who carried animals for hire were expressly required to cleanse and disinfect the trucks after the animals had been taken out of them. But these orders have been repealed, and this direction is omitted in the order of 1867, which is in favour of what is contended, that the service of so cleansing is for the benefit of the owners of the animals.

J. Brown (Blofield with him) appeared for the plaintiff (the respondent), but was not called on.

KEATING, J.—It is unnecessary to refer to the second question stated in the case, as I am of opinion that the defendants clearly had no right to charge the plaintiff with the cost of the cleansing of the truck, it not being in respect of a service done for him in particular. The Order in Council makes it necessary to cleanse the trucks when used in order to prevent the spread of the cattle plague. It does not appear from what is stated in the case whether the truck in question was cleansed just before or after the plaintiff's cow was put into it, but in either way I do not think that the cleansing can be a service rendered to the plaintiff individually as contradistinguished from the rest of the public. The object of the statute and of the Orders in Council made under it was to prevent the spread of the disease generally; and I cannot see how the defendants, acting under such Orders, would have any right to make this charge. Therefore, I am

(1) The following are the words of such 230th section: "And with respect to the conveyance of goods, minerals and things, carriages and animals, the company may lawfully demand and receive, as a maximum rate of carriage for the conveyance thereof along the railway, including the tolls for the use of the railway, and waggons or trucks, and locomotive power, and every expense incidental to such conveyance, except a reasonable sum for loading, covering and unloading of goods at any terminal station of such goods, and for delivery and collection, and any other services incidental to the service or duty of a carrier, where such services, or any of them, are or is performed by the company, and except a reasonable sum for warehousing and wharfage, or for any other extraordinary services performed by the company (in respect of which the company may make a reasonable extra charge), any rates or sums not exceeding the rates or sums following, viz.," &c.

Digitized by Google

of opinion that the County Court Judge was right, and that his judgment should be affirmed.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not satisfied that the cleansing of the truck was a service performed by the defendants for the plaintiff within the meaning of the 230th section of the defendants' Railway Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. ccxxiii. The case does not find whether the service was performed before or after the cow was put into the truck, and if it was afterwards I cannot see how causing the truck to be disinfected can possibly be said to be a service done for the plaintiff. It is, however, to be observed that the order in question does not say that the railway company are to cleanse the truck for every animal that uses it, but that they are to do so once in every twenty-four hours in which it is so used. That clearly gives the company no right to charge the owner of any particular animal that may be put into the truck with the expense of cleansing.

BRETT, J.—It seems to me that the cleansing of the truck is a duty cast on the railway company for the benefit of the public generally in order to prevent the spread of the cattle disease, and not for the benefit of any individual in particular; consequently the plaintiff ought not to be charged with the expense incurred by the company in the performance of that duty.

Judgment affirmed.

Discussed, Barker v. Herbert, [1911] E. R. A.; 80 L. J. K.B. 1329; [1911] 2 K.B. 633; 105 L. T. 349 (C. A.).

Watercourse—Obstruction—Liability of Owner of Land for Wrongful Act of Strangers.

WATER AND WATERWAYS. C.—In an action for obstructing the flow of water from a stream to certain works of the plaintiff the evidence shewed only that the defendants were owners of the soil of the stream, and that the obstruction had been placed there in order to use the water for certain works before it came to the plaintiff's works, but without the sanction of the defendants and by persons who were strangers to the defendants, and between whom and the defendants there was no connexion by title or otherwise. The defendants derived no advantage from the continuance of the obstruction, and offered to allow the plaintiff to enter and remove it, but they declined to do so themselves:—Held, that there was no evidence of a wrongful continuance of the obstruction by the defendants, and that under these circumstances the plaintiff was rightly nonsuited.

The first count of the declaration alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of certain print-works, land and premises, and by reason thereof was entitled to the flow of a stream or watercourse for working the said works and for the more beneficial use and enjoyment thereof, and the defendants obstructed and diverted, to wit, by means of a weir and planks and other obstructions, the water of the said stream away from the said print-works, lands and premises, and the plaintiff was thereby injured.

The second count was abandoned at the trial; and the third count merely alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of certain land, and was entitled to the flow of a stream or watercourse through the said land, and that the defendants obstructed and diverted the water of the said stream or watercourse from the said land of the plaintiff.

Plea—Not guilty. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Channell, B., at the Chester Spring Assizes for 1868. It appeared that a canal company, incorporated in 1794, by 34 Geo. 3. c. xxvi., for making the Peak Forest Canal, made a cutting in the bed of a natural stream called Todd's Brook, which had since by statute been united with and become the property of the defendants. Todd's Brook flowed into the river Goit, and below the point where Todd's Brook joined it some print-works, called the Furness Print-Works, were situated, which were worked by the water of the Goit. In 1854, a Mr. Welch, who was then the proprietor of these print-works, erected some other print-works, called the Whaley Bridge Print-Works, on land of his higher up the Goit and between the Furness Print-Works and the junction of Todd's Brook with the Goit. Welch, being also the occupier of the adjoining land, placed a dam or weir across the artificial cutting which had been made in Todd's Brook, and conducted the water of the brook to the Whaley Bridge works. The water, after it had been so used and fouled at these works, was then discharged into the Goit, about a mile above the Furness works. In 1858, Welch, who had thus occupied and used both works together, sold the Furness Print-Works to the plaintiff, without reserving any right to divert the water of Todd's Brook; and he subsequently sold the Whaley Print-Works to Messrs. Grave & Co. The plaintiff, insisting upon his right to have the water from Todd's Brook as it had formerly flowed, required the defendants to remove the weir and restore the watercourse to its original state. The defendants, though owners of the soil of the cutting across which the weir had been put, were not the owners of the adjoining land; and in the correspondence which took place between their attorneys and those of the plaintiff they stated that they wished to be neutral in the matter, and that though they declined to remove the weir themselves, as they were unwilling to be involved in a lawsuit with those who had put it there, they would make no objection to the plaintiff sending any one to remove it. The plaintiff did remove it, but it was shortly afterwards restored, though it did not appear by whom, only that it was not done by the defendants; and the plaintiff, declining to remove it again, although offered every facility for that purpose by the defendants, brought this action. Under these circumstances the learned Judge, being of opinion that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the action, nonsuited the plaintiff.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained, on behalf of the plaintiff, to set such nonsuit aside, and for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence to go to the jury of the defendants' liability.

Against this rule

M'Intyre now shewed cause.—The nonsuit was right. The diversion of the water had been effected by a riparian proprietor when the two works were united and worked by the same proprietor. The defendants did not claim under the person who had made the obstruction, nor did they adopt his act or derive any benefit from it. They were willing to permit the plaintiff to enter on their land to remove the obstruction, and if he should be improperly prevented by anybody from doing so he would have a right of action against the person who should so prevent him, and therefore there was no necessity for the present action in order to ascertain and enforce the plaintiff's rights, if he had any. There was, however, no evidence of any wrongful act by the defendants. On moving the rule the case of Reedie v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (4 Ex. Rep. 244) was cited, for the observations of Rolfe, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, as to the liability of the owner of real property for nuisances arising from the mode in which his property has been used by strangers. Such observations might apply if there had been evidence to shew that the defendants in the present case had adopted the wrongful act complained of, as is the case where a person lets a house or land with a nuisance on it, although that nuisance had been created previously by some former occupier. The strongest instance of this is in the case of Gandy v. Jubber (5 B. & S. 78; 33 L. J. Q.B. 151), where the owner, who continued a yearly tenant after a nuisance had been created by the yearly tenant, was held liable for the continuance of the nuisance, although he had no knowledge of the existence of such nuisance.

[Mellish, for the plaintiff, informed the Court that that case had been in effect reversed on appeal, but he stated that as the defendant had consented to a stet processus, the case in the Exchequer Chamber had not been reported, although the Judges there had said that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be reversed.]

There is the case of Fletcher v. Rylands (35 L. J. Ex. 154; L. R. 1 Ex. 265), which, however, is very distinguishable.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—That case does not touch the present one.]

There really is no reported case in which a person has been held liable for a trespass or wrong committed against his will, unless he has been a party to its wrongful continuance. The defendants here never did either the one or the other of these things, nor had they any interest in either creating or continuing the diversion of the stream.

Mellish and Bowen, in support of the rule.—The question is whether, if there be something on land which causes a continuing nuisance, the owner and occupier of such land is not legally liable to the person who sustains a damage from such nuisance. There is, no doubt, very little authority to be found on the subject where the act causing the nuisance has been done by a stranger and wrongdoer. It was settled by Penruddock's case (5 Rep. 100 b) that a nuisance created by the dropping of water was a new wrong each time it occurred, so that if not reformed after request made to the person who came in afterwards as feoffee of the premises from whence the water dropped, an action was maintainable in respect of it, but that, without such request, it was not maintainable against such feoffee. Therefore, that case drew a distinction between the person who did the wrong and the person who allowed it to continue.

[KEATING, J.—There the feoffee was a party claiming the premises under the person who had done the nuisance.]

That is true. The case of The Queen v. Watts (1 Salk. 357) decides that an indictment lies against a tenant for suffering a house to remain ruinous and likely to fall down.

[BOVILL, C.J.—That was founded on the duty to prevent an injury to the public.]

But there was no obligation beyond what arose from being the occupier of the property. In The Queen v. the Bradford Navigation Company (34 L. J. Q.B. 191), a canal company empowered by statute to take the water of certain brooks and use it for their canal, were held liable to be indicted for a nuisance arising from the water becoming polluted by drains before it reached the canal; and, though the decision in Gandy v. Jubber (5 B. & S. 78; 33 L. J. Q.B. 151) was questioned by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, there has been nothing to diminish the effect of the observation of Crompton, J., in that case, that "In the earliest times it was held that the owner of land, if the occupier, was bound to keep his land free from nuisance." And, in Reedie v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (4 Ex. Rep. 244), Rolfe, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "It is not necessary to decide whether, in any case, the owner of real property, such as land or houses, may be responsible for nuisances occasioned by the mode in which his property is used by others not standing in the relation of servants to him, or part of his family. It may be that in some cases he is so responsible. But then his liability must be founded on the principle that he has not taken due care to prevent the doing of acts which it was his duty to prevent, whether done by his servants or others. If, for instance, a person occupying a house or a field should permit another to carry on there a noxious trade so as to be a nuisance to his neighbours, it may be that he would be responsible though the acts complained of were neither his acts nor the acts of his servants." The defendants in this case had notice of the wrongful obstruction, and the fact of their saying that they desired to be neutral shews that they sanctioned the continuance of it. At all events, there was evidence to go to the jury of such continuance, and the authorities apply which shew the liability of the owner of land to be indicted for a nuisance to the public, as in such a case an individual who has sustained a personal damage would have a right of action.

BOVILL, C.J.—I am of opinion that my Brother Channell was right in directing a nonsuit to be entered, on the ground that there was no evidence for the jury on which they might find a verdict for the plaintiff. With regard to the act itself which the plaintiff complains of, that act was not the act of the defendants, nor was it ever adopted by them, nor did it cause any benefit to their property. In truth, the act was done by other persons against the will of the defendants, and was an act which they had neither ordered nor adopted, but which had placed them in the greatest difficulty. It is said, however, that the defendants ought to be held responsible for the continuance of this wrongful act. If, after it had been done, it had appeared either that they had adopted it or had had some benefit from it there might, perhaps, have been some evidence of their liability to go to the jury. But this was not so, and it is simply the case of an act done by others which has not been approved of by the defendants. It is said that the defendants might, at least, have removed the obstruction, but it seems that the plaintiff had also power to do the same; for the defendants gave him leave to come on their land for that purpose. Therefore there were two parties, namely, the plaintiff and the defendants, who had power to remove it, but the consequence of removing it was serious, for it involved a conflict with those who had put it there; and, further it subjected the party so removing it to the liability of an action at the suit of the persons who had placed it there. Under these circumstances it is impossible, I think, to say that there was any evidence on which a jury could properly be allowed to find a verdict for the plaintiff.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the defendants had created the obstruction they would, undoubtedly, have been liable in this action, but that was not so, for the act here had been done by strangers. The defendants did not know by whom or under what right the act had been done, and they did not continue the obstruction, but were willing to have it removed, only they would not incur the expense or responsibility of such removal.

KEATING, J.—I do not understand that the Court, by what they are now deciding, are interfering with the general rule which imposes a liability on the owner of land in respect of creating or continuing a nuisance to a neighbour. Here there was no continuance, nor could there be, except a privity was shewn between the defendants and those who had created the nuisance. I think, therefore, my Brother Channell was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I wish to place my decision on the narrow ground that there was no evidence of a wrongful continuance of the obstruction by the defendants. It appears that the defendants were as ready as the plaintiff to remove it, and that they invited the plaintiff to co-operate with them for that purpose, so that there was not any continuance by them of the obstruction which would make them liable in this particular action.

Rule discharged.

absence, made a contract in the absence of such manager, and within the city of London, between A., a customer of the company, and S., a jobber, for the purchase by A. of certain railway stock, and C. signed his own name, with the words "per pro. Manager," to a bought-note of such contract, which was headed with the name of the company. On another occasion I., who was the secretary of such company, made in like manner a contract between A. and S. for the sale by A. of such stock, and he signed his own name, with the word "secretary" added, to a sold-note of such contract. Both C. and I. received a fixed salary from the company, and derived no other profit from making these contracts. Neither the manager nor any officer or other person connected with the company was a duly admitted broker, pursuant to statute 6 Ann. c. 16:—Held, that both C. and I. acted as brokers within the said city within the meaning of the statute 57 Geo. 3. c. lx. s. 2, and not being duly admitted were liable to the penalties imposed by that enactment.

These were actions brought by the plaintiff, as Chamberlain of the City of London, to recover from each defendant a penalty of 100*l.*, for acting as a broker within the limits of the city of London without being duly admitted and licensed by the Court of Mayor and Aldermen.

The defendant in each action pleaded not guilty by statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 4. s. 4, on which issue was joined.

Both actions were tried together, before Bovill, C.J., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1868. The facts as they appeared at the trial were these: The defendant Cousins was the book-keeper and accountant, and the defendant Inglis was the secretary, of a company incorporated and registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1862, and called the Open Stock Exchange, Lim., which had offices in Lothbury, in the city of London, and was a company established for buying and selling, on behalf of other persons, shares and stocks and other such securities, both by public auction and privately on commission or otherwise. There was no evidence that any of the directors, manager, or other person connected with the company was a duly licensed broker. In February, 1868, a Mr. Ainslie called at the office of the company, in Lothbury, and saw there the defendant Cousins, of whom he inquired the price of 1,000*l.* Great Eastern Railway Stock. Cousins thereupon went and ascertained the price from Mr. Soilleux, a jobber and member of the Stock Exchange, and returned and informed Mr. Ainslie, who instructed him to buy at 30⅝ for the next account-day. Cousins accordingly went back to the Stock Exchange and bought the stock of Soilleux at that price. He then made out and signed a contract-note, which he delivered to Mr. Ainslie. The following is a copy of such note:

"The Open Stock Exchange, Lim.

"5, Lothbury, London, E.C., Feb. 10, 1868.

"Bought, by order and for account of Wm. Ainslie, Esq., of E. Soilleux, for February 28, 1,000*l.* Great Eastern Stock @ 30⅝ £306 5 0

Stamp and fee 1 17 6

Commission 1 5 0

£309 7 6

"C. COUSINS, p. pro. Manager."

The defendant Cousins stated at the trial that he was authorized to act and sign for the manager in his absence, and that it was the usual course for him to have acted as he did on this occasion when the manager was absent.

The occasion on which the other defendant, Inglis, was sought to be made liable for acting as broker without a licence was on a re-sale by Mr. Ainslie of this 1,000*l.* Great Eastern stock, when the defendant Inglis was the person Mr. Ainslie saw at the company's office, and who having gone and sold the stock to the same jobber, Soilleux, signed a sold-note, similar to the said bought-note, adding, however, the word "secretary" after his signature. Both the defendants received a salary each, and had no profit out of the transactions.

Neither party desiring the opinion of the jury, the Chief Justice decided that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for 100*l.* in each action, but he gave leave to the defendant in each action to move to enter a verdict for him if the Court should be of opinion that such defendant was not liable to the penalty, the Court being at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

A rule nisi to that effect having been obtained in each action,

Archibald now shewed cause.—The earliest statute prohibiting persons acting as brokers in the city of London unless sworn before and duly admitted by the mayor and aldermen is the 13 Edw. 1. statute 5. There was afterwards the 6 Ann. c. 16, which was amended by the local Act 57 Geo. 3. c. lx., and by section 2 of that last Act it is enacted, "That if any person shall take upon him to act as a broker, or employ, or cause, permit or suffer any person or persons to be employed with, under or for him to act as such within the said city and liberties, not being admitted in pursuance of the said recited Act" (6 Ann. c. 16), "every such person so offending shall forfeit and pay to the use of the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the said city for every such offence the sum of 100*l.*, to be recovered by action of debt in the name of the Chamberlain of the said city in any of His Majesty's Courts of record, in which no protection, essoign or wager of law shall be allowed, or any more than one imparlance." These defendants say that they acted merely as servants or clerks, and are therefore not liable to the penalty imposed by this Act; but it is submitted that what these defendants respectively did in this matter, whether as servants or not, was sufficient to constitute an acting as broker within the meaning of this statute.

[BOVILL, C.J.—No doubt there was clear evidence of such acting as a broker unless the party so acting be protected by reason of the situation in which he stood as a servant of the company.]

The company were not—indeed, being a body corporate, they could not be —themselves licensed brokers, and it did not appear that any officer of the company was such broker. Then, can a person evade these statutes by being a clerk or agent of persons who are not authorized to act as brokers? The statutes intended to forbid any one acting as a broker who was not licensed.

[BYLES, J.—Does the statute strike at the clerk? May not an authorized broker act by a clerk who is not a broker?]

A sworn broker enters into a bond with sureties, and the condition of the bond, which is set out in Kemble v. Atkins (Holt N.P. 432, note (a)), shews that such broker is not to "employ any one under him to act as a broker within the city and liberties thereof not being duly admitted." It is not necessary to deal with the question whether a clerk of a duly admitted broker may act or not for his master without incurring the penalties of the statute, for neither of these defendants were acting on behalf of any one who had authority to act as a broker.

Montagu Chambers and Mansel Jones, in support of the rules.—The statute of 57 Geo. 3. c. lx. s. 2. applies only to the principal who so wrongfully acts as broker, and does not apply to the person employed by him. The words of that section, "take upon him to act as broker or employ" any person "under or for him to act as such," do not apply to either of these defendants, who were only servants employed, and not persons employing others. They received no profit from the transaction, but were merely servants, receiving a fixed salary, and as such were not, it is submitted, within the meaning of this statute, which was directed entirely against those who, as principals, acted as brokers for their own profit or employed others to act for them.

BOVILL, C.J.—In each of these cases there was a contract for purchase and sale. In the first transaction, Mr. Ainslie was a buyer, and the contract was between him and Mr. Soilleux, the jobber. Some person intervened between Ainslie as the buyer and Soilleux as the seller; and who was that person? In fact, in that first transaction it was Cousins alone with whom Ainslie and Soilleux communicated, who were certainly the two principals on that occasion. The terms of the bargain being settled, a contract note was signed in point of fact by Cousins, and in his own name, adding these words, " per pro. Manager." When the evidence was given for the defendants at the trial, it appeared that the company managed such transactions as these ordinarily through their manager, but that if he were absent, it was the duty of Cousins to act for him. He was not the clerk of the manager, but a person whose duty it was in the absence of the manager to make the bargains, the profits resulting from which belonged to the company. There was no evidence that the manager, or any one connected with the company, was a licensed broker of the city of London, even if that would have sufficed. Then, on these facts, as the company, being a company incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, could not act by itself, but must employ some one to act for them, it seems to me that they did employ Cousins to act for them, and for that purpose to make the bargains and contracts required in their business. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the case falls distinctly within the Act, and that Cousins is liable to the penalty. The case as against Inglis was, with reference to the latter part of the transaction, when, after the purchase of the shares, and after they had been continued from account-day to account-day, they were eventually re-sold by Ainslie to Soilleux, the jobber. That transaction was completed by Inglis, who was the only intervening person, and who signed the contract sold-note thus: " R. W. Inglis, Secretary." It seems to me that, as in the other case, so in this, the party signing the note was acting as broker, and liable therefore for the penalty.

BYLES, J.—I think that my Lord rightly decided this case at the trial. The defendants were acting as brokers, and there was no one else but them acting as such for the principals in the transaction, and therefore they come within the meaning of the statute. It is not necessary for me to say, and therefore I give no opinion whether a duly authorized broker can act by his clerk, and if he cannot, whether the clerk would be liable for the penalty.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that both these defendants acted as principals. There was no one connected with the company, that we hear of, whether as manager or secretary, or otherwise, who was shewn to be a duly admitted broker. Then these two defendants acted as brokers, and could only act as principal brokers, because there was no one for whom they could be agents. Consequently the verdict in each action was right, and the rule in each must be discharged.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that these two defendants took upon themselves to act as brokers, and that they come within the first part of this second section. There was no broker duly licensed from whom either of them could derive authority. They did not profess to act for any licensed broker, but for the company, who could not act except by some servant or agent. They acted each in an independent capacity as the servant of the company, not deriving any authority from any one who was authorized to act as a licensed broker.

Rule in each action discharged.

Will—Construction—Equitable Estate in Fee subject to Defeasance.

WILL. I.—*A testator devised a house to trustees on trust to apply the rents for the advancement and benefit of his granddaughter M. until she should attain the age of twenty-one, but in case she should die under that age, then he devised the said house to his daughters E. and C., their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common. executrices, and his son executor of his will, to whom he bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate, not specifically bequeathed, as tenants in common:—Held, that the testator's granddaughter M. took, under the above devise, an equitable estate in fee in the said house, subject to defeasance in case she should die under twenty-one years of age.

This was an action of ejectment, brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, in which the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to the possession of a house, No. 4, Coronation Terrace, Ilfracombe, Devonshire, of which the defendants were in actual possession; and by consent of the parties, and by order, the following SPECIAL CASE was stated for the opinion of the Court:

John Martin, deceased, made his will in writing, bearing date February 17, A.D. 1855, duly signed and attested as then and now by law required. The following was part of the said will:

"I give and devise all that my dwelling-house situated on Hillsborough Terrace, Ilfracombe, aforesaid, being No. 4, and also all that my dwelling-house and premises, situated on Montpelier Terrace, Ilfracombe, being No. 9, and also all that my dwelling-house and premises situated on Coronation Terrace, Ilfracombe, being No. 4, and all my furniture and other effects in the said houses respectively, to Henry Day and Robert Henry Moon, of Ilfracombe aforesaid, gentlemen, upon trust as to the dwelling-house No. 4, Hillsborough Terrace, and the furniture therein, and No. 9, Montpelier Terrace, to receive the rents, and to pay the same to my said wife during her life, if she shall so long continue my widow and unmarried, and after her decease, or second marriage, which shall first happen, then as to the dwelling-house and premises No. 4, Hillsborough Terrace, with all the furniture and effects therein, upon trust to apply the rents for the advancement and benefit of my granddaughter her heirs and assigns for ever; and as to the dwelling-house and premises No. 9, Montpelier Terrace, upon trust to convey and assure the same to my daughter Caroline Rogers Martin, her heirs and assigns for ever. And as to the dwelling-house and premises No. 4, Coronation Terrace, and the furniture therein, upon trust to apply the rents for the advancement and benefit of my granddaughter Mary Annie Clarke, until she attains the age of twenty-one years; but in case my said granddaughter should die under that age, then I devise the said dwelling-house and furniture to my daughters Elizabeth Annie Martin and Caroline Rogers Martin, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common. And I hereby declare that the said trustees or trustee shall, after the decease or second marriage of my said wife, and during the minority of my said children, apply the whole or such part as they or he shall think fit, of the rents to which my children Elizabeth Annie Martin and Caroline Rogers Martin shall, for the time being, be presumptively entitled under the trusts hereinbefore declared, for or towards the maintenance or education of such children respectively, either directly or to her guardian respectively, without seeing to the application thereof, or requiring any account for the same, and shall accumulate the residue (if any) thereof."

After making provision for the receipts of the trustees being good discharges to purchasers, and for the appointment of new trustees in case of death, &c., the will concluded as follows: "And I appoint my said wife and the said Henry Day and Robert Henry Moon guardians of my infant children and grandchild Mary Annie Clarke. And I appoint my son Henry Martin and my daughters Mary Clarke and Annie Cropton executor and executrixes of this my will, to whom I bequeath all the residue of my real and personal estate, of whatever kind or description, and not hereinbefore specifically bequeathed, as tenants in common, but so that the shares of my said daughters Mary Clarke and Annie Cropton shall be for their separate use, and shall not be subject or liable to the debts or engagements of their present or any future husbands, but the residue as aforesaid shall be subject to the payment of my debts, legacies and funeral and testamentary expenses, and also to the payment of 25*l*. 10*s*. yearly to Mrs. Seal during her life."

The said Mary Annie Clarke mentioned in the said will is the defendant Mary Annie Davis; she attained the age of twenty-one years before the commencement of this suit, and is living and married to the defendant Robert Davis. The said Henry Martin mentioned in the said will is dead. The said Mary Clarke and Annie Cropton mentioned in the said will and her husband Thomas Cropton are the plaintiffs in this action, and any interest that Henry Martin would have had in No. 4, Coronation Terrace, had he been living, has passed to the plaintiffs. The widow of the testator died in the month of March, 1867. The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiffs or the defendants are, under the will above set forth, entitled to the premises No. 4, Coronation Terrace, Ilfracombe aforesaid.

In last Michaelmas Term,

Digby Seymour (Beresford with him) argued the case for the plaintiffs, and Joseph Brown (R. E. Turner with him) argued for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court[1] was delivered, on February 12, by—

BRETT, J.—This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiffs to recover possession of a house, No. 4, Coronation Terrace, Ilfracombe. The plaintiffs claimed as residuary devisees under the will of John Martin, deceased, or as representatives of his son Henry Martin, who was also his heir-at-law. The defendants claimed in right of the defendant Mary Annie Davis, as devisee under the will. John Martin, the testator, by his will, dated February 17, 1855, after several bequests to his wife and other members of his family, proceeded to devise three houses, including that in dispute, to trustees, in trust, as to the two first houses, to receive the rents and to pay the same to his wife during her life or widowhood, and after her decease or second marriage, as to the first upon trust to convey and assign the same to his daughter Elizabeth Annie Martin, her heirs and assigns for ever, as to the second, in similar terms, to his daughter Caroline Rogers Martin, and as to No. 4, Coronation Terrace, upon trust to apply the rents for the advancement and benefit of his granddaughter Mary Annie Clarke, until she should attain the age of twenty-one years; but in case his said granddaughter should die under that age, then he devised the said dwelling-house to his daughters Elizabeth Annie Martin and Caroline Rogers Martin, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common. The will afterwards contained an appointment of the testator's son Henry Martin and his daughters Mary Clarke and Annie Cropton to be executor and executrices of his will, to whom he bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate, of whatever kind or description, and not thereinbefore specifically bequeathed, as tenants in common, &c., but the residue aforesaid should be subject to the payment of his debts, legacies and funeral expenses, and also to the payment of 25*l.* 10*s.* yearly to a Mrs. Seal during her life.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that no estate whatever in No. 4, Coronation Terrace was devised to the defendant Mary Annie Davis, the granddaughter of the testator, but that the devise of the estate was to the trustees, with a direction to apply the rents for the advancement and benefit of his granddaughter whilst under age; and if any estate was devised to her, it was only until she should attain the age of twenty-one years, when it passed to Henry Martin and to the plaintiffs Mary Clarke and Annie Cropton, under the residuary clause, or to Henry Martin as his heir-at-law. On the part of the defendants it was contended that upon the words of the devise alone, or upon them coupled with the intention otherwise manifest on the face of the will, the defendant Mary Annie Davis took an estate in fee subject to defeasance if she should die under twenty-one years of age. The cases chiefly relied upon on behalf of the defendants were—Newland v. Shephard (2 P. Wms. 194); Peat v. Powell (Amb. 387); Gardiner v. Stevens (30 L. J. Ch. 199); Tomkins v. Tomkins, cited by Lord Hardwicke in Goodtitle v. Whitby (1 Burr. 224) and Goodright v. Hoskins (9 East, 306). In answer to which cases it was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, that Lord Hardwicke, in Fonereau v. Fonereau (3 Atk. 316), had disapproved of the doctrine in Newland v. Shephard (2 P. Wms. 194), that Peat v. Powell (Amb. 387) was decided on the authority of Newland v. Shephard (2 P. Wms. 194), that both these cases are questioned in Jarman on Wills, vol. 2. p. 253, and that they are overruled in the case of Fitzhenry v. Bonner (2 Drew. 36).

Upon consideration of the will now in question, we are of opinion that the trustees took a legal estate in the three houses mentioned in the devise; that the defendant Mary Annie Davis took an equitable estate in No. 4, Coronation Terrace, and that such estate was an estate in fee, subject to defeasance in case she should die under twenty-one years of age. As to the first objection to this interpretation, taken on behalf of the plaintiffs, we think that, inasmuch as all the profit or produce of the house was to pass to the benefit of the testator's granddaughter, it sufficiently appears to have been the testator's intention that an estate in the house should pass; and as to the second objection, without saying that if the devise had stood alone it would have raised, by necessary implication, an estate in fee, we think that looking to it and the other portions of the will together, it manifestly appears to have been the testator's intention to give the whole interest in the house No. 4, Coronation Terrace to his granddaughter, to go over to his daughters Elizabeth Annie Martin and Caroline Rogers Martin only in a case which has not happened, viz., in case his granddaughter Mary Annie Clarke should die under twenty-one years of age. If this were not so, the strange consequence would follow that if the granddaughter died under twenty-one the estate would go over to the daughters Elizabeth Annie Martin and Caroline Rogers Martin, whereas if the granddaughter attained the age of twenty-one it would go over to the residuary legatees, who are other persons. Such an intent cannot, we think, be presumed from the structure and language of the will. We are of opinion that the decision of Wood, V.C., in Gardiner v. Stevens (30 L. J. Ch. 199), which seems to recognize the doctrine of the earlier cases, is in accordance with our present judgment, and that it is not in conflict with the decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Fitzhenry v. Bonner (2 Drew. 36), which seems to admit that words such as are used in the devise now in question, are sufficient to pass the whole interest, "if, looking to the language and to all the dispositions of the will and the circumstances, there is an irresistible inference in favour of implying such a gift." We think there is such an inference in the present case, and therefore give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

the meaning of the Act:—Held, however (Keating, J., and Montague Smith, J., dubitantibus), that an objection to the recognizance that some of the petitioners signed it as sureties is an objection to the sufficiency and not to the validity of the security, and is therefore amendable by a deposit of money under section 9.

The petitioners in this case were Joseph Walker Pease, Henry Barkworth, Anthony Bannister, William Leetham, and eight other persons, and the petition, which was presented by them under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), complained of the undue election of the two respondents for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull at the election holden on November 16, last.

The respondents were made respondents to the same petition, and the security for costs given on behalf of the petitioners, within three days after the presentation of the petition, was a recognizance entered into by the said petitioners J. W. Pease, H. Barkworth, A Bannister and W. Leetham, for 250*l.* each.

The respondents thereupon took out a summons before one of the election petition Judges, to set aside the petition on the ground that the recognizance so entered into was not a recognizance in accordance with the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, and was wholly null and void, and in support of such summons identified by affidavit the persons who had entered into the recognizance with the said petitioners J. W. Pease, H. Barkworth, A. Bannister, and W. Leetham.

Upon the hearing of such summons Willes, J., endorsed the same as follows: "I make no order in the terms thereof, and treating it by arrangement as a summons properly before me to declare the security insufficient, I declare the security to be insufficient, and I deem the sum of 1,000*l.* requisite to make the security sufficient; and I order that if 1,000*l.* be deposited in the manner prescribed by the general rules within three days from the date of this order, not including such date, the petition shall be deemed at issue, and that unless the amount be so deposited, all proceedings on the petition shall be stayed."

This order was dated December 21, 1868. There was no consent on the part of the respondents to its being made.

Within the time limited by the said order for doing so 1,000*l.* was deposited on the part of the petitioners in the manner prescribed by the general rules.

On the first day of this term a rule was obtained by Mellish, for the respondent Clay, and by H. James, for the respondent Norwood; and by each rule the petitioners were called upon to shew cause why the said order of Willes, J., should not be rescinded, and why all proceedings in the petition against such respondent should not be stayed on the ground that the said recognizance was not a recognizance within the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and that no recognizance had been given or money deposited within the meaning of the said Act.

Sir J. Karslake shewed cause.—The question turns on 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, and the material sections are 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 20, 22, 31, 42. The first objection taken on the other side is that the recognizance, the form of which is given by rule 19, is void, because it is made by the four petitioners, and not by sureties for them. But the respondents have no right to treat it as void, but must go before a Judge to get it set aside. The late Act follows 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. ss. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, under which statute, as appears from May's Parliamentary Practice, 5th edit., 602-606, and the Falkirk case (May's Parliamentary Practice, 5th edit., p. 606), the objection was to be taken before the examiners. The recognizance is to provide as to costs up to a certain amount, and if entered into, and no objection taken, then, by section 10, the Master is to treat the petition as at issue. Here the recognizance, good on its face, was lodged, but because it is ascertained that it is entered into by some of the petitioners, it is said it may be treated as a nullity; but no provision says so, and there is a tribunal to determine what amendments shall be made. It may be that there are four obligors whose sufficiency may be mooted; if one be sufficient this may be remedied; so if all be infants, though by law the bond is void, the parties must go before a Judge, especially if the recognizance is good on its face, as it is here. This gives the proper effect to the word "insufficient" in section 9.

[BOVILL, C.J.—By section 26 the old practice is to be observed in cases to which the New Rules do not extend.]

If the practice under the old Act is to be looked to, the Falkirk case (May's Parliamentary Practice, 5th edit., p. 606), which shews the objection must have been before the examiner, is an authority to shew that now it should be taken before a Judge; and the legislature in section 9 uses the widest terms, the words being "any objection." Here the summons asked to have the petition set aside, and the Judge refused, but ordered that a deposit should be made. The proper course was to have asked the Judge to decide that the recognizance was void. The question whether it was good or bad was for him, and he had a right, under section 9, to order a deposit, for in every case questions as to the security are to be determined by a Judge. Section 8 provides as to the recognizance and the mode of objecting to it; then comes section 9, which allows a deposit, and then the 21st and following rules, which provide as to the procedure before a Master or Judge. The object is that the costs may be secured. The respondent may waive this, but if he does not he must object in the way specified. After a certain time, the Master is to assume matters to be at issue, and is to put the petition in the list. If the respondent were entitled at any stage to treat the recognizance as bad, it would be most inconvenient, and it was never intended that the respondent was to take the matter in his own hands. It is not for him to treat the recognizance as void, but he must go before a Judge to alter it or get a deposit. If the Judge decided by agreement the Court has no jurisdiction, and the respondent is concluded.

[H. James, for the respondent Norwood, said the Judge acted in invito, not by agreement.]

Further, it is absolutely necessary to go before the Master if the recognizance is on its face good, and anything to the contrary is a fact to go before him. The other side also take another point, viz., whether, as there are two respondents, 2,000*l.* is required. Now, first, the matter has been decided by a Judge, and the Court has no jurisdiction; secondly, it is sufficient. By the old practice petitions against two members might be joined; and sections 6 and 22 of the present Act provide that the security in a petition shall be 1,000*l.*, and that two or more candidates may be respondents in the same petition, and the Judge held that the old practice was to be followed. The wording of sections 41 and 42 favours this view. By the other construction, at every stage, double proceedings would be necessary, though the Acts complained of be joint.

[BOVILL, C.J.—The Act is to be read with 13 Vict. c. 21. s. 4, and the plural number may be used for the singular; and by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. s. 3. only 1,000*l.* was required.]

To prevent frivolous petitions a security is required. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. gave the same form of recognizance, and also contained section 108, because 13 Vict. c. 21. was not then in force.

Mellish and H. James, in support of the rules.—There was no agreement or consent to the learned Judge making the order which he did, and it has never been acted upon by the respondents.

[BOVILL, C.J.—We are all agreed that there was nothing which passed before my Brother Willes at chambers which precluded the respondents from making the application which is now before the Court. The questions to be argued on this rule will be the main questions in the case.]

Then the first question will be, whether the recognizance was not a nullity. It is submitted that it was just as if there were no security, and in that case there would be no power to amend. Before 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. objections to the sufficiency of securities were made before the examiner, but objections as to the validity of the recognizance were made to the House, and there was no power to amend, and if invalid the petition fell; then section 13 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. gave the examiner power to examine as to the validity, from which section 8 of the present Act is taken, leaving out the words " that the same is invalid or . . . . not duly entered into or received . . . ."; section 15 provided as to the procedure of such examination; and section 46 enacted, that if the examiner reported the recognizances were objectionable, no further proceedings were to be taken. Then the present Act, by section 5, provides that the petition shall in future be to this Court; and by section 6, that certain things shall be done on the presentation of a petition. All the conditions in section 6 are conditions precedent, and the petitioner is to give security, i.e., money, or a surety, which must be something more than his own liability, for he is independently liable.

[BOVILL, C.J.—What ought the examiner under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. to have done? It would seem he would have received and certified, and then have heard objections under section 13. If the old practice is to prevail an objection is necessary.]

If they be the same persons it would be his duty to reject, if he knew it; by section 7 he has to certify, and he has power to inquire whether they be other than petitioners. As respects the present Act, by the other construction a man might deposit 1*s.*, and then must be taken before the Master, and so get time. Section 8 clearly does not apply to an invalid security; and then section 9, as is shewn by the expressions " further time " and " time limited," refers to section 8.

[BOVILL, C.J.—Section 9 says, not " such objection " or " recognizance," but simply " any objection to the security." Why is it not general?]

If a man be one day too late, there is no power to amend; suppose there is no security, what is a respondent to do except come to the Court to take the petition off the file; he cannot object to the security. This proceeding is not an objection to the security, but merely in order to bring to the notice of the Court that there is no security, that a condition has not been fulfilled, and that all proceedings ought to be stopped, and the respondents went to a Judge because the Court was not sitting. Rules 21 and 22 point to objections under section 28.

[BYLES, J.—Rule 23 is sweeping: " any objection made to the security."]

If section 9 be not built solely on section 8, then it would follow that objections under and objections not under section 8 would be taken at different times, and further, the petitioner might give the go-by to section 6 by an illusory security. The words of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 58. s. 42. shew that the sureties must be some one else than the petitioners, and the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. s. 3. is unequivocal. Now, as to 1,000*l.* being sufficient. This turns on section 22, which, after saying different candidates may be joined, provides that " for all the purposes of this Act such petition shall be deemed to be a separate petition against each respondent." That is, the petitions are to be tried at the same time for convenience, but are only the same for mere matter of form. Under the old practice, there might be joint petitions for joint Acts, but it was a moot point whether the petitioners could go into separate Acts.

[BOVILL, C.J.—Section 22 is introduced after sections as to trial, and it may be that it means only that they are to be separate when and after they come to trial.]

It seems to assume there would be two petitions but for the section, and it gets rid of any doubt about this and says, but for all purposes they are to be two. It was intended that joint or separate Acts might be tried in one petition, but that they were to be treated as separate.

Manisty, O'Brien, Serjeant, Huddleston, Nasmyth, Cave, and Beaumont, argued shortly in support of, and Sir P. Colquhoun, Price, O'Malley, Jelf, Herschel, Gates, and Jeune argued against similar orders which Willes, J., had made in other petition cases which raised the same points as those in the principal case.

BOVILL, C.J.—We have already, during the progress of the argument, intimated our opinion that the parties are not precluded by anything that passed at chambers from coming to the Court by way of appeal against the order made by my Brother Willes. The questions which we have had to consider arise upon the construction to be put upon some sections of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. We have found great difficulty, looking at the language of the Act, and comparing one section with another, in discovering the meaning of the legislature: and I am by no means certain that the conclusion we have arrived at is the correct one. It is therefore with some hesitation that I express the opinion which I have formed, and which seems to me in some measure to solve the difficulty.

The first question is, whether, where the petition is against two or more members whose election is complained of, the security to be given by the petitioners under section 6 is to be to the amount of 1,000*l.* only, or whether the statute requires it to be for 1,000*l.* in respect of each member petitioned against. In considering that question, we must not disregard the previous legislation and the practice which prevailed on the trial of election petitions before the tribunal which formerly existed. According to that practice and the last Act upon the subject, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98, it seems to have been established that although the petition might be against the return of two or more members, one security for 1,000*l.* alone was required; and by section 26 of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, it is expressly enacted that, "until rules of Court have been made in pursuance of this Act, and so far as such rules do not extend, the principles, practice and rules on which Committees of the House of Commons have heretofore acted in dealing with election petitions, shall be observed so far as may be by the Court and Judge in the case of election petitions under this Act."

The principal object of the late Act was to substitute a new tribunal for the trial of these petitions in lieu of the Committees of the House of Commons; and, although numerous changes are introduced by the Act, they all seem to be addressed to the making of provisions suitable for the new tribunal, viz., the Court of Common Pleas and the Judges appointed for the trial of election petitions pursuant to section 11. If it had been intended to make so important a change with regard to the extent of the security as that here contended for by the respondents, I should have expected to find some distinct and express enactment on the subject. But, so far as there is any specific provision, all the earlier sections of the Act throughout point to one petition and one security only. It is said, however, that there is a provision (in section 22) which renders it necessary for the Court and the election Judges to treat the petition, where there are more respondents than one, as separate petitions for all purposes. That section enacts that "two or more candidates may be respondents to the same petition, and their case may for the sake of convenience be tried at the same time, but for all the purposes of this Act such petition shall be deemed to be a separate petition against each respondent." That section therefore assumes that there may be one petition against two or more respondents, and that the proceedings thereon may be continued to trial as upon one petition against all the respondents, where the same objection applies to one. In a case of that kind, it is plain that there could only be one petition and one trial. What, then, does the section mean as applicable to such a case when it says that "for all the purposes of this Act such petition shall be deemed to be a separate petition against each respondent"? In point of fact it is not so, and cannot be made so. I have great difficulty in putting any sensible construction upon this part of the Act. What are the "purposes" of the Act? To test the validity of the election of the sitting members, to unseat them and to seat other persons. For the purposes of the judgment and the consequences that are to follow it, it may be that the petition is to be considered a separate petition against each respondent, though that construction does not meet the whole difficulty. No satisfactory solution has been offered by any of the learned counsel who have appeared for the respondents in the several cases which depend upon our judgment in this case. It was, indeed, suggested by Mr. Mellish that section 22 applies to candidates only. But the answer to that is that, by the interpretation clause, section 3, "candidate" includes "member." For the purpose of the practical application of the section to the present cases, however, I do not think it necessary to attempt to define the meaning of the expression to which I have referred. The only question before us is, whether it applies to the security which is to be given. Now the security is no part of the petition, or of the proceedings upon or under the petition; it is a matter which is wholly collateral to the petition, and is made a condition by an express and positive enactment having reference to one petition; and I cannot construe section 22 as requiring a separate security to be given in the case of each separate respondent. As a general principle, our law does not require a plaintiff to give security for costs; and in many cases there would be as much reason for calling upon the respondent as upon the petitioner to give security for costs upon an election petition. It was probably found in former times, when political feeling ran high, that it became a habit to put forward sham petitions; and it may be that that which was at first imposed as a test of bona fides ultimately became a real security. The security, however, is not the only remedy for the costs which the respondent has. Under the old Acts, all the petitioners were liable for costs in certain cases. That liability was from time to time enlarged; and under the present Act (section 42) the security is only to be had recourse to upon the failure of the petitioners to pay costs. If the deposit or recognizance was intended to be the actual and only security for the full amount of all the costs to be incurred under the petition, considerable hardship would no doubt arise where there was one security only for 1,000*l.* and several respondents, especially where there were separate cases against the several respondents, each requiring a different time and mode of trial, the one being comparatively inexpensive, the other involving a prolonged inquiry and large expenditure of money; and more particularly in the city of London, where there might be one petition against four members. It being perfectly clear that, down to the passing of the Act of last session, one security for 1,000*l.* was the limit in all cases, if the legislature had thought it right to alter it, I should have expected that they would have done so in clear and unambiguous terms, and not left it to be inferred from such language as we find in section 22. If we are wrong in the construction we put upon the Act, or if parliament shall think that the deposit or recognizance should be a security for the actual costs incurred, it will be for them to interfere. It may be that they may think that the respondent also should give security. We, however, cannot speculate. All we have to do is, to deal according to the best of our judgment with what the legislature has declared. Looking, therefore, at the former practice, and at the objects of this Act of Parliament, and seeing that there is no express enactment requiring more than one security to be given, and that the security is a matter collateral to the petition, I have come to the conclusion that the view taken by my Brother Willes, and concurred in by the other election Judges, was right. This objection, therefore, in the principal case, as well as in all the other cases which depend upon it, fails.

The next question which arises is, whether a recognizance entered into by some out of a larger number of petitioners is a compliance with the Act of Parliament; and if not, a further question arises, as to the nature and effect of the objection, and whether it can be raised under the 8th or the 9th section of the Act, and can be removed by a deposit, or whether effect is only to be given to it under the general jurisdiction of the Court. I entirely concur with my Brother Willes and the other election Judges that the security must be by persons other than the petitioners themselves. The recognizance is to be "a security given on behalf of the petitioner"—section 6, and there are many clauses in the Act which point to the same construction. I am therefore of opinion that the recognizance in this and in all the other cases where it was signed by petitioners is not a compliance with the Act. Then arises the question, what is the nature of the objection, and whether it is an objection to the validity or to the sufficiency of the security? In order to answer that question, it will be necessary to refer to the Act which regulated the rights of the parties in this respect before the passing of the Act of last session, viz., the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. Under section 13 of that Act, the power given to the respondent to object to the recognizance was given in these words: "Any sitting member petitioned against, or any electors petitioning and admitted parties to defend the election or return, may object to any such recognizance on the ground that the same is invalid, or that the same was not duly entered into or received by the examiner of recognizances, with the affidavit thereunto annexed as hereinbefore required, or on the ground that the sureties or any of them are insufficient, or that a surety is dead, or that he cannot be found or ascertained from want of a sufficient description in the recognizance, or that a person named in the recognizance has not duly acknowledged the same." Under that section there are two classes of objections referred to: first, that the recognizance is invalid or has not been duly entered into or received by the examiner; secondly, that the sureties, or any of them, are insufficient, or that a surety is dead, &c. All these objections, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98, had to be disposed of by the examiner of recognizances. His decision was final; and there was no power of amendment, except by the substitution of a new surety in the place of one who had died. That being so, when the Act of the last session was passed, certain sections were introduced with a view to objections to the recognizance being made upon various grounds; but it is somewhat remarkable that throughout the Act there is no provision which expressly defines the mode in which objections to the validity of the recognizance are to be determined: and in section 8, which authorizes and requires certain objections to be made, the time at which the objections are to be presented, and their nature, are distinctly stated:—"It shall be lawful for the respondent, where the security is given wholly or partially by recognizance," within a prescribed time, "to object in writing to such recognizance, on the ground that the sureties or any of them are insufficient, or that a surety is dead, or that he cannot be found or ascertained from the want of a sufficient description in the recognizance, or that a person named in the recognizance has not duly acknowledged the same." All these objections are included in the second class mentioned in section 13 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98; and I have failed to discover any reason why objections to the validity of the recognizance were not included in section 8 of the late Act, and it seems to me that it is only such objections as are mentioned in section 8 that can be deemed to come within section 9. That section is as follows:—"Any objection made to the security given shall be heard and decided on in the prescribed manner. If an objection to the security is allowed, it shall be lawful for the petitioner, within a further prescribed time, not exceeding five days, to remove such objection by a deposit in the prescribed manner of such sum of money as may be deemed by the Court or officer having cognizance of the matter to make the security sufficient. If on objection made the security is decided to be insufficient, and such objection is not removed in manner hereinbefore mentioned, no further proceedings shall be had on the petition; otherwise, on the expiration of the time limited for making objections, or, after objection made, on the sufficiency of the security being established, the petition shall be deemed to be at issue." If there had been nothing in the Act upon the subject, it might have been assumed that all objections to the security must be heard and decided under the general jurisdiction by the Court or by a Judge sitting as a Judge of the Court, and not as a Judge appointed under the Act. Now, the language of section 8 of the Act of last session being similar to part of section 13 of the Act of 1848, I am disposed to put the same construction upon the former as was put upon the latter; and, so far as this question is concerned, it will not be necessary to refer to all the grounds of objection enumerated. I will mention only that one included in the first class of section 13 is a ground of invalidity, the other, in the second class, is a ground of insufficiency. Here, there was a recognizance in point of fact, and a valid one in the sense that it might be enforced by the ordinary remedies. Further, it is a recognizance which is good upon the face of it. It seems to be in the nature of a suretyship. It is further a recognizance which, even looking at it as the recognizance of some of the petitioners, is at all events a security for the other petitioners; and it creates a different degree of liability and constitutes an additional security for the petitioners themselves who sign it. If that be so, can it be said that it is an objection to the validity of the recognizance that the parties to it are principals as well as sureties? or that they are not sureties at all? What meaning is to be given to the word "insufficient"? May it include personal incapacity? I agree that it does not mean a general incapacity of entering into a suretyship, but insufficiency for the purpose of the Act. Take the case of infancy: would that go to invalidity or mere insufficiency? It seems to me that it would fall within the latter. So, in the case of a married woman; she would be insufficient as a surety, because she is as a married woman incapable of contracting. Is it to be the less insufficiency because created by the Act itself? I can understand that if any illegality conclusively appears upon the face of the recognizance, it may amount to no recognizance at all. It does not appear with certainty that the four persons who signed the recognizance were four of the petitioners; indeed, the names and descriptions upon the two documents are not identical. And, even if they were, does that make the recognizance invalid on the face of it? It seems to me that the utmost that can be said is that it is a presumption of fact that they are the same persons. Then, if it be a presumption of fact, it is liable to be rebutted by contrary evidence; and there must be some tribunal before which the fact is to be tried. What right have the respondents to ask to have the recognizance taken off the file, or that they may be relieved from the petition? The recognizance is to my mind valid as a recognizance, but liable to be objected to on the ground that the parties who have entered into it are principles as well as sureties. It seems to me that this objection is one which goes only to the sufficiency of the sureties; and in that view it is an objection which falls expressly within section 8 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. If so, it must equally come within section 9, and then the objection may be removed by making a deposit under that section. This is the view which was taken by my Brother Willes and the other election Judges; and I am of opinion that they were right in so deciding. The consequence is, that a sum of 1,000*l.* having been duly deposited in pursuance of the order, the objection to the recognizance fails, and the petition must be allowed to proceed.

The points which have been argued upon these rules were undoubtedly points of grave difficulty; and it is not without considerable hesitation that I have come to the conclusion I have as to the proper construction of the Act of Parliament. The matters were very properly brought to the attention of the Court; and, under the circumstances, I think justice will substantially be done by discharging the several rules without costs.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary for me to do more than add a very few words. No doubt this Act of Parliament, like many others, is difficult to construe, and it may be that in order to give effect to the Act some liberality must be introduced into the construction of some of its words. But the legislature require us to construe it, however difficult it may be, and to take their general intention, so far as we can gather it from the Act itself, as a guide to conduct us through its dark passages.

The first question is, whether, where there is one petition against more than one member a security for 1,000*l.* is enough, or whether there is to be a security for as many thousand pounds as there are members petitioned against.

Now, as my Lord has already pointed out, the old practice was perfectly clear; and section 26 of the "Parliamentary Petitions Act, 1868," obliges this Court in express terms to adhere to the old practice where no rules have been made superseding it. Then by sub-sections 4 and 5 of section 6 security to the amount of 1,000*l.* is to be given for the payment of expenses, payable to the member whose return is complained of. The word "member" being in the singular number, creates no difficulty, for, by force of the Act, 13 Vict. c. 21. s. 4, we are to read it as member or members, unless the context forbid.

Let us see what we are now asked to do. We are asked (certainly without any express words to warrant it) to do this; namely, wherever there are two members jointly petitioned against, to double the security; wherever there are three, as there are in many counties and in some large towns, to treble the security; and in the case of the city of London to quadruple the security. We certainly ought, I think, to look for some positive enactment to enable us to do this, especially when the number of voters has greatly increased, and when their station in society and their means are such as to make them, when petitioners, less able to give security than voters who were entitled to petition on former occasions. I should require some stronger words than those I find before I came to the conclusion that the legislature has indirectly and by inference doubled, trebled and quadrupled the security which is to be given.

The difficulty, if any, is introduced by section 22, which enacts, that " two or more candidates may be made respondents to the same petition, and their case may for the sake of convenience be tried at the same time, and for all the purposes of the Act such petition shall be deemed to be a separate petition against each respondent." I am not at all sure that the qualification introduced in the last passage of this section does more than enact that when cases are tried together, there may nevertheless be separate judgments, separate costs, separate subpœnas, and the like; but I think it does not apply to the payment or security, which is a condition precedent to the definitive reception and prosecution of the petition. Upon these grounds, I entertain no doubt that 1,000*l*. is a sufficient amount of security in every case.

The next question is a question of much more difficulty, and it is whether there was power to amend the security by allowing the deposit of 1,000*l*. That depends on sections 8 and 9, where the statute says, " it shall be lawful for the respondent where the security is given by recognizance within a further time, not exceeding five days, to object in writing to such recognizance, on the ground that the sureties, or any of them, are insufficient, which objection may be removed by deposit of such a sum of money as will make the security sufficient." Now, the language would have been perhaps more appropriate to this particular case, if the statute had used the word " incompetent " instead of " insufficient." But I think the word " insufficient " is not to be read as limited to the narrow sense of pecuniary insufficiency. For example, infants, married women, foreigners residing abroad would no doubt be deemed insufficient. It is, I think, enough to bring the case within the healing efficacy of the Act, if the sureties are persons who although they ought not to be sureties are persons who have honestly undertaken the full liability of sureties, and are able to fulfil their engagement, especially if, as in this case, the security on the face of it is good, and could not be decided to be bad by the Master without an inquiry. It is true there are here several sureties and several petitioners, the names and surnames of whom are the same, but the question would have been exactly as it is now, if there had been one petitioner and his own name and the name of one of his sureties had been John Smith of a large town. I think in determining this matter we have not only to consider that the security is good on the face of it, but to recollect that these persons who entered into a recognizance, are by the terms of the recognizance mutually sureties for one another. The strict literal sense therefore of the Act of Parliament may be satisfied so far as to authorize the substituted deposit.

But I confess I am very much governed in my decision of this last question by another consideration. We are bound, as I have already said, to carry into effect, if we can, the general intention of the legislature as expressed in the statute, and in so doing to put, if necessary, not a violent but a liberal construction on particular expressions. This is a substantial security. It was intended that these parties should undertake at least the obligation of being sureties; they are of ability to do so, and there was no fraud. At the same time, no doubt, there was an error in what they did, but I think an amendable error.

KEATING, J.—The petition, which was signed by thirteen persons, embraced the two members returned for the borough. The time having gone by for giving security pursuant to section 6 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, the respondents went before a Judge at chambers and asked to have the petition taken off the file, on the ground that no recognizance had been entered into within the meaning of the statute. The ground of objection was that the recognizance was entered into by four of the thirteen petitioners, and so in truth there was no recognizance with sureties, as required by the Act. My Brother Willes refused to make the order as prayed; but, treating the summons as an objection to the sufficiency of the security, held the security to be insufficient, and required a sum of 1,000*l.* to be deposited within five days. The respondents now come and ask the Court to do what the learned Judge refused to do, the contention before us on their part being that there was in effect no security at all, and therefore that the proceedings upon the petition ought to be stayed. If that contention were well founded it would, in my opinion, be the duty of this Court, even at this stage, to stay the proceedings. The main ground urged before us was that section 8 of the statute only provides for objections to the validity of the recognizance on the ground of the pecuniary insufficiency of the sureties; and it was insisted that what is complained of here is not insufficiency within the 8th section, and therefore is not aided by the provision in section 9. I agree that section 9 applies only to the objections specified in section 8; and, supposing this not to be an objection to the recognizance by reason of the insufficiency of the sureties, I think the provision in section 9 would not aid the petitioners in their argument. Now, the respondents contend that there is a total absence of all security here, because the petitioners themselves could not be sureties. We have already in the course of the argument thrown out an intimation of opinion that the petitioners could not be sureties within this Act. But, a security appearing upon the face of it to have been regularly entered into, the question is whether when it is brought to the knowledge of the Court that the persons signing the recognizance are principals, the Court is not bound to hold it to be no security within the Act. I must confess I have entertained considerable doubts, and I cannot say that those doubts are entirely removed. At the same time, I feel the full force of the observations of my Lord and my Brother Byles as to the importance of giving a wide and liberal construction to this Act of Parliament; and therefore I do not press my doubts so far as to dissent from the order made by my Brother Willes.

As to the amount of the security, I agree with my Lord and my Brother Byles that one security for 1,000*l.* is enough. Looking fairly at the words of the Act, and reading them as any person of ordinary understanding would read them, I come to the conclusion that section 6 distinctly provides for one security only of 1,000*l.*, and that no other or greater security is mentioned throughout the Act. The only argument in favour of the contrary construction is the provision in section 22, that two or more candidates may be made respondents to the same petition, but for all the purposes of the Act such petition shall be deemed to be a separate petition against each respondent. The word there used is "candidates"; but, by the interpretation clause, section 3, "candidate" is to be read as any person elected a member, or who has been nominated as or declared himself a candidate at an election. If the legislature had intended to impose the further condition that, where the petitions are to be deemed separate, a separate security for 1,000*l.* should be given on each, it seems extraordinary that they should not express that intention in distinct terms, and not leave it to inference and conjecture. Upon the whole, it seems to me that the giving security is a step that is initiatory in the proceedings on the petition; that a single security for 1,000*l.* is all that the statute requires; and that the 22nd section has no such effect as has been contended for. I agree, therefore, that the rules should be discharged; but, seeing that some difficulty and doubt surround the matter, I think there should be no costs.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—This is an application to the Court to stay the proceedings on this petition; and assuming that the objections to the security do not fall within the grounds of objection mentioned in the 8th section, I think this is the right course to take. It appears to me that the 8th and 9th sections are to be read together, and that the grounds of objection which can be gone into on the 8th may be amended, as the 9th section shews, not by leave of the Court, but by the parties themselves as of a right given to them by the statute.

Digitized by Google

The reason why no power was given in the 8th section to object to the invalidity of the security generally seems to be that the legislature meant to allow an amendment in certain specified cases only. Therefore the legislature specified the grounds of objection which, if made, might be amended, and left open what was to happen if the recognizance should be invalid on other grounds. The statute omits altogether to make provision for what is to be done in a case of that kind. Inasmuch as it is clear, in my opinion, that a valid recognizance is a condition to the right of the petitioner to proceed with his petition, I am of opinion that the course which has been taken here, of applying to the Court to stay the proceedings because there had not been a performance of what the legislature has made a condition to the prosecution of the petition, is right. It seems to me it is consistent with what was done by Parliament itself when it had the control of these petitions within its own walls. There was no power to amend the security at the time when this Act passed, but if the security was objectionable on the ground of invalidity or insufficiency then the order for proceeding with the petition was discharged by the House. I think, if I may be allowed to say so, that the most convenient provisions which have been enacted on this subject are to be found in the temporary Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 18; and if the powers there given to the select committee appointed to try election petitions were now entrusted to the election Judges or to the master, it seems to me that full security might be given to the sitting members, and petitioners would be secured from danger arising from mistakes perhaps beyond their control and which did not result from any default on their part. Such being in my view the construction of the Act with regard to procedure, it is now to be considered whether the two objections which have been made to this security are good objections, and whether, if good, the security can be amended.

Now, with regard to the first objection, viz., that this security is for a sum of 1,000*l.* only, the petition being against two members, I entirely agree with the rest of the Court that on the proper construction of this Act of Parliament the sum of 1,000*l.* is sufficient. No difficulty whatever would have arisen if clause 22 had not been inserted in the Act. The old practice was that a petition might be presented against two members, and in that case one security to the amount of 1,000*l.* was sufficient. The legislature in passing this Act of Parliament has provided that there shall be still the sum of 1,000*l.* given by the petitioner as security, and though I have looked through every clause in the Act in which anything is enacted on the subject of security, I find no trace whatever of any indication on the part of the legislature to alter its old practice in that respect, or to impose greater impediments in the way of petitioning than existed before. Certainly when the practice of parliament has existed so long, it must have been very well known that one security had always been deemed sufficient in the case of one petition against two members, and if the legislature had intended to alter that state of things, I should have expected it would have so in distinct terms. The whole question turns on the insertion of the 22nd clause, which, no doubt, is in very wide terms, but it is plain that those terms must have some limitation, otherwise there seems no object in making the provision at all, that there may be one petition against two members, for if everything was to be in duplicate, nothing would be saved except the paper on which the petition was written. It seems to me that the Act, in saying that the petition may be against two, and the trial may be against both at the same time as one proceeding, if convenient, but providing that for all purposes it shall be deemed separate against the two members, meant, as my Lord has put it, for all purposes under the petition, but was not meant to apply to the condition as to security imposed on the petitioner. The security under the former Acts was a condition precedent to the presentation of the petition. Here, no doubt, it is made a condition subsequent, but it is still a condition to the prosecution of the petition, and is collateral to the petition itself. On these grounds, and for the reasons already given by the other members of the Court, I think we should be putting a construction on this Act which the legislature did not intend if we imposed a larger obligation on the petitioners than that which existed before.

Digitized by Google

The other objection is certainly, to my mind, more formidable. The Act requires that the security shall be by a deposit of 1,000*l.*, or a recognizance entered into by sureties. I confess that I have felt during the argument, and that I still entertain, considerable doubt whether the recognizance here was a recognizance at all within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and whether the objection does not go to its validity altogether, and not to its sufficiency. However, as my Lord and my Brother Byles, and the election Judges who have considered it, have come to a clear opinion that the objection is one as to the sufficiency only, and is amendable, I have hesitation in arriving at a conclusion different from theirs, though I confess I cannot see my way to agree with them, or to comprehend how a principal can in any sense be deemed a surety for himself. After all, the matter is one of practice only, as to which certainty is of the essence of benefit, and as there is no appeal from this Court, and my Brother Keating does not dissent, I also do not wish to dissent from the judgment of the rest of the Court upon this point. The result is that these rules will be discharged.

Rules discharged.

Error from a decision of the Court of Common Pleas (reported 37 L. J. C.P. 281), on a special case, the material facts in which are fully stated in the report of the case in the Court below.

The plaintiffs were the Metropolitan Board of Works, in whom the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. cxx.), vested, inter alia, the Fleet Sewer, part of which had been constructed in 1855 by the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers under the powers given them by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112.

The defendants were authorized by their Act, the Metropolitan Railway Act, 1851 (17 & 18 Vict. c. ccxxi.), to construct a railway, a portion of which was parallel to the line of the said sewer, and for the purpose of constructing such portion of their railway they caused an excavation to be made on lands which they had purchased under their Act. This excavation was about 16 feet below the bottom of the said sewer, and at about a distance of 15 feet from the brickwork of the same. Both the sewer and the works of the railway company were properly made and constructed; and the works of the excavation would have been sufficient for the support of the adjacent soil in its natural position, but were not sufficient to support it with the sewer. The result was, that the part of the sewer which had been so constructed by the Commissioners in 1855 burst; and the question was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to compensation from the defendants for this injury to the sewer, the amount of which had been ascertained by an arbitrator appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to be 18,000*l*.

The majority of the Court below (Bovill, C.J., Byles, J., and Montague Smith, J.) decided that the plaintiffs had no right to compensation, on the ground that they had no right to lateral support for the sewer from the adjacent land of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed from this decision.

Sir J. Karslake (Raymond with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question in this case turns mainly on the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, under which that part of the sewer was constructed which was damaged by reason of the defendants' works, and it is submitted that the right to have such support from the adjacent land as was necessary for the sewer was impliedly given by that statute. A claim for compensation for this might have been made by the owner of such adjacent land; but it is submitted on the part of the plaintiffs that the payment in such compensation was not a condition precedent to the acquisition of the right to such support. The Act made it obligatory upon the Commissioners of Sewers (who are now represented by the plaintiffs) to make this sewer, and therefore the Act gave them a right to make it, with a right to lateral support from the adjacent land. The 7th section vests the sewers then made and all sewers which they should thereafter make within certain limits in the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers; the 37th section subjects all sewers to their control; and the 38th section shews their duty. They are directed by that section to repair the sewers vested in them, and to cause to be made such sewers as shall be necessary, and they are thereby authorized "to carry any such sewers through, across or under any turnpike-roads or any street or place laid out as or intended for a street, or through or under any cellar or vault the report of the surveyor it should appear to be necessary) into, through or under any lands whatsoever, making compensation for any damage done thereby as hereinafter provided." Then section 54 shews what the legislature intended and required for the protection of the sewer even as against adjoining landowners. "No building," it says, "shall be erected in, over or under any sewer vested in the Commissioners without the consent of the Commissioners first obtained in writing; and all vaults and cellars adjoining their sewers shall be substantially made, and so as not to interfere or communicate with any such sewers"; and if any building or vault is so made it may be pulled down, and the charges of doing so are thrown upon the landowner who has made it. The 6th section, which relates to the power of purchasing lands or easements, shews that the Commissioners can only purchase by agreement "any land which may be necessary for the formation or protection of any works" which they are authorized to make, or "any land or any right or easement in or over any land which it may be necessary or expedient to purchase to prevent the obstruction of sewerage or drainage within the limits of the commission." By the 67th section, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, except the provisions with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, is incorporated with the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. The 69th section provides for making compensation. It says, "Full compensation shall be made out of such rates to be levied under this Act as the Commissioners shall by their decree direct to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act." This is the provision for making compensation which is referred to in section 38 by the words "hereinafter provided." The result is, the Act has directed the Commissioners to make sewers, and for that purpose has authorized them to go under any land or through any cellar or vault, making compensation, which is to be a full compensation, for any damage done thereby, but not empowering the Commissioners to purchase any land or easement unless they can agree with the landowner for such purchase.

[KELLY, C.B.—The question is not whether the Commissioners are to make compensation for damage done, but whether they are entitled to support for their sewer from the adjoining lands, and so prevent the landowner from using his land as he would by law be otherwise entitled to do, and that without the purchase of such support.]

Not without making compensation. But the making the compensation is not a condition precedent to acquiring the right to the support. If the landowner granted to the Commissioners a right to make a sewer over his land he would have granted not only the right to make the sewer, but also all such easements as would be necessary to keep the sewer up—The Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot (2 Macq. H.L. C. 449). It is submitted that the same right is impliedly conferred in like manner by the statute. The making of sewers is a work for the public benefit, and as to the execution of which the Commissioners have no option, and the statute therefore is different from one in favour of a railway or other private company where the work is done for the benefit of the shareholders, and where the statute therefore generally requires the compensation to be made before the right is given to enter and take the land required for the company. Now, it is manifest that a sewer must rest on something; it cannot be supported except the bottom of the invert rest upon the soil itself. Then, is it to be contended that because the Commissioners have not bought the land under the sewer, which they had no power to buy except by agreement, therefore the sewer is not to be supported by such subjacent soil, but that the landowner may dig under it and let the sewer down, and for this purpose there really is no difference between "subjacent" and "adjacent" land? It is submitted that the work having been done in performance of the duty imposed by the Act there was a right to have the support both of the subjacent and adjacent land, and that though the landowner might have a right of compensation he would have no right to break down the sewer.

[MELLOR, J.—Is it reasonable to suppose that the words in section 38, "making compensation for any damage done," mean compensation in respect of a servitude imposed on the adjoining land?]

Yes, it is submitted that they do. Section 69, with which section 38 must be read, says the compensation is to be to "all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the Act." There is no obligation to make the compensation in the first instance. The case of Pettiward v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 489; 34 L. J. C.P. 301) is an authority to shew that it may be claimed long afterwards, and when the damage has become apparent.

[MELLOR, J.—If your construction of the statute be right, what is the value of section 54? Why should there be a special provision as to building over or under any sewer?]

Because the land not being vested in the Commissioners, the landowner would have a right to build over or under the sewer. Then, if the Commissioners had, as contended, a right to the support of the adjacent land, that right was not taken away by section 104 of the Metropolitan Railway Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. ccxxi.). With reference to the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), the 135th section vests the main sewers, of which this sewer was one, and the rights of the Commissioners, in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and, no doubt, by sections 150, 151, and 152, the Board has compulsory power to purchase easements and land; but the Act does not make it compulsory on the Board to use that power. If the plaintiffs have established that there was such right of support impliedly granted by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, then, what has been done by the defendants has been an interference with a statutable right, and the plaintiffs are entitled under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to claim compensation.

The Solicitor-General (Horace Lloyd with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiffs have no such right as they claim, either at common law or by statute. The defendants constructed their railway through the land adjacent to the sewer in question in execution of the powers of their Act, and without any negligence. That is found by the case; and the sewer not being twenty years old, it is clear there can be no common law liability. Then, what statutable right have the plaintiffs to the power they claim of preventing the defendants from using their land in the way they have used it? No express enactment has been pointed out; but the plaintiffs say that the statute of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, gave power to construct a sewer in the proper way, and that if they did so construct the sewer, it followed by necessary implication that a statutory power was conferred of inflicting upon the neighbouring land, and that, too, without payment. whatever burden was necessary for sustaining the sewer. This is a fallacious argument; the sewer need not be subterranean, and there is nothing to shew that at the time of its construction there was any necessity for this lateral support. It cannot be that in the absence of any direct enactment to that effect, the Commissioners had a right to construct their sewer anyhow, so as to impose an indefinite amount of responsibility upon the landowner for which they made no compensation. This is not a damage within section 38 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, and for which the owner of the land could have recovered compensation. The damage done, to be within that section, must be damage actually done to the land through which the sewer is constructed. Then, further, the damage in this case could not be the subject-matter of compensation, for no one can recover compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for doing anything for which an action would not lie but for the statute which authorized its being done. What action would lie at the suit of the adjacent landowner for the supposed inferior value of his land by the servitude imposed thereon by the construction of this sewer? The case of Pettiward v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 489; 34 L. J. C.P. 301) does not apply. No doubt, where there is a damage compensation for it may be claimed at any time afterwards, provided it be claimed as soon as it has been ascertained that there is a damage, but here there was no damage for which an action would have lain. Then, can it be said that the legislature intended to confer the power of inflicting such a servitude as is here claimed without compensation? It may be, as has been contended, that when the sewer was constructed the Commissioners had no power to purchase otherwise than by agreement; but the fact that it was necessary that express power to purchase easements over land should be given by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, sections 150 and 151, is a strong argument to shew that such a servitude could not be inflicted without buying it. The servitude claimed not being a common law right can only be acquired under statute, and the fact of the last Act giving in express terms the power of purchasing such easement as might be necessary for the support of any sewer, is the strongest possible argument to shew that the previous statute did not convey that easement even by implication. By what necessary intendment can such an easement as this be said to be acquired? It has been attempted to assimilate the case to where a man who sells land to a railway company is deemed to impose a burden on his land contiguous to the railway, that such land should not be used so as to let the railway down. That rests upon a settled principle of law that a man shall not derogate from his own grant. That cannot apply here, where, by passing through land of one person, the owner of adjoining land is sought, without compensation or a right of action, to have imposed on him for all time a limitation in the use of his property.

[CLEASBY, B.—Section 145 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112 gives the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers all the rights of the Commissioners of Sewers under the statute 23 Hen. 8. c. 5, except so far as the Act of Victoria varies them. If a sewer had been constructed under a commission issued under the statute of Hen. 8., could an adjoining landowner have done anything which directly and immediately would have had the effect of damaging and destroying the sewer?]

If it gave any such right as the plaintiffs claim, one would expect to see some allusion to it in the Act of Victoria. Unless there was something to shew that the common law rights of the subject were interfered with by direct words it is apprehended such rights would remain.

Sir J. Karslake, in reply, cited The North London Railway Company v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (Johns. 405; 28 L. J. Ch. 909).

KELLY, C.B.—We are of opinion in this case that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. A claim is made to a large sum of money in respect of damage done to a sewer, of which the plaintiffs are to be deemed in point of law proprietors, by the defendants having dug into land not contiguous, but near to the sewer, and so causing the sewer to burst; and also for the costs of an arbitration by which the amount of damage was determined. The question which arises on the case is, whether the defendants have done an illegal act. Now, what is it that the defendants have done? They are seised in fee simple of a quantity of land near to the plaintiffs' sewer, within which land they have constructed a railway; and they found it necessary in the course of their works to excavate to a depth exceeding by 16 feet the bottom of the sewer; and it was by this excavation that the support of the sewer was taken away and the damage to it occasioned. It cannot be denied that the defendants in thus excavating were only availing themselves of one of the original rights attached to the ownership of their property, and that if the plaintiffs can complain of it, it must be because they have in some way entitled themselves to such lateral support as may be necessary for the safety of the sewer. The plaintiffs are a public body not acting for their own profit, but appointed for great and important purposes, and have succeeded under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. to all the rights of the Commissioners of Sewers, who were also a public body, and by whom this sewer was constructed under the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. The question immediately arises, whether by those statutes, or what has been done under them, the plaintiffs have acquired a right to lateral support for the sewer. The right they claim is an easement, and, as such, might be acquired either by the provisions of an Act of Parliament or by means of the sale and conveyance of the right by the owners of the adjoining land. The plaintiffs contend that in this case it has been conferred upon them by the provisions of the above-mentioned Acts of Parliament, and that the sewer having been properly made, the right at once arose and became vested in the Commissioners of Sewers, in whose place they stand. If the Act of Parliament (11 & 12 Vict. c. 112.) really intended that the plaintiffs should have such a right, one would have expected to find the usual provisions, viz., that the board might construct the works; but that, if they did any injury, they should make compensation for it; and if they required any land or easement, they should have power to purchase it. We find, however, no such provisions. The most important sections are the 38th and the 66th. The first gives power to make sewers "into, through and under any lands," and directs that compensation should be made to their owners, but gives no power to purchase the lands, or to make compensation to any one except those "into, through and under" whose lands the sewer is made. The section appears to have no reference to the owners of neighbouring lands, such as the defendants. When we come to section 66 we find that it is wider in its terms, and contemplates that it may be desirable to take lands near to the sewer, and it therefore provides that "it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to purchase by agreement, or to take on lease on such terms as they may think fit, any land which may be necessary for the formation or construction of any works which the Commissioners are authorized to execute under this Act," which implies that the plaintiffs may from time to time acquire neighbouring lands for the protection of the sewer. The Act, however, only authorizes them to acquire these lands by agreement. In a later Act, passed shortly after the making of the sewer now in question, they are authorized to take compulsorily any land or easement that they may require, which confirms the view we take of the case, that the legislature contemplated that if any land or easement should be required, it should become the property of the board, not by force of the Act without compensation, but under the first Act by voluntary agreement, and by the last, by compulsory purchase. It was argued for the plaintiffs that, since no compulsory powers for the purchase of any land or easement are given by the earlier Acts, that if such an easement was absolutely necessary, the easement must be considered to have been conferred upon them at once without any purchase, or any payment or compensation for its value. It is enough to say that we find nothing in the Act of Parliament to warrant such a conclusion, and that we cannot interpolate such provisions in the Act, especially where it is expressly provided that such easement may be purchased by agreement. Looking at the date of the Acts, it may well have been thought that at that time there would be no difficulty in obtaining the necessary land and easements, and, in fact, for very many years the powers that were given proved to be sufficient. It is only when so unexpected a work has been accomplished as the construction of underground railways throughout the metropolis that the existence of these sewers has proved to be endangered, and we find accordingly that in the later Act, which was passed after these underground works were begun, or at least contemplated, express power is given for the compulsory purchase of an easement such as that now in question, for the protection of the sewer. But it is said that although it can hardly be supposed the legislature would have given such a right without some compensation to the persons whose land is subjected to the easement, the making of the sewer would in itself amount to a damage to the adjacent owner over whose lands the easement was claimed, and that he would therefore be entitled to compensation under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112. s. 38. The right to lateral support, though usually of small value, is sometimes of great price, as in the case where there are mines under the land for which the easement is claimed, or where a railway is intended to be made through it, as in the present case; and, in fact, if the plaintiffs had such a right as they claim, they might have obtained an injunction to prevent the railway, on which such vast sums had been expended, being completed so as to interfere with their sewer. It is to meet the difficulty arising from these considerations that the plaintiffs have endeavoured to shew that the defendants were entitled to compensation for the making of the sewer. What damage, however, resulted to the defendants' predecessors when the sewer was made? The land was not damaged, and the easement upon it of the right to lateral support was a mere speculative possibility, unforeseen and unthought of. There seems no ground therefore for saying that there could have been a claim for compensation by the defendants of their predecessors for the making of the sewer. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that no right to lateral support was acquired by the mere construction of the sewer under the Act, but that such a right can be acquired only by purchase. Two cases have been cited for the plaintiffs. The case of Pettiward v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 489; 34 L. J. C.P. 301) is said to have decided that the obtaining a right to lateral support by the construction of a sewer is a damage to the owner of the land over which the easement is claimed. The case, however, really only decides that a person may seek and recover the damage caused to him by the construction of the sewer, whenever he actually sustains it. The nature of the damage in that case, when it is looked at, appears to have been that a sewer had been constructed in, under and through the lands of the plaintiff's predecessors, and that the plaintiff had been prevented thereby from building certain houses in the way he had planned. The other case, The North London Railway Company v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (Johns. 405; 28 L. J. Ch. 909), goes only to shew that before an easement can be acquired by a public body they must have either the authority of an Act of Parliament or an agreement with its owner. The result therefore of the whole case is, that the plaintiffs have no such right to lateral support for their sewer as they claim, and the defendants are entitled to our judgment, and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas must be affirmed.

CHANNELL, B., PIGOTT, B., MELLOR, J., and HANNEN, J., concurred.

CLEASBY, B.—I ought to say that I still retain the doubt expressed by me during the argument, whether where works have been constructed, as in this case, by a body acting with all the powers originally given by an Act of 23 Hen. 8. c. 5, and continued by various subsequent Acts, a right to lateral support ought not to be considered as conferred by those Acts. Otherwise, I should expect to find clauses enabling the Commissioners compulsorily to acquire so essential a right. The consequence would be that after a work of great national importance, a sea-wall for instance, had been constructed under those Acts, protecting a large area of country, an adjoining landowner might dig down any depth below its foundations, and on the water rising the wall would give way and the country be flooded. The idea in my mind is, that as there is a right conferred to have the sewer, so there is conferred along with it a right to the under-support and the lateral support, by a liberal application of the maxim that when anything is granted, whatever is essential to the enjoyment of it is, if it can be, granted also. But as this view, though adverted to by me, was not insisted upon in the argument, or noticed in the Court below, it is most probable that I am mistaken in it.

Judgment affirmed.

Marine Insurance—Damage from Delay.

MARINE INSURANCE. D.—Meat was shipped at Hamburg for London, and was insured against perils of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people, of what nation, condition or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment or damage of the said goods. The voyage was much prolonged by storms. The meat was in no way affected by the sea water or such storms, but owing to the length of time to which the voyage was protracted and delayed by the weather, became putrid, and was necessarily thrown overboard:—Held, that the insurer was not liable.

This was a special case, and the question was, whether an insurer under a marine policy of insurance was liable for the loss of certain meat thereby insured. The following are the only material facts: The meat was insured from Hamburg to London, and the only material words of the policy were; "Valued at 5,000*l.*, on dead meat on deck or below; including all risk of washing overboard or jettison; average payable on each shipment separately, or on the whole, on all interest shipped by Holtzay, of Hamburg. Touching the adventures and perils which we the assured are contented to bear and do take upon us in this voyage, they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes and people, of what nation, condition or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof." The voyage was greatly delayed and prolonged by storms, particularized in the case, which, however, stated that the said meat was in no way affected or injured by the sea or sea water, or by the storms or tempest, but that it was discovered that the said meat, owing to the length of time to which the voyage was protracted and delayed by the weather, had become putrid, and was necessarily thrown overboard at sea.

Sir G. Honyman, for the defendant, was not called on.

KEATING, J.—There is no doubt that the proximate cause of damage was the delay in the voyage, and there is equally no doubt that such delay was caused by the perils of the seas; but no case has gone to the length of saying, though the duration of the voyage has been prolonged by perils of the sea, that the assured is entitled to recover on such a policy as the present, and we should establish a dangerous precedent if we held otherwise.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The loss arose from the goods perishing by reason of delay in the voyage, and therefore is not within the perils mentioned in the policy. To bring a loss within such a policy the loss must be due proximately to those perils which are therein enumerated, and delay is not one of them. The goods in the present case were not injured by sea water, or by being knocked about by the storm, for it is stated that the loss arose solely from the length of time to which the voyage was protracted by the weather. If they had been so injured the case would be within Laurence v. Aberdein (5 B. & Ald. 107); but if we held that delay by bad weather or other perils assured against was within a policy in the present form we should open a door to claims not intended to be within it, and it has never been held that such a claim is within a policy so framed. I am therefore of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

BRETT, J.—Damage to goods by delay, even if the delay is caused by tempest, is not a loss by the perils assured against; in no case has it been held that it is; and if the parties so intended they could easily put it in the policy. Judgment therefore should be for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

Parliament—Referring Case back to Revising Barrister—Costs.

ELECTION LAW. A.—Where the Court sends a case back to the Revising Barrister to decide a matter of fact which he has referred to the decision of the Court instead of deciding it himself, and the appellant then drops the appeal, the respondent is not entitled to costs.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the city of Gloucester.

The question was whether or not the canons of the Cathedral Church of Gloucester were liable to pay poor-rates for the houses (in the cathedral close) in respect of which they claimed the right of voting. On the case coming on for argument, it appeared that in truth the question turned on whether or not the cathedral close was extra-parochial, and that the Revising Barrister, instead of deciding this, had simply decided that the claimants had not paid all the poor-rates, and disallowed their claims, but submitted the correctness of his decision to the Court, the decision to be obtained on the facts and merits of the case. The Court refused to decide the question of fact, and referred the matter back to the Revising Barrister. The appellant then dropped the appeal, and the respondent now applied that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

J. J. Powell, for the respondent.

Dowdeswell (Gilmore Evans with him), for the appellant.

BOVILL, C.J.—We[1] are all of opinion that the respondent is not entitled to costs. Even if both parties agreed to refer this question to the Court, the refusal to decide it is the act of the Court. The appellant only appealed on the case as it stood, and all the costs arise from the Revising Barrister trying to get this Court to decide on the facts.

Appeal dismissed, without costs.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The qualification required for a borough franchise, under the Representation of the People Act, 1867, must be complete by July 31 of the qualifying year. Therefore, a person claiming such franchise as a rated inhabitant occupier, but who had never been rated to any of the poor-rates which had been made during the twelve months previous to July 31 of the qualifying year, cannot rely on a claim to be rated made under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30, which was not served on the overseers until after such July 31.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Horsham.

The case stated that the respondent claimed to have his name inserted in the lists of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough of Horsham, in respect of the occupation by him of a house, No. 9, Park Terrace West, in the parish of Horsham, and within the said borough.

There is only one parish within the said borough, namely, the parish of Horsham; and the name of the said respondent having been omitted by the overseers of the said parish from the list made and published by them of the persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough, he proved the service on the said overseers on August 4, 1868, of a claim to have his name inserted in such list in respect of the occupation of the said house.

The appellant, who was on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the said borough, duly objected to the name of the said respondent being inserted in the said list. The said respondent had never been rated in respect of the said house, but he paid all rates due in respect of the said house up to January 5, 1868, prior to July 20 following. On August 24, 1868, the respondent served on the said overseers of the said parish of Horsham a claim to be rated in respect of the said house, and which claim was in the following form:

"Claim to be rated.

"To the Overseers of the Parish of Horsham.—I hereby give you notice that I claim to be rated to all rates made by you for the relief of the poor since the 31st day of July, 1867, in respect of a house situate in Park Terrace West, and numbered 9, in the parish of Horsham, in my occupation; and I hereby tender payment of the full amount of all rates made previously to the 5th day of January last and now due, if any. Dated this 24th day of August, 1868."

This notice was duly signed by the said respondent. At the time of the service on the said overseers of the said notice of claim to be rated, there was only one poor-rate in force within the said borough, and which was made on January 15, 1868. It was contended, on behalf of the said appellant, that the said claim to be rated, served by the respondent on the overseers on August 24, 1868, was invalid and insufficient. That the said claimant was bound to prove that he was entitled to vote on July 31, 1868, and that a claim to be rated, dated and served subsequently to the said July 31, was too late and invalid, and did not entitle the said claimant to have his name inserted in the said list. The Revising Barrister thought the said claim to be rated was too late and invalid; but the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland having decided in two cases, Agnew v. Reilly (2 Ir. L. R. 560) and Muldowney v. Malcolmson (15 Ir. L. R. 375), under provisions contained in the Irish Reform Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 69. ss. 55, 110.) similar to those contained in the English Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30), that a claim to be rated, dated and served in August, was sufficient and valid, and related back to the previous July 20, and also had relation back to the time the rate was made, the Revising Barrister held the said claim to be valid. The respondent, having, in other respects, proved his title to vote, the Revising Barrister inserted his name in the list of persons entitled to vote for a member for the said borough.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the said claim to be rated, dated and served by the respondent on the overseers on August 24, 1868, was valid, and sufficient to entitle the respondent to have his name inserted in the said list of voters.

Keane (Lumley Smith with him), for the appellant.—The demand to be rated made under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30. only applies to the rate for the time being, which, according to Bushell v. Luckett (2 Com. B. Rep. 111; 15 L. J. C.P. 89), means the then existing rate; and that, in the present case, was the rate made on January 15. The demand, however, was made after the qualifying period, viz., the year ending July 31, had elapsed, and therefore was made too late. It is said that it had relation back to the time when the rate was made by force of section 30 of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45; and reliance is placed on the Irish cases of Agnew v. Reilly (2 Ir. L. R. 560) and Muldowney v. Malcolmson (15 Ir. L. R. 375). Those cases were decided on the Irish Reform Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 69. ss. 55, 110. The 110th section is analogous to section 30 of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45; but there is some difference in the language between the two sections. In the Irish Act, in case the guardians neglect to insert the name in the rate after the claim has been made, he is to "be deemed to have been rated in respect of such premises in the rate in respect of which he shall have claimed to be rated"; but in the English Act it is to be "from the period at which the rate shall have been made." Malcolmson's case (15 Ir. L. R. 375) was only a decision on the authority of Reilly's case (2 Ir. L. R. 560), Fitzgerald, J., saying, "If that case be rightly decided—and I am not prepared to say it is not—it seems to me to rule this." The effect of those Irish cases no doubt is, that the claim is to have relation back to the time when the rate was made, and that the claimant is to be deemed to be rated from that time. That this can be the case when the claim is made after the qualifying period, is directly opposed to the late decision of this Court in Ainsworth v. Creeke (38 L. J. C.P. 58).

[Bovill, C.J.—Our decision in that case is not inconsistent with the Irish cases, because there the claim was made on the day of revision by the Revising Barrister; whereas, in the last of the Irish cases, it was considered that it ought to be made before the holding of the revising sessions; but I agree that the reasons which we gave for our decision in Ainsworth v. Creek (38 L. J. C.P. 58) are directly opposed to those in the Irish cases, unless there be any material difference between the English and Irish Acts.]

Mohahan, C.J., says, in Reilly's case (2 Ir. L. R. 560), that the Barrister has not any right to inquire when the applicant was put on the rate, if the claim had been complied with by the guardians; that is opposed to what Erle, J., said in Pariente v. Luckett (1 Lutw. 446).

[Bovill, C.J.—That does not apply here. If the claimant is put on the rate, it is by force of the Act of Parliament.]

It is submitted that everything must be done within the qualifying year. It is too late afterwards.

Pickering, for the respondent.—The case of Ainsworth v. Creeke (38 L. J. C.P. 58) does not affect this case. There a ratification was relied on as made at the Revising Barrister's Court, which was clearly too late. Here the respondent had paid all the rates due to January 5, which was all he was required to pay by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14. s. 1. in order to be qualified; and he finds afterwards that his name has been omitted from the poor-rate, having been lulled into believing that he was rated from the fact of paying the rates. The 30th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. was intended to meet such a case by enabling him to claim to be rated, and thereupon the overseers are to put him "upon the rate for the time being"; and in case of their neglect to do so, he is to "be deemed to have been rated to the relief of the poor" in respect of the premises "from the period at which rate shall have been made in respect of which he shall have so claimed to be rated."

[Bovill, C.J.—The point raised here is, whether the claim was made in time.]

It was not intended that the overseers should have the power of disqualifying a voter, and therefore section 30 makes the position of the voter the same as it would have been if the overseers had done their duty.

Digitized by Google

[BRETT, J.—But how do you deal with section 3 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, which makes it necessary that the qualification should be perfect by July 31?]

It is submitted that by force of section 30 of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. he is to be deemed to be so qualified by July 31. The reasons of the Judges in the Irish cases on this point are, it is submitted, unanswerable. If the voter is to be unable on August 24, to make the claim to be rated so as to give him the benefit of the 30th section, when can he do so? On August 1, when the list is published, he finds his name has been omitted. Is he to make the claim on August 2? He naturally takes the day when the other claims are sent in, and makes his claim therefore before August 25. By section 16 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. power is given to voters and persons claiming to vote to inspect the poor-rate book, but that is only during certain hours between August 10 and 31, so that that power will be useless if the claim cannot be made after July 31 in time to qualify the claimant.

Keane replied. Cur. adv. vult.

BOVILL, C.J. (on Jan. 18) delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case, which was argued last term, before my Brothers Byles, Keating, and Brett and myself, the claimant, Henry Russell Streeter, claimed to vote as the rated occupier of a dwelling-house in the borough of Horsham. The claimant had not been rated at all in respect of the house in question; but had at some time before July 20, 1868, paid to the overseers all rates which would have been due previous to January 5, 1868, in respect of the said house. After January 5, namely, on January 15, a rate had been duly made in the borough, but in it the claimant was not rated. On August 24, 1868, the claimant finding that his name was not in that rate, and never having previously claimed to be put upon that rate, served on the overseer a claim to be rated to all rates made since July 31, 1867, and in such claim stated that he tendered payment of all rates due prior to January 5, 1868. On these facts the Revising Barrister, contrary to his own opinion, but in deference to two cases decided in Ireland, held that the claimant was entitled to vote, and inserted his name on the register of voters. It was contended before us, on behalf of the appellant, that the claimant was not duly qualified as a voter on July 31, 1868, because he had not then been rated to all rates made since the previous July 31, nor had then done anything declared to be equivalent to having been so rated, and that nothing done after July 31, 1868, could obviate the objection that he was not qualified on that day. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the claim and tender of August 24 had relation back to the time of the making of any rate to which such claim applied, and put the claimant in the present case in the same position as if he had been rated on January 15, 1868, in the rate then made and published. The solution of the question thus raised depends upon the construction of the various enactments regarding the qualification and registration of voters. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, "Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, &c., who (among other things) is on the last day of July in any year, and has during the whole of the preceding twelve calendar months, been an inhabitant occupier, &c., and has during the time of such occupation been rated, &c., to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor," &c. By statute 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, "No occupier shall be registered unless he shall have occupied such premises as aforesaid for twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in such year, nor unless such person, &c., shall have been rated in respect of such premises to all rates, &c., made during the time of such his occupation," &c. The collocation of phrases is different, but reading the later by the former statute it seems that the true meaning of the later enactment is, that no man shall be registered unless he has been rated to all rates made during the twelve months previous to July 31 of the qualifying year. The claimant has not been so rated, and therefore primâ facie was not otherwise relating to the representation of the people in England and Wales, and the registration of persons entitled to vote, shall remain in full force and shall apply as nearly as circumstances admit," &c.; and by section 59, "This Act, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, shall be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people and with the Registration Acts," &c., and therefore it is necessary to consider whether the claimant, although he has not been rated, may not have done something which is equivalent for the purposes of qualification and registration to his having been rated. By 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 30, "It shall be lawful for any person occupying, &c., to claim to be rated, &c., whether the landlord shall or shall not be liable to be rated to the relief of the poor in respect thereof, and upon such occupier so claiming and actually paying or tendering the full amount of the rate or rates, if any, then due, &c., the overseers, &c., are hereby required to put the name of such occupier upon the rate for the time being, and in case such overseers shall neglect or refuse so to do (i.e., to put his name on the rate for the time being) such occupier shall nevertheless for the purposes of this Act be deemed to have been rated, &c., from the period at which the rate shall have been made in respect of which he shall have so claimed to be rated as aforesaid" (i.e., the rate for the time being). This seems to refer to a claim made at all events during the time the rate is current. This claim cannot effectually be made in respect of a previous rate after a subsequent rate is made and published. This interpretation was acceded to by Maule, J., in Bushell v. Luckett (2 Com. B. Rep. 111; 15 L. J. C.P. 89). By the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14. s. 1, "No person so claiming to be rated and paying or tendering on or before the 20th of July in each year, the full amount of the rate or rates (if any) due in respect of such premises on the 5th of January preceding shall be required to make any further claim in regard to any future rate, &c., but shall be entitled to be put on the list and to be registered as a voter," &c. This enactment, made by way of amendment to that last cited, applies to any claim, properly made before July 20, to be rated to all rates made before such claim, and accompanied by payment or tender before July 20 of all rates due on the previous January 5. The required payment or tender is only in respect of rates due on or before January 5; but the enactment does not dispense with a rating or a valid claim to be rated in respect not only of the rates made before, but also of those made after January 5, and before the claim or before July 20. It does not dispense with the necessity of the claim, in order to make it valid, being made in respect of a rate current at the time, and does not refer to a claim made after July 20. Neither of these provisions, in terms at all events, enables a claimant, by claiming after July 31, to be rated in respect of a rate made previous to July 31, to maintain that he was on July 31 qualified to vote by reason of having then been rated to all rates made during the previous year. These sections do not aid the contention of the respondent, or do away with the primâ facie disability arising upon the 3rd section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. If we look to the Registration Acts, the necessity of the qualification being complete on July 31 seems to be even more fully made out. The only jurisdiction or power which the Revising Barrister can properly exercise is that which is given to him by the statutes under and by which his office is created. By 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 7, the objection given, which is to be answered by the claimant, is, that every person upon the register for the time being for any county may object to any other person upon any list of voters for such county, as not having been entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted. &c. By section 15 the persons who may claim in boroughs as having been improperly omitted by the overseers are those who can and shall claim as having been entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have their names inserted, &c. This seems further to shew that under section 14 the persons whose names the overseers ought to insert are those who would be entitled on July 31. By section 17 the power to object in boroughs is to any person as not having been entitled on the last day of July next preceding to have his name inserted, &c. By section 37 the Revising Barrister has power to insert in any county list the name of any person who has claimed in case it shall be proved that he was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to be inserted, &c. By section 38 the same limitation to the power of the Revising Barrister is imposed in boroughs. And by section 40, the section on which the action of the Revising Barrister mainly depends, it is expressly enacted that when any person shall have been objected to by the overseer, or by any other person, &c., such barrister shall then require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted, &c., and in case the same shall not be proved to the satisfaction of such barrister, or in case it shall be proved that such person was then incapacitated by any law or statute from voting in the election, &c., such barrister shall expunge the name of every such person from the said lists, &c. It would surely require very specific words elsewhere to override the force of these specific enactments, and to authorize the Court to say that, although on July 31 the claimant would not have been entitled, yet by reason of something done by him after July 31 he is entitled, and that the Revising Barrister should not require it to be proved that the claimant was entitled on July 31; and even though it should be proved that he was not entitled on July 31, should insert his name in or refuse to expunge it from the register of voters. The case of Powell v. Bradley (34 L. J. C.P. 67) seems to shew that for some purposes at least July 31 is the day on which the qualification must be complete. It has, however, been argued that if the construction contended for by the appellant be adopted, no practical effect can be given to section 16 of 6 Vict. c. 18, and the power therein given to inspect the rate-book is futile. It would seem, however, that such power of inspection, even in an extreme case, might be useful for the purpose of seeing what the overseer has done or omitted, even though a claim has previously been made, and for thus guiding a claimant as to the amount of evidence which will be required from him before the Revising Barrister. This argument seems hardly sufficient to overrule the express enactments above referred to. Convenience and safety seem to point to the same conclusion as that to be deduced from the words of the statutes. If that which it is asserted may be done after July 31 may be then legally done, there seems nothing to prevent its being done even before the Revising Barrister in Court, and we have already substantially decided in the case of Ainsworth v. Creeke (38 L. J. C.P. 58) that a claim at that time would be too late. It seems to us that the true construction of the English statutes and convenience and safety alike require that the qualification must be complete on July 31. We are, however, met by authority to which we shall ever feel inclined and bound to pay the highest respect, the authority of the Irish Judges in the cases of Agnew v. Reilly (2 Ir. L. R. 560) and Muldowney v. Malcolmson (15 Ir. L. R. 375). We have carefully and anxiously considered those cases, as well as the statutes 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, on which is founded the administration of the poor laws in Ireland, and the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 69. on which the qualification and registration of voters in Ireland depend. We are bound to confess that there is so much similarity between many of the enactments in the English Registration Acts and the last-mentioned Irish statute, that many of the reasons which have led us to the construction we feel bound to put on the English Acts could hardly have permitted us to concur with some of the remarks of the Irish Judges on the Irish statutes in those cases; but even in one of those cases it seems to have been considered by some of the Judges that the claim must be made before the Court of the Revising Barrister is opened; and the administration of the system of poor-law rating in Ireland is so different from that in England, and the qualification as to rating of voters, the formation of the list of voters, and the machinery for preparing them and taking the registration are so different, and give rise to so many different considerations and arguments, that we do not feel called upon or authorized to discuss further the propriety of of the ultimate decision in those cases upon the Irish statutes. We confine ourselves to saying that, having regard to the English statutes, we, for the reasons before stated, are of opinion that the decision of the Revising Barrister in this case, given in deference to the Irish cases, was wrong, and his own personal opinion was correct. The decision of the Revising Barrister will, therefore, be reversed, and the register be amended accordingly.

Digitized by Google

Parliament — Borough Vote — Eleemosynary Occupation — Inhabitant Occupier—Representation of the People Act, 1867, s. 3.

ELECTION LAW. A.—The appellant claimed a borough vote in respect of his occupation of one of a series of houses known as Lord Coningsby's Hospital, to which he had been duly nominated. The persons who occupy these houses are nominated by the owner of certain estates, out of which fixed payments are made to such occupants, who are called servitors, and are subject to certain rules made for their government in 1614, when the hospital was founded, and which they must obey under the penalty of a fine. They pay no rent, and clothes and coals are supplied to them out of the funds of the hospital. When a man is appointed to one of the houses he holds it, with a garden near to it, for life, and cannot be disturbed in his occupation by any one, except for a murder or a felony, or something of that kind. None of the houses had ever been let by any of the persons appointed to them, but a garden appertaining to the house held by the appellant had been let by him because he was too old to cultivate it himself:—Held, that the appellant had a freehold interest in the house to which he had been appointed, and this his occupation thereof was not of such an eleemosynary character as to prevent his acquiring the borough franchise as an inhabitant occupier under the Representation of the People Act, 1867.

This was an appeal from the decision of one of the Revising Barristers for the city of Hereford.

The respondent objected to the name of the appellant being retained in the St. John Baptist list of voters for the said city.

The case stated that it was proved before the Revising Barrister, that the appellant, John Fryer, occupied one of a series of eleven houses known as Lord Coningsby's Hospital, originally founded in 1614, and that he had so occupied during the qualifying period, and had been separately rated, and had paid all poor-rates in respect of such occupation, but that some of the said rates had been afterwards returned to him by Mr. Arkwright, hereinafter named, in consequence of a request made by the occupants of the hospital, but such return was optional and a mere matter of grace on his part. It was further proved that a notice of objection, good in form, was duly served on the said John Fryer, and that the said John Fryer's claim was in respect of occupation of one of a series of houses, known as Lord Coningsby's Hospital, for and occupied by six soldiers of three years' service, and five domestic servants, who have lived in service for seven years and who are badly off in their circumstances. That the said eleven occupiers (of whom the claimant was one) are called servitors, and that one of them is appointed superintendent or corporal by Mr. Arkwright, and is called Corporal Coningsby. It was further proved that the persons who occupy these eleven houses are nominated by John Hungerford Arkwright, Esq., of Hampton Court, who owns the Coningsby estates, out of which fixed payments to the occupants of the houses are made. It was further proved that rules had been made in the year 1614 (when the hospital was founded) for the government of the occupants of the hospital, but it appeared that these had become partly obsolete; but it was in evidence that Mr. Arkwright could do as he liked with regard to the rules, and that he appointed the inmates of the hospital as servitors to their respective houses, and that the funds of the hospital came from Mr. Arkwright's estate, and are distributed equally among the servitors. The evidence given also proved that the servitors paid no rent, and that clothes and coals were supplied to them out of the funds of the said hospital. The houses are built on two sides of a quadrangle, a portion of the other sides of which is occupied by a chapel and a common hall. This quadrangle is entered by an iron gate, which opens into the street, and the key of which gate is kept by the corporal of the hospital. The gate is locked at nine o'clock in the evening, after which time none of the occupants can enter from or go out into the street or beyond the limits of the hospital without the special licence of the corporal. The occupants of the houses occasionally dine together in the common hall, and they are expected to attend service on certain fixed days in the chapel and not to be absent more than three days at a time without the leave of the corporal. When a man is appointed to one of the houses, he holds it and a garden near to it for his life, and cannot be disturbed in his occupation by Mr. Arkwright or anyone else, except for a murder or a felony, or something of that kind. It was agreed that none of the houses had ever been let by any of the persons appointed to them, but a garden outside the hospital and appertaining thereto held by the said John Fryer had been let by him because he was too old to cultivate it himself. There is no service or duty to be performed by the servitors, but they are subject to certain rules of the hospital which they must obey under penalty of a fine. They are bound by these rules to attend the chapel at regular times, to keep the windows of their houses clean, not to become intoxicated, nor to use profane oaths, and not to be absent from the hospital for more than three days at any one time without the corporal's leave. The said John Fryer did not produce any deed or other document.

The Revising Barrister held that the occupation of the appellant was eleemosynary in its character, and that he did not occupy as owner or tenant within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and he accordingly expunged his name from the register.

Dowdeswell (G. Brown with him), for the appellant.—It is submitted that this case falls within the principle of Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49) and Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), in which the inmates of Lord Burleigh's hospital were held to have a freehold interest in the rooms assigned to them, and were entitled, in respect of such interest, to vote for the county. What would be a sufficient estate to entitle the claimant to a county vote under the old Reform Act would clearly be sufficient to qualify for a borough vote under the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3, where it is only required he should be "an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant." If he has a freehold for life in the house he occupies, he occupies it as owner: and that is alone sufficient, as the value is immaterial. Here it is found that, when a man is appointed to one of the houses, he holds it and a garden near to it for his life, and that he cannot be removed, except for felony or such like criminal misconduct, which never will be presumed. There is no substantial distinction between the rules to which he is subject and those governing the inmates of Lord Burleigh's hospital; and in the present case, as in the case of Lord Burleigh's Hospital, there is no corporate body, or anything from which a corporation must be presumed, in whom the property, both legally and beneficially, would be vested. Moreover, that was not the question before the Revising Barrister, who only decided that the occupation of the appellant was eleemosynary and not as owner or tenant. It is submitted that, if the appellant had a right to occupy the premises, it is immaterial that he did so occupy in an acquired because the occupation was eleemosynary was pressed by counsel in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), but it did not prevail; and Erle, C.J., said: "A great deal of ambiguity has been brought into these cases by saying that a man would be prevented from being qualified, though he had a legal or equitable freehold, if the mode of occupation was eleemosynary. I have a great desire to avoid introducing anything that is, to my mind, an entirely mistaken notion as to the question whether the party is owner of the equitable freehold or not. In deciding that question, it may be very material to see whether the trustees hold in trust to take the profits and dispose of them in an eleemosynary manner to the objects of the donor's bounty; but if a person have an estate, whether legal or equitable, it matters not whether the motive of the donor of the estate was of a charitable nature, or whether the feelings of the parties who took the estate and enjoyed the profits under it ought to be the feelings of eleemosynary grantees." Here the appellant occupied in an independent character and for his life, without power in any one to remove him. It is not necessary that he should occupy as owner; he may occupy "as owner or tenant"; it is sufficient that he does not occupy as servant. The word "tenant" is to be considered as used in its largest sense, and to comprise tenant at will or sufferance. The cases of Randall v. Stevens (2 El. & B. 641; 23 L. J. Q.B. 68) and Locke v. Matthews (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 753; 32 L. J. C.P. 98) are instances of a tenancy existing notwithstanding the tenant was put into possession from charitable motives; and they shew, therefore, that the question whether the occupation was eleemosynary is an immaterial one.

Macnamara, for the respondent.—The appellant did not occupy as owner or tenant within the meaning of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 3. No relation of landlord and tenant ever existed between the appellant and Arkwright, and the nature of the occupation and the restrictions upon it divest it from being the occupation of an owner. It is found by the case "that Mr. Arkwright could do as he liked with regard to the rules."

[KEATING, J.—There must, I presume, be some modification to that statement. For instance, Mr. Arkwright could not make a rule that the inmates should only occupy for three years, since that would be inconsistent with the statement that when a man is appointed he holds for life, and cannot be disturbed in his occupation by Mr. Arkwright, except for murder or felony.]

That is so; but reference is made to the power of Mr. Arkwright to make what rules he liked, in order to shew how the occupation is made subordinate to rules. The occupation required to confer the franchise must be of an independent character, and not that of a servant, nor of one who is the object of a charity. The cases which have been cited as to the Burleigh hospital were decisions as to the right to a county vote, where the only question was, whether the claimant held a legal or equitable freehold in the land; but here the claim is to a borough vote, where the question is, whether the occupation is as owner or tenant.

[BOVILL, C.J.—The circumstance that the occupation was conferred as an act of charity will not necessarily prevent the occupier occupying as tenant or owner.]

The hospital in this case is only an almshouse. It is found that the eleven occupiers, of whom the claimant was one, are called "servitors," and that clothes and coals are supplied to them out of the funds of the hospital; and it is submitted that the occupation, under the circumstances stated in the case, is only of an eleemosynary, and not of an independent, character.

[BOVILL, C.J.—It is of an independent character in this sense, that the occupier cannot be turned out; and he does not occupy as a servant. KEATING, J.—Is there any case in which it has been held that such an occupation as this would not confer the franchise?]

Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144) is the leading case upon this subject as to borough votes, and there the occupation of the Military Knights of Windsor was held to be subordinate to the purposes of the charity, and not such as would confer a borough franchise under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45; and Cockburn, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "Whether the interests of these parties in the benefits of the charity be a freehold interest or not, we are of opinion that there is no such estate or interest in these houses as can properly be deemed an ownership;" and the Court distinguished that case from that of Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49), on the ground that in that last case "the recipients of the charity had the direct and uncontrolled management of the property in their own hands; and the only question raised in that case was, whether the Revising Barrister was right in presuming a commencement of the estate of the bedesmen by the royal licence prior to the passing of the 39 Eliz. c. 5." The case of Heath v. Haynes (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 389; 27 L. J. C.P. 50) was that of Earl Leicester's hospital, incorporated by an Act of Parliament, and the brethren of which were appointed for life, subject to removal for the causes specified in the rules. There each of the brethren, as such, occupied exclusively two rooms in the hospital, and was rated in respect of such occupation; but it was held, that he did not occupy as owner or tenant, and was therefore not entitled to a borough vote. In Bridgewater v. Durant (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 7; 31 L. J. C.P. 46), Erle, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "Occupation alone of a house is not sufficient to qualify: thus, occupation as a member of a corporation aggregate—Heath v. Haynes (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 389; 27 L. J. C.P. 50); or as a receiver of charitable bounty—Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144); or for purposes connected with services to be performed—Dobson v. Jones (5 Man. & G. 112; 13 L. J. C.P. 126); Clarke v. the Overseers of St. Mary, Bury St. Edmunds (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 23; 26 L. J. C.P. 12); or under an appointment from governors of a charity at their discretion Davis v. Waddington (7 Man. & G. 37; 14 L. J. C.P. 45), have been held not to qualify. The question is one of fact, and it was for the Revising Barrister to draw his own conclusion from the premises before him." The case of Freeman v. Gainsford (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 68; 31 L. J. C.P. 33) also shews that, because each inmate of the hospital may enjoy the house which is assigned to him for his life, it does not follow he does so as owner, or that he is therefore qualified to vote. Looking at the nature of the occupation of the houses by the servitors in the present case, it is submitted that such occupation is manifestly subordinate to the purposes of the charity, and that it never was intended by the legislature that persons in the receipt of a charitable bounty like the inmates of this hospital should have the franchise, as exemplified by the express provision of the Reform Act, which disqualifies borough electors who have been in the receipt of parochial relief or other alms.

Dowdeswell was not called upon to reply.

BOVILL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the claimant in this case was the occupier of a house as owner within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act, 1867; and it seems to me that the present case is undistinguishable in principle from that of Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84). There the cases which have been cited by Mr. Macnamara of Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144) and Freeman v. Gainsford (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 68; 31 L. J. C.P. 33) were strongly relied on, as they have been here, against the voter; but the distinction between them and the case then before the Court was pointed out by Erle, C.J., in his judgment, where he says, "There is a broad distinction in my mind between the present case and each of those cases; for in them there was a governing body, in whom the legal estate was necessarily to continue vested, for the purpose of executing the trust to be performed by them, and the profits of the endowment did not belong absolutely, and without any intervening person, to the persons who claimed to be qualified by reason thereof. The trustees were to receive the profits, and then the poor Knights of Windsor were entitled to claim a portion of the money out of those profits; and so the inmates of Lord Shrewsbury's hospital were entitled to receive a portion of the money from the trustees without themselves having any estate at all, though in each of those cases the trustees were bound to find the lodgings for the inmates. But I see that, in Lord Burleigh's hospital, the members are, when named, to be placed in certain rooms, and in those rooms they are to continue until they die." Now apply that to the present case, and the observation that the persons are to continue in the rooms to which they have been appointed until they die are very applicable, for here there is a distinct finding that, "when a man is appointed to one of the houses, he holds it and a garden near to it for his life, and cannot be disturbed in his occupation by Mr. Arkwright or any one else, except for a murder or a felony, or something of that kind." Therefore, there is a freehold interest for life in the person when once he has been appointed to a house. As regards the exception for murder or felony, there was a similar power of removal in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), as appears from the ordinances of the hospital which are set out in the report of Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49), a case upon the same hospital, and amongst which will be found (Ordinances 11 and 12) ordinances to the effect that the occupants should lose the benefit of their occupation if convicted of drunkenness, barratry, adultery, or such-like faults.

The Revising Barrister having stated the right under which the claimant in the present case occupied, gives, as the ground why he held such occupation to be not as owner or tenant so as to entitle him to the franchise, that the occupation was eleemosynary in its character; but it is manifest that there are many occupations which may be given as an act of charity, and yet the occupiers may occupy as owners or tenants; and in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84) it was clearly laid down by Erle, C.J., that the motive of the donor in bestowing the right to occupy cannot affect the character of the occupation. I think the present case cannot be distinguished from that of Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), but is distinguishable from the other cases cited by Mr. Macnamara on the grounds mentioned by the Court in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84). My Brother Byles, who has been obliged to leave the Court, desired me to say that he entirely concurs with us that the decision of the Revising Barrister should be reversed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt, in the case of Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144), there are expressions in the judgment of the Court as to the nature of the occupation of the Military Knights of Windsor which have created the difficulty in the present case; but that case is not only distinguishable from the present one in the facts, but it underwent a review in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), and all the points relied on by Mr. Macnamara were insisted on there, and yet this Court held that they did not prevent the claimant from acquiring the franchise by right of his having an equitable freehold in the premises. Now, the decision of the Revising Barrister in the present case is, that the occupation was eleemosynary, and probably he intended by that to bring the case within the expressions used in the judgment in Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144); but he has also set out in this case the facts which were proved, and the circumstances on which he founded his opinion; and this Court has held that if the Revising Barrister states the circumstances under which he came to a conclusion, though it is one of fact, and submits those circumstances to the Court, this Court will see how far he was justified in coming to the conclusion he has arrived at. The fact that the mode of occupation is eleemosynary will not, as pointed out by Erle, C.J., in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), necessarily prevent the occupier from being the owner of a freehold interest, and therefore disentitle him to the franchise; and here there is a distinct finding that the appointees under this charity had each a right to occupy the particular house to which he was appointed for his life, subject to being divested from that occupation only upon the happening of an event, which one cannot expect as likely to take place, namely, the commission by him of a felony. Where the legal estate in these houses may be is not stated, but the only persons who deal with the occupation are these servitors. Moreover, an Act of ownership is stated which is of great importance. It is stated that, though none of the houses had ever been let by any of these appointees, yet a garden had been let by the appellant Fryer, as he was too old to cultivate it himself. That, however, was an act of ownership, and he appears to have exercised it without interference by any one. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Revising Barrister was mistaken in thinking that the occupation being eleemosynary alone prevented the appellant from acquiring the right to vote.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the appellant had a freehold interest in the house assigned to him. It is expressly found that he had it for his life, and that he could not be disturbed in his occupation of it, except for murder or felony. There is nothing which makes his removal from that estate depend on anything that is arbitrary or indefinite. If then he has a freehold in the house, it is plain that he is also in the occupation of it, for it is not suggested that any other person was in such occupation. I therefore should have thought that this was the decision we should have arrived at if there had been no authorities on the matter; but I think that the case falls clearly within those of Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49) and Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), and is distinguishable from that of Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144) and the other cases which are in the same category. In Heartley v. Banks (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 40; 28 L. J. C.P. 144) it did not appear that any one of the knights was the occupier of any room definitely assigned to him, nor that he had a freehold interest in any particular room; and that case is also distinguishable from the present one on the other grounds mentioned in Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84). For these reasons, I am of opinion that our decision should be for the appellant.

Decision reversed.

Parliament—County Vote—Equitable Freehold—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 18—Actual Occupation—Rights of After-Grass and Depasture.

ELECTION LAW. A.—A piece of land, called a riding, divided into about eighty allotments of an acre each, had been held for centuries by the bailiff and bailiff burgesses of the town of C., who from time immemorial, whenever a vacancy had occurred, had invested an inhabitant of such town with the possession of one of such allotments, to hold the same for his life and the life of his wife so long as he and she should reside in such town, subject and chargeable with waste, and also subject to the rules of the said bailiff and bailiff burgesses. Each holder of such allotment manured and mowed the same, and after the crop of grass had been taken off by him the bailiff and bailiff burgesses were accustomed to grant the after-grass for five weeks to such other inhabitant as they thought fit, and at the expiration of such five weeks the whole riding was thrown open to all the inhabitants of the town to depasture sheep and cattle there until December 15, when it was closed. Each holder of such allotment was separately rated to and paid the poor-rates, and the annual value of such allotment was between 3l. and 5l.:—Held, that each holder had such an Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the Western Division of the County of Gloucester.

The appellant, John Trenfield, claimed to have his name placed on the list for the parish of Old Sodbury, but was objected to.

The CASE stated that the following facts were established by the evidence: The bailiff and bailiff burgesses of the town or borough of Chipping Sodbury, is a body of very ancient origin, and existed, as appears by the records of the town and Court rolls of the manor of Chipping Sodbury, long previously to the year 1681, but no charter of incorporation is at present known to have existed. The said bailiff and bailiff burgesses are appointed as hereinafter mentioned.

In the year 1681 a charter was granted by Charles the Second. A translation of this charter is given in Sir Robert Atkyns's History of Gloucestershire, and is referred to as a part of this case.

Shortly after the granting of this charter the inhabitants became anxious for its repeal, and according to a statement in Rudder's History of Gloucestershire, published in 1779, which is also referred to as a part of this case, the charter was annulled by proclamation at the request of the inhabitants themselves in 1668. Whether the charter of Charles the Second was formally annulled or not, it fell into complete disuse, and from the year 1668 or 1669 down to the present time the borough or town has been under the government of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses as prior to the last-mentioned charter.

The bailiff and bailiff burgesses, amongst other property, are entitled to a piece of inclosed pasture land, situate in the adjoining parish of Old Sodbury called "The Mead Riding," and containing by admeasurement ninety acres. The origin of the title of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses to this piece of land is not shewn, but they have held it for centuries; and in Rudder's History of Gloucestershire, this and other property is referred to as derived from ancient grants made in the reign of King John and King Henry the Second. The piece of land called the Mead Riding is divided by metes and bounds and trenches into eighty-one allotments, none less than an acre in extent, and many of them from an acre to an acre and a half, but all are called "acres." The bailiff and bailiff burgesses have from time immemorial given these acres to the inhabitants in the following manner:—On an acre falling vacant, a meeting of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses is convened, and held at the usual place of meeting, in the Town Hall of the town of Chipping Sodbury, and such meeting decides by majority of votes to whom, being an inhabitant of the town or borough of Chipping Sodbury, such vacant acre shall be given; after such decision has been made, one or more of the bailiff burgesses and the inhabitant to whom the acre has been given enter upon the acre in question, and a sod or turf is then cut from the acre by the hayward of the riding (an officer appointed in Court leet of the manor) and a twig stuck in it, and thereupon one of the bailiff burgesses, acting on behalf of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, gives possession of an acre by delivering the twig and turf to the donee, at the same time reading the following formula, which is called the investiture:

"The piece of land on which we are now standing (commonly called an acre) has lately fallen into the possession of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses of Chipping Sodbury, and in pursuance of their direction I invest you therewith by delivering to you this twig and turf: To hold the said piece of land for your life and the life of any woman that may be your lawful wife and survive you, so long as you and your wife shall reside in this town, and subject and chargeable with all manner of waste, particularly waste in felling or cutting any tree or trees whatsoever growing or that may hereafter grow on the said piece of land. And also subject to all the present rules and orders of the said bailiff and bailiff burgesses respecting the grounds called 'The Ridings,' as well as those that may be from time to time relating thereto."

This completes the ceremony, and a minute is usually recorded in the minute-book of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses to the effect that the acre which fell in on the death of A. was given to B.

The acre thus obtained is held by the donee according to the terms of the investiture, and is drained, manured and mown by the holder, who at spring and fall pays to the bailiff in respect thereof, for what are called dues, the sum of 2*s*., which goes to the bailiff in aid of his expenses of office, which are considerable.

With regard to the Mead Riding aforesaid, the following custom has prevailed from time immemorial. After the crop of grass has been mown and taken off by the several parties who for the time being are the holders of acres as aforesaid, the bailiff and bailiff burgesses convene a meeting of themselves and grant out the after-grass in what are called stems to such of the inhabitants of Chipping Sodbury as they think fit, to the number of eighty-two, this being the number of acres of which the riding is considered to consist. Each such stem confers the right to depasture a cow in the riding for five weeks from September 10. At the expiration of such five weeks, the riding is thrown open by the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, according to custom, to all the inhabitants of Chipping Sodbury, to depasture sheep and cattle therein until December 15, when it is closed; but manure may be taken out on the acres after the grass is cut and carried until August 1, and also from January 5 to February 14 in each year.

Each holder of an acre is separately rated to and pays the poor and church rates of Old Sodbury, and is also separately assessed to the income-tax for that parish in respect of such acre, and no instance has been known of a person once elected as the holder of an acre being dispossessed or ceasing to hold such acre, except upon his death, or his ceasing to reside in the town of Chipping Sodbury. In no case is the clear annual value of an acre in the said Mead Riding less than 3*l*., but in no case does it amount to 5*l*.

The said John Trenfield, being an inhabitant of the said town of Chipping Sodbury, was in the year 1847 duly elected by the said bailiff and bailiff burgesses to an acre in the said Mead Riding, and was thereupon duly invested with the possession of the same acre, according to the form of investiture in manner aforesaid. The said John Trenfield has ever since been and now is such an inhabitant as aforesaid, and in the enjoyment and possession of such acre. The clear annual value of the acre of the said John Trenfield is more than 3*l*. but less than 5*l*.

The said John Trenfield duly claimed to have his name placed and retained on the list of voters for the parish of Old Sodbury, in the western division of the county of Gloucester, in respect of the acre so held by him as aforesaid, but his vote was objected to on the ground that his interest in the land in respect of which he claimed to vote was not such an estate of freehold as would confer a county vote.

The Revising Barrister decided that the said claimant had not, under the circumstances stated, such an estate of freehold in the land in question as would confer a vote for the county.

Pickering (J. G. Edwards with him), for the appellant.—The appellant had an equitable estate of freehold in the land in question which entitled him to a vote for the county. After the centuries which have elapsed, it may now be presumed that the bailiff and bailiff burgesses hold the land which is divided into these allotments in trust for the several persons who are from time to time chosen out of the inhabitants and admitted into possession of one of these allotments. In this respect such persons are as much entitled to the vote as the bedesmen in Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49) and Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), the parish clerk in Roberts v. Drewitt (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 48), or the owners of benchers' chambers in Lincoln's Inn—2 Peckwell, 109, Rogers on in the town, and therefore was for an indefinite and uncertain period, and its duration was not liable to be determined at the will of the grantors—Preston Estates, 405, Co. Lit. 42 a, the authorities collected in Mr. Serjeant Manning's note to Davis v. Waddington (7 Man. & G. 46; 14 L. J. C.P. 45) and Beeson v. Burton (12 Com. B. Rep. 647; 22 L. J. C.P. 33). The question then is, whether there is anything in the existence of the rights of depasture which it appears are given to the other inhabitants which so interferes with the freehold estate which the appellant takes in the land in question as to prevent its being in his "actual and bonâ fide occupation" within the meaning of section 18 of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. The Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. s. 5), has only altered this 18th section by reducing the yearly value of the qualifying property required to take the case out of that section from 10*l.* to 5*l.*, and therefore where it is not of that reduced value, the person who has only a freehold for life must still, no doubt, be "in the actual and bonâ fide occupation" of the land. It is submitted, however, that the appellant in this case was in such occupation. The rights of depasture which the other inhabitants have do not oust the appellant from his actual occupation of the soil. A grant of the herbage does not pass the soil—Co. Lit. 4 b; and here it is expressly found that the appellant has always been in the possession of the allotment, and has been rated to and paid the poor-rates.

Joshua Williams, for the respondent.—The appellant has not an estate in the land at all, either legal or equitable. He has only a mere franchise, and in this respect the present case differs from those of Simpson v. Wilkinson (7 Man. & G. 50; 14 L. J. C.P. 49) and Roberts v. Percival (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 36; 34 L. J. C.P. 84), where the bedesmen were in the actual and exclusive occupation of particular rooms. Here the appellant can do nothing with this land but mow it, and in fact what he has is a right to mow it. His interest is like that of the freemen of Bedford in Nash v. Coombs (37 L. J. Ch. 600; L. R. 6 Eq. 51), who were entitled so long as they were resident there to turn out one head of stock annually upon certain commonable land. The main objection to the appellant's right to the vote is, that he is not in the actual occupation of the land within the meaning of section 18 of 2 Will. 4. c. 45 during the whole of the year. In Rogers on Elections, 10th edit., p. 5, it is stated, with respect to the occupation required by this 18th section, that it "is peculiar from the introduction of the word actual, which does not occur in the section conferring the borough franchise." "The question, What is actual occupation? has been supposed to be illustrated by the decisions under one of the Pauper Settlement Acts (1 Will. 4. c. 18), where the same words are used, and in which it was held that no constructive occupation by a tenant or lodger, nothing, in short, but the person's own exclusive occupation of the whole premises, satisfied the provisions of the Act," citing The King v. St. Nicholas, Rochester (5 B. & Ad. 219; 5 L. J. M.C. 45), The King v. St. Nicholas, Colchester (2 Ad. & E. 599; 4 L. J. M.C. 46), The King v. Berkswell (6 Ad. & E. 282; 6 L. J. M.C. 35) and The King v. St. Giles's-in-the-Fields (4 Ad. & E. 495; 5 L. J. M.C. 51). The case of The King v. the Trustees for the Burgesses of Tewkesbury (13 East, 155) shews that the persons who have the right to aftermath are the occupiers of the land. What interest, then, had the appellant? The freehold was in the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, and though the appellant might acquire perhaps an equitable estate for life, it could be only in the particular mode of enjoying the land, and not an estate in the land itself. He would only have a right to manure and to mow, but he could not stack the grass when cut, and for portions of the year others would have the right to use the land. The case of Suckerman v. Warner (2 Bulst. 248) shews that the mere right to mow would not make the person who has such right an occupier.

Pickering replied.

KEATING, J.—In this case the question has been faintly argued whether the claimant took an estate of freehold for life. Mr. Williams did not lay much stress upon this point, and I have no doubt that the intention was, that the claimant should take possession of the land for life, subject to the rules of the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, some of which rules involved the rights of other persons to go on the land to depasture with cows and sheep, and also to take the after-grass. He was admitted into the possession of the land by the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, into whose possession it had fallen by this form of investiture.—[The learned Judge here read the words of the investiture, as stated in the case.]—And so far as the possession is concerned, the case distinctly finds that the claimant, "the said John Trenfield, has ever since been and now is such inhabitant as aforesaid, and in the enjoyment and possession of such acre." It seems, therefore, to be clear that the claimant took an equitable estate of freehold; but the main point which has been raised is, whether, within the meaning of section 18 of the Reform Act, he can be considered to have been in the actual and bonâ fide occupation of the land, and it has been argued that he was not in such occupation because he was not in the exclusive occupation in consequence of the rights of other persons to a right of common of pasture on the land. I have doubted whether the occupation was of such a nature as the statute contemplated; but, on consideration, I think that we may reasonably hold that the claimant had the bonâ fide occupation of the land within the meaning of the 18th section. It is found by the case that he was rated to the poor-rate as the occupier, and there really was no other person who could have been so rated, and under all the circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the claimant was in the occupation within the meaning of the 18th section. I doubt whether the Revising Barrister intended to raise this question, but inasmuch as it has been argued, I thought we ought to give our opinion upon it.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that Mr. Pickering put the title upon the right ground, namely, that the legal estate was in the bailiff and bailiff burgesses, and that they had invested the claimant with an equitable freehold for life. I share the doubt of my Brother Keating, whether anything more than that question was intended to be raised for our opinion, because the case finds that the claimant was objected to on the ground that his interest in the land in respect of which he claimed to vote was not such an estate of freehold as would confer a county vote, and that the Revising Barrister decided that the claimant had not, under the circumstances stated, such an estate of freehold in the land as would confer a vote for the county. It has been scarcely argued by Mr. Williams that the claimant had not such an equitable estate of freehold as would confer a vote, provided the restriction required by the statute where the annual value was less than 5*l.* had been complied with; but he argued that such restriction had not been complied with, as the claimant was not, it was said, in the actual and bonâ fide occupation. I think, however, that he was. It was plainly intended by the investiture to put him in the actual possession of the land. It is stated in the case that the claimant was so put in possession, and he was clearly in the actual and beneficial occupation of the land during part of the year. It seems, however, that there was a right of pasture over the land during the rest of the year, but that was no more than a stinted right of common over the meadow, and I think that the putting the cattle on the land under that right would not prevent the person who was in the possession of the land from having such possession. There is nothing that I can see which would prevent such person from being on the land during the time such right of pasture was exercised, and doing anything with the land which was not inconsistent with such right. The form of the investiture is not unimportant. It treats the person who is thereby invested as the person who is to be considered as the possessor of the land, and liable for waste. I therefore think that this point, though not expressly raised, ought, if raised, to be decided in favour of the claimant.

Decision reversed.

Parliament—Election Petition—Finality of Decision.

ELECTION LAW. A.—A petition was presented against the return of C. as member for the borough of T., on the ground of bribery, &c., and such petition also claimed the seat for J., an unsuccessful candidate. At the trial J., being called as witness, was cross-examined by the respondent's counsel as to acts of bribery, &c., and the Judge was addressed on the point; the Judge decided that C. was improperly returned, and J. entitled to the seat. Twenty-one days after the return had been altered in pursuance of this decision, a petition was presented against the return of J.:—Held, that the decision of the Judge as to the status of J. was final; that this would have been so even if a recriminatory case had not been entered into, as the opportunity was afforded; and that the proper course was for the Court to stay all proceedings.

This was a rule calling on the petitioners to shew cause why the petition should not be taken off the file, and all proceedings thereon stayed on the ground that the judgment of Blackburn, J., was final, and that no fresh petition could be presented against the return of Mr. Henry James.

It appeared that November, 1868, Mr. A. C. Barclay, Serjeant Cox, and Mr. Henry James were candidates at the parliamentary election for the borough of Taunton; that Mr. Barclay and Serjeant Cox were returned; that such return was filed with the clerk of the Crown, November 19; that a petition was duly presented by T. M. Williams and J. Meller against the return of Serjeant Cox on the ground of bribery, which petition claimed that Mr. Henry James ought to have been returned; that on March 2, 1869, the petition came on for trial before Blackburn, J.; that no witnesses were called by the respondent, but that Mr. Henry James and other witnesses for the petitioners were cross-examined to shew bribery, &c. on the part of Mr. Henry James; that counsel for the respondent argued that bribery, &c. by Mr. Henry James had been shewn; that the learned Judge determined that Serjeant Cox had been guilty, by his agents, of bribery and not properly returned, and that Mr. Henry James had not been guilty of bribery, &c. by himself or agents, and that (on a scrutiny) he was duly elected instead of Serjeant Cox; that on March 5 the learned Judge so certified to the House of Commons; that on March 8 the House ordered the certificate to be entered in their journals, and gave the necessary directions for altering the return; that on March 9 the alteration was made; and that the present petition against the said return of Mr. Henry James was presented on March 29 on the ground of bribery and treating.

Manisty and Cohen shewed cause.—It is submitted that Mr. James was not returned till March 9, or at all events the 5th (in either of which cases the petition is in time because of excluded days), and that it was therefore competent to the petitioners within twenty-one days afterwards to petition against him. Now, looking to 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. ss. 5. and 6, it is quite clear that Mr. James was not returned at all events till something more was done than the matters therein alluded to, and that no power to petition existed. He, however, by matters subsequent, has been now returned. Then, when and how has he been returned? It is submitted it has been by the action of the clerk of the Crown, on March 9. By the 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 7. s. 5, the clerk of the Crown is directed to enter all returns, and by section 13 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 the House is directed, on receiving the Judge's certificate, to order the entry thereof and direct everything to be done necessary for confirming or altering the return. Section 53 is relied on by the other side, and it is said that because it is competent to a respondent to go into a recriminatory case, therefore, whether he avails himself of the opportunity or not, the time is gone by as against the whole world. The effect of this is that by the neglect or collusion of a candidate petitioned against, he may prevent a petition by independent persons to test the validity of the return of the other candidate, unless, indeed, they should have contemporaneously petitioned, in which case, by section 23 (substituted for the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98. s. 48), the petitions would be tried together. This is not an impossible case, for suppose the two candidates on the same side in politics, the respondent, though willing to prevent the other candidate from turning him out, would on failure be unwilling to do what would perhaps let in one of the other side.

[BRETT, J.—The rule formerly was that the petition must be within a certain time. WILLES, J.—There is no authority for a second inquiry into the conduct of a member where an opportunity of having it gone into has been afforded. MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—Where there was an opportunity of going into a recriminatory case the matter could not be inquired into again; but where it could not, time was given to allow persons to go into one.]

The House of Commons would allow any one to come in; here the constituents are prevented.

[WILLES, J.—In Rogers on Elections, 9th edit. 470, note (o), it is said, "In the Southampton case, after P., an unsuccessful candidate, had been declared duly elected, a petition was presented against him on the grounds of want of qualification and acts of bribery. The Speaker (Mr. M. Sutton), however, stated that such petition could not be received, since both these allegations might have been brought forward on the hearing of the former petition, though it was presented by electors and not by P." BOVILL, C.J.—If the decision were the other way, would it not be conclusive? for the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. s. 86. expressly enacts that if a candidate be declared guilty of bribery he cannot be elected during the same parliament; if so, should it not also be so if in his favour? WILLES, J.—In The Dumfries case, did not the House re-open an inquiry? O'Malley, amicus Curiæ.—The Committee carefully guarded themselves against deciding more than that there was an existing disqualification.]

The constituency is handed over to the sitting member; that, in truth, is the result of the contention on the other side. In the cases cited the House had a discretion; here the Court has none, and must decide that, whether a recriminatory case is gone into or not, the decision is conclusive. Such a conclusion is directly opposed to section 5, which allows three classes of persons to petition. And it may be pointed out that though the decision of the House of Lords is final, yet two cases really involving the same matter may be taken up and result in two decisions of the House, opposed in fact, and it may be that the word "final" is used in this sense.

Mellish (Giffard and Griffits with him), in support of the rule.—The decision was in rem and final, and, even if no recriminatory case had been gone into, it would have been final, as it is quite sufficient that it might have been gone into. The provisions of the statute shew that the judgment is not inter partes; thus the respondent may be changed, and the Judge may go on if the original petitioner desires to withdraw. As to what has been said about fraudulent abstinence from recrimination, no statute can prevent a corrupt giving up under all circumstances which may be suggested, and the words of the statute must govern; and when its provisions shew that the decision is not inter partes, and the construction now contended for makes the act consistent, such construction appears to be the correct one. By the other construction, after full evidence has been gone into and a decision given, the matter may be tried over again on the very same evidence, and possibly a different judgment given by another Judge on the very same materials, which would be an absolute scandal to the administration of justice. The present argument, no doubt, goes the length stated by the other side, that there cannot be a petition against a member seated as here; and it is said that an independent elector may be prevented from disputing the right to the seat by collusion of the candidates. Cases, no doubt, may be put of possible hardship, but the same difficulties may be put the other way, and no practical difficulty in obtaining a full investigation can arise if it be really desired, and certainly the cases put by the other side are not usual ones. The words of section 6 are so general that, perhaps, if the scheme of the Act were against finality, the Court might say the other side were right; but as it is the other way, the section must mean that the return of the returning officer is to be the time from which the right of petition is to run. The important section, however, is section 11, par. 13, which says plainly that the decision is to be final, and the Judge is to determine, not inter partes, but finally. Section 13 also treats it as final, and obliges the House to act on it as such. Then section 32, allowing the Judge himself to call witnesses, though perhaps no great protection, was intended to be so, and so also were sections 38 and 39, which allow a change of petitioners; which latter sections also shew the decision not to be inter partes. Then section 53, which allows the recriminatory case to be gone into, shews the intention that such case should be broached at that time, and puts the case exactly on all-fours with the cases under the old practice, where, as has already been pointed out, the opportunity having been afforded and not taken, the matter could not be relied on at any future time.

BOVILL, C.J.—In this case the petition, which was presented by two voters, sought to avoid the election of Mr. Serjeant Cox, and also claimed the seat on behalf of Mr. Henry James, who was a candidate at the election. Upon such a petition it is clear, according to the terms of the Act of Parliament, that a distinct issue was raised on each of the points involved in that petition. The 53rd section of the Act distinctly authorizes and gives jurisdiction to the Judge to try the issues with respect to the candidate on whose behalf the seat is claimed, or who is alleged by the electors or the voters to have been the person returned as their representative; and, according to rule 7 of the Rules framed by the Election Judges, provision has been made for carrying into complete effect the intention of the legislature, and for the trial of all the issues which are raised on such a petition. It is true that the candidate is no party to the petition, but that was well known to the legislature, and from the nature of things the probability is, that the matter will be fairly and properly conducted without collusion; and there are some provisions in the Act for the purpose of preventing collusion under certain circumstances. The inquiry is one not as between party and party, but one affecting the rights of the electors, the persons who are or may be members or candidates, and the House of Commons itself and its privileges; and this inquiry is to take place before one of the Election Judges, who is to inquire into and decide the questions raised for his determination. One of those issues, undoubtedly, must be on such a petition as this, whether the candidate, for whom the seat is claimed, was or was not duly elected at the election; that is an issue distinctly raised, and the parties may go into it if they please, or may abstain from so doing, and the opportunity is therefore afforded of having the question discussed and absolutely and finally determined by the Election Judge. If the decision on such a petition be against the candidate, then, under the Bribery Act of 1854, he becomes disqualified, whilst if the decision be in his favour then the consequence follows that the return is amended, the provisions of the Act are carried out, and by the decision of the Judge he becomes the sitting member. In the present case, of all others this matter seems to me to have become res judicata. Not only was the issue raised by the petition, but the question so raised was gone into, and it matters not that affirmative evidence was not offered on behalf of the sitting member, and that he contented himself with the cross-examination of the witnesses who were offered by the petitioners; for in that way evidence was obtained and was submitted to the consideration of the Judge, and the learned counsel who appeared for the sitting member argued the case as to the disqualification of the gentleman who is now the sitting member, Mr. James. The issue having been raised, the evidence gone into, and the arguments of counsel heard, upon that the Judge has decided, and I am at a loss to distinguish this case from one where witnesses have been examined in any number, a scrutiny has been gone into, which has continued for days, possibly for weeks, and ultimately a decision given in favour of the candidate who claims the seat. In such a case as that, it cannot be contended for a moment that the intention of the legislature was that after the fullest inquiry has been made, ample evidence given, arguments adduced on either side, and the matter finally determined by the Judge, exactly the same question might be brought under discussion before another Judge, and the whole inquiry gone into again. That would be nothing more nor less than an appeal against the decision of the Judge who decided in the first instance, and notwithstanding that no power of appeal is to be found anywhere in the Act. So far from its being the intention of the legislature that there should be any appeal, or that the decision of the Judge should be questioned on a matter of fact, parliament, by the 13th paragraph of the 11th section of the Act, expressly declares that the decision of the Judge shall be final to all intents and purposes. If it is to be final to all intents and purposes, can it be said to be final unless it is to conclude the parties in a matter which was in issue, and on which the decision of the Judge has been pronounced? The argument on the other side would go to defeat the very express enactment, as it seems to me, contained in the Act. That the decision is to be final is further shewn not only by the absence of any power of appeal, or of questioning the decision of the Judge, but by the 13th section, which declares that upon the certificate of the Judge being communicated to the House of Commons by the Speaker, it shall give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the return, or issuing a writ for a new election, or carrying the determination of the Judge into execution, as circumstances may require. In this view of the case, it would seem that in every instance where the seat is claimed by the petition, and the matter distinctly raised, then, whether the matter is gone into or not, as it is raised and is a point in issue which the Judge may determine, and which he would determine in the absence of evidence in favour of the one side or the other, the decision is equally conclusive whether the evidence is given or not. The consequence is that in every case where the seat is claimed there can be no new petition; and that if there be an alteration of the return the sitting member will be unseated and the other candidate declared duly elected, and I can quite understand why the present Act so provides, as this is exactly the practice which prevailed in parliament before the recent legislation. The practice was that where a seat was claimed, and there was an opportunity of contesting the validity of the election of the party claiming the seat, the House of Commons would not allow the matter to be gone into afterwards, or allow any further time for the presentation of a petition, and, à fortiori, it would be so in a case like the present, where not only was the question raised, but the matter was gone into by argument and evidence, and a decision pronounced by the Judge. In former times, where a petition proceeded on some technical ground, as to the form of the return, the mode of adding up the figures, or the like, it seems that it was the practice of the House to relax their rules, and by a special resolution to allow a fresh petition to be presented, but there is no such provision in this case, nor can any such doctrine apply in the case now under consideration. It is sufficient to say that there is no clause in this Act which authorizes any new petition where a matter has been already inquired into, and solemnly determined by the Judge. The status of the member is declared by the judgment of the Election Judge. By that decision Mr. James was declared duly elected, and that decision becomes binding on every person, on every elector, on the candidate, on the sitting member, and also on the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the present rule must be made absolute, not however to take the petition off the file, but to stay all further proceedings on the petition, which, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper course to be adopted.

WILLES, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I agree with my Lord that, in point of form, it would be better to stay all proceedings on the petition rather than to take it off the file, if it be only for the purpose of having jurisdiction over the deposit. On the main question only one doubt has crossed my mind, which is this, that unquestionably Mr. James has been seated subject to the assault of a less numerous body of opponents than might have assailed him had he been returned in the first instance; because, if he had been returned instead of Mr. Serjeant Cox, any voter, or the candidate Mr. Serjeant Cox, might have presented a petition against him; whilst, as matters have turned out, he has only been exposed to a recriminatory charge in the nature of a petition to avoid his election by Mr. Serjeant Cox (or if he had withdrawn such person as might have been substituted); and it may be plausibly said that a member not returned in the first instance, but obtaining the seat as Mr. James has done in this case, goes through a less searching ordeal than would have been the case if he had been returned in the first instance. When, however, this comes to be looked at, I do not think it really presents a practical objection to the result at which the Court is prepared to arrive; because, though each voter or candidate may present a petition against the persons who are returned, he is not entitled to do so in respect of any private claim, but as representing the general body of the public, or rather such part of them as are directly interested in the representation of the borough. The object of the legislature is to insure a proper tribunal, and the most ample opportunity of investigating the circumstances of the election. Accordingly, against a member who is returned in the first instance, any person may present a petition; but if an unsuccessful candidate petition against a successful one, then, if he does not claim the seat, there is no recrimination; but if he claims the seat, then the respondent is entitled to protect himself, and is entitled, before any question of scrutiny can be raised, to prove his recriminatory case against the petitioner for the purpose of shewing that he is not a person who can stand in the place of the respondent. It is true, if he proves his recriminatory case, the petitioner can still insist on going into the scrutiny, in order to turn out the respondent, though he is incapacitated from obtaining the seat himself; but the interest of the person who claims the seat, and the strong vested interests for the time of the person who has the seat, are abundant on the one side and the other to insure that a full inquiry shall take place into the circumstances of the election. I think there is a sufficient practical distinction between the case of a petitioner and that of a member actually in the possession of that which is considered and sought after as a great prize, a seat in parliament, to have induced the legislature to trust the latter to use all fair and proper means for the purpose of preventing the seat being taken from him and handed over to the person who petitions against him; and probably that may account for the legislature being content that a matter which might have been brought forward by anyone of a numerous body, if the petitioner had been returned in the first instance, should, to a certain extent, be left in the option and at the discretion of the respondent to bring forward or not when the seat is claimed. Besides, a respondent who proceeds to trial under such circumstances gives a pledge of the good faith, sincerity and earnestness with which he defends the petition; and if he feels disposed to drop the matter, the Act provides for his doing so at a period when no great costs have been incurred, enables him to give a notice of withdrawal, and in case this be done, furnishes ample means, not merely for enabling him to withdraw, but also for letting other persons come in his place, if they think proper. These proceedings seem to have been considered by the legislature sufficient to be substituted in the case of a charge against an unsuccessful candidate claiming a seat for the proceedings which might have been taken against him if he had been returned in the first instance; at all events they are the only proceedings the legislature has expressd in the Act, and by the Act must we be guided. In a case like the present, where the matter sought to be brought forward (constituting, it may be, a criminal charge against the member) has been once gone into and disposed of, there is the strongest reason for its not being re-opened; and we have the opinion of a very distinguished and experienced Speaker of the House of Commons (Mr. Manners Sutton) that this course could not have been taken under the old practice of parliament, even if (the opportunity having been afforded) the matter had not been inquired into. If such a case should arise as that put by Mr. Manisty in that part of his argument where he pointed out the possibility of collusion or fraud in the election court between the petitioner and the respondent, I conceive that, notwithstanding the terms of this Act, it may be that, inasmuch as there are no means whereby this Court could deal with such a case, and it is a case which necessarily would require to be dealt with, it would fall within the general competence and jurisdiction of the House of Commons to deal with all matters affecting the return of its member—a competence and jurisdiction which has been questioned only once, and established beyond all doubt, in Goodwin's case (2 State Trials, 91). For these reasons, I think the rule should be made absolute to stay proceedings.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was an inquiry before one of the Election Judges on a petition claiming the seat, which involved, not only the question whether the member who had been returned was duly elected, but whether the person for whom the seat was claimed was duly elected. That is an issue raised when the seat is claimed; on that issue the decision of the Judge must be given, and when given, I think that the decision is final. I should have thought on general principles that where a Judge has jurisdiction over an issue, and where no appeal to any other tribunal is given from his decision, such decision would be final. But it further appears to me that, upon the plain words of the 13th sub-section of the 11th section of the Act, the certificate of the Judge is made by virtue of the statute final and conclusive. Language could hardly be stronger than the words used in that section. It is enacted that "at the conclusion of the trial," i.e. the trial of the petition under which, by the 53rd section of the Act, the issue may be raised whether or no the candidate claiming the seat was duly elected, "the Judge who tried the petition shall determine whether the member whose return or election is complained of, or any and what other person was duly returned or elected, or whether the election was void, and shall forthwith certify in writing such determination to the Speaker," so that the Judge is bound on such a petition to determine who was duly elected at the election, and to certify his decision to the Speaker, and "upon such certificate being given such determination shall be final to all intents and purposes." It seems to me exceedingly difficult to say, after this express enactment, that the determination of the Judge that Mr. James was duly elected can be in any way impugned. Certainly the statute does not shew any mode by which it could be impugned. The statute gives no appeal, but on the contrary contains the very words that are to be found in statutes, in like cases when it is intended that there should not be an appeal—"the determination shall be final to all intents and purposes." The learned counsel, Mr. Manisty, pointed out some consequences which might arise from the inability of the electors to question the proceedings of a candidate claiming the seat at an election; but consequences still more serious might follow if under the scheme of this Act a second petition were to be allowed, because, in that case, a candidate might be put to all the anxiety, vexation and expense of a second inquiry, and public justice might be open to the scandal of having a different judgment upon the same issue, even upon the same evidence, from two Judges of co-ordinate jurisdiction. I think the consequences which would arise from our holding that there might be a second petition are much more serious than those which will occur from our holding that such a petition cannot be presented. The consequence suggested by Mr. Manisty was this, that the respondent might collude with the petitioner, and so stifle an inquiry into any corrupt practices committed by the candidate for whom the seat was claimed. Collusion of this kind may possibly occur, but it also may occur in many other cases for which the Act makes no provision, and if such an evil is hereafter found to arise, the legislature may supply the remedy very easily by enacting which might be tried with the original petition. There would then still be but one inquiry. It seems to me that the whole scheme of the Act is founded on this, that there shall be but one inquiry into the election, and that the whole inquiry shall take place on the original petition, with such substitutions as are allowed by the Act. The decision given on such inquiry is a decision in rem, and the intention of the Act is expressed in very plain terms that the determination of the Judge upon it shall be final, and put an end to all further investigation into the election.

BRETT, J.—There are two questions raised, as it seems to me: first, whether the petition can properly be presented; secondly, if it can properly be presented, is it one which ought to be entertained? In my view of the case neither question can arise, except in the case where the seat is claimed by an unsuccessful candidate, because if the unsuccessful candidate does not claim the seat there can be no reasonable ground for petitioning against him; neither can there be a judgment as to his status or position. As respects the first question, until the decision of the Judge has been given, the unsuccessful candidate has not been returned to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery; and after that decision, it is enacted, by the 13th section, not that a new return is to be made, but that the old return is to be altered; and then the name of the successful candidate is inserted in the return, which bears the original date. So that it seems to me both from the facts and the construction of the statute that there can be no valid petition against an unsuccessful candidate who claims the seat. That was put forward by Mr. Manisty as an invincible objection; but it does not seem to me to be so; for it does not lead to any injustice, as by the 53rd section the candidate who does claim the seat lays himself open to all the consequences to which a successful candidate is liable on petition. I therefore think that a petition cannot be properly presented to this Court, and that in the case of a candidate claiming the seat there can be no valid petition, and that no such petition is required. Supposing, however, this not to be so, then arises the next question, viz., whether on such a petition there can be a second trial with regard to the election. It seems to me that there cannot, because upon the true construction of this Act the first judgment is a judgment upon the status of the person originally elected, and is binding against all the world. Section 11, sub-section 13 states in terms that the judgment is to be final and conclusive, and the meaning of the words there used is to be construed by reference to section 13, which shews that it is not only to be binding as between the parties, but it is to be binding on the House of Commons. It is made obligatory on the House of Commons to carry out the decision of the Judges' certificate ministerially, without any discretion on their part. This is strong to shew that the meaning of the words in section 13 is, that the judgment there mentioned is to be final. And sections 38 and 39, which allow a change of parties, go to shew that the judgment is to be a judgment on the status of the person originally elected—a judgment in rem binding against all the world. Two objections have been made to this view. First, there was a powerful objection made by Mr. Manisty, the effect of which was, that assuming the sitting member to conduct the case against the claimant without sufficient energy, yet without fraud, that the constituency is practically barred by the present decision of the Court. That, to a certain extent, is true; but it seems to me that section 32 is the means by which the legislature intended to meet that difficulty. It is obvious that the legislature might, if they pleased, have given power to any one to intervene, or have appointed an officer to intervene in these cases, as the Queen's Proctor does in cases of divorce, but they have not done so; and the only meaning that I can give to section 32 is, that the Judge is to act in a more mitigated manner in the same way. It may be that the section may not carry out the intention of the legislature, but up to the present time it has not been tried, and however that may be, I can give no meaning to it, unless it was passed in order to meet the difficulty pointed out.

Digitized by Google

The other objection was, that the sitting member and the candidate may fraudulently collude; but it is to be noticed that a judgment in rem may be challenged and set aside, on the ground of fraud between the parties to the deception of the Court; and, if it could be shewn that a judgment had been so obtained, it might well be argued that the judgment was not final. What would be the proper means of re-opening the question I can hardly say; whether there might be a fresh trial on the old petition I know not; or it may be, as was suggested by my Brother Willes, that the House of Commons in such a case would not be barred by the section which makes them bound to carry out the certificate; and that it would be null and void; so that by the instrumentality of the House a new trial under those circumstances might take place. But suppose that were not so, and that this is a casus omissus, still it does not to my mind alter the determination to be arrived at from the construction of the Act itself. For these reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that such a petition as is now before us cannot properly be presented to this Court, which is only authorized to receive petitions presented according to the Act; and that, even if properly presented, yet that, there cannot be a second trial, which practically would be an appeal from the first.

Rule absolute to stay proceedings, with costs.

38 L. J. C.P. 203; L. R. 4 C.P. 296; 20 L. T. 786; 17 W. R. 827.

Discussed, O'Carroll v. Hastings, [1905] 2 Ir. R. 590 (K.B. D.).

Parliament—Incapacity on account of being a Government Contractor—22 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 1.—Executed Contract—Knowledge that Contract is with Government—Secretary of State for India.

ELECTION LAW. A.—To incapacitate a person from being elected as a member of the House of Commons as "executing, holding or enjoying" a contract made for the public service within the meaning of the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 1, such contract must, at the time of the election, be an executory one.

Where, therefore, under a contract for the supply of goods, the goods had been delivered to and accepted by the government before the election, and at the time of the election nothing remained to be done under the contract except for the government to pay the price which previously had become ascertained and was payable, the contractor was held not to be disqualified, inasmuch as, at the time of the election, the contract was executed, and was not within the statute.

The statute 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 1. applies only to cases where the person contracting with the government knew, or ought reasonably to have known, that he was so dealing with the government.

Quære—Whether the Secretary of State for India is such an agent of the government, that a contract with him in Council for the supply of goods for the Indian department is within the statute.

Petition against the return of the respondent, Mr. Hugh Birley, as one of the representatives for the parliamentary borough of Manchester, on the ground that he was a contractor with the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, or with some other person or persons for or on account of the public service.

The case raised by the petition was stated as a special case for the opinion of the Court, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868; and the following are the material facts as they appeared in such SPECIAL CASE.

Digitized by Google

The writ for the election of representatives for the parliamentary borough of Manchester was dated November 11, 1868; the nomination took place on November 16, and the polling on November 17; and, on November 18, 1868, the Mayor of Manchester declared that Mr. Hugh Birley was elected one of the representatives. Mr. Birley was, during the whole of the year 1868, and still is, a member of the firm of Charles Macintosh & Co., of 83, Cannon Street, London, and Cambridge Street, Manchester, patentees and manufacturers of the vulcanized india-rubber; and, for the purposes of the special case, it was admitted that there had been dealings, as thereinafter mentioned, by the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. with the Secretary of State for India in Council, and with the Broadmoor Asylum for Criminal Lunatics, which it was contended on the part of the petitioners were, and on the part of the respondent were not, contracts within the meaning of the Act of the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. With respect to the said dealings with the Secretary of State for India in Council, the case stated several contracts, but the following facts relate to the only one which was relied on by counsel for the petitioners upon the argument as amounting to a contract within the statute.

About June 14, 1868, the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. received, at their warehouse in London, a printed form from the India Office, signed by H. C. G. Bedford, for the Director General of Stores, stating that certain specified goods were required for exportation to India, and that tenders for supplying the same would be received on or before Monday, June 22, 1868, at two o'clock.

The following is a copy of the said form:

"India Office, Westminster, S.W.
June 13, 1868.

"Gentlemen,—I am directed by the Secretary of State for India in Council to acquaint you that the articles specified in the annexed list are required for exportation to India, and that tenders for supplying the same will be received on or before Monday, June 22, 1868, at two o'clock. The date for delivery is written on the form of tender. You will have the goodness to abstain from taking any steps towards the provision of the goods until you shall have been informed by letter that your prices have been approved. The goods are to be delivered into the store depôt, Belvidere Road, Lambeth, London, and no charge is to be made for carriage or cartage to the depôt, nor for the packages or wrappers in which the goods may be inclosed or enveloped, as the same will be returned to you on application. Payment will be made in cash after the examination of the stores has been completed, for which due time must be allowed. Every delivery at the depôt shall be accompanied with a list of the particular articles sent in; the articles shall be therein designated as in the words of the accompanying form of tender and no other; forms for such lists may be obtained on application to the inspector of stores. In the cases in which patterns exist for any of the articles for which you are invited to tender, they may be seen on application to the inspector of stores, at his office, Belvidere Road, Lambeth. You are at liberty as often as you see fit, within the usual hours of business, to inspect the patterns; and the officers of the inspector of stores department will afford you ready assistance in comparing with the said patterns any stores which you may send in as a preliminary delivery, or for your own satisfaction by way of assuring yourself of the correctness of your work. The pattern number of each article is shewn against it in the form of tender. The opinion of the inspector of stores as to the quality of the goods shall be final. Notice in writing will be given to you of any rejected goods, and the same must be removed at the expense of the contractor within one week from the date of such rejection being notified. In case any of the stores shall remain undelivered at the date specified, or having been delivered and rejected shall not be replaced with approved goods within such period, the Director General may at his discretion reject the same and cancel the order, or he may call upon the contractor to pay, as and by way of liquidated damages, 2*l*. per cent. on the value of all such stores; any stores remaining undelivered (or having been delivered and rejected) one month after such specified date, will be subject to a further penalty of 2*l.* per cent., and any stores remaining undelivered (or having been delivered and rejected) two months after such specified date, will be subject to a still further penalty of 3*l.* per cent. Should the stores not be delivered at the expiration of three months from the date specified for their delivery, the Secretary of State shall have power to close the contract, inflicting all fines which may have been incurred and to purchase elsewhere the quantities not supplied, charging the contractor with excess of price, if any, paid for the stores so repurchased over that at which he contracted to furnish them. All such stores as may be rejected by the inspector of stores as unfit for the service must be replaced with approved stores on or before the day fixed in this letter, but the inspector of stores is at liberty to allow contractors to take away any small quantities of stores having been delivered in time which may require amendment in trifling particulars, and he will receive back the same when amended without any deduction from the full price, although the final delivery of the stores may be delayed a few days after the stipulated time; if, however, the quantity of objectionable stores be considerable, the Director General will not allow this indulgence, but will close the account on the day originally fixed in the order, reporting the same as directed above. In your reply, I request you will describe the articles and quantities exactly as designated in the annexed form of tender, shewing the price against each, and will write upon the cover 'Tender for India Rubber.' If there should appear to you any omission or deficiency in the description of the articles herein set forth, you will point out the same, in order that this letter may be correct before you make your tender. I am your obedient servant,

"HENRY C. G. BEDFORD,
For Director General.

"N.B.—On the completion of the order, separate claims for the stores for each presidency and department must be forwarded to this office in duplicate, addressed to the Director General of Stores. In describing the stores in your claims, the terms of the form of tender must be carefully observed. Printed forms for claims may be obtained on application at this office."

On June 18, 1868, the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. forwarded a tender for the said goods to the India Office.

The following is a copy of the said tender:

"To the Secretary of State for India in Council.

"Sir,—We hereby offer to supply the under-mentioned stores at the prices quoted. We agree to all and each of the conditions contained in the paper of particulars bearing date June 13, 1868. In case this tender shall be accepted, we agree to submit the names of two parties who, if approved by you, will join with us in a letter of indemnity to guarantee the payment of the amount of any fines and charges to which we may become liable under the 8th article of the conditions of this contract, and we further agree to enter into a deed of contract under seal (when required) for the due performance of the several conditions dated June 13, 1868, under which we have tendered, together with a bond to be executed by us and our sureties for the due fulfilment of our said tender. We also agree to abide by this tender for the period of two weeks from the date fixed for receiving the same, and in default of our so doing to pay the sum of 5*l.* per cent. on the aggregate amount of this tender to the Secretary of State for India in Council as and by way of liquidated damages in this respect. We are, Sir, your humble servants,

"CHAS. MACINTOSH & Co.

"Dated at Manchester, this 18th June, 1868."

At the end of this letter was a list of india-rubber articles offered to be supplied, with the prices for each, amounting in the aggregate to 287*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*

On June 24 or 25, 1868, the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. received a letter from the said India Office, announcing that their tender had been accepted, subject to the conditions stated in the said letter of June 13. The goods mentioned in the said tender were, together with an invoice, delivered into the said India Store Depot, Belvidere Road, on August 17, 1868. About September 30, 1868, the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. received a letter from the said India Store Department, objecting to a portion of the goods. The goods objected to were received back by the said firm, and were replaced by other goods, which were delivered at the said India Store Depot, in Belvidere Road, and accepted as satisfactory on October 23, 1868. On January 18, 1869, the said firm received from the said India Office a sum of 285*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* in payment for these goods, a small deduction having been made for difference in weight, &c.

With respect to the said dealings with the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum for Criminal Lunatics, the Special Case stated that by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 75 it was amongst other things provided that it should be lawful for Her Majesty, by warrant under her Royal Sign Manual, to appoint that any asylum or place in England which Her Majesty might have caused to be provided or appropriated, and might deem suitable for that purpose, should be an asylum for criminal lunatics, and accordingly, by a warrant dated June 28, 1861, under Her Majesty's Royal Sign Manual, the Broadmoor Asylum, at Wokingham, in the county of Berks, was appropriated and has ever since been used for that purpose.

On or about November 10, 1868, the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. received by the post a demand order, of which the following is a copy:

"No. 3389. Demand.

"Broadmoor Asylum, Nov. 9, 1858.

"To Messrs. Macintosh & Co., London.

"The following articles are required for the service of the above establishment, to be delivered in accordance with your contract:

Contract No.	Articles.	Quantity.	Head of Service to which Chargeable.
Chas. T. Phelps.	India Rubber Chambers unhandled. John Steward.	3 Doz.	Furniture, &c. Superintendent.

"The attention of contractors, &c., is directed to the instructions on the back."

The instructions were as follows:

"Note.—Every delivery of goods must be accompanied by a price invoice, quoting the No. of the demand and the head of service as specified. At the close of each quarter forms will be sent for rendering the accounts, which must be transmitted without delay. Want of attention to the above will, probably, cause delay in payment of the accounts."

The London agent of the said firm of Charles Macintosh & Co. accepted such order[1] before November 16, but, although in the said demand order (which was partly printed and partly written) the said articles are stated to be required "to be delivered in accordance with your contract," there was not, in fact, at the time of the sending of the said order any such contract, and this demand order was the only order or authority for the articles being supplied. Mr. H. Birley was not aware at the time of the election that the said order had been accepted, nor did he or his said London agent, Mr. Brown, know until the presentation of the petition in this case that the Broadmoor Asylum was, as in fact it is, a government institution, supported by an annual parliamentary grant, and used for the purposes of the Crown. The goods mentioned in such demand were forwarded by railway on November 26, 1868, together with an invoice, in which the price was stated to be 7*l.* 11*s.*

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, in effect, whether the

(1) Mr. Mellish, in his argument, explained how this was, viz., that an officer from the asylum brought the order to Messrs. Macintosh's, when their agent, on seeing the order, said that the articles should be sent as required."

aforesaid contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council was a contract for or on account of the public service within the meaning of the said statute 22 Geo. 3. c. 45; and whether, if it was such contract, the same was a subsisting contract at the time of the said election. Also, whether the aforesaid dealing with the superintendent of the Broadmoor Asylum was a contract within the said statute; and whether the election of Mr. H. Birley was void by reason of such contracts, or either of them.

Manisty (Bryce with him), for the petitioners.—With respect to the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council for the goods, which amounted to 287*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, it is submitted that it came within the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 1, which enacts, "That from and after the end of this present session of parliament any person who shall, directly or indirectly, himself or by any person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold or enjoy, in the whole or in part, any contract, agreement, or commission made or entered into with, under, or from the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, or of the Navy or Victualling Office, or with the Master-General or Board of Ordnance, or with any one or more of such Commissioners, or with any other person or persons whatsoever for or on account of the public service, or shall knowingly and willingly furnish or provide, in pursuance of any such agreement, contract or commission which he or they shall have made or entered into as aforesaid, any money to be remitted abroad, or any wares or merchandise to be used or employed in the service of the public, shall be incapable of being elected or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons during the time that he shall execute, hold or enjoy any such contract, agreement or commission, or any part or share thereof, or any benefit or emolument arising from the same." Assuming, for the purpose of this argument, that the Secretary of State for India is an officer of the government within the meaning of this section, then the contract in question in this case incapacitated Mr. Birley from being elected so long as he held or enjoyed, that is to say, was entitled to "any benefit or emolument arising from the same." It cannot, therefore, be said that the contract was at an end within the meaning of this section when the goods had been supplied, but it was still a subsisting contract at the time of the election, for the statute shews that it is the benefit which is to be derived from it which incapacitates the contractor from being elected.

[BRETT, J., referred to section 7, which provides for members holding contracts being discharged on giving twelve months' notice.]

That 7th section applies only to the persons who were then members, and shews how strict the legislature was even to the then existing members. Until the contractor was paid he had not reaped the fruits and benefit of his contract. By making an early payment it would naturally be in the power of government to influence a member, and so the case would be within the mischief which the statute was intended to remedy. Then the Secretary of State for India was an officer of the government within the statute. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106. s. 1. transfers the territories and government of India to Her Majesty; and the subsequent sections shew how the Council is appointed and constituted, how the property in India is vested in the Crown, and how accounts of the revenues of India are to be laid before parliament. The contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council was, therefore, within both the letter and spirit of 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. s. 1. It was as much a contract on behalf of the public service as the contract with the Comptroller of the Stationery Department, which was lately decided by the committee of the House of Commons to render Sir Sidney Waterlow incapacitated.

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—That was the case of a continuing contract.]

The Leominster case (Rogers on Elections (11th ed.), Appendix, 1) shews that the Act applies to contracts which are within the mischief of the Act, though not known in practice at the time the Act passed. In the Maidstone case (Rogers on Elections (11th ed.), Appendix, 4) the contractor had assigned his contract before the election.

revenues of the Crown.]

It is submitted that that makes no difference. The Secretary of State for India is an officer of the Crown, and a contract with him is the same as a contract with the Crown.—[He referred also to Mr. Forsyth's case (Rogers on Elections (11th ed.), p. 225).]—Then, as regards the contract with the Broadmoor Asylum, that was clearly a contract with the government, which was subsisting at the time of the election; but it is said that the respondent did not know that the asylum was a government institution. That is immaterial. The word "knowingly" in the second part of the 1st section of 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. does not apply to and cannot annihilate the language of the first part of that section. The second part was meant to meet the case of a person who, having made a contract with the government, had transferred it to some one else before the election, and yet afterwards supplied the goods, although he no longer continued to hold the contract. Here the contract with the Broadmoor Asylum was within the first part of the 1st section; and if the word "knowingly," which occurs only in the second part, is to be imported into the first part of the section, the Act of Parliament will be entirely altered.

Mellish (Birley with him), for the respondent.—Contracts with the Secretary of State for India in Council are not within this statute of 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. The ordinary rule for construing a statute is, that where there are particular words used, and then general words, the general words are to be limited to cases of the same kind as those named in the particular words. All the persons expressly named in the 1st section are ministers of the Crown, dismissible at pleasure, and the money payable under such contracts is money which would have to be voted by the House of Commons, and it is submitted that this may be taken to shew what the statute means by the words "for and on account of the public service." When this statute was passed a Secretary of State for India was not known. The statute was before the union with Ireland, and would a contract at that time with the Irish government have been within the Act, so as to have disqualified the contractor from a seat in the English House of Commons? It was thought necessary, however, to extend the provisions of this Act to Ireland after the union by the 41 Geo. 3. c. 52. In Thompson v. Pearce (1 B. & B. 25), a contract between an army-clothier and the colonel of a regiment to furnish the regiment with army clothing was held not to be within the Act, as the colonel, and not the Crown, was liable for the articles supplied.—[He then examined the constitution of the Indian Council and the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, and contended that the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council was a contract with a pro tanto corporation, and payable out of the revenues of India, and was different from a contract with any of the boards mentioned in the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45.]—The next point is, whether a contract which has been performed by the contractor, but not paid for by the government, is within the statute. It is submitted that it is not. Otherwise a government, by owing a man and never paying him, might for ever disqualify him from having a seat in parliament. What was such a person to do in order to be qualified? He could not even release the government from payment of the debt, if the government chose not to be released. How could he be said to be enjoying "the benefit or emolument arising from the contract" when he was kept out of the pay that was due to him? A contract which is executed cannot be within the Act. Section 7, which enables existing members to get discharged "from the execution of" any such contract, shews that the statute contemplates only contracts which have still to be executed by the contractors. Then, as regards the contract with the Broadmoor Asylum, it is submitted that it never was intended that a contract which was not known to be made with any one on behalf of the government should be held to be within the Act. The words "knowingly and willingly," in the second part of the 1st section, throw light on the preceding part of the section.

[BRETT, J.—If disqualified from being elected, may he not also be liable to the penalty of 500*l.* imposed by the 9th section?]

Yes; there is no distinction. The statute is highly penal, and the legislature could not have intended to have subjected the person to either the pecuniary penalty imposed, or to the penalty of losing his seat, unless he knowingly offended. Who could be presumed to know that the Broadmoor Asylum was a government establishment, and that by undertaking to execute such a small order as this he was making a contract with the government?

Manisty replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgments were delivered on May 6:

WILLES, J.—This was a petition, presented under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, praying that the election and return of Mr. Hugh Birley at the last election for the city of Manchester might be determined to be null and void, upon the ground that he was disqualified by the Act of 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. The question arose in this way: Mr. Birley is a member of the firm of Messrs. Macintosh & Co., who are india-rubber manufacturers, and they had an order from the Secretary of State for India in Council for the supply of goods under a certain contract, to the department presided over by that officer. This contract was fulfilled on October 23, 1868, to the extent that all the goods had then been delivered and finally accepted as being a complete fulfilment of such contract, and nothing remained to be done under it, except for the government to pay the price which had then become ascertained. Therefore on October 23, 1868, Messrs. Macintosh & Co. had become creditors of the public, to speak popularly, in respect of the price of the goods, and, in fact, the only relation that existed between them and the public from that time was that of creditor and debtor. There was another contract relied on by the petitioners, and that arose in this way: an order was given by an officer of the Broadmoor Asylum, which is an asylum for the reception of criminal lunatics, not established under an Act of Parliament, which might be considered as notice to all the world that it was a government establishment, but under a warrant bearing the sign manual, by which it was declared to be a public institution for the reception of criminal lunatics, Her Majesty having the power, under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 75, to issue such warrant. Broadmoor Asylum was not, in fact, known to Mr. Birley or his partners or to their agent, to whom the order was given as a public institution, until after the election and supply. Before the election, the asylum, being in want of some india-rubber articles, sent an order to Messrs. Macintosh for three dozen of them. That order was inquired after by a person who came on the part of the asylum to Messrs. Macintosh & Co.'s place of business, and he was informed that the goods would be sent. That is the construction to be put upon the statement in the case that the order was accepted; and the value of the goods being under 10*l.*, it must be treated that this formed a contract for the delivery of the goods. Those goods were sent after the election, and after some correspondence the price appears to have been agreed upon and settled at 7*l.* 11*s.* These being the facts, the question is, whether Mr. Birley, at the time of the election, did fall within the disqualifying statute, 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. It was insisted, on the part of the petitioners, that the Secretary of State for India, contracting for the Indian service under his control, was contracting for the public service. It was also insisted that a person who had completely performed his contract, so that he had nothing to do but receive the price, and nothing to hope for in respect of that payment except receiving that which was his due, was still a person holding or enjoying a contract within the disqualifying clause of the statute. Each of those propositions was denied on the part of the respondent. With respect to the second contract, which was the order for the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum, there can be no doubt that it was literally a contract for the public service; but the question raised with respect to that was, whether a mere casual, isolated order, given across the counter, so to speak, by a person not known to be contracting for the government or supplying the means of ascertaining at the time whether he was so or not, and accepted by a trader who is not aware that he is dealing with the government either then or at the time of the election, comes within the prohibition of the statute. These questions must be disposed of separately. With regard to the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council, the first question is one deserving much consideration, and it might not be useful to express a judicial opinion upon that, except in a case in which it was necessary to dispose of it. Certainly, the impression upon my mind at first, and I do not say that that impression has been entirely removed, was that a contract with the Secretary of State for India, who is one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, would be a contract for the public service; but I do not think it necessary to express an opinion upon that, because, upon the second ground, it appears to me that the respondent was not a contractor within the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45, because, before the election, he had ceased to be a person holding or enjoying a contract within the meaning of that statute, and had been converted into a mere creditor of the government, whose claim had been ascertained, and whose right was to receive his money, and as to whom, as it appears to me, it would be an injustice to say that a mere delay in payment on the part of the government should have the effect of disqualifying him as a candidate. It appears to me very clear, when the terms of the Act come to be examined, that it was not the intention of the legislature that the mere relation of debtor and creditor subsisting shall of itself create a disqualification. If that were so, it would be impossible to avoid the absurdity suggested by Mr. Mellish, that the mere omission of the government to pay a small sum of money, namely, a small balance to a contractor who had completely fulfilled his contract, whether by reason of there having been a dispute that was not adjusted until shortly before the election, or even by reason of an accident, leaving out a few pounds at the time of payment, should constitute the status of disability. If that were really the meaning of the Act, of course we should have no other duty but to adopt it, but we have the preliminary duty of being quite sure that the legislature did intend such a state of things before we pronounce it to be law. Now the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. deals with two classes of persons: it deals with persons to be elected in future elections to parliament, and it also deals with persons who were in the House of Commons at the time. And the first piece of information of what the legislature intended, I think, may be derived from the comparison of the 1st section, which deals with the first of these classes, with the 2nd section, which deals with the second class. The 6th, 7th and 10th sections also throw light upon the matter. Now, reading the 1st section by itself, with the light of the preamble, that this was an Act for "securing the freedom and independence of parliament," and finding the specific provisions in the section seem to point to the execution of a contract with the government, and finding also the provision for disqualification is limited to the time during which the person contracting should "execute, hold or enjoy any such contract, agreement or commission," I think the enactment refers to the case of a man having a contract under which he is to derive some future benefit from dealing with the government in respect of which they might control him, as, for instance, by directing their officers not to look too closely to the sort of goods he sent in, or the like. I should be strongly disposed to come to the conclusion that a person cannot be said to execute, hold or enjoy a contract when the only thing he can be said to enjoy is the not being paid money in respect of something which he has completely done at some former time, and for which he would have been entitled to have been paid on the spot and at the instant, if that were the course of business. Looking at the fact that there is no general provision that a public creditor shall not be a member of the House of Commons. I should have thought, if that 1st section stood alone, it would be wrong to come to the conclusion that, because the government owed a person a debt, that person is disqualified by this statute if there had been previously a contract under which such debt accrued. The 2nd section seems to tend in the same direction: "That if any person, being a member of the House of Commons, shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use and benefit, or on his account, enter into, accept of, agree for, undertake or execute in the whole or in part any such contract, agreement or commission as aforesaid; or if any person being a member of the House of Commons, and having already entered into such contract, agreement or commission or part or share of any such contract, agreement or commission by himself or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or upon his account, shall, after the commencement of the next session of parliament, continue to hold, execute or enjoy the same or any part thereof, the seat of every such person in the House of Commons shall be and is hereby declared to be void." It would certainly be a violent conclusion, as it appears to me, to arrive at, that, if a person, who at the time of the passing of this Act happened to be a contractor who had fulfilled his contract, and to whom it only remained that the government should pay what was due to him for what he had supplied, should be kept out of his money till the commencement of the next session of parliament, that such a person thereupon, for no fault whatsoever, and in respect only of the delay of payment, should lose his seat. That would tend rather in an opposite direction to what the Act intended, for it would tend to destroy the freedom and independence of parliament. Because, if such a thing were conceivable, if there happened to be two contractors in the House, the one a follower of the government and the other not, a delay of the Treasury might make one of them unseated while the other by being paid would retain his seat. That would be a strange conclusion. Then, passing over the 3rd and 4th sections, I come to the 5th clause, which provides that " Where any contract, agreement or commission has been made, entered into or accepted, with a provision that the same shall continue until a year's notice be given of the intended dissolution thereof, the same shall not disable any person from sitting and voting in parliament until one year after the said notice shall be actually given for the determination of the said contract, agreement or commission, or till after twelve calendar months to be computed from the time of passing this Act." That is quite inapplicable to the case of a mere creditor, unless it were to be supposed that he was to give up his debt as a condition of remaining in the House. Then the 6th section rather alters the language, although it means to express the same idea as the clause as to time in the 1st section, because it is, " that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any person on whom, after the passing of this Act, the completion of any contract, agreement or commission shall devolve by descent or limitation, or by marriage, or as devisee, legatee, executor or administrator until twelve calendar months after he shall have been in possession of the same." That looks very much like a contract which is to be completed, and under which something is to be done beyond mere payment, being the sort of contract which was intended by the legislature to be a disqualification. The 7th section of the Act applicable to then members looks the same way: " That any person who is now a member of the House of Commons and holds and enjoys any such contract, agreement or commission as aforesaid, may be discharged from the execution thereof on giving twelve months' notice to the person or persons with or from whom such contract, agreement or commission is made, entered into or accepted of his desire that the same shall cease and determine, and such contract, agreement or commission after the expiration of the term aforesaid shall be null and void." Those are the sections which, as far as I can understand, apply, and they all point to the same conclusion. There have been several cases, I am aware, upon the construction of the Act; but no decision either of our own Courts or, as far as I can learn, of the parliamentary committees in which the continuance of the relation of debtor and creditor has alone been held to keep the contract open, so that the candidate being a creditor of the government at the time of the election has been held to be disqualified. That completes all I have to say upon the question arising out of the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council. The second question is, whether the order which was accepted for the utensils for the Broadmoor Asylum should be considered as a disqualification. I must take it that the goods were ordered for the service of the government, because they were ordered to be used at an asylum for criminal lunatics, but they were ordered, not under a formal tender and acceptance by the government, which would ordinarily take place in the case of a contract popularly so called, but simply by an officer of the Broadmoor Asylum sending a written order to the place of business of Messrs. Macintosh to "send down three dozen chambers," and by somebody calling at Messrs. Macintosh's about these things, and being told "They will be sent as you ordered them." There was an entire absence of any notice to Messrs. Macintosh that the goods were ordered for or on account of the public service. They were ordered by a person who professed to be an agent for the Broadmoor Asylum, but who said nothing as to the nature of the asylum; and it is found in the case that it was only at a very late period that Messrs. Macintosh became aware that the Broadmoor Asylum really was a government establishment. The question therefore is, whether a casual, isolated order for goods, which is unknown to the seller to be an order from government, and which is such an order as was only equivalent to a person going into a shop and asking for and buying an article, that would be charged to the Treasury, falls within the meaning of the Act. That raises the question whether knowledge is any element in the disqualification. In dealing with that it is right to look to the Act, which contains a highly penal provision, not only in respect of forfeiture of the seat, but also of a sum of money imposed upon the member who sits in violation of the Act, and in the 10th section it is enacted "that in every such contract, agreement or commission to be made, entered into or accepted as aforesaid, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons be admitted to any share or part of such contract, agreement or commission, or to any benefit to arise therefrom." Unquestionably if this provision is intended to be imperative upon all persons dealing with the government there are no means of carrying it into effect; and it seems hardly applicable to contracts for so small an amount that the execution of them is left to the hands of inferior officers, who would, in ordering the things, give no notice that they were dealing for the government, any more than if they went in and bought the goods across the counter. The 10th section proceeds thus: "And that in case any person or persons who hath or have entered into or accepted, or who shall enter into or accept any such contract, agreement or commission, shall admit any member or members of the House of Commons to any part or share thereof, or to receive any benefit thereby, all and every such person or persons shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of 500*l.*" Now, would Mr. Macintosh, if he had admitted a member of the House of Commons into partnership with him, after taking this order of the Broadmoor Asylum, without knowing the public creditor who was behind the Broadmoor Asylum, be bound to pay the sum of 500*l.*? I answer unhesitatingly that that would be one of those cases in which it would be necessary to read into the 10th section the words "knowingly and willingly," which are in the 1st section. That is an indication of the intention of the legislature that knowledge or at least means of knowledge should be a condition of the penal consequences which are to follow. Now, the same sort of provision is in the 9th section, which refers to the members themselves, and I need not go through the same course of reasoning as to the language of the 9th section; it is open to the same sort of remarks as the 10th section, and the word to be noticed is the word "presume," which seems to me to imply not a mere ignorant act, but an act in which a person knowingly takes upon him to do that which the law says shall not be done under the circumstances. It is unnecessary that I should make any further observations upon the Act in order to explain the reason why I have come in my own mind clearly to the conclusion that Mr. Birley was not disqualified by the Act, either in respect of the first contract, because that contract had been completed and fulfilled by his firm, and the government was a mere debtor, and there is no sensible reason for disqualifying a man simply because he happens to have money due to him which is not paid him, or in respect of the second contract, because there was a total absence of knowledge that the contract was with the government. I can only add, in conclusion, that I am the more satisfied it must have been the intention of the legislature that the Act should apply only to cases where the contract was entered into with knowledge, because one can hardly conceive a substantial case of a government contract, unless made under circumstances in which the person dealing with the government knew or had the means of knowing that he was dealing with the government.

I am desired by the Lord Chief Justice, who, I regret, is unable to attend, to say that he concurs in the decision I have pronounced.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended that Mr. Birley is disqualified from being elected for the city of Manchester because he was a partner in the house of Messrs. Macintosh & Co., which at the time of the election held two contracts with the government: one with the Secretary of State for India in Council, and the other with the Broadmoor Lunatic Asylum. Now, first, as to the contract with the Secretary of State for India in Council, I think it is unnecessary, in the view we take, to decide whether such a contract is a contract for the public service within the meaning of the 22 Geo. 3. c. 45. It is a question which will require serious consideration when it becomes necessary to decide it, and I desire to express no opinion upon it. I decide this case, so far as regards that contract, upon the ground that at the time of the election the contract was no longer executory, and nothing more remained to be done upon it than for the government to pay the price of the goods. Looking at this Act of Parliament, and the general tenor of it, I certainly am strongly of opinion that the legislature intended it to apply only to contracts of a continuing nature, such as contracts for the building of works, and contracts for a recurring supply of goods, though I do not say that a contract for a single supply of goods is not within the terms which are used. But to my mind it very plainly appears that the statute did not mean to disqualify a contractor unless the contract was in an executory state on his part, that is to say, that something remained to be done by him, and that in no other way can the Act of Parliament be properly construed. Now, the words "undertake and execute" in the 1st section clearly apply only while the contract is executory; and though the other words, "hold" and "enjoy," are more general, it seems to me they refer to holding a contract or enjoying a contract which is executory, that is, a contract under which something has to be done by the contractor, either one act or recurring acts, and that he is only disqualified "during the time that he shall execute, hold or enjoy" any such contract. The words "hold and enjoy" may have been inserted to meet cases where a contractor, holding a contract, did not himself execute it. The words "during the time" clearly shew that parliament was contemplating a contract which would endure for some period of time, and that during that period of time something should remain to be done on the part of the contractor under that contract. The 4th and 6th clauses also point to contracts having some duration in point of time for the performance of that which the contractor was to do under them. I repeat that I do not say that if there is a contract for a single supply of goods that that contract is not within the Act, so long as it remains to be performed on the part of the contractor, he having to supply the goods and the government having a right to reject or find fault with them. But when the contract is no longer executory on the contractor's part, and he is only a creditor of the government, I do not think he can be said to "execute, hold or enjoy" within the meaning of this Act of Parliament. The consequences of holding otherwise would be, that a man might be disqualified from entering parliament by the misfeasance of the government, and more, it would be twisting the Act so as to produce the very consequence it was sought to avoid, namely, giving the government a control over a man, and leaving it to their discretion, by paying him or not, whether they would allow him to enter parliament or not. I think we ought not to put a construction upon the clause which would lead to such a consequence, unless we are compelled by plain and direct words so to do. On these grounds, therefore, I come to the conclusion that Mr. Birley was not disqualified by reason of Messrs. Macintosh & Co. being unpaid at the time of the election for the goods superintendent and an answer sent, the case really comes to no more than if the superintendent of the asylum had gone to the shop of Messrs. Macintosh & Co., and ordered three dozen of these articles, which are not supplied till after the election. It may be that that is a contract within the terms of this Act, though, as I have said, I do not think it was in the contemplation of those who passed this statute that such a transaction should be deemed a contract within the terms of this enactment. However, assuming it is, I am clearly of opinion that where the order is not given by some recognized government officer, so that the fact of giving the order is itself notice that it is an order on behalf of the government, and where it is consistent with the order, that it may be given on the part of a private person, and, in point of fact, the person of whom the goods are ordered does not know but that that is the case, such last-mentioned person is not disqualified by this statute; for I think there must be a contract with the government by the person sought to be disqualified which is known by him, or ought reasonably to be known by him, to be a contract with government. Here it is found, in point of fact, that Mr. Birley and his partners did not know that the order was given on the part of the government, and there is every reason, upon the facts, for coming to the conclusion that the order received was not one which upon its face gave any notice to the person receiving it that it was an order on behalf of the government. I confess I am very glad that, upon this last contract, we are able to come to this conclusion, because it would be monstrous to hold that the representation of one of the largest cities in the kingdom should depend upon the question, whether the candidate was a partner in a firm which had taken an order for some articles of such small value that the contract was not required by the Statute of Frauds to be in writing. I cannot help thinking that it would be very desirable that this Act should be revised, because it certainly appears to me to be totally inapplicable to the present state of commerce, and that it really provides a pitfall into which men who mean to walk uprightly and according to law may, unwittingly, tumble. I think Mr. Birley is entitled to keep his seat.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. The questions are, what is the construction of the 1st section of this statute? and, how is that section to be applied to the two cases before the Court? Now, as to the construction of the statute, it seems to me that the first thing to be considered is, what is the canon of construction to be applied? Is it that which is to be applied to a highly penal statute, or is it not? That depends, I think, on the 9th section. In the 9th section there is disability spoken of twice in the same terms, and there are two results made to follow from that disability. The first part of that section says, "that if any person hereby disabled or declared to be incapable to sit or vote in parliament shall nevertheless be returned," the election shall be void. And the second part of that section, using exactly the same words as to disability and incapacity, says, "And if any person disabled and declared incapable by this Act to be elected shall after the end of this session of parliament presume to sit or vote," he shall be subject to the penalty of 500*l.* for every day he shall sit or vote in the House. Inasmuch as the same words are used, it seems to me that whatever are the necessary incidents in order to make the person liable to the penalty of 500*l.* are also necessary incidents in order to make the election void. For instance, if knowledge is necessary in order to make the person liable to the penalty, and is a necessary incident for that purpose, it is also a necessary incident in order to make the election void. Therefore, the whole section and the whole Act, I think, are to be construed as of a highly penal character. If that be so, then the points raised in this case on this 1st section are, first, with whom is it necessary that disqualifying contract should be made? On the one side it is said it must be made with a person who is an agent of the government capable of making contracts binding the government, and the payment of which must be voted by the parliament of Great Britain. On the other side, it is contended that it is sufficient if it is made with an agent of the government, and that it is not necessary that the payment should be out of the public funds of Great Britain. I confess I am inclined to think that the latter contention is right, and that the Secretary of State for India is such an agent for the government. He is so much an agent of the government, holding office under the government, that in taking office he vacates his seat, and is obliged to go to a new election. I should have thought that any contract made with him was within the statute, and that it was immaterial that the money was to be paid out of the revenues of India, because otherwise it would seem to me that the mischief pointed at in this Act might be committed with impunity, and that a government might exercise very considerable influence over the independence of parliament by means of the revenues of India. But I quite agree that it is not necessary to decide that point in the present case. Then the next point is, whether it is necessary that at the time when the person is elected the contract, even supposing it is made with the government, should be executory. That depends upon the view to be taken of this 1st section. Now the first part of that section applies to any person who shall "undertake, execute, hold or enjoy" any contract therein mentioned. To undertake a contract would seem to be to enter into it; the word "execute" would seem to refer to the case of a person who takes on himself the execution of a contract not originally made with him; the word "hold" to the case of a possible transfer of a contract which had been made already with some other person; and the word "enjoy" to the case of a person with whom the contract was not made, but who as cestui que trust is to enjoy the benefit of it. But then the second part of that section says that any such person shall be incapable of being elected "during the time that he shall execute, hold or enjoy any such contract." Now, for such person to be executing, it seems to me he should be in a position to be called upon to execute, and if so, the words "hold" and "enjoy" would mean hold or enjoy in the same sense, i.e., holding or enjoying a contract which the contractor may be called upon to execute, or under which there may be something still to be executed. I think that such an interpretation may fairly be given from what appears in the 1st section by itself. But when you look at the 2nd section, and interpret that by the 7th section, I think the view indicated becomes much stronger, because the words in the 2nd section are the same as those used in the 1st, though they are applied to the case, not of a person entering into these contracts before he is elected, but after he is elected and has become a member of parliament. The 2nd section says that if any person being a member of parliament shall "enter into, accept of, agree for, undertake or execute" any such contract, or if he shall after the commencement of the next session of parliament "continue to hold, execute or enjoy the same," his seat is to be void. Therefore these are the same words as in the 1st section, and if the contract in the 2nd must be executory, it does seem to me that the contract contemplated by the 1st section must also be an executory contract. Now the 7th section deals with the case of persons who being in parliament at the time this Act was passed were disabled by reason of the words used in the 2nd section, and provides a mode by which such persons might get discharged from the execution of such contracts, and so get rid of the disability. The 7th section clearly contemplates that the contract from the disability under which the members could escape was still an executory contract. It seems to me therefore strong to shew that the contracts in the 2nd section are contracts still executory. And the 10th section would seem also to carry out the same view. If that be so, then, for the reason that I have already mentioned, it seems to me contracts under the first part of the 1st section must also be considered executory. The next question is, whether under the first part of the 1st section the contract there mentioned must be entered into with knowledge that it is with the government. It was argued that it was not necessary that there should be such knowledge, because it was said there were no words to that effect in the first part of the section, whereas the second part of the section is introduced by the words "knowingly and wilfully." But the first part of that section seems to me to be pointed to the case of entering into a contract; and the second part to the case of carrying out a contract. Mr. Manisty argued that that second part was intended to apply only to the case where a person having entered into a contract and given it up should nevertheless afterwards go on with it again. But considering how highly penal this statute is, it seems to me rather the more favourable construction to say, that the first part applies to contracts knowingly entered into with the government, and that the second part applies to the case where a contract has been entered into with the government in fact, but without the knowledge of that fact by the contractor, and he afterwards, upon its coming to his knowledge that the contract was with the government, he nevertheless goes on and insists upon executing it. If that be so, knowledge is required under the first part of the section just as well as under the second part. Then we come to the facts of the present case. In the first contract brought under the notice of the Court, it must be considered that it was a contract for the supply of goods to be paid for by cash payment. There was no credit. There was power indeed under the contract for the government to object to the goods when delivered, but before the election the goods had been supplied, and the government had accepted them as satisfactory, so that there was nothing to do but to pay the money; and the credit having expired, it would not be necessary for the creditor to sue upon the contract, but he could sue as for goods sold and delivered. It seems to me, under these circumstances, that at the time of the election the contract was executed, and was therefore not within the statute. Then, as to the case of the contract with the Broadmoor Asylum, I think the objection fails, because it is distinctly stated in the case that not only Mr. Birley did not know there was a contract with the agent of the government, but he actually did not know that any contract had been made. I must say, when one considers the results of a contrary decision, it does seem almost impossible that the Court could hold otherwise than it is about to do; because with respect to the contract in the first case, if the Court held differently, the government, when it had been supplied with goods, and had nothing to do but to perform the simple duty of payment, might be able to keep a person out of parliament for ever simply by not paying him his debt. And with respect to the contract in the second case, as was pointed out by Mr. Mellish, if the traveller of some large firm received an order from a person whom he did not know was an agent of the government, yet if he was such agent, although none of the principals of that traveller knew at the time of the election even that a contract had been entered into, and certainly not that it had been entered into with the government, then any one of the principals who should be elected to parliament, although he knew nothing of the matter until after he was elected, or perhaps until after he had sat in parliament for six months, would find his election void, and, according to my view of the matter, would find himself fixed with a penalty of 500*l.* for every day he sat or voted in parliament during those six months. The injustice of such a construction of a penal act seems to me fully to justify the Court in the interpretation of it which they have come to. I will only further say that the view which the Court now takes is not at all inconsistent with the decisions of the committees of the House of Commons in the case of Sir Sidney Waterlow, and in the Leominster case, because in both those cases there was, at the time of the election, something remaining to be done under the contract, whereas here the contract was, as it appears to me, no longer executory.

Judgment for the respondent, with costs.
